TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country. Strange and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been slandered, abused, and labelled beyond any civilised people on earth, insulted to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality, shielded and armour-plated with the cry of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality!" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loath to believe it, —and think, on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States, —and being to an inefficient blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over from this country, both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater sacrifice, has been conducting her commerce to a fear of War with the North. The so-called "neutrality" practised against the South has been their greatest hardship, and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. How strange and incredible have our conduct towards the combatants!—the Confederate States having declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South is conquered, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence: nay, we have, during this entire unprogressive struggle, given succour and support to the North, and rendered friendly aid. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North should blot out the South or not, or whether the South ought to have her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the Fraternity of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle men to be free, then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of concert of action among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends, and the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire. Offices open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., at 7, St. Mildred's-court, Poultry, E.C. Meetings every Wednesday at one o'clock, p.m., at the above place.

THE
CONFEDERATE STATES EXCHANGE ROOMS.

The want of some rallying point at which the friends of the Confederate Cause and those interested in business with the Southern States might meet, exchange views, and discuss matters of common concern, has been long and severely felt in this metropolis. It is proposed to supply this want by opening in some central and convenient locality a set of rooms, to be called "The Confederate States Exchange Rooms," or some other name that may hereafter be agreed upon, expressive of the objects the originators have in view. Arrangements will be made to ensure a regular supply of late Southern Papers, as well as authentic information from the best sources. The principal American Journals, and all Publications having an important bearing upon the issues of the American struggle, will be kept on hand. The initial steps have already been taken to carry these objects into practical execution, and a Committee will frame provisional rules and regulations, subject to revision by a general meeting of subscribers, so soon as the number shall have reached one hundred. Gentlemen desiring to co-operate in ensuring to this enterprise the success which it so amply deserves, are desired to place themselves immediately in communication with Mr. J. B. HOPKINS, Index Office, 13, Bouverie-street, E.C., who has kindly consented to act as Temporary Secretary until the final arrangements are completed.

NOW READY,
THE FIRST TWO NUMBERS OF A NEW QUARTERLY SCIENTIFIC JOURNAL, ENTITLED
THE ANTHROPOLOGICAL REVIEW,
AND

Journal of the Anthropological Society of London.
THE ANTHROPOLOGICAL REVIEW is an effort to supply a want which has long been felt by all who have directed any serious attention to the philosophy or natural history of Man. It will be a repository of facts, an arena for discussion, and a medium of communication between Anthropologists and travellers all over the world. All relevant subjects will receive, in its pages, a free and fair consideration, irrespective of party or personal feelings, and it will be the aim of the Editors to see that every question is discussed purely on its merits, and that every shade of opinion shall be able to command a fair and adequate representation. Neither will the work be a merely passive recipient of the communications of the learned or of the facts brought to light by travellers and explorers. It will actively seek, by every available means, to promote the study of Man "in all his leading aspects, physical, mental, and historical; to investigate the laws of his origin and progress; to ascertain his place in nature and his relations to the inferior forms of life; and to attain these objects by patient investigation, careful induction, and the encouragement of all researches tending to establish a de facto science of man." As a means of attaining these objects it will contain:—
I. Original Articles, or Translations of Original Communications in Foreign Languages.
II. Reviews of the principal British and Foreign Works on Anthropology.
III. Short Notices of the Minor Works bearing on the Science of Man.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

1862 .. 1,037 .. 769,324 .. 23,641 0 0
Thus in five years the number of Policies issued was 3,623, assuring the large sum of £2,928,947.
The leading features of the Office are:—
1. Entire Security to Assurers.
2. The large bonus additions already declared, and the prospect of a further bonus at the next investigation.
3. The advantages afforded by the varied Tables of Premiums—unrestricted Conditions of Policies—and general liberality in dealing with the Assured.
Forms of Proposal, and every information will be furnished on application at the Temporary Offices, 58, Threadneedle-street, 4, New Bank Buildings, London, E.C., and at the West-end office, 8, Waterloo-place, Pall Mall.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the bitter agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the lonely charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathize with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHERIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 21, Rue Lord Byron.

AMERICA.

GENERAL MEADE has issued a complimentary order to his troops; Mr. Chase has declared his conviction that the "rebellion" is virtually at an end; there has been a panic in Wall-street; and President Lincoln has called for 300,000 volunteers. It seems to us that General Meade and Mr. Chase are not quite so discreet as Wall-street and Mr. Lincoln. We cannot discover anything in the military situation that calls for Northern jubilation. The Army of the Potomac has again made a strategic movement, which has brought it further from Richmond and nearer to Washington. In plain language, the invader has retreated hastily, burning what stores he could not carry away. In the movement the rear of the Northern army was hardly pressed and suffered heavily in officers. Gregg's cavalry was surrounded and lost 500 men. The Army of the Potomac is within fifteen miles of the Federal capital; and within a threatening distance, on the old battle-ground of Bull Run, is the Confederate Army, which also holds all the passes in the Bull Run Mountains. If General Meade congratulates his army on such a retreat, how boundless would be his gratitude for a crushing defeat! And what was there in the prospect of affairs to inspire Mr. Chase with the idea that the "rebellion" is virtually at an end? It could not be Meade's retreat; yet the Federal prospect in Virginia is as promising as it is anywhere else. General Rosecrans is still shut up at Chattanooga with his rear harassed, his communications menaced, and his enemy building pontoons to bridge the river that separates the two camps. Burnside is 10th instant at Blue Springs, and all the Northern art being roughly handled. He attacked the Confederates on the 10th instant at Blue Springs, and all the Northern art of "cooking accounts" cannot conceal the ugly fact that the Confederates "inflicted heavy loss upon the Federals." About the same date a train of more than 300 wagons, containing ammunition and supplies for the Federals, was destroyed near Anderson, Alabama. There is "no news" from Charleston except a semi-official intimation that the siege is likely to be a long one. By the way, Admiral Dahlgren denies that any damage was done to the Ironsides by the Confederate torpedo raft. The Northern correspondents declare that she was so injured that it will be necessary to send her away for repairs. Of the two we rather believe the newspapers than the official report, especially as both admit that the crew of the Ironsides suffered, and it is not very probable that the crew could be injured and the vessel escape unscathed. The advance guard of General Herron's army in Louisiana, consisting of cavalry, infantry, and artillery, has been captured by the Confederates at Morganza. The capture of General Blunt's body-guard near Fort Scott, Kansas, is confirmed. The Confederates are active on the line of the Memphis and Charleston Railway, and in Missouri. As a set-off against these reverses, the Federals announce that General Brown has defeated Colonel Shelby in Missouri, "capturing all his artillery, small arms, baggage, and many prisoners." As Colonel Shelby was operating with a very small band, the captures could not have been very large. It is also notified that the Federals are about to resume offensive operations in the Teche country. No doubt, if unopposed, the operations of General Banks will be very offensive, so far as the destruction of property is concerned. If Mr. Chase expects the world to see anything that indicates the end of the "rebellion" in the present aspect of affairs he must be very sanguine, and have an exceedingly poor opinion of the common sense of mankind.

A correspondence has been published between Mr. Fullarton, who describes himself as "Acting British Consul," and who dates from the "British Consulate" at Savannah, and the Governor of Georgia, in reference to the enlistment of British subjects. The rule adopted in the Confederacy with respect to aliens is founded on common sense and equity, and is in accordance with the requirements of international law. An alien who has become naturalised, or who has taken such steps (for example, one who has served in the Confederate army) as entitles him to demand letters of naturalisation is, of course, in precisely the same position as a citizen by birth. Aliens travelling in the Confederate States, and who are manifestly mere visitors, are altogether exempt from military service. There remains a third class of aliens who are carrying on business in the Confederate States, who have taken up their abode in the Confederate States, and whose lives and property are as much under the protection of the respective Governments under which they live as are those of citizens. Now this class is held liable to military service, both in the State militia and in the Confederate army; but it must be observed, that when the war broke out aliens had the right and opportunity of leaving the Confederacy, and, indeed, it was not until a year after the commencement of the war that any demand was made upon them for military service. For their own convenience they elected to remain in the Confederacy, and cannot now reasonably complain of a manifest consequence of their choice. It is necessary to premise so much, that we may be able to appreciate the extraordinary position taken up by Mr. Fullarton in the name of the British Government.

On the 22nd of July he wrote to Governor Brown, demanding the exemption of British subjects from military service. In the letter he says, Her Majesty's Government acknowledges that British subjects resident in a foreign State are liable to serve as a local police or militia, and even to a limited extent to defend their places of residence against an invader. Mr. Fullarton adds:—

But if it shall so happen that the militia, after being so organised, shall be brought into conflict with the forces of the United States, without being turned over to the Confederate States, so as to form a component part of its armies, or if it should be so turned over, in either event the service required would be such as British subjects cannot be expected to perform.

In a subsequent communication, dated the 17th August, Mr. Fullarton explains that he did not mean exactly what he had written. He says:—

You have misunderstood me when I admitted the right of the State to claim the services of British subjects resident within its limits for the purpose of maintaining internal order, and even to a limited extent to defend the places of their residence against local invasion by a foreign Power. Such service might be rendered by them in the event of a war by a foreign Power, but not in a civil war, like that which now rages on this continent.

He then goes on to observe:—

I have consequently, under instructions, felt myself compelled to advise those drafted to acquiesce in the duty until they are required to leave their immediate homes or to meet the United States forces in actual conflict; in that event to throw down their arms and refuse to render a service, the performance of which would run directly in the teeth of Her Majesty's proclamation, and render them liable to the severe penalties denounced against a violation of the strict neutrality so strongly insisted on in that document.

And he winds up with the following menace:—

The despatches which I have received from the British Government relative to compulsory service are strong. I am instructed to remonstrate in the strongest terms against all attempts to force British subjects to take up arms. Should these remonstrances fail, the governments in Europe interested in this question will unite in making such representations as will secure to aliens this desired exemption.

Mr. Fullarton has clearly exceeded his province in attempting to discuss the character and objects of the war, and it is simply absurd in him to advise soldiers in the service of the State of Georgia to mutiny, in the face of any enemy against whom their commander may lead them. There is a state of warfare; that Mr. Fullarton sees and cannot deny; and he has nothing to do whatever with the question of Federal or Confederate right. But it is not to be denied, assuming that Mr. Fullarton is justified in drawing a distinction between liability of aliens to serve against a foreign Power and in case of civil war, that he is placed in an anomalous position, which somewhat excuses the insult which he, trusting to his own insignificance and the forbearance of the Confederate people, flung at the Confederacy in the name of the British Government. He chose to forget that Great Britain had recognised the Confederate States as a belligerent power, and he only remembered that his Government had refused to recognise the national existence of the Confederate States. So he tells the Governor of a Sovereign State, of which the government is administered as regularly and as orderly as the Government of England, that he, Governor Brown, is engaged in a civil war, and, in fact, that he is a rebel. And, then, mark Mr. Fullarton's inconsistency. He threatens the Confederate States with certain pains and penalties if his mandate is not obeyed. But if it is a civil war raging in America, Mr. Fullarton ought not to remonstrate with the "rebel" Governor Brown; but he ought to complain at Washington, and seek redress from a Government which Great Britain does recognise. This correspondence, indeed, exemplifies in a very strong degree the impolicy and the injustice of non-recognition. British subjects are undoubtedly entitled to protection wherever they reside. Who is to be responsible for their protection in the Confederate States? Mr. Lincoln? Mr. Lincoln has no power to protect them. Ought the de facto Government of the Confederate States to afford them protection? But we cannot hold any power responsible for its acts unless we recognise the existence of that power.

Possibly the practical result of Mr. Fullarton's conduct will be that the Confederate Government will refuse to allow any British consul to reside within its jurisdiction unless he applies for an exequatur from that Government. The replies of Governor Brown to Mr. Fullarton's letters were singularly courteous. He reminds Mr. Fullarton that many persons claiming to be British subjects are large slaveholders, and that all those who are so anxious to be exempted from military service are not less anxious to enjoy the protection of the State. He says, however, that those British subjects who have no stomach for the fight and who are not conscripted by the Act of Congress are free to depart, but that they shall not remain under the protection of the State unless they will contribute to the defence thereof. In answer to Mr. Fullarton's insult about the Confederacy being engaged in a civil war, Governor Brown merely tells him that if that is the case he should have applied to Washington and not to him. With regard to Mr. Fullarton's advice to British subjects to throw down their arms in the face of the enemy, the Governor says that any who follow it will be dealt with according to the law, and mutiny before an enemy is death, in the code of every nation. In his final communication the Governor announces that he will cheerfully grant passports for all those who are proved to him to be British subjects to depart from the State after thirty days notice, provided they became residents after the 19th January, 1861, when the Ordinance of Secession was passed, or, being resident before that, filed a declaration within three months that they did not wish to become citizens of Georgia.

The Anglo-Federal press have paid Colonel Lamar the compliment of perverting, instead of answering his argument. Thus they have found it necessary to represent his remarks as applying to the African slave trade, when in fact Colonel Lamar's only reference to that subject was to say that he would not then discuss the agencies by which the South was forced to solve the difficult problem how to deal with a numerous population of an inferior race. Everybody knows, what Colonel Lamar withheld from courtesy to his hearers, that it was the mother country, against the strenuous opposition of the Colonies, which planted the African race on the American continent. Elsewhere will be found some correspondence relating to the insinuations made against Colonel Lamar.

Like the man with the ass, if we may be pardoned a Lincoln illustration, Earl Russell has succeeded in offending both North and South. This, we know, his advocates cite as an evidence of neutrality, but it is simply a proof of bad administration. In reference to the reported stoppage of the steam-rails, a Richmond paper observes, that if the British Government was really neutral, and would be at as much pains to stop Federal recruiting in Ireland, the war would be over in three months. How the Federals regard his Lordship's cringing policy we may gather, not only from the Northern papers, but from the observations of a member of the Federal Cabinet. Secretary Chase has lately delivered a speech in Cincinnati, in which he attributed the non-intervention of foreign Powers to the display of Federal strength; and said that England would hereafter regret her friendship with America's enemies, and would pay for the damage done to Federal shipping by Confederate cruisers. He also declared that he had sometimes felt "as if he should like to take Old Mother England by the hair, and give her a good shaking." Who will now pretend that the insults of the New York Herald are not to be regarded, seeing that they are thus endorsed by a Cabinet Minister? Except Mr. Bright and Historicus, no Englishman of any reputation can feel much sympathy with a Power that is perpetually bullying us.

Under the heading of "Honour to the Czar," a full account is published in the New York Herald of the dinner given to the Russian Admiral at the Astor House. The table was decorated with a statue of Alexander II., and the bill of fare included "a cake fort, ornamented with Russian colours." The business of the evening was inaugurated by a grace said by the Rev. Dr. Hitchcock, who asked "a blessing on the Emperor of the Orient and the President of the Western Republic." The first toast was, "The Emperor of Russia.—Absolute as a monarch, enlightened as a statesman, allied to the people of all lands by his efforts in behalf of the freedom of his own!" This was received with acclamation, "and a discharge of miniature guns from a model of Fort Sumter, situated at the end of the room." The admirable taste of "the model of Fort Sumter," particularly as the real Fort Sumter is not yet taken, must have commended itself to the Russian Admiral. Amongst the choice specimens of oratory, we notice the remark of Mr. Brady, the chairman, who, speaking of Admiral Farragut, "the hero of New Orleans," observed, "Seated beside this man (the Russian Admiral), is him whose orator now is, as his orator in the future will be, the majestic Mississippi river, raising itself from its bed to rejoice that he consecrated it to freedom for ever and ever." The Rev. Mr. Chapin said, "The Hudson never bore up with greater joy the keels of any noble ships as it now does the fleet that has come to us from the waters of the Neva." Mr. Gould proposed as a toast, "The City of New York.—With her left hand she grasps the harvest of the West, with her right she weds the everlasting sea." However, these are harmless follies, that will not disturb the Mississippi, or the Hudson, or "the everlasting sea;" but the Russian manifestation is not a mere ebullition of the popular whim. At a gathering on board the Russian flag-ship the toast was drunk of "Russia and America.—In time of peace friends; in time of war allies." It is also rather significant that when the Russian officers were asked to meet the English and French officers, to inspect the institutions of New York they declined the invitation. Another Russian war vessel has arrived at New York.

General Magruder has issued an order to the Army of Texas upon the victory at Sabine Pass. He thus describes the brilliant engagement:—"Attacked by five gunboats, the fort, mounting but three guns of small calibre, and manned by the Davis Guards, Lieutenant R. M. Dowling, assisted by Lieutenant Smith, of the Engineers, supported by about two hundred men—the whole under command of Captain F. H. Odium—steadily resisted their fire, and at last forced the surrender of the two gun-boats, Clifton and Sachem, badly crippling another, which, with the others, escaped over the bar. The result of this gallant achievement is the capture of two fine gun-boats, fifteen heavy guns, over two hundred prisoners—among them the commodore of the fleet—and over fifty of the enemy killed and wounded; while not a man was lost on our side or a gun injured."

The elections in Pennsylvania, Ohio, Iowa, and Indiana appear to have gone against the Democrats, although the final results of the Pennsylvania and Ohio elections were not known when the mail left New York. We observed last week that Mr. Seward was unduly nervous, and that the master of legions can always regulate the ballot-box.

A correspondence between Messrs. Seward and Stanton, and Generals Banks and McClellan, in reference to the arrest of the legislature of Maryland, has, through some treachery, come to light. We are not concerned to know by whose contrivance it is published, but it is of interest, as it admits what no one in the South doubts—that Maryland would have passed an ordinance of Secession but for military intervention. The object of this correspondence is to prove that General McClellan is no better than his Republican rivals, and was quite as ready to become the tool of arbitrary power.

Governor Gamble, of Missouri, has issued a proclamation declaring that any attempt to remove him from his office before the expiration of his term of administration will be regarded and treated by him as treason against the State, the penalty for which is death. He also gives warning that any interference with the elections on the part of the military will be resisted by the employment of all the force at his command.

The fluctuations in the price of gold at New York have been considerable. At one time the price was 56 per cent. premium; then Mr. Chase's brokers operated, and the price receded to 48 per cent. premium, but immediately recovered to 49½.

ENGLAND.

The Colchester Conservative Association held its annual dinner last week. Mr. Papillon, M.P. for the borough, in the course of a speech then delivered, said that he shuddered at the pitch to which men's feelings in America had been roused. When we heard the sentiment of Parson Brownlow, calling for "Greek fire for the masses, and hell fire for the leaders," we had heard enough to rouse the spirit of every true Christian. He was an ardent advocate for peace, but if peace was to be preserved as the present Government seemed inclined to preserve it, at the expense of England's honour and at the expense of humanity, then he thought it was time some other government was in power. The day had come and passed when we might have stepped in, and by simply recognising the South have put an end to the quarrel; but the Government had always professed that their policy was one of strict neutrality. Was, however, the course adopted with regard to Mr. Laird's rams in the Mersey an honest neutrality? He thought that it was in excess of the powers given by law, and now Lord Russell, having his doubts on the point, was about to make the Act more stringent. Surely this savoured more of a coward trucking to a bully than of an English statesman with a good old name, to whom were entrusted the honour and chivalry of England. Captain Jervis, M.P. for Harwich, also addressed the meeting, and said that with reference to the American question he was in favour of the strictest neutrality, but it was not preserving the strictest neutrality to put an Act in force called the Foreign Enlistment Act, which was brought forward in support of Spain against her rebel colonies. It was because this Act gave such a preponderance to Spain that the late Lord Stowell supported it. It was clear then that such an Act could not but give a preponderance to the Power in whose favour it was exercised, and, therefore, to put it in force was to violate the strict neutrality which we professed.

Mr. Edmond Beales has summoned and presided over another meeting of the National League for the Independence of Poland. Prince Czartoryski was present, and addressed the assembly. He said that the cause of Poland was the cause of the Western Powers, that his countrymen were in arms for individual liberty, political and religious equality before the law, justice to all and freedom of commerce, and that it was false to represent the struggle as one for ultramontane principles. He further declared that the peasants were eager for the freedom of their country, and were only precluded from fighting by the lack of arms. He claimed from England the withdrawal of her sanction of the dominion of Russia, and the recognition of the belligerent rights of the Poles. The president implored the members of the League to furnish money and other substantial assistance to the Poles acts which would not implicate England in a war. The objects of the League were, first, to obtain from England a declaration of the avoidance of the Russian dominion, and second, an acknowledgment of the Poles as belligerents. He did not know, and he did not care, whether these steps would lead to war between England and Russia.

The Right Hon. the Earl of Powis was on Monday last elected without opposition to the office of Lord High Steward of the University of Cambridge, in the room of the late Right Hon. Baron Lyndhurst.

There is at length some prospect of locomotion within the city of London being made somewhat less arduous than the ascent of Mount Blanc. The Court of Aldermen, at a meeting at Guildhall, has been engaged in considering a code of bye-laws for the future regulation of traffic within their jurisdiction. These rules have been drawn up under the provisions of an Act of Parliament passed last Session, which was introduced at the instance of the Court of Common Council, and have now been adopted by the Court of Aldermen, subject to the approval of the Secretary of State. The first regulation is that every cab and omnibus going eastwards through St. Paul's Churchyard to London Bridge shall pass down Cannon Street and not down Cheapside. No vehicle drawn by more than four horses, nor laden with merchandise to a greater height than 16 ft. from the ground, or a greater width than 7 ft., shall pass through the streets between nine in the morning and six in the evening; but strangely enough, the vested interests of vehicles in use before the 28th July last are reserved. So locomotives and waggons laden with timber are prohibited within the same hours. No coals, beer, wine, or other liquid in casks conveyed in carts, waggons, or vans, are to be delivered in twenty-four of the principal streets of the city between nine in the morning and five in the evening, and every waggon while delivering goods is to be placed with its side parallel with the foot pavement. The sale of vegetables, fruit, fish or other articles carried upon any truck or vehicle is prohibited during the day in the main streets. Provision is also made for the management of the shoe-black brigade, the stations for them being enumerated, and the number of boys regulated. Power is given to the Chief Commissioner to increase the number of the boys to 300, and the number of standing-places to 150.

The last of the ships appointed to convey the cable which in a few months will connect England with the most remote provinces of the Indian Empire, is to leave for Bombay this week. The vessels employed in this service are the Assaye, the Tweed, the Marian Moore, the Winabam, and the Cospatrick. The length of the cable as shipped is 1,250 miles, it is 1½ in. in diameter, and weighs in water 2½ tons to the mile. Each ship carries out complete telegraph stores for one station in the Persian Gulf, and the Charente, hereafter to be called the Amber Witch, carries thirty or forty miles of shore ends of great strength, being herself destined for service between the new stations. In each of the vessels there are three massive wrought-iron tanks built from the bottom of the main-deck, and in these the cable is stowed away in three coils, the beginning and end of each coil being carried along the ships to the testing-room, and the tanks are then filled with water by a small steam-pump on deck. By this contrivance the cable can be tested while under water in the tanks daily, and for this purpose a member of Sir Charles Bright's electrical staff goes with each ship. A large staff of skilled workmen, an immense stock of appliances and materials for repairs in case of injury, and the most perfect and costly sets of instruments are also on board. The five stations will be from Kurracheeto Gwadel, from Gwadel to the peninsula of Khasab, from Khasab to Bushire, and from Bushire to Fow on the estuary at the mouth of the Euphrates. From this point the line will be carried to Bagdad, Mossul, Diabekir and Scutari. Dr. Esselbach is to be chief superintendent in charge of the whole line, having at his disposal a regular staff of skilled mechanics at the head-quarters at Kurrachee. At each station there will be a superintendent and a deputy of great experience, together with six clerks. None of the staff will be kept more than three consecutive months at one station; the Amber Witch will carry the letters and papers between the stations, and a library of 2,000 volumes has been sent for the use of the men. The work of submerging will probably commence at the end of January, and will occupy a month. The great risk will be incurred along the land-line between the last station on the Gulf and Scutari, from the uncertain temper of the Arabs and the apathetic contumacy of Turkish operators. There will be a subsidiary line from Bushire to Teheran and from Teheran to Bagdad. There will also be a line from Teheran to Teflis, and from Teflis there will be communication by the Russian lines. Colonel Stuart is to leave at once for Constantinople to inspect the lines in Asia Minor, and will go thence to Bofnab. Sir Charles Bright and Mr. Latimer Clark, with the rest of their staff, will leave next month to make all necessary arrangements in reference to their responsibility in laying the wire.

A meeting of the Great Ship Company was held last week at Manchester for the purpose of taking into consideration the recommendations of the London committee. A resolution was unanimously passed in accordance with that of the London committee to raise the necessary funds to pay off the current and pressing liabilities of the Company. A further resolution was also adopted to raise the necessary funds to equip and send the ship on a voyage to India or Australia; and the opinion of the meeting was expressed, that if such a voyage were undertaken, not only with due regard to economy, but with energy and prudence, it would be a commercial success. It seems to us that the advantages of a voyage to Australia are obvious as compared with short trips across the Atlantic. In a vessel of so vast a size the expenses of loading and unloading are enormous, and it is only marvellous that the Company has only now adopted an enterprise of such superior promise.

On Friday last, Mr. John Laird, M.P., distributed the prizes for rifle and artillery shooting at Birkenhead, and made an elaborate speech on the national defences. He first referred to the question of the Armstrong gun, and stated that the country had spent £2,500,000 on that gun, and had not got value for the money. Mr. Laird thought the appointment of Sir William Armstrong as Engineer-in-Chief of the Rified Ordnance an injudicious appointment, because the Government was thereby confined to the inventions of one man instead of being able to avail themselves of the scientific knowledge of all the best men of the country. It had been proved that the Armstrong gun was absolutely inferior to the old 68-pounder at a range of 200 yards. Next as to the building of ships: Mr. Laird thought that the plan of Mr. Coles was the only one adapted for the working of heavy guns, for the cupola principle would admit of the use of a 20 ton gun, and the cupola itself could be armed with plates of 15 inches in thickness. He also referred with praise to the plan of Mr. Reed, and censured the Government for not yet having a vessel built on either principle. In his opinion, our navy was not in such a state as to enable us to go to war with a certainty of success. At present, we had only two ships in the navy list suitable for coast defences, and they were not brought forward. Moreover, her Majesty's dockyards were wholly insufficient. They did not contain together more than forty-one acres of space, and the number of the graving docks was thirty-three, while Liverpool and Birkenhead had 400 acres of space, and 28 graving docks. Mr. Laird then referred to the Alabama. He was not ashamed to say that his sons had designed the Alabama. That vessel and the Florida had been afloat for a considerable time, and had defied the power of 400 ships. He denied that there had been any secrecy observed about the ship. She had not crept away at night, but had sailed at 11 o'clock in the morning, after having been anchored off the landing-stage. He ridiculed the story of the sailor to whom the captain had told all the ins and outs of the enterprise. Any number of men could be hired to go on any expedition, and if a little extra pay were given it was quite unnecessary to say a word about destination. Mr. Laird referred to a secret expedition which he had equipped and sent to India and China some years ago for our Government, about which not a word was ever known till the object was accomplished. He was sure that the statement regarding the captain of the Alabama having told a sailor all about the ship was false; and the sailor to whom he referred, a man named Passmore, was the man whose evidence, and whose evidence alone, the solicitor-general considered as substantial. Mr. Laird also quoted Lord Palmerston's words declaring, that as the ship sailed unarmed her condition could never have justified a seizure. Mr. Laird then alluded to Earl Russell's speech at Blairgowrie, and said that the noble lord had undertaken to say that he could do certain things, and that if he found the law insufficient he could go to Parliament and get an indemnity. Mr. Laird did not believe that Parliament would ever indemnify any man, however great and powerful he might be, if he was trying to transgress the law. Mr. Laird's remarks were received with much applause, and the name of the Earl Russell was considerably hissed.

ENGLAND will shortly be, or is already, rid of the Rev. H. W. Beecher. His orations at Manchester, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Liverpool have, as might naturally have been expected, excited the utmost disgust in the mind of every reasonable man and the heart of every decent Christian. The greatest of men have not arrived at perfection, and new gifts may be ever acquired. Mr. Beecher is no exception to the rule. He has possessed hitherto many excellent gifts: he now boasts the greatest of all. He is a prophet, and like the great ones of old, armed from heaven with miraculous gifts. If any man doubts the interposition of the Deity, exercised to change, hasten, or retard the ordinary laws of cause and effect, let him hear the miracle worked on behalf of Beecher, and the faith he preaches, and no longer disbelieve. The narrative of this marvellous event is as follows: on Friday last, the 23rd of October, a numerous company, consisting principally of ministers of different dissenting members, assembled at breakfast at Radley's Hotel, to bid a last farewell to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. The Hon. and Rev. W. B. Noel occupied the chair. The man whom that assembly had met to honour made an elaborate address, the principal portion of which was occupied in the somewhat arduous undertaking of proving that the negro was better off in the North than in the South. Our object, however, is to direct attention to one of the most remarkable statements ever addressed to men supposed to be in a sane condition of mind. Mr. Beecher said that he felt he could speak with perfect freedom in that assembly as to what he believed to be the interposition of Providence on his behalf since he had been in this country. When he came from the Continent he had been for more than twenty weeks without speaking, and was quite out of training; and after speaking in Manchester, Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Liverpool his voice completely failed him. He was afraid he would not be able to speak in Exeter Hall. When, however, on Tuesday morning he spoke to himself, he found his voice as clear as a whistle. Some might say that his recovery was owing to the remedies he adopted, but he was disposed to think that in their use he had the direct interposition of the Almighty. Now we candidly own that we are somewhat puzzled to know in what light to regard this extraordinary declaration. We are asked to believe, not that the interposition to which Mr. Beecher testifies took place—even an Abolitionist of the first water would scarcely believe that the Deity would interpose to turn the harshness of Mr. Beecher's voice into the shrill clearness of a whistle—but what we are called upon to believe is this, that any man with any pretensions to common sense could persuade himself that such an interposition had taken place in his behalf. Henry Ward Beecher is quite welcome to the alternative: he is a fanatic or an impostor. Either he states what he does not for a moment believe, or he surpasses all men in the art of self-deception. For years he has been an agitator, a politician, and a preacher, now he is an inspired prophet. Henry Ward Beecher returns to New England a greater man, if possible, than when he left.

THE CONTINENT.

NOTHING is yet known about the resolution of the Allies with regard to Poland, and it is not at all improbable that they have come to no resolution. It is still asserted that Earl Russell despatched a note to St. Petersburg declaring the forfeiture of Poland by Russia, but it is now added that the noble lord repented in a day or two of his own energy, and stopped, by a telegram to Lord Napier, the presentation of the offensive notification.

On the other hand, it is asserted that Austria has gained both Powers over to her views, and that the allied reply to the Russian despatch will be a summons to Russia to accept the six points: a summons couched in language which will give it the character of an ultimatum. Credat Judeus. Austria may talk largely about her wish to free Poland, and even repeat the falsehoods proffered by Prince Metternich to Lord Castlereagh in 1814, about her willingness to abandon Galicia in favour of an independent Poland; but she will never involve herself in a war with Russia, the upshot of which, whichever way it may go, must be very much to her disadvantage. All the efforts of the French Government will not avail to determine her to take such a step, and the French Government, in its anxiety to do something for Poland, in its consciousness that any isolated action on its part would be ascribed to selfish motives, has done everything in its power to assure the Austrian Government against any dangers from the adoption of a decided policy. The Mémorial Diplomatique has this week published an analysis of two despatches from M. Drouyn de Lhuys to London and Vienna, dated in June, and urging the importance of an understanding between the three Powers, as to the course to be adopted in the event, which the French Minister rightly enough foresaw, of a refusal of Russia to accept the six points; throughout these despatches an earnest desire is shown that arrangements should be made to ensure Austria against any possible loss by the adoption of energetic measures. These despatches had not the effect of obtaining the result they desired, but they are valuable as evidence of the sincerity, and we may say, the singleness of purpose, with which France has taken up the Polish cause. We must mention here a rumour coming from a very good source, to the effect that Count Rechberg, in the course of his more recent conversations with the English and French ambassadors, assured them, and was able to prove his assurance, that the insurrection was practically at an end. If the Austrian Government has acquired that conviction it certainly will not have proposed to address any ultimatum to St. Petersburg. We are sorry to say that all reports from impartial authorities tend to confirm the statement attributed to the Austrian Minister. For a long time the Russian Government has been preparing for a desperate effort to crush the movement. The certainty that the friends of Poland can do nothing to help her for six months has inspired fresh energy in the Russian authorities. Two large bands of sympathisers, one exceeding 700 in number, contrived to elude the vigilance of the Austrians, and crossed the frontier within the last few days—only, however, to be surrounded and dispersed with great loss by an overwhelming Russian force. The Russian authorities seem to have at last got upon the track of the secret National Government. If advices from Breslau can be believed, they have seized a secret printing press, and there can be no doubt that they have arrested a large number of influential persons in Warsaw, including forty members of the municipality of the city. There are still many small bands carrying on a guerilla warfare; but we hear nothing, even from the Polish news manufacturers, of the larger corps, of whose exploits so much was said a little time ago, and the natural inference is that the Russians have at last succeeded in overwhelming them.

The latest measures of General de Berg show that he has no fear of producing an explosion in Warsaw. He has issued orders prohibiting the wearing of mourning after the 10th of November.

The Russian consul-general in London, M. de Berg, a brother of the General, has been getting himself into something of a mess, by contradicting in the Times certain statements as to an execution in Wilna. The consul denied that the persons mentioned had been executed, and a day or two after, an extract from the official Wilna Gazette, was forwarded to the Times, giving an account of these very executions. M. de Berg's zeal outruns his discretion. Of what avail is it for him even to prove the falsity of some of the charges made against his Government? The fact remains unquestioned that General Mouravieff and General de Berg too have shot, flogged, and deported an immense number of persons. If M. de Berg can prove that these punishments were well deserved, well and good. If he cannot, he had better leave the matter alone, and not increase the public indignation by lame attempts to explain away particular accusations.

The Germans have been celebrating with great pomp the fiftieth anniversary of the battle of Leipsic. Almost everywhere throughout the land, the 18th, a Sunday, was kept as a grand holiday, and the memory of the great fight in which French domination was broken honoured by concerts, special religious services, torch processions and illuminations. The chief celebration, however, was at Leipsic itself. There were gathered a large number of the veterans who had taken part in those eventful days of combat, and the representatives of many of the chief towns of Germany. The festival was favoured by fine weather and passed off very well. It did not, however, assume that grand national character which its originators had desired. The place itself, although, of course, in one sense the fittest, was in another the most unfortunate. The King of Saxony fought then on the side of Bonaparte, and so did his subjects, during a portion of the contest. They went over during the battle to the Allies, and Leipsic, merely as a battle-field, is not a very honourable recollection for Saxony. Many of the Saxon soldiers who fought in those days wear the medal of St. Helena. Again, the result of the battle of Leipsic was the division of Saxony; the richer half of the kingdom was added to Prussia to make good the losses she had sustained at the hands of the French, and many Saxon towns declined to have any part in the celebration of a day which was the cause of the dismemberment of Saxony and their separation from their brethren. Other towns refused to share in the celebration for other reasons: some Prussian ones, because they did not deem the time appropriate for any jubilee; and the participation on the part of the Southern Germans was not a little checked by the attempt of the National Verein to improve the occasion for the promotion of its own views. However, so far as the fête went, it was most successful.

On the same day King Louis of Bavaria opened the magnificent Hall of Liberation, which he has erected at Kelheim, on the Danube, not far from Ratisbon, to celebrate the liberation of Germany, in the presence of many veteran generals who had fought in that war. His Majesty welcomed them in these words: "Welcome, valiant soldiers of the War of Liberation! Welcome all! It is Germany's most glorious time; we will hold to it. I can only say to you what I have written in the Hall of Liberation: 'May the Germans never forget what made the War of Liberation necessary, and by what means they conquered.'"

The primary elections in Prussia have, as was generally anticipated, resulted in the complete triumph of the Liberals. Almost everywhere the overwhelming majority of the wahlmannen, or election-men, is decidedly hostile to the Government; and in only a few of the rural districts has Herr von Bismarck, in spite of all the extraordinary efforts made by himself and his colleagues—in spite of all the intimidation they have brought to bear upon the public functionaries and all persons in the slightest degree dependent upon the Government or the Court—any chance of obtaining the election of candidates willing to support him. The new Chamber will be much more decidedly liberal than the last. The election of the deputies took place yesterday.

A conference has been held at Nurnberg during the past week, attended by the ministers of the sovereigns—with the exception of those of the very small states—who signed the Austrian Reform Act. The object of the conference was the discussion of the means to be taken for the execution of that act, and the preparation of the joint answer to the Prussian ministerial report, recommended in the despatch which Count Rechberg addressed to the signatories of the Reform Act, upon receipt of the Prussian memorandum. A telegram announcing that the conference, having despatched its business, had broken up, adds that the result was satisfactory. That would mean that the diplomatists were unanimous. If they were, we may be certain that no decided action has been resolved upon.

The Transylvanian deputies have made their appearance in the Reichsrath. In administering the oaths, the President of the House of Deputies made an appropriate speech of welcome, appropriately answered, when, for the first time the Magyar tongue sounded in the Austrian Parliament. The Reichsrath now completed, and in full possession of its powers, has set vigorously to work to despatch the budget and other business of importance.

The Austrian Minister of Commerce, Count Wickenburg, has resigned. The cause of his resignation is said to be the resolve of the Government to give up the scheme he had broached of an international exhibition in Vienna in 1865.

The German Diet has declined to entertain the despatch of Earl Russell protesting against the Federal occupation of Holstein, on the ground that the question is one with which foreign Powers have no concern. This pretension is altogether untenable, inasmuch as the avowed object of the execution is an alteration in the position of Schleswig towards Holstein, in the first place, and then towards Denmark; but the Diet was out of temper, as it well might be, with a statesman who could protest against its taking measures to obtain the adoption of the very arrangement he had himself suggested. A subsequent despatch from his lordship was referred to the committee upon whose recommendation the refusal to entertain the former one was resolved. In the second despatch Earl Russell has again considerably changed his tone. Instead of protesting on the part of England against the execution, he points out the dangers to German shipping which would ensue if Denmark should be irritated into blockading the German ports and seizing German ships, and intimates that Denmark is ready to declare the ordinance of the 30th March only provisional if the Bund will postpone the execution.

The Danish Government seems to have determined after all to treat the execution as a casus belli. Whilst its courage and resolution are rising, that of Germany is ebbing out at the palms of its hands. Austria will push on the occupation as long as there is no danger of war, because Prussia is opposed to it, but if Austria discovers that war is likely to break out she will be glad enough of a pretence for drawing back.

An odd story is going the round of the papers, to the effect that the King of Denmark recently made a speech in which he declared that if France and Sweden allowed South Jutland (Schleswig) to be conquered by Germany he would resign his crown and proclaim a republic, for which, his Majesty added, the Danish people were well suited. Some English newspapers, which ought to know better, have accepted this story as true, and have believed that his Majesty, so speaking, meant what he said. The King of Denmark sometimes gets a little excited, and might possibly make such a declaration; but he certainly would not hold to it in the morning. He has no more right to proclaim a republic in Denmark than he would have to cede the whole kingdom to the King of Prussia. He has given his assent to a law, by virtue of which Prince Christian succeeds to the throne of Denmark upon his death or abdication; and the rights of Prince Christian, who certainly would not be disposed to abandon them, even in the very improbable case that the Danes wished him to do so, are virtually guaranteed by the great Powers.

The Italian Senate and Chamber of Deputies are convoked for the 17th of November. The Ministry seems to be extremely disunited; one section is always attacking the other in the press, but just as it comes to an open rupture and one side or other must resign, the difficulty is made up and both pretend to be excellent friends:

The Spanish elections have resulted, as was inevitable, in a signal triumph for the Ministry. The Liberals, as we have announced, abstained from all part in the election, and the Marquis de Miraflores and his colleagues had everything their own way. The triumph is, however, rather too signal: the Ministers feel that the country is not with them, and it is anticipated that they will not remain in office until the opening of the session. One of the Ministers has already resigned.

A somewhat similar resolution to that adopted by the Spanish Liberals has been taken by the Gross Deutsch and Conservative party in the Duchy of Baden. This party, many of the leaders of which are Government officials, does not indeed impute to the Government that interference with the elections which occasioned the abstention in Spain, but it seems to have felt that it could return no candidates, or at least, very few, at the approaching elections, and that it would be more consistent with its dignity and profit its cause more to leave the Liberal and Prussian Hegemony party to do as it pleases.

The Swiss Federal Assembly is composed of two houses; one a kind of senate, consisting of two representatives from each canton, the other a national council of 120 members, elected by the cantons in proportion to their population. The election of this national council took place on Sunday. The strength of parties is but little changed. The Liberals retain the overwhelming majority.

Earl Russell has published some correspondence designed to vindicate himself against the charge of having got rid of Sir James Hudson in order to find a place for his relative Mr. Elliott. It commences with a letter from the Foreign Secretary to Sir James Hudson, accepting his resignation, declaring that nothing but his own desire to quit a mission where his efforts had been attended with such memorable success could have induced him (Lord Russell) to recommend to the Queen any other person to represent her Majesty at Turin; regretting that no principal embassy was vacant to offer Sir James; intimating her Majesty's intention to confer upon him the Grand Cross of the Bath, and generally as flattering as the most greedy could desire. The next letter is from Sir James, thanking Earl Russell, but explaining that he had informed the King of Italy, who had asked why he quitted the Court of Turin, that he conceived himself bound by an engagement with Earl Russell to do so. "Offered promotion in March, 1862, I had obtained permission to decline it and to continue to reside at his Majesty's court until such time as my pension for public service was due to me." Earl Russell at once writes to Mr. Elliott to declare that Sir James had made a great mistake. In March, 1862, he had reason to believe that a first-class embassy would be vacant, and thought no one more deserving of promotion than Sir James Hudson. Sir James, however, declined the promotion, because he wished to remain at Turin; when, therefore, in the spring of this year Sir James intimated his intention to resign his post, his lordship thought that, after more than thirty years of public service, he wished to retire.

Earl Russell would seem from this correspondence to have had some injustice done him; but it is possible that this correspondence does not tell the whole story, and before we charge Sir James Hudson with undue sensitiveness, we must wait for revelations yet to come.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, October 13.

THE aspect of the war is very much changed within a few weeks, even in the estimate of the most sanguine Federals. Not long ago they were buoyant with the faith that the resisting power of the South was broken, that its armies were dispirited and disorganised, that the roads and hills were full of deserters whom no force could bring back into the ranks, and that there were great multitudes, even whole States, ready to implore for peace on any terms which the victorious North might be mercifully inclined to grant. In fact, there was such an assurance felt of the immediate closing up of "the rebellion," that a serious quarrel has been growing up among the Abolitionists, extending to the members of the President's Cabinet, on the questions, how the subjugated people and States are to be disposed of; how much, if any, of property and rights, is to be left to them; and to what degree the hanging of leaders should be limited. The folly of selling the hide of the lion before the hunt is over has passed into a proverb, and the proverb has a meaning the Yankees would do well to profit by, when they stop to reckon up the spoil of a subjugated South.

The idea of an early conclusion of the war, by victory or by submission, is passing away. The confidence of final success is not at all abated, nor is the determination to subdue the Southern people at all costs, and the rage at being so long baffled adds a deadlier intensity to the purpose; but the news from the South has effectually dulled the expectation that the war will be closed with this campaign, or that it will soon be closed, with the assent of any portion of the people worth taking into calculation, on any other terms than total separation from the North. The consolidation of the South, in this determination, appears in every act which reaches us, cleared of the mists in which Southern accounts are designedly enveloped by the Federal reports. The unanimous vote of the Confederate Congress against the proposition to institute an inquiry into the disposition of the people of the North in respect to peace, is evidently in accord with the sentiments of the great masses of the people. Every public man of the South whose name is paraded at the North as disposed to listen to terms of re-union, makes haste to repel the imputation in the most public declaration possible of his hostility to all forms of political association with the North, now or ever. The journals here take no notice of such denials, but continue to deceive their readers by daily repetitions of the same falsehoods; as in the case of Governor Vance, of North Carolina, and Judge Watts, the newly elected Governor of Alabama, both of whom are held up as friends of a restoration of the old government, on terms, when they have severely repelled the imputation, resentfully, in published documents, under their own signatures. Instead of being demoralised and scattered, the armies are largely recruited, and are exceedingly active. The army of General Bragg, which was described as most disheartened, has turned on the advancing column and defeated them. At this moment, instead of being overwhelmed and flying, the Confederates are rallying at all points, making head everywhere against the most imposing Federal forces, and startling the Yankees with the audacity and success of their aggressive movements in unexpected quarters. The proofs of terrible energy and inflexible resolve are heard from all parts of the invaded South.

This state of affairs would be more clearly discernible but for the circumstance that the fall elections were coming on, several of which, namely, in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and some of the more western States, come off to-day, for which army and other news, by telegraph and by official reports, have required to be manipulated in the interest of the Government. The Administration is openly in the field, to sustain itself and keep its partisans in office, and to secure a prolongation of its own power. Of course, and until these elections are decided, it has been useless to look for a candid statement of any facts. Whatever is unpalatable is suppressed; whatever cannot be altogether suppressed is coloured so as to look like success; and the grossest exaggerations, and even down-right fabrications of Federal victories, swarm in the columns of the press.

But in spite of this constant stream of deceptions the military situation is widely felt to be much worse than it has been for several months before, and the prospect of improvement, in any essential particular, is, at this date, extremely doubtful.

It has been announced, positively, that Charleston was to be attempted, by a combined assault of the army and navy, on the 11th of October, last Saturday. The Greek fire was to be tried again, for the purpose of destroying the city, from a distance, while the attack on its defences was going on. We ought to hear something of the result before the steamer sails to-morrow, and you may get some account, received by telegraph, at the latest moment, from Boston. The city may possibly be destroyed by the fire; but I have no idea that the defences can be taken or pierced, or that it will ever be surrendered.

The movements in Virginia are very puzzling, even to the men in authority. They either do not know what is going on on the side of the Confederates, or they are not sure of what it is expedient to say about it. The current Federal version a few days ago was, that General Lee had weakened his forces so much by reinforcement sent to Gen. Bragg, in the South-west, that he could no longer hold the line of the Rapidan, but was withdrawing, so as to be nearer to Richmond. Suddenly, however, Lee, last Saturday, made a northern movement, in the neighbourhood of Madison Court-house, in such force and with such results in driving back a large Federal force, that the Federals are, or appear to be, alarmed lest their flank should be turned, and a forward movement be intended into Maryland and upon Washington; while the army of Gen. Meade is depleted by the despatch of heavy columns to the assistance of Rosecrans in Tennessee; and there are in their places only the conscript recruits, who are yet raw and not very willing troops. The truth will probably be found to be that both Gen. Lee and Gen. Meade have sent many troops to the South-west, and that the campaign in Virginia will be one of mutual observation only, until that in Tennessee is decided, and probably during the winter months, for the season of mud is coming on, in which large armies cannot move in Virginia. All the time, Confederate cavalry and the county guerrillas are keeping the Federals uneasy, almost in sight of Washington City, for the safety of their supply trains.

There are some bulletins abroad to-day, announcing Union victories—so called in Tennessee—the routing of Confederate cavalry in various directions, and other Federal successes, ending with the consoling assurances, "Rosecrans impregnable—entrenched—Burnside safe." It is a change of tone worthy of particular notice, that the triumphant march of those two columns, heralded a few weeks ago as driving a rabble of runaway rebels before them, has been brought to such a check that it is put forth as good news that Rosecrans is fortifying himself inside of entrenchments, and that Burnside is still "safe"! It may be otherwise. The Confederate plan appears to be to hem Rosecrans within his lines at Chattanooga, to obtain command of the heights about the city, and of his lines of communication with his rear, and by checking the troops sent to his succour in detachments with veteran troops, finally to compel him to surrender, or to fight another battle, at great disadvantage, with a superior force. It is doubted, notwithstanding the various rumours, that Rosecrans has received the large reinforcements sent from the East and West, or whether any considerable body has succeeded in reaching him. The Confederates interpose powerfully in each direction, and numerous guerrilla bands, operating in a country friendly to them, are hanging around his rear in dangerous proximity to his only line of communication, and making bold dashes, tearing up railroad tracks, and destroying tunnels and bridges, and now and then picking up supply and ammunition trains. A critical point of the war is to transact in the South-west; and in spite of the guessing of the Federal journals, you may believe that this time the Confederates have altogether the best of the position. The army of Rosecrans is the beleaguered one, and it may not long be in the power of the Federals to take comfort that it is safe against the numbers which the Confederates are accumulating about him.

The trans-Mississippi region—at first a little paralysed by being cut off from communication with Richmond and the east by the fall of Vicksburg and the loss of the Mississippi river—is recovering itself. A meeting of the governors of the four States of Missouri, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Texas, was held, and efficient measures were taken to re-organise for self-defence, without expecting direct aid for the present from the Government at Richmond. The result of their efforts has been surprising. The Confederates have taken heart, have rallied considerable armies, and adopted a system of warfare suited to the character of their country, which harasses the invaders and leaves them little advantage from any successes they may have in the engagements which may be risked. The enemy's troops advance, make conquests of unimportant points—which are blazoned in the bulletins as brilliant victories—and necessarily divide themselves in order to keep these towns. The Confederates withdraw through swamps or mountain passes in safety, keep themselves well together and in communication, and suddenly turn upon and crush some detachment or force it to retire; the Confederates advance, and the country is recovered. Such was the case with the Teche country of Louisiana, which General Banks took and could not keep. Such was the result of the late movement on Texas, in which one part of the expedition was repulsed at Sabine Pass, and a portion of another has just come to grief at Morganza, where a party of the Confederates—supposed to be roaming guerrillas, and attacked as such—turned out to be a body of regular Confederate troops, who beat back the Federal column, and killed or captured five hundred of them. The expedition upon Texas is now reduced in effect to one single line of march—advancing towards the Sabine, slowly, through an extremely difficult country, which the Confederates have deprived of everything which can help the advance of an army, retiring themselves in order to get the advantage of position and opportunity to make a stand or to harass the enemy until he can be gradually and successfully attacked.

The Confederates are re-appearing in large force. In north-western Arkansas, and in the State of Missouri guerrilla bands are pressing the Federals in various parts of the State, and a considerable body of troops has advanced so far as to give alarm for the safety of Fort Scott, and to frighten the Federals into a loud call upon Government for more troops for the protection of that fort, and the driving out of a Confederate army; when they were only lately importuning Government for the license to plunder some of the suspected among themselves.

All around there are these signs that the courage of the South is unabated, and that their determinations is to fight on unflinchingly. Their hope to prevail in the fight, and their resolve that, live or die, they will never submit to the dominance of the Yankee, are as inflexible as ever. They will suffer anything and sacrifice everything to accomplish their independence. They do not entertain the thought that there will be ever a case of extremity in which, in order to succeed, they must arm their own negroes or must purchase foreign help by consenting to a system of prospective emancipation. They desire and will defend and want to keep slavery, but they hate the Yankees and love independence more than they care for slavery; and just as surely as the crisis arrives in which this alternative comes up to them distinctly, they will employ slaves or sacrifice slavery, before they would accept the best terms which could be offered to them, for re-union under a common government with the faithless, rapacious, and cruel North.

The news of the withdrawal of Mr. Mason from England was received here with jeers at the South, as having been foiled and repulsed in its efforts to obtain countenance from the British Ministry, and some slight abatement for a day or two of the popular frenzy of rage against the British, for their previous toleration of the "rebels," by granting them a certain degree of belligerent rights. The Anglophobia broke out again in a few days, and the thinking people were told that it is from no good will to the United States that Earl Russell slighted and snubbed Mr. Mason, until self-respect constrained the Confederate Government to close the mission and withdraw their minister, but because England had been brought to know—by the despatches of Mr. Seward, the remonstrances of Mr. Adams, and the warnings of a special agent sent out for the express purpose by Mr. Lincoln—that if decided steps were not taken to show a public disapproval of the cause of the Confederates, and to obstruct the engagements of Confederates in England to obtain vessels, under the received construction of the neutrality law, and to stop ship-building for them by private builders, there would be war at once, and the Yankee iron-clads would soon be in the Mersey to settle matters for themselves. To these efforts and threatenings is traced the straining of presumptions beyond the law, by which the Government stopped the transfer of the "rams," by sale to foreign hands, lest they should ultimately come by purchase into the hands of the Confederates, and the consequent climax of the series of facts which decided the government of Mr. Mason that it would be useless and degrading to make any further attempt to open or keep open intercourse with the British Cabinet. The English people have, in the main, dealt kindly and liberally with the Confederacy. It could scarcely have been otherwise with a people who, in spite of every political combination, always sympathised warmly with Hungarians and Poles, or other nations not kindred, struggling for independence. But the English Government has allowed herself to be badgered out of the assertion of clear rights and into the sacrifice of great interests by the pertinacious insolence of the North. The time may come, and that before long, in which Ministers may learn, from the wholesome reaction of an honest national feeling at home, or by the mischievous effects upon the foreign relations of England of their pusillanimity, that it would have been wiser, as well as more honourable not to have truckled to the domineering and the unjust.

The Confederate Government will doubtless take steps for prohibiting the exercise hereafter of any consular powers within the Southern States by British functionaries under the recognition of the Government of the United States—the only form of authority which these agents can show; and they have been tolerated in acting until heretofore by the convenience of the case. But this implied recognition; that the Government at Washington has power to grant consular jurisdiction within the Confederate States, has always been an anomaly under which the Confederates have fretted. It became very offensive in several instances, and lately came up with some practical difficulties in the case of the British consul at Savannah, who presumed, on behalf of certain British subjects, to argue their exemption from certain liabilities which would fall upon them in case this was a foreign war, by contending that it was a civil disturbance merely, in which by his interment, subjects are contending against their sovereign—in other words, that the Georgians are rebels. The occurrences in England will doubtless lead to a decision at Milledgeville and in Richmond, stopping at once the consular powers, which are not duly commissioned to and recognised by the competent State or the Confederate Government.

There is a slight drawback to the Federal glee over these events in the apprehension that the transfer of Mr. Mason to Paris may indicate the approaching completion of negotiations with France—of more serious consequence in favour of the South than toleration of a Confederate minister in London by Lord Russell, or the free egress of Mr. Laird's rams.

The elections in Pennsylvania and Ohio to-day occupy a great deal of attention. The chances are in favour of the Administration party in both States, although there is quite a possibility of success in Pennsylvania, according to the judgment of most observers. The results are so far important that they will very seriously affect the Presidential prospects next year. In regard to the question of war or peace they are utterly insignificant. The Administration is in full power to carry out whatever policy it pleases for the year-and-a-half to come, and within that period it can do more mischief than can ever be repaired by any change of Administration or measures. The opposition have so sullied themselves and disgusted what good sense and manly love of justice and good faith there is in the country, that nobody believes their success would be really followed by any good results, and it is becoming a matter of desponding, almost despairing, indifference, which party succeeds.

THE SITUATION IN LOUISIANA.

NEW ORLEANS, Oct. 4.

You have already been advised of the progress of the Federal movement towards Texas, sufficiently so, indeed, to show that the expedition, at its very outset, is almost a failure. Had the plan been carried out as arranged, it could scarcely have been, under the most favourable circumstances, a success. If Franklin had placed a large body of men on the Sabine River to cut off the Confederate retreat towards Houston, if Herron had reached the road towards Red River so as to intercept the march of Taylor's men to Alexandria, and if Washburne's column had pressed the Confederates towards either one of these inevitable "gobblers"—the movement would have been called, if it were in the smallest degree satisfactory, a Federal success, and would have been added to the list of similar successes that have followed the Federal army in its invasion of the Southern States.

There are, however, in the proposition three "ifs," two of which have been disposed of effectually. The Sabine Pass affair was a failure, and Herron, instead of cutting off the Confederate retreat to Red River, was driven back himself to the Mississippi River. Our latest news of interest is from this portion of the grand movement. Herron is sick, and goes north on the mail steamer to-day, while General Dana has succeeded to the command of the division—the second division of the 13th Army Corps. There is scarcely a doubt that this division intended to make the movement already indicated, in connection with the main army. For several days their time and attention have been occupied with unimportant skirmishes with what were called "rebel guerrillas," but, as later news tells us, with a really important Confederate force. Dana's men have made Morganza, six miles above Port Hudson, on the west bank of the Mississippi, their base. They have destroyed a part of the village—it is said, to give their artillery a freer range, indicating that the place is quite likely to be needed for a defence, as well as a base for offensive operations. September 29, Dana sent a body of five hundred men towards the Atchafalaya to "clean out the guerillas." They encountered a Confederate force, estimated to be an entire brigade, under the command of Prince Polignac, and, after a sharp fight of a half-hour's duration, the Federals were surrounded, and those who were not left dead on the field were captured and carried away. Subsequently a small body of Federal cavalry escaped, but the prisoners, as admitted by the Federals themselves, were four hundred and eighty men, and they lost in addition their artillery. I do not know how it is that the Federals are so ignorant of the force opposed to them in that section of the State. Since that day's failure, it is announced that Dana would move with his whole division to disperse, destroy, or capture these "guerillas," when in fact there is nothing to prevent the concentration of at least three Confederate brigades to oppose him, and Federal scouts have been near enough to discover that a large force is fortifying the west bank of the upper Atchafalaya to prevent the crossing of the Federal division. Meanwhile, as cavalry parties ("guerillas") are scouring the country between the Atchafalaya and the Mississippi, those of "head-quarters" in this city congratulate themselves to-day that Dana has succeeded in getting the Confederates in a tight place between the two rivers, as indeed he has—to his cost, as the recent skirmishes sufficiently show.

This is all the news from that division, and unless Dana suddenly becomes ill and goes North, we may presume that he is vigorously engaged in "cleaning out" the guerillas; for if he does this and succeeds in safely returning to Port Hudson or New Orleans, it will be officially announced by-and-by that he has done all that was designed, and that it was not intended that he should take part in the Texas movement. Meanwhile, the Confederate force that he "dispersed" will simply retreat to the Teche, to annoy the main Federal column with guerilla warfare.

On the opposite side of the river and below Port Hudson, there is another "guerilla" force, of say 1,500 men, which has been very annoying. They have lately raided in upon a Federal telegraph station and carried away the guard of ten men with their commanding officer, although a gunboat lay in the river near the station. The same day a small company of Federals, a few men and five or six horses, were captured. On the other hand, the Federals have taken eight or ten "guerillas" near Baton Rouge, among others, it is said, Mr. Robert Hunter, formerly State Treasurer. While the river "cuts in twain the Confederacy," it is quite evident that the annoyances of these guerilla parties on both banks of the river, seriously disturb if they do not destroy the Federal connection by land between this city and Baton Rouge and Port Hudson. The Confederate "surprise parties" have put a very sudden stop to cotton collections and have damped the hopes of Northern speculators. There has been no period since the Federal occupation of the very small portion of the State in which they call themselves "We, the people of Louisiana," when they have been so harassed and annoyed by the Confederates, and when their position in the conquered territory was so uncertain and so insecure.

Now for the advance from Brashear city. The whole Federal force is, at last, across Berwick Bay and is moving along, slowly, as yet, and with no important results. Within a day or two the advance guard of Franklin's cavalry brigade was attacked near Centreville, on the Teche, by a body of three hundred Confederates, whom they soon dispersed. This is only the commencement of the march, the beginning of the skirmishes which will arrest the daily march of the Federal column along the Teche and towards Texas.

As the Federal column advances, we learn much that was for a while only conjectural, and are assured that the Confederates, by slowly retreating, by guerilla warfare, by the removal of their negroes, cattle, mules, and horses to Texas, and by the destruction of the cisterns, and, indeed, everything that cannot be carried with them, are pursuing the exact plan which seemed most feasible for their inferior force, and which has already been indicated in my recent letters. The Federal march will be barren—barren especially in results; and to cap the climax of misfortunes attending the very beginning of the expedition, for some days past the country has been flooded with rains, and the roads will soon be impassable for heavy trains, if not for marching men. Texas is alive with excitement, in consequence of the threatened invasion of that State. The forces scattered here and there are known to be concentrating at Houston and Galveston, and it is believed that they are strong enough to resist and to repulse the Federal advance, weakened, as it must necessarily be, by the long march across Louisiana. There is so little that is encouraging, and so much to dishearten the Federals in this city, that there is talk already of an abandonment of the Texas movement or its postponement to a more convenient season. If the army returns without the accomplishment of something more than promises at present, the war power at Washington, which ordered the movement, will be responsible for its failure.

I enclose Banks's recent General Orders as curiosities merely, since the more important of them relate to conscription for the Federal army in this State, and the idea of conscription here, excepting among negroes forced or dragged into the corps d'Afrique by armed press-gangs, is, of course, ludicrous. Martial law and a general order make it criminal for a white person in this city to carry or possess a revolver; special permits are required if one wishes to go with a shot gun to kill birds in the swamp; not long ago, the whites of the city refused to volunteer for thirty days for the sake of protecting the city against a threatened Confederate invasion; and in this state of affairs it is not likely that the Federals will arm, equip, and organise regiments in this city. If they would only threaten to conscript the hundreds of hungry speculators, cotton collectors, thieves, Jews, Yankees, and Northern men who have come down, and who will flock here this winter to plunder the people, it might have the effect to much lessen that enthusiastic throng of men whose loyalty to the United States is based wholly upon the glorious "liberty" the United States gives them and their followers to steal and destroy whatever they can lay hands upon. With them the preservation of the United States means the destruction of the Southern States, and while they favour the vigorous prosecution of the war their ideas of their individual duties "in the field" are confined wholly to fields of cotton and sugar.

From Texas we learn of the capture of the English steamer Sir Robert Peel (September 11) in the Rio Grande, by the Federal gunboat Seminole. The Peel had on board 1,000 bales of cotton, and as it is claimed that she was captured in Mexican waters we are likely to have another Peterhoff affair. The "prize" has been brought to this port, and Lord Lyons will be informed of the circumstances attending her capture. The British war vessel Buzzard has arrived here from Havana, it is said to investigate this matter.

The French corvette Colbert has arrived from Vera Cruz, and the report is current that five French gunboats are coming in response to the appeal for protection made by the French residents in this city several weeks since.

Accounts from Texas say that General Magruder is quite sick. The Evening Star going North this morning carries a number of the Confederate officers taken at Port Hudson, it is reported, for exchange. Our latest Mobile news is not important. Of course, they are delighted "over that way" with the Texas advance, which promises to be unprofitable to the Federals, and to postpone indefinitely the movement upon Mobile.

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, October 27.

I BEGIN to think I shall have to cry peceavi for the confident prophecy of continued peace in Europe I sent you some weeks ago. My last letters referred to the activity in the French War Department, and there is now a rumour that Marshal Niel is to go on a special mission to St. Petersburg, which, by most people, is considered ominous of war. More significant than this is the language of the France which so long took the side of peace, and which, for the last few days, has assumed a tone of menace unsurpassed by the Patrie. Commenting on the analysis of two despatches from M. Drouyn de Lhuys to Vienna, as published in the Memorial of Sunday, it is severe on the hesitation of Austria, after the offer of a guarantee against the results of a war with Russia made by the French Government, and still more severe on England, whose violent language has been calculated to set Russia indeed on fire but not to save Poland. "France, less violent than England in language, but more resolute in action, looks but to the object of the agreement she would bring about—the enfranchisement and pacification of Poland—and not, like the Cabinet of St. James, to the interest of a parliamentary debate, or like that of Vienna, to territorial guarantees." "When the documents relating to this weighty question are published, Poland will see who were her most faithful friends and most energetic defenders."

I sometimes refer to the Bourse as the most faithful exponent of general opinion. Its fluctuations and hesitations during the last week are the best proof how uncertain the future seems to the financial world. Until after the opening of the Chambers this uncertainty will weigh upon all transactions, for the Emperor gives no sign of his intentions, and it is said that his Ministers know as little as the men of money as to what his resolution may be. The season, however, forbids all idea of immediate war, and it is little likely that he will give utterance to threats of which the fulfilment must be so long delayed. The fall in the funds can hardly, therefore, be ascribed to any expectation of a warlike speech on the 5th, and it more probably originates in rumours, which have been rife, of a considerable deficit and an impending loan. Whatever the cause, it is certain that not only the great banking houses, but also the Bank of France, have been during the last ten days very large sellers.

You will probably have heard from other sources that Earl Russell has found means to render the Confederates useful to his policy notwithstanding Mr. Mason's withdrawal. He met Prince L. Czartoryski's application for the recognition of the Poles as belligerents by drawing a wide distinction between them, who have no avowed government and no visible existence except as rebels in the field, and the Confederate States of America, who have all the power and outward semblances of a regular government, whose seat is known, and who can negotiate as well as fight in the face of the day. His lordship is the personification of the great families of 1688, whose long tenure of power is due to the art with which they use all things and all men for the advancement of their own views.

The latest news from America is reproduced with undisguised exultation by the greater part of the Paris press. The few words which each paper allots in its summary of news to the events reported by the telegraph from all parts of the world, clearly indicate a hope as well as an opinion that now at last we are at the beginning of the end of this long struggle. The sufferings of the industrial classes in France from the almost total cessation of their exports to the American States, which could be aggravated by the inclement season, if even the cold be less severe than is anticipated, has naturally quickened the sympathies of the press and people for the cause of the South. But I believe that no further attempt will be made by the Emperor to offer mediation, and that the Confederates will be left to complete the work they have shown themselves so well able to carry on without aid.

The unfortunate termination of M. Nadar's second air-voyage does not seem to have discouraged him, and I have heard, on good authority, with great pleasure, that, excepting to one of his fellow-travellers, the results were less serious than has been represented. To the success of the balloon as a financial speculation they will be very conducive, as the daily letters which the papers print keep the subject before the eyes of the world; and, judging by M. Nadar's last notes, he is going, on his arrival in Paris, to add to its piquancy by a discussion with one of his companions, whose published account of the voyage has not met his approbation. I am told by those who have been in a position to form an opinion on the subject, that the immense volume of the balloon renders it quite unmanageable in the descent. The authorities in England, who have promised interference in favour of rope-walkers, would do well to consider whether they should allow the proposed ascent of the balloon from London.

The Empress is expected to-morrow evening from her successful visit to Spain, which seems to have exceeded all the anticipations she can have formed of it, and during which she enjoyed, up to the moment of her return to Valencia, the brightness of that southern autumn which is more genial than a French summer.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER, Oct. 28.

THE noble Earl at the head of our Foreign Affairs will be favoured before long with a manifestation of real feeling in Lancashire, for which, if we may judge from his speech at Blairgowrie, his lordship will be ill-prepared. A movement, headed by some of our leading mill-owners, and followed up by able and trusted representatives of the operative classes themselves, has just been set on foot, the effect of which will be to convince Earl Russell that, if, as his lordship recently asserted on our behalf, the majority of us are Northerners in the matter of sympathy, we are pretty well all of us—as we propose to assert on our own account—indubitable Southerners in the matter of cotton. It is felt on all hands that no time shall be lost in taking up the challenge the Foreign Minister has thrown down. It is also felt that the patience of our people has been basely abused by enemies on both sides of the Atlantic, and that the very self-denial with which we have endured our privations has been prostituted by Mr. Bright, Mr. Beecher, Mr. Forster and others, as an argument for perpetuating, for the sake of their shattered idol of Unionism, the calamity they have cruelly forced upon us by the vain attempt to put the pieces together. Judging from the humiliating past, the longer we suffer the worse we shall have to suffer—until a grovelling pauperism shall become the chronic and accepted condition of a large portion of our industrial population. It is obviously in the nature of things, and especially so in such a case as ours, to descend from bad to worse; and therefore no opportunity can be so valuable as the present for making a most serious effort to better ourselves. As in the image set up of old for the people to worship, the lower the members, the coarser the metal: the farther off the time, the more unfit for amendment. And—not to pursue the quaint divine's simile too curiously—to-day is the golden opportunity, to-morrow will be the silver season, next day but the brazen one, and so on, until at last we shall come to the toes of clay and be turned to dust.

It is idle, however, to moralise when there is work to do. The following memorial to Earl Russell is now receiving its thousands and tens of thousands of signatures from the great body of Lancashire operatives, whether in or out of employ; and so soon as the whole is completed, there ought to be such a beating of the drum at the doors of the Foreign Office, that the echo of it shall reach her Majesty at Windsor, and the Queen herself be thus made acquainted with the grievous straits and worse prospects of her loyal people in the North:—

To the Right Honourable EARL RUSSELL, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, &c.

THE MEMORIAL of the undersigned, Managers, Overlookers, and Others engaged in the Cotton Manufactures of the United Kingdom,

Respectfully Sheweth—

That your Memorialists depend entirely for their livelihood on the Cotton Manufacture, and, consequently, upon the importation to this country of a sufficient supply of cotton.

That, until the breaking out of the existing war in America the Southern States have always furnished us with an adequate supply of this indispensable material of a quality best adapted to our wants, by the use of which we were enabled to earn wages sufficient for the support of ourselves and our families; and as it was not supposed that the supply of cotton of this quality would fail, the rates of all our wages have been based upon its use.

That since this calamitous war arose, one-half of our number have been entirely deprived of work, and have become paupers or recipients of charity, and the remainder have been compelled to use cotton of an inferior description, with which, by the same amount of labour, they have only been able to earn two-thirds of the wages which they formerly received. Upon the sufferings and privations which have thus been inflicted upon the whole body to which we belong we need not dwell, as they are notorious to all the world.

That we offer no opinion as to the causes or merits of the war between the Northern and Southern States of America; we are no partisans of either side, but when we were first deprived of our accustomed supply of cotton from that country, we believed it would be but a temporary privation, and we cheerfully submitted to our sufferings in the hope that the war would soon come to an end, and that the Southern States would then be able to supply us as heretofore with the material which we require.

That for some time past, each successive mail from America has brought us tidings which fill our hearts with dismay. We find that the war, instead of being prosecuted by legitimate military operations for the restoration of peace between the contending parties, seems to be now carried on for the sole purpose of wasting the regions from which we received our supplies of cotton, by destroying the means of future production, and thus depriving us of all hope of future relief from that source.

That we learn from Northern newspapers, and from the speeches and letters of the Northern President himself, that their troops and naval forces are in future to be employed in destroying the Southern towns, in burning the farm houses, the cotton sheds, the ploughs, and other implements necessary for the cultivation of the land; in killing or driving away the horses and bullocks, and, when practicable, submerging the land itself, by cutting the banks and dykes which have been formed to keep the rivers within their due bounds.

That, in our judgment, such a mode of carrying on hostilities is not only cruel and inhuman, but contrary to all legitimate usages of war, and when practised on some few occasions by European despots, was visited by the just execration of mankind. On this view of the matter, however, it is not our province to dwell. We are constrained to regard it as affecting the future prospects of our own industry and welfare. When we learn that districts as large as the county of Lancaster, formerly employed in the cultivation of cotton, have been completely cleared of inhabitants and dwellings, and the land reduced to its original sterility; that thirteen Southern towns, formerly depots for the preparation and storage of cotton, have been entirely destroyed; and that this process of devastation is still carried on day by day: we discern in it not only a great outrage on humanity, but a threatened extinction of our future prospects of satisfactory and remunerative labour.

Your Memorialists, therefore, humbly pray that your Lordship will use your personal influence, and the influence of the British Government, in order to put an end, if possible, to proceedings so offensive to humanity, and so destructive to the present and future welfare of your Memorialists.

It seems a cruel commentary upon the foregoing memorial to quote from the statistics just published by the Manchester and Salford Sanitary Association, in proof that our people have not begun to cry aloud for better times without grievous cause. The hon. secretary to that valuable local institution reports that the quarter just ended exhibits a highly unsatisfactory state of the public health. Smallpox has spread so much that, whereas only fourteen new cases occurred in the September quarter, 1861, (in connection with the public institutions), the number rapidly increased to 552 in the June quarter of this year; last quarter it fell to 263. Scarlet fever has been the most general and fatal disease. The number of new cases increased from 17 in the September quarter, 1861, to 602 in the quarter just ended. Of the latter number 73 cases terminated fatally, or one in 8.3. The number of deaths from all causes was 81 in every 10,000 inhabitants; while the number of births was 93—a singularly low rate of increase. On looking to the several districts it is found that the rate of morality was highest in Salford, where 87 died in every 10,000. In the Ancoats, London-road, and Deansgate registration districts, with an aggregate population of about 118,700, the number of deaths amounted to 938, and the births to 998, showing an annual death rate of 328 in the thousand, and a birth rate of about 35. In considering the causes of this unfortunate state of things, the statistician says: "It seems difficult to resist the conclusion that the hard times through which the people have passed, and are still passing, are beginning to tell; that a population long accustomed to live well on high but hard-earned wages will not flourish beyond a certain time, at any rate in full physical vigour, beneath the various depressing influences which have combined to assail them, namely: poor fare, mental depression, crowded dwellings, and a sickly season."

Protests against Earl Russell's notorious mis-statement of a matter of fact are pouring in upon us, not only from towns throughout Lancashire, but from every quarter in the United Kingdom. These documents derive a peculiar value from a combination of various circumstances, which I need not now stop to mention. Suffice it that, as expressions of opinion, they are national, as opposed to party, in their political aspect; while, one and all, they favour separation as the only means of peace. A glance at the immense mass of letters received by the Secretary of the Southern Independence Association is more than sufficient to prove—if proof were needed—that Federal sympathy in this country is entirely confined to the actual members of the Emancipation Societies in London and Manchester, and to those purely Unionist members of Parliament "who could all be driven from the House of Commons in a single omnibus." As a sample of the Liberal, not to say Radical, authorship of the majority of these letters, I cannot do better than append a copy of one of them, from an ex-member of Parliament for a constituency like Bolton, and, to the boot of that, a political pupil of Jeremy Bentham, and one who does not yield to Mr. Cobden himself in the liberalism of a long public life, and who, like the renowned free-trader, has grown grey in labouring at the economics and literature of trade and commerce.

"The Athenæum, London, 17th October.

"Sir,—At an early period I came to the conclusion that the Union would not be restored on conditions creditable or even tolerable to either party. The continuance of the frightful struggle has intensified hate, augmented difficulties, and in my judgment, made reunion (for the present at least) impossible. I do not think the ultimate solution depends on the fortunes of war, or that any amount of success on either side will produce that extent of sympathy or increase those sentiments of nationality and common affection which are the only safe foundation for good government and public tranquility. Moreover, it appears to me that every substantial benefit might be obtained by friendly intercourse and unrestricted commerce, without enforcing amalgamation upon millions of discontented men. I have evidence in my own hands to show that many of the most illustrious of the patriots and statesmen of America foresaw the futurity (it is now present) when separation might become inevitable, and all their counsels were—'Then part in peace!' For that peace, in the interest alike of black and white, of America, of Great Britain, of the whole human race, I earnestly and daily pray. This prayer I feel must become one who has passed through the turmoils of a long political life into the serenity and solitude of old age; and I see no hope for peace but in separation.

"I have no objection to the publication of anything I have written on the subject of the desolating Transatlantic contest, and only wish the councils of peace found an emphatic echo from the other hemisphere. I have always been an earnest advocate for the abolition of slavery, but never by the instruments of political tyranny and bloody war.

"I am, &c.,

"JOHN BOWRING."

"THOMAS STALEY, Esq., Secretary Southern Independence Association, Manchester."

It used to be said that the charm of a breakfast-party "at Rogers's" lay in the beautiful natural law that forbids people to get conceited before one o'clock in the day. This "chief sweet," we may charitably presume, was not quite absent on Saturday morning at the Albion, although we might have to peer about somewhat curiously to detect its presence in the same room with Dr. Parker or Dr. Massie. But barring this defect, or perhaps I should rather say on account of it, the "farewell breakfast" to Henry Ward Beecher was what is called a "success," and must go for what it is worth. The most noteworthy feature in the proceedings appeared at a very early stage of the feast. Scarcely had the more solid fare been discussed, when the company forthwith grew dyspeptic about Lord Brougham. His lordship clearly did not "agree" with Mr. Beecher or his admirers, who avenged themselves, however, by quite agreeing with one another that the sometime "prince of Abolitionists" had grown into "a poor spoiled old man," who was now going about "pronouncing words of unparalleled baseness" concerning the war, while the only justification he could offer for his "truculence" (!) was the so-called right he had to be listened to as the leader of the effete anti-slavery party of days gone by. His lordship had forgotten that the old-fashioned principles of anti-slavery had been specially modified to meet the wants of a political party; and that it was of the prime necessity to the full play and free action of those principles that the clique professing them should "cease to be bullied even by a Lord Brougham. (Cheers.)"

Digestion having been aided by this preliminary discharge of bile, Mr. Beecher addressed his circle of private friends for more than two hours. It matters nothing what he said on a purely personal occasion of no sort of significance; but the almost comic if not impudent character of the whole affair can be best judged from the wind-up, when cheers were seriously given for—"The Queen and Mrs. Lincoln!"

THE MEXICAN EMPIRE.

(From the Richmond Dispatch.)

So we are to have an empire, and are to have an Emperor, living and being in North America: an event forbidden long ago by the "greatest nation in all creation," and interdicted by both the "Eagle" and the "Stars and Stripes!" Were the Yankee nation free from the war which now absorbs all their means and exercises all their ingenuity, they would beyond doubt essay to defeat the Empire and the Emperor; but the moment of their close occupation in our subjugation is selected by the French Emperor as the most fitting for the introduction of his policy—Napoleonic ideas—into Mexico. They will be indignant at the event, and may well discern in it that which is most unfavourable to their hectoring and domineering over this continent. They will profess to be horrified at the imperial character of the new government, while they are themselves the slaves of the vilest and most degraded tyranny that ever cursed the earth.

The South is content, nay, pleased, with the change of affairs in Mexico—with the prospect of order and security in that country, and its control, at least during pupillage, by a Power altogether friendly to us. Under it the industry of the nation will improve, and the tide of commerce and of power in the Gulf be immensely swelled in volume. This will be beneficial to the South and, of course, detrimental to the North, which must the more certainly cease to be the point of settlement for the continent. It will no longer ship everything, import everything, buy everything, sell everything, and have all the money in its own hands. To maintain this position it is now fighting and expending all its means. It would freely sell out and spend every dollar it is worth to-day to accomplish this, and think it had made a grand speculation. But secession has deprived them of it, and the elevation of Mexico in the scale of nations will help still further to keep them forever from recovering it.

With a strong and steady Government, and security to person and property, Mexico will become a great producing country—her productions, too, being of that character most important to commerce. It is a most remarkable country, covering an area of eight hundred and twenty-nine thousand nine hundred and sixteen English square miles, being one-fourth as large as Europe! Traversed through its whole length by the immense mountain range of the Cordilleras, it embraces within its limits every degree of temperature, from the torrid to the frigid. The sea coast, to an interior elevation of two thousand feet above the sea is the tierras calientes, or hot region, with a mean temperature of 77 degrees. The region above that, to five thousand feet above the sea, is the ras templadas, or temperate region, with a mean temperature of 68 degrees; and the third elevation, to the line of perpetual snow, is the tierras frias, or cold region. The city of Mexico is within this last, 7,400 feet above the ocean. Humboldt says that in the ascent from Mexico the climates succeed each other in layers, and the traveller passes in review in the course of two days the palms of the tropics and the plants of the arctic regions.

A country with so diversified a temperature and soil as Mexico will produce everything known to the agriculturist. Her productions, however, may be considered chiefly cotton, coffee, tobacco, indigo, flax, hemp, vanilla, jalap, and cochineal. Sugar might also be produced. Dye-woods, mahogany, and other products of the forests, are very valuable. Of these productions Mexico has exported considerably; but owing to the disturbed condition of the country no fair estimate of its capacity can be formed from its statistics. It is beyond doubt one of the most fruitful countries on the globe.

The chief source of wealth of Mexico to this time has been its mines. The silver mines, said to be over forty in number, yield an average of near $40,000,000 per annum. Gold is also found in considerable quantity. Quicksilver is abundant, the yield being near three hundred thousand pounds per annum.

Mexico has done something in the way of manufacturing—having 72 cotton factories, 6 woolen factories, 8 paper mills, 4 glass factories, &c.

The population numbers, 7,661,520, only one million of which is pure white. Four millions are Indians, and the remainder negroes and mixed breeds.

Here is indeed a vast country with vast resources. The Emperor of France is far-seeing enough to appreciate its advantages, and know what may be achieved with them in time to come. With order and security, enterprise, industry, and capital will flock to Mexico, and it will assume a position as a producing and commercial nation that will surpass the largest calculations.

Speculation about what Yankees will do in all such matters is only agreeable to those who speculate. The Yankees will just accommodate themselves to circumstances. They will submit to what they can't prevent—pay damages—pocket insults—acquiesce in revolutions detrimental to them—do anything and everything that they may think expedient, and avoid everything to them inexpedient, while they wage their war of malignity and subjugation against the South.

But it is all the better for the South that Mexico is placed beyond their grasp, and is under the direction of a power whose character and interests assure us of peace, security, and friendship on our Southern border. Therefore the South may well exclaim, "Long live the Mexican Empire!"

LETTER FROM THE HON. W. C. RIVES.

The following letter was written by the Hon. W. C. Rives to a member of the Virginia Legislature:—

My dear sir,—I learn from you, with great regret, that some of our fellow-citizens are a good deal discouraged by recent events in our military operations, while you yourself, I am glad to see, retain your accustomed erectness and buoyancy of spirits. Are we not, in some degree, the spoiled children of that marvellous good fortune which, by the gracious providence of God, has, for the most part, attended us since the commencement of this gigantic struggle? And have not our very successes, long-continued as they have been, unstrung our minds for the discipline of those occasional reverses which none can hope to escape amid the inexorable vicissitudes of war?

When we recollect, not merely the disparity of numbers and material wealth between us and our adversaries, but that they were in possession of the army and navy of the United States, the creation of the joint efforts and contributions of the entire Union for seventy odd years; that all those branches of manufacturing industry most essential to the operations of war had been long established and in full activity with them; and that at the same time they had the advantage of an open and unrestricted intercourse with the rest of the world to supply any deficiency which might exist in their resources; while, at the commencement of the war, we had not a ship or a soldier, were without the munitions of war, or any existing establishment for furnishing them, even to percussion caps, and cut off from all foreign supplies by the blockade of our whole coast—the extent and magnitude of what we have accomplished ought to be a matter of grateful astonishment to ourselves, as it is of special wonder to other nations of the earth. With all these odds against us, what a long and dazzling roll of victories have we furnished for the pen of the future historian of the war!

Virginia, embracing the seat of Government of the Confederacy, has been the selected object against which the most formidable and imposing enterprises of the enemy have been directed. How "lame and impotent" the conclusion of all these vaunted expeditions, so often and so pompously gotten up for the capture of Richmond and the subjugation of Virginia, let Bethel, Manassas, Leesburg, in the first year of the war—the plains of Williamsburg, the bloody panorama of battle-fields around the beleaguered capital, the blaze of successive victories with which Jackson lighted up the valley of the Shenandoah from Harper's Ferry to Port Republic, Cedar Mountain, Manassas again, the closing and overwhelming discomfiture at Fredericksburg, in the second year of the war—and the grand rout, after four days' conflict, of Chancellorsville and Marne's Heights, in the present year, followed by the enemy's third expulsion from the valley—let these memorable fields, with their solemn and truthful voices, tell.

During this period, too, the Army of Northern Virginia, under its illustrious leader, made two bold and successful incursions into the enemy's territory; levied contributions upon it; gave battle to his concentrated legions on his own soil, crippling and inflicting heavy losses upon him; and then returned at leisure to resume its attitude of calm defiance and proud invincibility at home. Such is a general outline of the history of the war on the Atlantic side of the Confederacy. Outskirts and fragmentary portions of territory have, in some instances, been temporarily and reluctantly abandoned to the enemy, as not justifying the attempt to defend them at the risk of the central and more important portions; but in no case has the heart or grand interior of the territory been yet penetrated.

In the valley of the Mississippi the course of events has been more chequered by alternate good and bad fortune. Springfield, Columbus, Shiloh, and even Murfreesboro, were noble successes for us. Fort Donelson, Corinth, New Orleans recall the remembrance of sad disasters; and to these has been recently added the loss of Vicksburg and Port Hudson. I have no disposition to extenuate the gravity of any of these disasters. But looking at them in their very worst aspect, there is nothing in any or all of them to give rise to a feeling of despondency. The enemy is as far as ever from the great object he had in view—the free and unobscured navigation of the Mississippi for commercial purposes. Its banks are still accessible for hundreds of miles, within our territory, to our sharpshooters and movable batteries, that can and will prevent the use of the river by trading vessels, and effectually interdict it to all practical commerce. The inhabitants of the country are more roused than ever by the outrages of the enemy, and redoubled efforts will be made to render his local successes bootless to him. We have two powerful and noble armies under Johnston and Bragg on the eastern side of the river, which are strengthened daily both by the Confederate conscription and by the zealous co-operation of the adjacent State Governments; while on the western side of the river are the enterprising and indomitable commands of Price, of Kirby Smith, of Taylor and Magruder, to strike wherever the enemy may present himself.

When this situation is compared with the many unavoidable reverses and endless difficulties which our brave ancestors had to encounter, and so gloriously surmounted, in their struggle for independence, who does not feel his spirit rebuked at the slightest thought of discouragement under our present circumstances? Recollect the condition of Washington in the second year of the war of the Revolution, when, after successive and severe disasters on Long Island, at New York, at White Plains, and the loss of Fort Mifflin, on the Hudson, with its garrison, he was compelled to retreat through the Jerseys, "pushed," to use his own expressive language, "from place to place, till we were obliged to cross the Delaware with less than three thousand men fit for duty," and the reluctant confession was extorted from his firm and manly breast that unless "a new army can be speedily recruited, the game is pretty nearly up." Even in this extremity there was no despondency, no discouragement. The pressure and magnitude of the dangers only supplied new energies of action and stimulated to redoubled exertion, and in a few days the brilliant achievements of Trenton and Princeton redressed the balance of victory.

In every period of the revolutionary contest a large portion of our territory was overrun and occupied by the enemy. In the South, Green was compelled to retire before Cornwallis, as Washington had done before the Howes in the North. Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, each and all of them, east of the Blue Mountains, were overrun for a time by the armies of the enemy; while all the chief cities in the North and South—Boston, Newport, New York, Philadelphia, Richmond, Norfolk, Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah—were, for a longer or shorter period, in his possession. But if the country was overrun, the hearts of the people were not overawed. With them and their trusted servants, whether in the council or in the field, there was no despair of the Republic. They felt as Washington, when most oppressed by the complicated difficulties of his situation, expressed himself, in the sincerity of his heart, in writing to his brother: "Under a full persuasion of the justice of our cause, I cannot entertain an idea that it will finally sink, though it may remain for a time under a cloud."

All history proves that a brave and uncorrupted people, determined to be free, never can be subdued by the insolent superiority of force and numbers, however disproportioned. What availed the countless Persian hordes of Darius and Xerxes, when confronted, in many a field made classic and holy ground by their discomfiture, with the proud spirit of freedom and the noble self-devotion of the small but undaunted commonwealths of Greece? If ever a people had apparent cause for despondency it was the people of Rome, when Hannibal, with his Carthaginian hosts, after three successive victories on the Ticino, the Brescia, and Thrasymene, in his triumphal march towards the capital, almost annihilated the Roman army in a fourth at Cannæ, leaving more than forty thousand Roman citizens dead upon the field, including one of the consuls in command, many senators, ex-consuls, prætors, ædiles, and others of the highest rank and consideration. But, amid the consternation of so terrible a calamity the spirit of the Republic never blanched. When the surviving consul, whose rashness even had been the cause of the disaster, approached the city, with the wreck of his army, the Senate and all ranks of the people, we are told by one of their great historians, went out to meet him and thanked him for not having despaired of the Commonwealth. And in the end it was not Rome, but Carthage, that perished in the conflict.

So, too, when we come down to the period of modern history. Is it possible to conceive a struggle more unequal in numbers, armament, and every material resource than that in the sixteenth century, between the seven insurgent Provinces of the Netherlands, beginning with two of them only, and the whole weight and power of the Spanish monarchy in its meridian splendour; when, in addition to the resources of its large dominions in Italy, the Netherlands, and the Peninsula, including Portugal, it wielded the riches of America and the Indies united. And yet by the indomitable courage and perseverance of the inhabitants, animated with the spirit of civil and religious liberty, and in spite of calamities and disasters which tried to the uttermost the heroic stuff of which they were made, leaving to them often no other resource than, by cutting their dykes, to call in the aid of that destructive element it had cost them ages of labour and trial to shut out; they redeemed their native land from the remorseless surges of a despotism more ferocious than the sea, triumphantly established their independence, and constituted a renowned Commonwealth, which, for 200 years, proudly held its place in the first rank of the Powers of Europe.

If we wish further to see what prodigies an undismayed spirit of national independence, battling upon its own soil for its hearths and its altars, is capable of accomplishing against the odds of force and numbers, look at the example of the same people, under the third William of Orange, magnanimously bidding defiance to the united and powerful 'armies of Louis XIV. of France and Charles II. of England. Look at Prussia, under Frederick II., in the memorable Seven Years' War, successfully contending against almost all the Powers of continental Europe—Austria, France, the German States, Sweden, and Russia—all banded together, at the same moment, in the invasion of her territory. Look again, at the miracles of successful valour accomplished some thirty years later by the people of revolutionary France, in the enthusiasm of liberty, and in vindication of the right of national self-government against a second and more formidable combination of all Europe, both insular and continental.

What any of these people accomplished, we are capable of accomplishing. We have the same love of liberty; we have the same devotion to our native land; we have the same martial ardour; we have the same, and even greater motives to exert every faculty for our deliverance. With the most of them, the great stake involved was national independence and political rights. With us, in addition to all this, everything precious to the human affections, everything sacred to the human heart, is at issue. From the ruthless spirit in which this war has been waged by our adversaries; from the specimens we have had of their infamous pro-consular governments in parts of our territory occupied by them; from the appeals they are now making to the vindictive and brutal passions of an uncivilised race, as their allies in this unholy crusade against us, it is impossible for the imagination to picture a fate more horrible than ours would be if we were once subjected to their power. I know no language which, in that case, could adequately paint the depth of our degradation and the extremity of our wretchedness, unless it be those burning lines of an English poet, in which he gave vent to his feelings of horror and indignation when deprecating the iron rule of a vulgar and hypocritical tyranny in his own land:—

"Come the eleventh plague, rather than this should be!
Come sink us rather in the sea;
Come rather pestilence and reap us down;
Come God's sword, rather than our own.
Let rather Roman come again,
Or Saxon, Norman, or the Dane.
In all the bonds we ever bore,
We grieved, we sighed, we wept, we never blushed before."

In the foregoing remarks it has been assumed that the enemy's forces were, in numbers, much greater than ours. This has, undoubtedly, heretofore been the fact. But I am firmly persuaded that, notwithstanding the immense difference in the actual population of the two countries, we shall henceforward have an army in the field at all times fully equal in numbers to theirs; and that, surely, is all we need desire. The energies of the South are just beginning to be thoroughly aroused. We already see a proposition in the Legislature of Alabama to extend the limits of the military age below eighteen years to sixteen, and above forty-five to sixty. This was the old Spartan rule, and prevailed a long time in England, until the institution of standing armies, and her insular situation, made her careless with regard to the military organisation of the mass of her population. But our circumstances may well justify a recurrence to the ancient rule, so far, at least, as to call out the supplementary classes for local defence. The spirit of the people, there can be no doubt, would nobly respond to such a call, while the demands of the crisis, appealing to the instinctive courage of men, and enforced by the pleading loveliness of women, will keep our active army full within the limits of the age heretofore prescribed for it.

The situation of our adversary presents a very different picture. The popular fervour of the war, first kindled and for some time kept up by delusive pretexts, is abated and abating. The difficulties and general repugnance opposed to their recent draft have converted it into a very little more than a barren mockery. No large accessions to their army, already much reduced by the expiration of enlistments and the casualties of war, can now be had by force or by persuasion. The cordial support of public opinion, in the present age of the world, is indispensable to the effective prosecution of every war. Great as has been the amount of prejudice and delusion and bad feeling among the people of the North towards us, happily "reason has not fled to brutish beasts." Many of them now see that the present war is, almost without disguise, a war for the extermination or degradation of the white race by the installation of the blacks in virtual dominion over them, and in such a war they have no motive of sympathy or interest to engage them. Others, profiting, at last, by the sagacious lessons of Chatham, Burke, Fox, and that noble band of patriots and statesmen in England who manfully opposed the war upon the American Colonies from the start, begin to see that the triumph of lawless despotism over the independence of the South would be equally fatal to their remnant of constitutional liberty at home. From the operation of these and other causes, the military, with the moral strength of the North in this contest, will go on decreasing, while ours will certainly increase.

On whatever side I look, then, I see no omen of discouragement, but on the contrary new grounds of assurance, with regard to the ultimate and certain triumph of the great cause in which we are embarked. We may have occasional reverses in the future, as we have had them in the past. These are often salutary trials of our constancy and faith, and needful admonitions to increased vigilance and exertion. Even heroic Charleston, for whose fate every bosom is now yearning with anxiety, may fall under the extraordinary means concentrated for her destruction. But if she does, it will be in a blaze of glory that will irradiate the remotest corner of the Confederacy, and light the way to retributive victories elsewhere, while she herself will be destined to rise again with increased splendour from her ashes. The capture of Athens by the Persians ushered in the glorious days of Salamis and Plataea, and when reoccupied, strengthened and adorned by the pious hands of their children, she was more than ever the envy and admiration of the world. No local or occasional disaster can check the onward progress of a great cause blessed with the approving smiles of Heaven, and sustained by stout hearts with unceasing vigilance and unflinching faith.

I remain, very truly and faithfully, your friend,

W. C. RIVES.

THE RAMS IN THE MERSEY.

A RUMOUR was in circulation at Devonport on Tuesday to the effect that a telegram had been received in the dockyard from the Admiralty, intimating that the Northern States of America and Russia had declared war against France. It was suggested that the presence of the Russian fleet at New York had something to do with this allegation. From the form which the rumour took this would seem to have been the case; but it is thought it owes its origin to the circumstance that orders were received in the dockyard on Monday to have the new iron-clad ship the Prince Consort ready to proceed to sea the next morning. In consequence of this order extra efforts were put forth to make the ship ready, and some persons were in consequence employed the greater part of the night. Captain Vesey, of the Royal Adelaide, was detached from that ship, and went on board the Prince Consort, taking the command. Early yesterday morning a detachment of 100 marines were told off for duty on board the Prince Consort, and embarked after breakfast under the command of Captain Drury. These orders for the sudden departure of this great ship caused much consternation in the families of officers and men, and others interested in people belonging to her. Out of this perplexity many rumours arose. When, however, the time came at which she was to have left the port a telegram came from the Admiralty delaying her departure. In the hot haste of getting ready in the morning it is presumed that arrangements were not made to provide dinner for the detachment of Royal Marines so promptly embarked. At all events, when it was found the ship was not to sail immediately, the Marines were disembarked, returned to the barracks, and had their dinner, and were subsequently re-embarked. There were many conjectures as to the destination of the Prince Consort. According to some, she and other ships were to be ready for any emergency arising out of the presumed hostilities between America, Russia, and France. According to others, she was to go out to look after an American and a Russian vessel, said to be cruising in the Channel. Others had it that she was going to Liverpool to look after the steam-rans in the Mersey. Additional probability is imparted to the latter version of the cause by the facts detailed by the following from the Liverpool Courier:—"Yesterday (Monday) there was a report that the steam-ran lately lying in the Great Float, at Birkenhead, had slipped out into the fog on pretence of a trial trip. It turned out that it was the other ram, El Monastir (The Victory), which was temporarily taken out of Messrs. Laird's large graving dock, at their shipbuilding works, made a single turn in the river, with the aid of tug-boats, and then went into the dock again, the manoeuvre having been performed to enable another vessel under repair to enter the graving dock. El Tousson remains in the Great Float, with workmen still on board." A more minute detail of the facts has been supplied from another source. According to this information, there has been a feeling of insecurity amongst the Ministry as to what are the present intentions of the promoters of the Mersey rams. It was hinted that a design was entertained of sending the rams to sea by fraud. On Monday, when the El Monastir, one of the rams, was taken into the river, much party feeling was elicited at Liverpool by that circumstance. The Federalist sympathisers were on the qui vive to ascertain what was going to be done, and thus came into collision with some of the friends of the Confederates. Warm altercations ensued, and some of the Southern blood being up, such an indiscreet hint was ventured as that if the rams once got into the river they would be able to run down with ease any ship which was there, and might attempt to prevent their proceeding to sea. Such a threat was immediately telegraphed to London. There, by some of the authorities, the threat was entertained. The Liverpool's return to the Mersey was suggested, but then she was fitting for another port, and if force was to be used vessels must be sent that were suitable and that could remain there, if required, for a lengthened period. The Prince Consort, 35, screw, iron-cased ship, was therefore chosen as in every way adapted to offer opposition to the rams, and not being required elsewhere, orders were sent down to Devonport for her to be at once manned, provisioned, stored, and sent round to Liverpool. The carrying out of this order was commenced as above-stated, and in addition to the Marines, drafts of seamen were sent on board from the various ships in ordinary. While, however, the order was thus being carried out with alacrity, another telegram came down cancelling the former one, and the men and stores shipped were returned. Subsequently, a third order arrived confirming the first one, and the Prince Consort was equipped and passed into the Sound last evening. Should it come to pass that the El Monastir or El Tousson get to sea under such circumstances, they would have very different opponents to escape from than the Alabama has encountered. Every port where the British flag flies would be closed against them; and numerous vessels in every quarter of the globe, of a very different class to the Vanderbilt, would be but only too delighted to give them chase.—Western Morning News.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday.

Yesterday morning a body of seamen arrived in Liverpool to reinforce the crew of Her Majesty's ship Majestic, and in the afternoon a body of armed marines was landed, and, backed by this force, Mr. Morgan, of the Customs, took formal possession of El Tousson, lying in the Great Float, and El Monastir, lying in an unfinished condition in Messrs. Laird's graving dock. The workmen were turned ashore and left the ships, not, however, without expressing their discontent pretty freely. The order for the seizures is said to have come from the Foreign Office. The gunboat Heron now lies with steam up opposite Messrs. Laird's yard, and the gun-boat Goshawk still keeps watch over El Tousson.

These decisive proceedings appear to have been taken owing to a very unfounded report that the vessels were about to be taken away surreptitiously, although El Monastir is without steering gear, and neither of the vessels have any coal on board and could only leave the docks at high water.

A report is current that it is intended to take the vessels into the river for greater security. A more absurd proceeding could scarcely be thought of, as the cost of insurance would be very heavy and the vessels would be less safe than if they were in the docks.

It may be mentioned that the rumours which have been current for some time, to the effect that a portion of the Florida's crew had arrived some weeks ago to take charge of the iron-clads, has no foundation in fact. The real fact is, that these men became insubordinate at Brest because they were refused leave ashore, and were subsequently discharged by Captain Maffit. They made their way to Liverpool, and on their wages being paid they dispersed, and most of them immediately shipped in various merchant vessels.—Times.

CONGRATULATORY ORDER OF GENERAL LEE.

General Lee has just issued the following congratulatory order to the Army of Northern Virginia, announcing the victory at Chickamauga by General Bragg:—

General Orders No. 89.

Headquarters Army of Northern Virginia,
September 24, 1863.

The commanding-general announces to the army, with profound gratitude to Almighty God, the victory achieved at Chickamauga by the army of General Braxton Bragg.

After a fierce and sanguinary conflict of two days, the Federal forces under General Rosecrans were driven with heavy loss from their strong positions, and, leaving their dead and wounded on the field, retreated under cover of the night on Chattanooga, pursued by our cavalry.

Rendering to the great Giver of victory, as is most justly due, our praise and thanksgiving for this signal manifestation of his favour, let us extend to the army that has so nobly upheld the honour of our country the tribute of our admiration for its valour and sympathy for its suffering and loss.

Invoking the continued assistance of Heaven upon our efforts, let us resolve to emulate the heroic example of our brethren in the South, until the enemy shall be expelled from our borders, and peace and independence be secured to our country.

THE REV. H. W. BEECHER.—The Times of yesterday severely criticises the oratory of Mr. Beecher. It says he "comes from America with the best of all credentials as an orator. The sittings at his church are regularly put up to auction, and produced last year the sum of $18,549." That he is possessed of gifts of speech such as are appreciated highly across the ocean is evident from these figures; but whether his oratory is suited to the colder Briton, accustomed to associate elevated subjects with a chaste and decorous language, we are inclined to doubt. Indeed, in his own country there are malevolent critics who object to his style, and deride the taste of his congregation. From his late orations we are now able to form an estimate of his talents; and certainly in our judgment he is not the man to convert the British public to the Federal cause. Unless his speeches here are very unworthy samples of his genius, we must conclude that the religious politicians of America are pretty much on a par in conception and language with the politicians proper, and that the pulpit is not more intellectually elevated than the stump." His object is that England should sympathise with the territorial ambition of the Federals. "Feel for us, applaud us, pray for our success," such is his request to the English religious world, "for we desire to keep our large territory, we desire to increase the strength of the Federal Government, to put down the theory of State rights, as dangerous to our nationality." Such is the sum of his argument. What else, indeed, can he say? Can he, with the events of the time before his eyes, pretend that the principles of self-government, which make the safety of England, can be advanced by the subjection of a large population to military rule for an indefinite term? Already the evil example of the Federal States is seen in the boldness with which the Russian Government in Poland braves the censure of the World." The Times concludes by denying any sympathy with such a cause. "Are we just at this moment, when the war is again happily languishing, to goad on the Federals to another year's slaughter at the bidding of a clerical politician? We think that there will be but one answer from the intelligent society of England. Those cheers which any fluent speaker on any side of a question can obtain will represent no opinion worthy of serious consideration by politicians. The mind of this country is made up; in three years it has had time to fix itself so as to be wholly unchangeable; and the opinion of the nation is, that Mr. Beecher's section of the late Union is waging a war of injustice under the influence of an ambition with which the world in general has no reason to sympathise."

MR. LAIRD, M.P. AND THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.—In the course of Mr. Laird's recent speech at Birkenhead, he said, in reference to the report that the captain of the Alabama had informed his sailors before they left England for what service they were wanted:—"But let me tell you it is not necessary, in engaging men to go to any part of the world, to tell those men where they are going; because, you know, I am an old hand myself in fitting out secret expeditions. (Applause.) A few years ago it was thought desirable by the Government of this country to send vessels to China and to various parts of India secretly. A Chinese war was anticipated; the Russians were expected to come down the head of the Indus and the Euphrates; and it was desirable to place faith in somebody. Her Majesty's Government were pleased to place faith in me, and I built for the British Government about a dozen vessels; but the Government said to me, 'What we want you to do, Mr. Laird, is this: we want you to build, any to arm, and equip these vessels, and to send them out; they must be yours, and nobody must know anything about it.' Well, being a prudent sort of a shipbuilder, I said, 'I will take your order on those conditions.' I built the ships; they were armed; I engaged men; I did everything. (Hear, hear, cheers, and laughter.) I had to engage, not only sailors, but engineers and boiler-makers, ship-carpenters, and men of a variety of trades; I had to send them to various parts of the world, and I can assure you that a few shillings per month extra did all the business. They did not care where they went so long as they got a little extra pay (laughter); and, therefore, the statement regarding the captain of the Alabama having told a sailor all about the ship—whose she was, and where she was for—bears the impress of falsehood upon the very face of it. I never saw the captain of the Alabama but once, and that was after having taken the ship out, and I don't think he was the man to make such a statement as that upon which the ship might have been stopped."

SOME forty merchants and bankers of the city of London entertained Colonel Lamar, late one of the Confederate Commissioners to Europe, at a farewell dinner at the Albion, Aldersgate Street, yesterday evening. The dinner was altogether a private one, and with the exception of a brief and feeling response to a toast in his honour, from Colonel Lamar, and a similar response from Professor Bledsoe, another Confederate guest, there was no speaking.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—

At Liverpool, to WM. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings, At Manchester, F. A. HOSBHAM, Esq., Manchester Southern Club Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PREIFFER and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4, Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1863.

Mr. J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, acknowledges the receipt of the following additional subscriptions—

Through Mr. Hotze, London:—

Sir Arthur Hallam Elton .. ... £3 3 0

Virginia and Tennessee.

"It is officially announced that General Lee has not crossed the Potomac." Such is the cheering news with which the Northern Administration consoles its anxious public after two years and a-half of its war of conquest. Within that time half-a-dozen enormous armies, confident in themselves and their leaders, have marched from the banks of the Potomac on their grand of invasion and destruction, and have returned, some in panic rout, some disgracefully beaten, all hopelessly vanquished, to their entrenchments around Washington. General after General has passed away into unhonoured obscurity, or fed with his life's blood the soil he could not conquer. Month after month the cry of "On to Richmond" has resounded through the cities of the North and been answered clamorously in its camps; and the end of all is, that Washington is once more racked with rumours of great reverses, and that Mr. Lincoln announces, in the language of a man who has barely escaped a terrible calamity, "that General Lee has crossed the Potomac." It seems but the other day that McClellan "saved the republic" at Antietam Creek, and Meade, in the words of the New York press, "gave the coup de grace to Secession" on the heights of Gettysburg. Lee's army was destroyed on both occasions; the Northern commanders had only to put out their hands to grasp the prize of victory; there was no more fight in the South; such were the boasts at Washington and New York; and now, almost upon the very spot where the first crash of battle between North and South was heard, and where McDowell's host marched in all the insolence of Yankee pride to sweep away from its path the small patriot band that lined the crests of the hills at Bull Run, two great armies are confronting one another, to decide, not the fate of Richmond, but that of the Northern capital. The plains around are rich with the blood of 100,000 men. There the bones of thousands of Northern mercenaries lie side by side with the remains of the very flower of the Southern people. But Bull Run, Manassas, and Centreville have not yet sufficiently taught their lesson, and Mr. Lincoln, with prophetic ken, foresees the coming slaughter, and calls for a new levy of 300,000 volunteers.

The movements which have brought the two armies back to the old battle-field bear a singular resemblance to those of the two last series of operations which closed respectively at Antietam and Gettysburg. Once more we have the long period of inaction; the Federals standing at bay; both sides busily occupied in filling up their ranks; their outposts within easy rifle shot, their cavalry skirmishing daily, and New York clamorous for another Federal advance; and then, suddenly and unexpectedly, the whole Southern force, after a few manœuvres, quite unintelligible to the Northern commanders, pushes forward; a portion of it marches round the right flank of the Federal army, is already some miles in its rear, and menacing its communications, before its chief is aware of his danger. Then there is a hasty retrograde movement, an ineffectual attempt to check the advance; a severe engagement with the rear-guard; affrighted sutlers and panic-stricken teamsters pour in throngs along the roads to Washington; provisions and materiel, worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, are given to the flames. Finally, the Northern army, jaded with a week's incessant marching, disheartened by its instinctive sense of the enemy's superior strategy, takes up a position on the ground made famous by its former reverses. For five or six days, in fact, there is a neck-and-neck race; the Confederates have the start, but the Federals hold the interior lines, and General Meade accomplishes great things if at the end the enemy is not between him and the Capital. In the beginning of the month of October the Confederates held the line of the Rapidan, their wings resting a few miles north of Gordonsville and at Fredericksburg; the Federals were in force all along their line; it was reported that one division at least of their army had gone to Tennessee, and the expectation was that Meade would attack. On the other hand, it was said that Meade's army was in a bad plight; that its losses at Gettysburg had been ill repaired by the new class of recruits; that the calls for detachments had been immense, and that unless Lee's army was very materially weakened Meade had no chance of successful attack. Then came the affair at Chicamunga Creek, which made fresh demands upon the strength of the Army of the Potomac, and once more restored the relative numerical equality of the opposing forces. It certainly speaks ill for Meade's prospects that at the time when Longstreet was announced to be at the head of his division in Tennessee, turning the scale of victory in favour of the Confederates in the South-west, no attempt should have been made to strike a blow at Lee; and if it be true that Longstreet has returned with his victorious division, and has swelled the Confederate army of Virginia to the number of 70,000 or 80,000 men, we may look forward with some confidence to another great Southern victory in the vicinity of the fields which Southern valour has already illustrated.

It would appear that General Lee had been preparing for his march in the early days of October, and that the order to advance was given about the 9th. A reconnaissance in force, made by Generals Kilpatrick and Beresford, was unsuccessful, the Confederates under Stuart driving the Federal cavalry back with heavy loss. The whole of Meade's army then began its retreat, which seems to have been conducted with a celerity peculiar to Federal soldiers. General Lee still moved steadily forward on the right flank of the enemy, a portion of his troops pressing closely on the Federal rear, and engaging it whenever there was an attempt to stand. By the 12th the line of the Rappahannock had been abandoned, Culpeper was in the possession of the Confederates; by the 13th the Federals had reached Manassas Junction, the enemy in hot pursuit; and on the 14th General Meade reports that his rear-guard had just repulsed the enemy at Bristow's Station, near Manassas, and captured a battery, some prisoners, and two colours. Notwithstanding this alleged victory, he seems to have been unable to check the Confederates, for a day later his army is drawn up at Centreville, and a portion of it advanced to Fairfax Court House to prevent the main body being outflanked and cut off from Washington. The position of the two armies at the latest date was very much the same as that occupied by them in August, 1862: the Confederates holding the passes of Bull Run mountains and the road to Leesburg and Harper's Ferry; the Federals covering the direct road from Washington southward, and the Orange and Alexandria railroad. We shall not attempt to anticipate the news that may arrive by next mail; but we have confidence that another battle fought will be another Confederate victory won, and we can only trust that it may be decisive. So far as can judge from the present meagre details, Lee's object is to compel his enemy to become the assailant, and, if possible, to divide his forces; General Meade's forte, however, is that of cautious defence; his instructions, and we believe his desires, are to avoid a battle; and unless General Lee should succeed in getting upon his line of communications and so forcing him to a battle, we shall not be surprised to learn that Northern soil is once more trodden by an invading army, or to see the burghers of Pennsylvania once again scared by Texan troopers.

General Rosecrans is not yet out of danger. General Bragg is still in his front, and guerillas are swarming upon his communications, and an intention is evident on the part of the Confederate General of crossing the Tennessee in force, and placing an army between Chattanooga and Nashville. No reinforcements from the West had reached Rosecrans. Burnside, completely isolated, was compelled to look to his own safety; and yet at this critical moment, when the safety of two large armies is in suspense, not a soldier can be spared from Washington. Tennessee and Kentucky must be held, and Rosecrans and Burnside saved by troops from the armies of the Mississippi. It remains to be seen whether these have not sufficient work cut out for them in their own Departments. Defeat in Louisiana and the West, failure before Charleston, above all the presence of General Johnston with an army of 60,000 men, ready, if the opportunity arises, to reopen the war in the State of Mississippi, must render the hope of obtaining effectual help from the South-west very faint. On the whole, the prospects of the Confederates were never brighter. The force they have now in the field is numerically stronger, better equipped, better fed, and more efficient in every respect, than at any previous period of the war. They have deprived the invader of half his strength by drawing him away from his gun-boats. We are justified in looking forward to a series of successes which may make even the North despair of conquest, and render the claim of independence too powerful to be resisted by any Government of the Old World which acknowledges the influence of public opinion.

State Elections in the North.

INTIMIDATION at elections is not altogether unknown in England. It is but a few days since a gentleman who still holds office under the Crown knocked down one refractory elector and directed his fellows to bonnet another, for having ventured to vote against the ministerial candidate, in a borough of which the Chief Secretary for Ireland claims to be patron, and, it would seem, proprietor. There are one or two places in which elections are always carried by a well understood species of compulsion. Calne would hardly dream of returning a candidate disagreeable to the Marquis of Lansdowne. Totnes did, the other day, rebel against the yoke of the Duke of Somerset, and several of His Grace's tenants have been ejected for their participation in that unsuccessful treason. Before the days of the Reform Bill, elections of this kind generally resulted in favour of the Tories, who were the chief proprietors of rotten boroughs. As the Whigs had the selection of the places to be spared from disfranchisement by that measure, most of the small boroughs that survived it are in Whig hands; and it is in the name of Liberal principles that landlords like the Duke of Somerset assert their right to do what they will with their own. But we never yet heard that either Whigs or Tories boasted of such triumphs as a proof that public opinion was in their favour. They do their dirty work in silence, and wisely forbear to crow over it.

The agents of the Federal Government on both sides of the Atlantic, would do well to observe a similar discretion; for, certainly, the less said about the State elections just terminated, the better for the successful party.

At the election of 1860, the Republicans carried the State of Ohio by a majority of 231,000 to 210,000, and that of Pennsylvania by 268,000 to 208,000. At that time, no considerable section of Mr. Lincoln's supporters anticipated a disruption of the Union as a result of his success. They intended to spite, provoke, and humiliate the South; but they had no idea of invading her rights, as they understood them, or of sacrificing their own. Had they known that the election of Mr. Lincoln meant disunion, civil war, a Confiscation Act, an Emancipation edict, military occupation of the Southern States, martial law at their own doors, not one in ten of them would have given the vote they did. Since that time Mr. Lincoln has done much to alienate and disgust his supporters everywhere; and in particular to disgust and turn against him the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio. The character as well as the geographical position of the former, is indicated by her title of "The Keystone State." She was always anxious to keep the Union together: as, on several occasions, Virginia also proved herself. She had no sympathy whatever with New England Abolitionism. She was disposed to keep the peace, and compel others to do so. She had decided the contest of 1856 against the fire-brand Fremont. She was a staunch believer in State Rights; a lover of peace; a hater alike of civil discords and of martial "coercion." Mr. Lincoln has outraged all her cherished principles. He has set up the theory, hitherto unknown, of Federal Sovereignty. He has done his best to abolish State Rights altogether; he has confiscated the liberties of Maryland; he has pretended to create a new State out of a portion of the territory of Virginia; he has imposed military rulers on portions of Louisiana and Tennessee, and he is trying to do the same thing throughout the South. He has, of his own mere will and pleasure, declared the freedom of the slaves. He has caused the leading citizens of Philadelphia to be imprisoned for many months without accusation and without trial, which he had as much right to do as the King of Prussia to order the imprisonment of a subject of Nassau or Bavaria. He has insulted the sovereignty of the State and trampled on her liberties. The man who stood as Republican candidate for the office of Governor is the traitor by whose connivance these things were done; the man who, as Chief Magistrate of Pennsylvania, betrayed her rights to the usurper, and who stood by, a willing accomplice, while the Constitution he was sworn to defend was outraged, and the citizens whom it was his duty to protect were dragged from their homes by Federal officers and immured in Federal dungeons. This man has been re-elected to the office he had so grossly misused—restored to the trust he had betrayed. Ohio has been almost as insolently treated. She has been placed under the military rule of General Burnside; has seen that officer issue orders prohibiting all criticism upon the Government on the platform or in the press; has seen that edict enforced by military violence and carried into effect at the point of the bayonet. Her most illustrious citizen was seized in his own house by Federal troops, who had no legal warrant of any kind for his seizure; charged with disobeying an edict which had no legal force whatever; tried before a Federal court-martial, which had no more right to try a citizen of Ohio on a political charge than a court-martial of the German army of occupation would have to try a subject of Denmark-Holstein; sentenced by that illegal tribunal to a term of imprisonment, for daring to speak his mind on public affairs, and sent into exile by a President who had no more jurisdiction or authority in the case than the Diet at Frankfort has over the disputes between the Prussian King and his Chambers. The victim of this tyranny was candidate for his native State; he has been rejected in favour of a tool of the tyrant. Over these triumphs the Federal faction, here and beyond the Atlantic, is enthusiastically jubilant. For them it is a bond fide expression of the popular will; a voluntary declaration in favour of the Republican party; a spontaneous "endorsement" of Butler and Blenker, Chase and Lincoln; a condonation of the crimes and treasons committed by the President and his creatures against the States of the North; a full approval of the atrocities they have perpetrated in the South.

We take a somewhat different view of the matter. In the first place, America is, so far as we know, the only country in which it is allowed to hold elections under martial law; which, as our readers will remember, now so far prevails throughout the North, that the Habeas Corpus Act, the only security against the exercise of military despotism, has been formally suspended. In Maryland and Kentucky the polling booths were actually guarded by troops, with orders to allow no "disaffected" or Democratic voters to enter. Secondly, the whole body of electors are at the mercy of the Government. In France, an elector who votes against the Government candidate has some sort of security. He may be harassed, persecuted, shut out of the sunshine of official favour, and scowled on at the Prefecture, but that is all; and yet we do not think the elections in France entitled to much praise for freedom or genuineness. Besides, the French elector has the protection of the ballot; his vote may be secret if he please. In America, the ballot is but a form; the voter really gives his vote openly, and he is exposed, at a time like the present, to any amount of vengeance that the Government may please to inflict. If he is a man of note on the Democratic side, he may be sent to prison for a twelve-month by a simple order from Mr. Seward; or sent across the lines and utterly ruined, at the pleasure of the military commander in whose district he lives. If he be too insignificant for a lettre de cachet or a formal exile, he may be drawn as a conscript. Failing this, he is at the mercy of his Republican neighbours and of the lawless soldiery at the disposal of the Federal general. He may be robbed by marauding Germans; he may be maltreated or plundered by other ill-wishers; and the mere hint that he is a Democrat will suffice to ensure a denial of redress in courts which are the creatures of the victorious party. Thirdly, the Government has compelled the States to recognise the votes of soldiers; and these votes, to the number of some thirty or forty thousand in each State, are at its own absolute disposal. No soldier would dare to vote against the Republican candidate or even to refuse to vote at all. Finally, the manipulation of the ballot-boxes is in the hands of the Republicans, and scrutiny is impossible. So much for the significance of these elections as tests of public feeling in the great Northern States.

The Mersey Steamships.

In a letter published in the Times of Friday last "Historicus" exults over the seizure of the steamships which Mr. Laird has been building in the Mersey, and makes a desperate effort to justify that seizure by demonstrating that the ships were destined for the service of the Confederate Government, and that such destination in itself subjected them to condemnation. His argument is so very curious, both in the perversions of law which it involves and in the extremely unprofessional notions of evidence which it displays, that we once more take up the pen to dispose of the last batch of sophisms with which this indefatigable special pleader endeavours to conceal the real nature of Lord Russell's conduct.

In the first place, it is to be established that the vessels were intended for the Confederate service; and Historicus endeavours to prove this point by a mass of irrelevant evidence, not one jot of which would be listened to in any court of justice beyond the jurisdiction of Mr. Lincoln. First, he brings forward a correspondence, by which it is shown that the Confederate Government has been for some time desirous of having ships built in Europe; and would have us infer from this that the ships building in Liverpool must be intended for that Government. This argument would of course equally prove that all vessels of a certain class which may be in progress in any European dockyard are intended for the same parties; and we may dismiss this precious bit of evidence without another word of comment. If this be the sort of proof on which Lord Russell is acting, he will hear, when the case comes into court, comments both from bench and bar, which will hardly be flattering to his intense self-satisfaction. Secondly, it is to be presumed that these vessels are meant for the Confederates, because the same firm built the Alabama. As it happens that Mr. Laird has built ships for many other parties, our own Administration included, it is not possible to attach much weight to this argument. Thirdly, it appears that the crew of the Florida arrived in Liverpool about the time when these vessels were ready to sail. They arrived there a month or two before that time; can Historicus tell us whether they be there still, or not? The final argument is a very strange one. Mr. Mason left England just before these ships were ready to sail; therefore, it is probable that he did so to avoid any demand for explanations from Earl Russell. In the case of Federal enlistments in Ireland, the Foreign Secretary complained to Mr. Adams, and received from him a satisfactory reply. Fearing that he would not be able to give an equally sufficient account of these steamvessels, says Historicus, Mr. Mason withdrew, in time to avoid inconvenient questions on the subject. This conjecture is very amusing, but it happens to be wholly inconsistent with facts. In the first place, Mr. Adams did not give any satisfactory account of the charges against his Government. Their truth was notorious; everyone knows, and none better than the Federal Ambassador, that the North is drawing large supplies of men from Ireland to fill up the wasted ranks of its armies; and when Mr. Adams denied this fact, and Lord Russell accepted his denial, no one believed either the Envoy or the Secretary of State. Secondly, Mr. Mason's withdrawal was due, as we explained at the time, to the persevering discourtesy of the Foreign Secretary, who made a point, at every possible opportunity, of insulting the Confederate States through their accredited representative. Whether dictated by ill-breeding or by the menaces of Mr. Adams, Lord Russell's treatment of Mr. Mason was such as it was not becoming for the envoy of a high-spirited nation to endure. Historicus is well aware that Lord Russell, behaved not merely with coldness and unfriendliness, but with pointed and wilful rudeness; and that the ingenious account which has been fabricated by his advocate of the reasons for Mr. Mason's departure is without the shadow of foundation. Historicus seems to think that the displeasure expressed at the detention of these vessels by those whom he calls "the English advocates of the Confederate cause," and by the Richmond journals, proves their destination to the Confederate service. Has it never occurred to him that Southern journalists—who, by the way, are not in the secrets of the Administration—may naturally be indignant at the unworthy and dishonest partiality displayed by a foreign Minister, who does not attempt to put a stop to Federal recruiting in Ireland, but takes energetic measures to prevent alleged Confederate purchases of ships in Liverpool, whether that allegation be true or not? Is it not plain to him that the complaisance of Lord Russell towards the North must move the disgust and anger of every honest and patriotic Englishman, whether or no his sympathies be with the South? It matters not whether the ships were or were not really intended for the Confederates: Lord Russell detained them because Mr. Adams thought that they were so intended; and it is this, whether Mr. Adams were right or wrong, this violation of British law, this intended departure from British neutrality, that provokes the resentment alike of Southerners and of Englishmen.

Historicus still clings to the hope, that, if he cannot prove the legality of the seizure, he may, at least so bewilder the public mind on that question as to prevent any dangerous outburst of popular indignation. Accordingly, a considerable part of his letter is taken up with a renewed attempt to twist the law to the condemnation of these vessels; to establish, by quotations from the English statutes book, and from American law reports, that if these vessels be intended for the Confederate service, it is the right and duty of our Government to seize them. On the two new points which he raises, we join issue with him at once.

First, he quotes the clauses of the Foreign Enlistment Act which forbid the fitting out, equipping, or arming of transports or men-of-war for the service of a belligerent Power; and proceeds to argue that from the very structure of the vessels now in question they are "armed" within the meaning of the statute, although they have not on board a single gun or an ounce of powder. Now it is clear, to begin with, that a "ram" without guns could make but a poor fight on the high seas. She can move but slowly, and a swift-sailing cruiser, with a heavy armament, would soon compel her to surrender, without ever becoming exposed to a blow from her beak. If, therefore, she pass out of neutral jurisdiction without receiving an armament, she is in no state to resist the belligerent right of capture; and, if that right be not infringed or resisted, the belligerent has no cause of complaint. We have a right to sell, and he has a right to seize; he has no claim to any other remedy. Next, as regards ourselves, the Act is a penal one, and as such must be construed strictly. The literal sense of its words is in no way to be extended or strained, but they are to be interpreted in the narrowest sense that they will fairly bear. It seems that the words "fit out or equip" were intended to refer to the case of transports and store-ships, which for the most part are not armed, and whose distinctive purpose is evinced, not by armament, but by a special sort of fitting-up. On the other hand, a ship-of-war becomes such, and evinces her purpose, not by fittings, but by armament; for without armament she is not capable of acting as a ship-of-war. If, therefore, the suspected vessel be neither equipped as a transport nor armed as a cruiser, it would seem that there is no case for seizing her. Further, the Act carefully omits any restriction on the mere building and sale of ships, whether transports or cruisers, intended for the service of a Power engaged in war against a State with which Her Majesty is at peace. This is not a piece of carelessness, but a deliberate and intentional reservation in favour of the freedom of a most important branch of national industry. It is clear, therefore, that the "arming" intended by the Act is not a part of the building of the ship, but something altogether apart therefrom and subsequent thereto. The offence contemplated clearly consists in some offensive armament superadded to the building of the vessel, and cannot be meant to include a mere peculiarity in her original construction. These vessels, therefore, are not fitted out, equipped, or armed within the meaning of the Foreign Enlistment Act; in leaving Liverpool to enter the service of a Power at war with the United States, or with France or with Russia, they would commit no violation of our law; it is needless to add, that if they left Liverpool as the property of a French owner, and were not transferred to Confederate purchasers save in a French or other neutral port, our law would in no way be violated, and the complaint of the United States would lie, if at all, not against us, but against the Power from whose ports the ships first departed in the character of Confederate cruisers.

Historicus has brought forward an American decision, for which he is indebted to a correspondent of the Economist—on which he lays great stress. The Gran Para, prize to the Irresistible, was brought into a port of the United States; the case came before the Supreme Court. It appears that the Irresistible had sailed from a port of the United States, carrying her armament as cargo, and a crew sufficient for a man-of-war. She entered the La Plata, was there commissioned, re-enlisted her crew, and cruised under the flag of the local government against the commerce of Spain. Held, by Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the judgment of the court, that this was a fraudulent evasion of Federal law; and judgment pronounced against the Irresistible. We confess that, though this case does not bear upon the question now in hand—seeing that there is all the difference in the world between going out in all but fighting trim, with an armament ready to mount, and going out without arms or ammunition—the judgment of the Chief Justice conflicts with that which we have always affirmed to be the law expounded by Federal courts. Are we right, or not? In the case of the Santissima Trinidad, tried one day previous to that of the Gran Para, how did the court decide? The Independencia left an American port armed, and with a crew sufficient for a man-of-war, entered the port of Buenos Ayres, passed into the hands of the local government, was commissioned, re-enlisted her crew, and cruised against the commerce of Spain. Held, by Mr. Justice Story, delivering the judgment of the court, that there had been no violation of Federal law. Take again the case of the Bolivar, which left an American port "in search of funds to fit her out as a privateer." She was acquitted. Pass from judicial decisions to national practice. During the war with revolutionary France several privateers cruised under the French flag, while we were still at peace with the United States, which had never been in any but an American port. During the Canadian rebellion the rebels were reinforced by American sympathisers, armed with weapons from the public arsenals; and neither State nor Federal authorities took any means to check these lawless proceedings. During the Russian war a vessel was built for Russia in an American port, and sailed thence under command of an officer formerly holding a commission in the Federal navy. A British and French squadron proposed to overhaul her. Her captain declared that he would not submit to the exercise of our right of search, and the Federal squadron on the Brazilian station sustained him in this resistance to the law of nations. Will Historicus take up the challenge, more than once offered him, and say what he thinks of American law and American practice? and with what face his clients, after the decisions and acts we have cited, can claim from us protection against proceedings which, at worst, are but imitations of their own?

Mr. Laird has had a word to say to his fellow-townsmen and constituents concerning the language used by the Attorney-General about the Alabama and the proceedings of the Government in the case of El Tousson and El Monastir. He points out the utter inconsistency of the speech delivered by the Attorney-General in defence of the Ministry against the attacks of the Federalists in the House of Commons, and that recently delivered at Richmond, in defence of Earl Russell's proceedings in regard to the Alexandra and the vessels recently seized: an inconsistency which destroys all respect for Sir R. Palmer's authority, by showing that he has spoken, not as the legal adviser of the Crown, but as an advocate retained for the Ministry. He spoke with just indignation of the insolent demeanour of the Foreign Secretary at Blairgowrie, when, admitting almost in so many words that he had exceeded the law which Parliament had enacted, he declared his intention to ask Parliament to pass the law which he had put into execution: Mr. Laird does well to be angry. Lord Russell's conduct towards him has been evidently dictated by other motives than an honest desire to do what he thought best for the public service. Had that been the only object, it was enough to mark the broad arrow on the masts of the vessels and give notice that their exit would not be allowed: To place a guard of marines on board, and order a man-of-war to make fast a cable to one of the vessels, and keep her fires up, ready for hostile action at a moment's notice, was utterly needless, and could be intended for no other purpose than to gratify the personal malignity of Mr. Adams, or to offer a wanton and ungentlemanly affront to a political opponent of the Foreign Secretary. An outrage on the decencies of political life so gross and so deliberate, an abuse of official power for the indulgence of ill-temper of an individual Minister so palpable and so flagrant, has not been ventured by any English statesman since first political warfare was brought under regulation, and rendered compatible with private goodwill and personal courtesy.

A German Professor on the American Quarrel.

THE Federal cause must be hard up for arguments and advocates, when the Daily News prints and comments on such miserable trash as we find in its columns of Tuesday week. We hardly thought that the Northern factions in England had sunk to so low an ebb. Have they not Harriet Martineau and Professor Newman? Or if religious scruples have suddenly arisen in our contemporary's consciousness, are not Mr. Newman Hall and the Rev. Baptist Noel on his side? Why need he print the ungrammatical twaddle of a learned German, who, having renounced two countries, has finally settled in the great city which, like Rome in her earliest age, gives refuge to the outcasts of all the world; who was once a German rebel, then a citizen of South Carolina and Professor in her University, and who, happening at the outbreak of secession to be settled in the North, has found it expedient to become a Yankee patriot and a vehement enemy of rebellion? Or, if for any reason it was requisite to publish this letter, why not let it rest in safe obscurity in the smallest print and least-read columns of a not very widely circulated journal? Why force upon public attention a performance which the public will not take the trouble to understand and is certain to laugh at?

Dr. Francis Lieber is a learned man, after the bad fashion so prevalent in Germany, and too generally favoured in America. He has read a great deal on many subjects, and crammed into a very limited brain an unlimited number of facts and fancies on all departments of human knowledge. He is the editor of an American Encyclopædia, borrowed (more Americano) from the German, and he is said to be the author of the extraordinary "Rules and Regulations" appended by Mr. Stanton to the military code of the United States. One of these betrays the amount and value of the man's political knowledge: "The uniform protects the soldier, of whatever class, condition, colour or former political relations." That is to say, an Englishman found serving against England in a French uniform is not liable to be hanged as soon as taken. We should not advise Dr. Lieber under any circumstances to put his theory to the test of practice; as, for instance, by enlisting in the Danish army to fight against the German Confederation. Not only would he certainly be hanged, but no jurist on earth would doubt the justice of his sentence. For the rest, his description may be found in Lowell's "Fable for the Critics":—

"'Twould be endless to tell you the things that he knew,
All separate facts, undeniably true.
But with him or each other they'd nothing to do.
No power of combining, arranging, discerning,
Digested the masses he learned into learning."

We are sorry to say that, in all his learning, one thing, extremely essential to his present purpose, appears to have been omitted. He does not understand the language he assumes to use. His letter is not written in German, nor in English, nor—unless the secession of the South has ruined as completely the language as the Constitution of the North—in American, nor in any other tongue with which we are acquainted. Who can tell us what is meant by "dignified geography?" We now of such things as eccentric grammar, and incoherent logic; so that terms of moral and intellectual qualification may be applied, we suppose, to the names of abstract sciences. But it requires the imagination of a German and the knowledge of an encyclopædist to invest geology with amiability or geography with dignity. We shall look with interest, hereafter, to the advertising columns of the Daily News, expecting that some enterprising publisher will announce a dignified map of the United States or a pious chart of the Atlantic Ocean.

We must do Dr. Lieber the justice to say that his first point is stated with some ingenuity; though, whether from imperfect comprehension of the English language or from malice prepense, he has altogether perverted the arguments of his opponents. "What right have you, whose entire government and national existence are founded on the idea that there exists such a thing as a right of revolution, according to which a new Government may be established—what right have you to resist the South if its people choose to establish a separate policy?" He goes on to argue that it does not follow, from the existence of a conditional right of revolution, that every revolution is justifiable. But the Federal Government is founded on a revolution which can only be justified on the theory that the right of revolution is unconditional; for if wrongs or grievances be required to give it, then never was there a more unjustifiable rebellion than that of the Thirteen Colonies. They rebelled simply because England asked of them, as she now asks of all her colonies, that they should contribute to their own defence. The fundamental idea of the American Revolution is, that the will of the people of any country is of itself a sufficient justification for a change of government. The existence of the United States is based on the idea that the right of revolution may be exercised at pleasure. Mr. Lincoln stated this idea pretty distinctly at a time when he little dreamed that he would one day wage desperate war against a people bent on national independence:—"Any people, anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have the right to rise up and shake off the existing Government, and form a new one that suits them better. . . . Any portion of such people that can may revolutionise, and make their own of so much of the territory as they inhabit. More than this, a majority of any portion of such people may revolutionise, putting down a minority, intermingled with or near about them, who may oppose their movement." This is the theory on which the American Government is founded. Justly, therefore, is it thrown in the teeth of the North that they are now opposing by force of arms the fundamental principles of their own political existence. The argument has no weight for Englishmen, who hold rebellion a crime; it is conclusive as against Yankees, who treat it, in the abstract, as a virtue.

Then follows a beautiful bit of logic. "The South is not fighting for independence, for it has never been dependent." In that case, no nation can ever fight for what it possesses already; and Englishmen, fighting on their own soil against a would-be conqueror, would not be fighting for national existence. Dr. Lieber fails to perceive that the same reasoning disposes of his subsequent assertion, that the South is fighting for slavery. She always was a slaveholding country; always independent; it is, therefore, as possible that she may be fighting to retain independence as to maintain slavery. And inasmuch as the North offered her every guarantee for slavery, if she would but forego independence, it is pretty clear, which is the real object of the present struggle.

The South is not to be let go, because the "dignified geography" of the country marks it as intended by Providence to be the territory of a single people. This is curious English, and still more curious reasoning. It is precisely by reasoning of this sort that Frenchmen claim for France the left bank of the Rhine; and the same logic would clearly justify the United States in appropriating Canada and the outlet of the St. Lawrence. "All large transmarine colonies" are destined to independence; but contiguous portions of the same empire can never separate. This justifies the claim of Russia to oppress Poland, and of Austria to retain Venice; it clearly proves that Belgium never ought to have been separated from Holland, Portugal from Spain, or Greece from Turkey. The disruption of the Roman Empire, too, was a defiance of natural laws; and the dissolution of the German Bund ought to be prevented at the point of the sword. It is unfortunate for the Professor's doctrine that England finds her colonies often eager to separate from contiguous governments, but always resolute to retain their allegiance to the mother country.

After a good deal of childish abuse of the South—abuse which, if it were not so extremely childish, would be justly described as sheer Billingsgate; after calling the Southerners cut-throats, and comparing them to thieves collared by a policeman, the Professor comes at last to his grand and conclusive argument. The North has the same right to resist secession, at least, that the South has to achieve it. If the South have the right of revolution, the North has the right of repression. And Dr. Lieber, as a citizen of the United States, has as much right to fight for the United States against the secession of Louisiana, as a Frenchman would have to fight for France against the revolt of Languedoc. Most sane men conceive that there is a vast difference between the dissolution of a confederacy and the disruption or dismemberment of an empire. Not so Dr. Lieber. In his view the Federal Government is a Sovereign Power, and the States are its subjects, possessing no more independence than Lancashire or Normandy. Is this quite consistent with his assertion that the South has never been otherwise than independent? Or is logical consistency one of those trivialities which professors are at liberty to disregard, along with historical truth and political facts? "But, say others, and it is sad to observe there are many Northerners of great notoriety among them, we have no right to fight the South, inasmuch as they, being Sovereign States, had a sovereign right to secede. We deny it. We maintain that the word 'sovereignty' applied to our States has merely slipped into our political language—merely slipped in, and much mischief has it done. The Constitution does not contain the word once from beginning to end." It is perfectly true that the Constitution does not contain the word; and for a simple reason—the position of the States was a matter ascertained long before the Constitution was framed or the Union came into being. What does Dr. Lieber conceive to have been the position of the States before 1789? They were independent of England; they were not subject to a Federal power; what was their status? The Constitution does not call them sovereign, forsooth! But has Dr. Lieber never read the treaty with England, prior by many years to the Union, which declares the States at that time to be "free, sovereign, and independent?" If the Constitution nowhere contains the word "sovereign," by what form of words was that State sovereignty given up? or, if not given up by the Constitution, when did it cease to exist? or how comes its existence to be recorded and asserted in the constitutions of the States themselves? We cannot help suspecting that among the few subjects of which Dr. Lieber is wholly ignorant must be reckoned the history and the law of his adopted country.

Driven from every other position, Dr. Lieber at last takes up that which, in the opinion of the South herself, is the actual position of the aggressors, and takes his stand boldly on the "right of the strongest." "Let us, however, for argument's sake, accept this position. Either the South had a perfect right to secede, or it had no such right. If the latter, we are of course right in fighting for our policy and Government, for law and country; and if the South had a right to secede, why then they constitute a sovereign nation; and we, being a sovereign nation too, have, according to all law of nations, the right of conquering another sovereign nation."

Granted, in one sense. The soldiers of a nation engaged in such a conquest are not pirates or murderers. They are entitled to the courtesies of war; to be kept as prisoners, not hanged as assassins. But universal opinion brands the Government which sends them on such an errand as a criminal against the common interests of mankind; it is held that all foreign Powers are justified in interfering, nay, bound to interfere, to prevent the success of its crime, and even to punish, by personal and national severities, the authors and accomplices of the monstrous iniquity. The Professor puts the enterprise of the North on the same footing as the attempts of Napoleon on Spain and of Nicholas on Turkey. Does he remember that Napoleon died at St. Helena, a prisoner and an exile? that Nicholas died of a broken heart, amid the curses of Europe? Does he know that Napoleon's conquests cost France three years of foreign occupation, and thirty years of prostration and poverty?—that Russia has not yet recovered the punishment she brought upon herself ten years ago? From the moment when the world clearly understands that the enterprise of Mr. Lincoln is of this nature—that it involves "the conquest of one sovereign nation by another"—its doom is sealed. Three months will not elapse before the intervention of Europe will have ended the contest, and driven back the would-be "conquerors," to learn, in humiliation and misery, that the maxims of the twelfth century are not to be applied to the nineteenth, and that he who now asserts the right of the strong hand against one of the family of nations draws upon himself the vengeance of the whole.

THE COTTON TRADE.*

In these days, when it is the fashion for magazine contributors to republish their articles in book form, we often meet with volumes, the chapters of which are in no way connected, except by the binding. It is likely enough that a cautious reader, going through the title page and table of contents of the work before us, might think it one of those patchwork performances. He might think that "The Mississippi Union Bank Bonds," and "The Wheat Trade of Great Britain, France, and America," were rather incongruous subjects to treat in a book devoted to the history of the cotton trade, but such a conclusion would be unfair. It would be impossible to write a complete history of the cotton trade without, at the same time, writing a history of the commerce and social progress of England and the late United States. For example, not only is the wonderful industrial development of Lancashire and the rapid expansion of our foreign trade due to cotton, but it is to the cotton lords, backed by the cotton operatives, that we owe the greatest and most beneficent revolution of modern times—the substitution of free-trade for protection. So in America. It is not only that the cotton cultivation of the South has been the means of fertilising both North and South, but that to cotton cultivation must be ascribed the extension and preservation of that institution which has been the means of saving the South from the political demoralisation that has overtaken the North. Here and there Mr. McHenry has given prominence to details and introduced topics that are hardly necessary to the elucidation of his subject. But it ought to be remembered that he has had to work a comparatively virgin mine, and that it was nearly impossible for him to entirely separate the gold from the quartz. We hope to show that there is much sterling metal in the book; for though many passages will provoke sharp criticism, every chapter contains valuable information, and reflects great credit on the industry and research of the author.

A very few figures from Mr. McHenry's elaborate statistics will set forth the intimate relation between the progress of England and the development of the cotton cultivation in the Southern States. From 1750 to 1801, a period of fifty years, the population of England and Wales had increased from 6,517,305 to 9,156,171, and from 1801 to 1861, the population had increased from 9,156,171 to 20,223,746. In 1801 our total importation of cotton was 56,000,000 lbs., of which 18,500,000 lbs. came from America. In 1860 our total importation of cotton was 1,390,938,752 lbs., of which 1,115,890,608 lbs. was from America. Our author says:—

"What more conclusive evidence of the importance of the Southern cotton crops to England can be given than this? These great augmentations in the population, it will be seen, occurred subsequent to the extension of the cotton industry of the kingdom. The population of Scotland within the same period, about sixty years, and for the same reason, nearly doubled."

To this it may be objected that the deduction is not strictly logical, and that our author has fallen into the too common error of assuming a coincidence to be a cause. Now we understand from the whole tenor of Mr. McHenry's book, that he does not think that without American cotton the world would have remained stationary, and that the steam-engine and the electric telegraph would have been born in vain; but he asserts that to American cotton must be assigned a greater progress than could have been achieved without it; and this, we think, is unquestionable. What other article would so exactly have met the industrial and commercial requirements of England? The chief raw materials of our wealth are coal, iron, and mechanical inventiveness. Is it possible to visit a cotton-mill and not be struck with the idea that no other manufacture can call forth so much ingenuity, or make a more ready use of steam and machinery? The locomotive has been compared to a horse, and the machinery of a cotton-mill invariably suggests a comparison between it and the handicraft of man. Then, again, we find that cotton, to a greater extent than any other article of general consumption, is increased in value by the process of manufacture, and so gives us the largest margin for profit, and fits in so nicely with our peculiar advantages—iron, coal, and mechanical inventiveness—as to confer upon us a virtual monopoly. Our commerce is with all the ends of the earth, and cotton fabrics are a leading article, that we can sell anywhere—in China, India, and Africa—in all our colonies—in cold as well as hot climates. At whatever port our ships touch, a market is found for it. So long as we can buy raw cotton in practically unlimited quantities, and at such cheap rates that our fabrics compete against home manufactures in the East, and tempt consumption by their cheapness, England must continue to be the great clothing emporium of the world. Are we not indebted to the Southern States of America for such an abundant supply of cheap cotton as we could get from nowhere else? See now, when the normal price is multiplied, what other countries can do for us. They send us an inferior article, but only in such limited quantities that a vast army of our operatives are yet standing idle in the market-place. Well, then, is not Mr. McHenry justified in looking to the cotton trade as a principal cause of our marvellous industrial and commercial progress? And is it not manifest that the English cotton trade could not have attained to its late—alas, that we should have to so describe it!—gigantic proportions without the aid of the cotton-fields of the Confederate States?

We have omitted one important item respecting the adaptability of cotton for the staple of our industry and commerce. It is not perishable, and its value is not affected by the fluctuations of fashion. A stock of cloths and yarns may be kept for years without deterioration. Like corn, it is always in demand; but unlike corn, it may be worked up ready for use, and stand for any length of time without spoiling. We refer to this because we desire to direct the attention of our readers to a valuable, and, as we believe, original suggestion, made by Mr. McHenry, and which solves a problem that has hitherto puzzled economists and politicians. When the war in America commenced, and it was evident that our cotton trade would be paralysed, it was supposed that the total commerce of England would be injured, and that our resources would be forthwith crippled. We all know how agreeably these anticipations have been disappointed. Our trade-returns exhibit hardly any falling off, and except in Lancashire the country is flourishing. We cannot account for this result, except to a very small extent, by the impetus given to commerce with France by Mr. Gladstone's treaty, or by the large orders from the North for munitions of war. How then, is it that we have escaped the evil that seemed imminent? Is it possible that the largest limb of our commerce can be disabled and the whole body not suffer? Mr. McHenry points out the true reason of the anomaly, and that the evil we dreaded is only postponed. He reminds us that clothing, not being perishable like food, is kept in store. There is generally a two years' stock of clothing in the world, but in 1861, there was at least a three years' stock of cotton—including raw cotton and cotton fabrics. In 1858, '59, and '60 a greater breadth of land had been planted with cotton than in any previous period. The South—to her detriment in 1862—had begun to rely on the West for her bread-stuffs, and to devote more of her land and labour to articles of export, and particularly to cotton. If war had not intervened, both the Southern planters and the English manufacturers would have been called upon to pay a heavy penalty for over-production. In 1861 our stock of cotton was large, and the markets throughout the world were glutted with our cotton goods. Our manufacturers were saved from ruin by the war, and their stocks both of raw material and manufactures attained to a value that more than compensated them for the inactivity of their mills. Besides, we have been doing an exceedingly lucrative trade. We have been selling at war prices the goods we bought at peace prices. But the game is nearly over. The cotton famine is at our doors. Henceforth, until the American supply is restored, we must do a smaller business at less profit. We shall soon see the crippling of our cotton trade telling upon our commercial resources.

We cannot attempt to follow Mr. McHenry through his elaborate discussion of negro slavery. To do so would involve the writing of a book; for the work before us so bristles with facts that they could not be summarised in the longest review. Englishmen will, no doubt, join issue with our author respecting many of the conclusions he draws about slavery in the South, but they will not be slow to testify to the value of his information. Mr. McHenry does not beat about the bush, but frankly and openly defends the institution of negro slavery. In this he represents the sentiments of the Confederates. Convince the people of the South that their institution is wrong and they will not do as some of their friends on this side have done, they will not apologise for it, but they will abolish it. On the other hand, the Confederates seek not to make converts to their own opinions on the abstract question. What they are willing to do, and what Mr. McHenry does, is to publish the plain unvarnished truth. They have a right to tell us that, whatever we may now think of negro slavery, it is to us that the South owes the institution. We forced it on them against their will. We who have been so zealous in suppressing the slave-trade, were for 246 years engaged in it. Nor need Englishmen blush to confess it. When our forefathers carried on the traffic they as much thought it lawful and expedient as we to-day think it unlawful and inexpedient. But what modesty ought this to teach us in speaking of Southern institutions! For two centuries and a half we were slave-dealers, and yet shall we have no patience or tolerance for the fruit of our enterprise? The gift of £20,000,000 for the redemption of the West Indian slaves was a noble act, though we cannot say the result has been a happy one, either for the West Indies or for the slaves so emancipated. But Mr. McHenry throws out a suggestion that should make us careful not to reproach the South with our chivalric generosity. The total number of negroes imported into the West Indies was 1,706,000, and the total number of negroes in the West Indies at the time of Emancipation was 660,000. The total number of negroes imported into the Southern States, was 350,000, and in 1860 the total number of negroes in the South was 3,953,760. In one case the negroes had dwindled away to one-third of the number imported; in the other case the number imported had increased elevenfold. If the negroes had increased in the West Indies as they have done in the South, their redemption would have cost us £500,000,000; if the negroes in the South had decreased as they did in the West Indies, they might have been redeemed with £4,000,000. To this might be added, that if the slaves in the South had not increased more than the free negroes in the North, a very few millions would have redeemed them. Mr. McHenry explains, that it was the custom to import only males into the West Indies, while the females were sent to the continent. With us the negro was a chattel only, and it paid us better to import him than to suffer him to increase naturally. In the South the negro is a person as well as a chattel, a human being as well as property, and he has a social status. It would seriously tax the eloquence of a Brougham and the fervour of a Wilberforce to depict the horrors of a system that made the negroes die away as they did in the West Indies; and none can be so blind as not to perceive that the rapid increase of the negroes in the South is an undeniable proof that they have been treated in a way that reflects the highest and enduring honour on the Christian philanthropy and kind y generosity of the Southern people. But further comment is needless. The statistics we have quoted are their own interpreters and their own exponents.

We had intended to advert to several passages in Mr.

* The Cotton Trade: Its Bearing upon the Prosperity of Great Britain and Commerce of the American Republics, considered in connection with the System of Negro Slavery in the Confederate States. By George McHenry. London: Saunders, Otley, and Co.

McHenry's book in which he points out the efforts made by the South to stop the slave-trade. The Constitution of the Confederate States, unlike that of the United States, forbids the traffic. We should have liked to dwell on the constitutional question discussed by our author in different chapters, as well as in his introductory letter to Mr. Gregory, M.P. But we must bow to the exigencies of space, and for these and other interesting matters refer our readers to the volume itself. We shall conclude our notice with a few remarks on an episode in the commercial history of the United States, that we commend to any sensation novelist who is in want of . . . that is not the less strange for being quite true.

In 1836 the Charter of the Bank of the United States expired, and President Jackson refused to renew it, justly declaring that the Federal Government had no power under the Constitution to establish a bank or any corporation that could acquire and hold property. The legislature of Pennsylvania came to the rescue, and passed an Act establishing a State bank, to be called the Bank of the United States. The president and officers of the old bank, instead of winding up, transferred to the new one all the business, together with the books, papers, notes, and obligations, including a quantity of notes that had been issued under the Federal charter. Although the nominal capital of the new Bank was $35,000,000, and it obtained large credit all over the world, it was from the first insolvent, and paid dividends out of the property of its creditors. In order to bolster up its credit it established branches in every direction, and resorted to a regular system of accommodation bills. At the time it commenced business—in 1836—the United States people were in the flush of a wild speculation which had in seven years raised the nominal banking capital of the country from $110,000,000 to $378,000,000, and consequently its operations did not meet with careful consideration. Mr. Biddle, the president of the bank, sent Mr. Jaudon to London to act as agent, and his son, Mr. Edward Biddle, a youth of twenty, with a Mr. Humphreys, to Liverpool, where they established the firm of Humphreys, Biddle, and Co. At the same time arrangements were made with Messrs. Bevan and Humphreys, of Philadelphia, to accept bills drawn in the South against consignments of produce. Bevan and Humphreys were reimbursed by the bank; the bank sold bills on European houses; Humphreys, Biddle and Co., of Liverpool received the bills of lading and pawned them, and the money so obtained was sent to Mr. Jaudon to meet the engagements of the bank. The crash came in 1839. Messrs. Hottingue and Co., of Paris, refused the drafts of the bank, but the bank determined to die hard, and applied to Messrs. Hope and Co., of Amsterdam, for assistance, and from that and other firms got advances upon the deposit of securities of State bonds. So depressed was the credit of such securities that for $1,000,000 Messrs. Hope and Co. received $13,000,000 at par value. Amongst the securities were some bonds of Mississippi which had been issued to the Bank of the United States, for the purpose of founding the Mississippi New Bank. The bonds were, according to the Act of the Mississippi legislature, to be sold at par value and for cash. So far from this being done, the bonds were pledged for credit, and not a sixpence of the money was ever paid into the State coffers. In 1841, Messrs. Hope and Co., were informed of these circumstances, and yet after that they passed the bonds to "innocent holders." The State of Mississippi, Mr. McHenry argues, was not legally bound to pay these bonds, any more than a man is bound to pay an acceptance to an "innocent" holder who bought it cheap, knowing it to have been stolen. It might, perhaps, have been expedient for Mississippi to have retired these bonds, which the "innocent" holders had bought at 10 per cent. of the par value, and were willing to sell at a profit of cent. per cent., but such a proceeding on the part of the government of Mississippi he thinks, would have been unjust to its constituents. The Bank of the United States he pronounces a gigantic fraud, and charges the "innocent" holders of the Mississippi bonds with trying to make something out of the crash, just as wreckers seek to despoil a stranded vessel. The chapters devoted to this subject by Mr. McHenry will repay perusal.

A work like that before us must necessarily partake of many of the characteristics of a dictionary, in which the compiler must avail himself of the labours of his predecessors. But it is due to Mr. McHenry to say he has contributed vastly more from his own stock than he has borrowed from others, and that he has produced something more valuable than a mere compilation, a compendium for permanent reference of all the most important facts and figures relating to his subject. He has, moreover, afforded to the reader such copious materials for forming their own opinions, that even those who may decline to follow him in his deductions, or who may find fault with details of arrangement or of style, cannot fail to consult the book with advantage.

THE "QUARTERLIES" FOR OCTOBER.

EXCEPT the little clique of British subjects who regard the worship of New England as the only true religion and the vilification of their country as the most exalted virtue, and who desire to see the dismemberment of the British Empire, and Great Britain solely intent on money-getting and carrying on business by the kind permission of other nations—except these men, no one can read the article in the Edinburgh on "Queensland" without heart-felt satisfaction. Perhaps the day may come when India will pass from our dominion, and our rule be only remembered as a wonderful episode in our career; but our colonies, whether they remain in political union with us, or whether, having attained to maturity, they prefer to take their places as distinct members of the family of nations, will be conspicuous and enduring monuments of our glory and greatness. And in colonisation we have beaten all our compeers so effectually that we may, without vanity, say that rivalry is now impossible. The dominant nations on the continent of North America are our descendants, and so far as Canada is concerned, our fellow-subjects. Turn we to Australia, and we find that that land also has become the heritage of the Anglo-Norman race. In that distant region our progress is unprecedented. In the course of a single generation, from being regarded as a convenient settlement for convicts, for raising wool, and for giving employment to a band of officials, Australia has become populous, rich, and important, and is already parcelled out into distinct and jealous nationalities. Of this progress Queensland is a wonderful example; but instead of dwelling on the rapid development of that colony, we think it will be more useful to point out some close but natural analogies between the colonial history of America and that of Australia. Every student must have been struck with the well-defined persistent individuality of the colonies of British America. It might have been expected, that as soon as the original grantees were dead, and their influence was withdrawn, the colonies would have coalesced, especially as their populations were small and their interests a century ago almost identical; but so far from amalgamating, they were, at the time when they threw off their allegiance to the British crown, perfectly separate powers; and despite the pressure upon them and the urgent demand for united action, they rigidly maintained their character as sovereign States; and when they formed that "more perfect union" which eighty years ago was necessary to protect and guarantee their independence, the Articles of Federation contained an emphatic declaration that the Federal Union did not involve any violation of the sovereignty of the several States, and the world was called upon to acknowledge the independence, not of a single nationality, but of thirteen independent nations. In Australia we behold precisely the same spirit prevailing. Australia is divided into distinct countries, with their distinct parliaments, and having no other political tie than their common allegiance to the British Crown. There are angry disputes about boundaries and strivings for territory that are surprising when we consider that the greater part of Australia is still unoccupied land. How can we account for this colonial disunity? How is it that members of the same race, brought together on the same continent, form themselves into distinct nations as soon as they have cleared forest enough to build a town or two? The phenomenon is easily explained. The English emigrant carries with him to his new home an instinctive perception that local self-government is the surest guarantee of liberty. The Briton is everywhere very patient of taxation, but he will not submit to taxation that is severed from representation, or be satisfied with a representation that is so distant as to be beyond his control. Some visionary colonial reformers have proposed that Canada and Australia should be represented in the British House of Commons, but neither Canadians nor Australians would accept such an offer, if we were foolish enough to make it. True freedom demands that the parliament—the taxing power—should be localised, and this involves the formation of separate nations in Australia, as it did in America. And what is now happening in America will teach the Australians to cherish their State independence. In the North they see a party in power that would abolish State lines, and in the attempt to do so has established a despotism such as has never before been imposed upon any community speaking the English language; and in the South they see a Government set up for the purpose of defending the sovereignty and independence of the States, and that in the midst of a numerically unequal and terrible struggle the rights of the Southern citizens are respected and political and personal liberty are inviolate. This doctrine of States Rights, which it has pleased our Government to ignore in deference to the mandates of Mr. Seward, is not an invention of American politicians, but is a manifestation of the vital principle of British liberty, just as the doctrine of the Northern Republicans is a manifestation of the vital principle of despotism—such a despotism, for example, as that of Russia.

Australia holds out a brilliant promise for the future, but what has occurred in America warns us of the folly of speculating upon the continued prosperity of nations. There is, however, one circumstance connected with Australia which, though now a source of discord, will, it is to be hoped, preserve that country from becoming the prey of the unscrupulous demagogues of an unbridled democracy. Australia, at least until the discovery of the gold-fields, was the resort of a better class of emigrants than those which flocked to the Northern States of the late Union. America was comparatively an easy refuge from poverty at home, but to go to Australia, so new and so distant, required greater nerve and resolution. Fortunately, though accidentally, the terms upon which a man could become a landowner in Australia were so favourable, that English gentlemen of small means—including many retired officers and younger sons of county families—and yeomen were allured by them; and before the gold discoveries brought emigrants of all sorts, there had grown up a powerful landed interest—a veritable aristocracy, except in name. Efforts have been made to oust this class from their possessions, but the only result has been to confer upon them a stronger and indefeasible title. Australia, then, will not be parcelled out into small tenements, but, on the contrary, there will be a large body of large landowners, embracing the best blood of the country, and who, for the defence of their property rights, as well as for other reasons, will have to make their voice heard and their influence felt in the government of the country.

The article on "Queensland," which has suggested the foregoing remarks, is the first in the current number of the Edinburgh, and the last article treats on a somewhat kindred subject—"The Colonial Episcopate." In nothing are people more conservative than in their forms of worship; and this is particularly the case with the members of the Church of England. When the doctrine of baptismal regeneration was being discussed there was much less excitement than when some clergymen preached in a white surplice instead of in a black gown. It is not that there is comparative indifference about points of doctrine, but that any change in a matter of form is a more palpable heresy, and is supposed—and wisely supposed—to indicate some radical change. It is, then, not surprising that members of the Church of England, when emigrating, should have felt it as not the least of their afflictions that they had to separate themselves, not only from the parish church in which they had been christened and married and from the churchyard in which their fathers slept, but, in fact from what appeared to them communion with the Church. It is true they took with them their Prayer Books, and they had clergymen to minister to them, but they had not the Establishment, or even a counterpart of it. The Episcopal Church in the American colonies was reproached by her enemies, that in her baptismal service she bound the sponsors to bring the child to the bishop for confirmation, well knowing that there was no bishop within 3,000 miles. Then again the want of bishops limited the supply of clergy, for a colonist however fitted for the work of the ministry, had to undertake a long, and in that era, perilous journey for the purpose of being ordained. Yet from year to year, and from reign to reign, the matter was shelved, and the anomaly was continued of an episcopal colonial Church without an episcopacy. Nor ought we to be surprised at the delay or hesitation. The Church of England is essentially a duality, being a Church, and also an institution of the State. How was the episcopacy to be planted in the colonies, seeing that there were no revenues or other means for supporting the episcopal dignity? Would not the creation of mere missionary bishops degrade the home bishops in public estimation? However, the necessity became urgent, and in 1787 Nova Scotia was created an episcopal see; and lately, the colonial episcopate has multiplied so rapidly that there are not less than forty bishops. The system does not yet work smoothly, and at present the question is pending whether the metropolitan rights conferred by the Crown on suffragan bishops are valid. If not, then it seems that colonial bishops are not amenable to any authority, and that they might turn Hindoos without forfeiting their rank and revenues. The Edinburgh notices the constant visits of colonial bishops to England, and we are afraid that there are many cases in which they live in England and only now and then visit their dioceses. It is wonderful that in the early days of the House of Hanover some minister did not hit upon the expedient of creating non-resident colonial bishops, and giving them seats in the House of Lords as well as revenues. It would have been an excellent way of making a batch of new peers to swamp the Opposition. The Church of England will flourish in the colonies, but divested of her formal state attributes. For example, it is absurd to have Lord Bishops in a country where there is not a titled aristocracy. It would be as well to drop the "lord" in all cases, both at home and abroad, when the bishop is not a peer of the realm.

Of the other articles in the Edinburgh, we need only mention two. One is a review of Mr. Phillimore's "History of England, during the reign of George the Third," which is exceedingly bitter, almost too bitter to do Mr. Phillimore much harm. Readers will enjoy it, because it is natural to enjoy the abuse of one's neighbours; but everyone will suppose that something besides the badness of the book made the critic angry. The other paper that we wish to mention is concerning "Cinchona Cultivation in India," which gives an interesting account of the means adopted for extending the cultivation of that most useful medicine, Peruvian bark. Mr. Markham has introduced it into India with complete success, and it is also thriving in other places. Plants from Peru have been transplanted to places where the climate and soil are in all essential particulars like those of Peru. At the end of the article on Cinchona, a few words are thrust in about cotton and the reviewer observes, "On the extensive cultivation of cotton in India the hopes of this country must necessarily rest for future supply." It occurs to us that the hope would be more reasonable if we had found in India a soil and climate identical with those of the cotton districts of the Confederate States.

The Westminster opens with a sensation article entitled, "The French Conquest of Mexico," of which the purport is to abuse the Emperor of the French. We shall offer a very few words in reply to this attack, which is marked by illogical conclusions more than by false premises. We cordially uphold the principle of non-intervention; and if the French had conquered Mexico we should not have defended the act, although we might think it good for the Mexicans. But what are the facts? The government of Juarez had so flagrantly repudiated its engagements that England and Spain, as well as France, agreed upon an armed demonstration. England and Spain withdrew, and the French alone had to complete the work. The result has been the overthrow of Juarez, and the election of the Archduke Maximilian as Emperor. Did the French overthrow a popular government in Mexico? So unpopular was Juarez that he could not find money enough to pay an army to keep the peace of the country, or even to procure "the small sum necessary" for paying the journey of an envoy to Paris. Juarez's minister, writing to the British representative, admits (p. 321), having resorted to the expedient of imprisoning "persons of the highest respectability in order to obtain resources from the sums paid for their release." Can greater wretchedness, and a more unpopular government be conceived? But the character and progress of the French expedition are a sufficient answer to the charge of conquering Mexico. If the intervention had not been at the instigation and with the consent of the great majority of the people of Mexico, could 30,000 French troops have prevailed against the whole nation? Ballot-boxes may be tampered with, but there is no gainsaying such facts as 30,000 troops being allowed to entrench themselves in the heart of a country inhabited by millions, and their advent being immediately followed by the overthrow of the very form of government. We might as well say that Garibaldi conquered Sicily. We do not wonder at the Mexicans being sick of republicanism, seeing that in forty years they have had no less than seventy presidents. The line of defence adopted for Juarez by the Westminster is peculiar. The reviewer admits that robberies and crimes of violence were of frequent commission, and were allowed to go too often unpunished, and that in such instances as the murder of Mr. Boale, an Englishman, and the shot fired (during the excitement of a popular rejoicing) at the French Minister, the Mexican Government does not appear to have taken any prompt steps to bring the offenders to justice. We should have thought that the murder of a British subject and an attempt to assassinate an ambassador being winked at, were crimes for which no excuse could be found. The Westminster is equal to the occasion. It is suggested that the Mexican Government was negligent because diplomatic relations had been broken off by England and France, and that Juarez consoled himself with the reflection that it was "as convenient to be hanged for a sheep as for a lamb." Here there is just a glimmering of truth; for certainly nothing that Juarez could do could make his title to the gallows more apparent. But the following excuse for the Mexican Government is the climax: "It must be owned, too, that whatever may be the usage of international law, it is not easy clearly to define the precise degree of responsibility which should be visited upon the Government of a disorganised country for the crimes of individual subjects." Now, "the government of a disorganised country" is a contradiction of terms; for the sole function of government is organisation, and where there is not organisation there is not a de facto Government, though there may be a sham Government. But as to responsibility, there is no question either in law or morals. A government is responsible to foreigners for the acts of its citizens; and if the respectable persons in a community sanction the existence of a Government that is too weak to enforce punishment against offenders or to protect the lives of ambassadors they must be prepared for war. The Mexicans have wisely embraced the first opportunity of getting rid of Juarez and his clique.

Altogether the Westminster is rather below the average. An essay on Miracles is not quite deistic, which is saying much for it, considering the theological principles of the Review. A paper on Wit and Humour is rather heavy reading. Wit and humour, like sparkling wine, are spoilt if we wait long to consider and criticise before we taste. An article on Poland betrays the same hate and envy of the Emperor Napoleon as does the article on Mexico. Europe is called upon to interfere in Poland, lest France should do the work alone, and so secure the gratitude of the Poles. According, however, to the following passage, there is little need for intervention:—

And if we look at the strength which the Confederates of America have put forward during their insurrection, which nevertheless was considered sufficiently great to justify their recognition by Europe as belligerents, we shall find that their efforts have been as nothing compared with those of the Poles. The Confederates, rich, free, and prosperous, began the struggle with their own disciplined armies and on their own ground for a disputed question of Federal rights; the Poles, ground down by a despotism without parallel impoverished by excessive taxation, and watched by the most elaborate system of espionage in the world, rose against their oppressors, unarmed and surrounded by enemies, for the holy cause of independence and freedom. The Confederates are defending themselves against an invader from without: the Poles are making desperate efforts to expel the oppressor within. And on which side has been the balance of success? The vast armies of the South, fighting for a point of law, are yielding; the half-starved and ill-armed insurgents, fighting for their homes and all that is most dear to them, are disputing, step by step, every inch of their country with the enemy, defeating his troops, counterchecking his manœuvres, and superseding his government by their own.

We certainly were under the impression that for every soldier put in the field by the Poles the Confederates had at least one hundred. We were ignorant of the fact that the Confederates began the struggle with "disciplined armies" and we thought that both South and North had to form the armies with which they have fought. The Confederates aver that they are fighting for independence—and Lord Russell, Mr. Gladstone, and all intelligent Englishmen agree with them—and the Federals say that the South is fighting for empire. But the Westminster declares all are wrong, and that the Confederates are fighting for "a point of law." We do know something about the success of the Confederates, and as we are told the Poles have been even more successful, we cordially congratulate them on their triumph. We only wish in this respect the above passage was correct—a passage, by the way, that is without precedent in a quarterly review, and rivals anything that has appeared in the New York Herald.

The "Progress of Engineering Science" is admirably described in the Quarterly. Great and enduring works were accomplished by the use of wind and water, but the steam-engine has totally eclipsed all former mechanical contrivances. It is an inadequate estimate to say that in the last hundred years "the engineers have doubled the mechanical power, and more than doubled the productive resources, of mankind." Machinery, which the workman spurned as an enemy, is the working-man's best friend. Demagogues have often complained of the burden of a class of consumers who were not producers, and who, therefore, were a charge to those who toil; surely they ought to praise mechanical contrivances for every machine that economises or multiplies the labour of man is a producer without being a consumer. That the working-classes are preparing to profit by the increase in the world's wealth, of which they get the lion's share, is evident from the formation of co-operative societies. From a carefully prepared article in the Quarterly, we learn that in Great Britain there were in April last 332 societies, having 90,458 members, with a paid-up capital of £429,315. This return is exclusive of the co-operative stores in Scotland and Ireland, and of many in England not upon the official register. The societies that are established for manufacturing purposes are only joint stock companies, and we do not see how the shares can be kept in the hands of the workmen; for they are marketable, and if the workman is willing to sell and the capitalist to buy, no law can prevent them passing into possession of the latter. But the stores are only available for workmen. The goods are sold (in most cases for cash) at the usual retail dealers' prices. The profits, after paying a small dividend on the capital, are divided amongst the purchasers in proportion to the amount of their purchases; in some cases the return to purchasers has been equal to 2s. 6d. in the pound. There is no doubt that the co-operative principle induces frugality, and ensures to the working classes better value for their money. It is likely, too, to have the good effect of putting a check to the system of adulteration, which cheats the working man of his health as well as his money.

The Quarterly contains reviews of "Thomas Hood, and his Life and Writings;" of Sir C. Lyell's "Antiquity of Man;" and of Mr. Froude's History of the Reign of Elizabeth. An article on Japan is very apropos to the present moment, and will be a boon to our public writers and speakers, who will therein find a store of useful information about a subject very little understood.

COLONEL LAMAR AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—Some of your contemporaries having connected my name with the African slave trade, permit me to state through your columns that the only connection of any kind that I have ever had with that traffic has been to denounce it, as well in the halls of Congress as before my constituents in Mississippi.

Yours very respectfully,

17, SAVILLE ROW, W.
October 24th.

L. Q. C. LAMAR.

The following letter from Mr. Lindsay, M.P., has been published in the Star:—

(To the Editor of "The Star.")

SIR,—My attention has been called to an article in your paper of Saturday last, in which you invite me to render you information in so special a manner, that I cannot refrain from doing so. I shall do so in specific terms.

1. It is not true, as I learn from Colonel Lamar, that he owned, or ever had anything whatever to do with, the yacht Wanderer, which you represent as having been engaged in the slave trade. On the contrary, if you refer to his speeches in Congress, and to his constituents in the State of Mississippi, you will find that he denounced and expressed his abhorrence of that trade.

2. It is not true that the Southern Confederacy favours the slave-trade. On the contrary, its Constitution prohibits that trade, and makes it imperative on Congress, by law, to carry that prohibition into effect.

3. It is not true that, whilst a member of the "house of Lindsay and Co.," or at any time since, I entered into any of the "business relations" set forth in the intercepted despatches to which you refer. I knew nothing of the contents of those despatches or their allusions until they were published.

4. It is not true, as you insinuate, that pecuniary motives have, or ever had, any influence over the course of conduct I have considered it my duty to adopt as a public man. In justice, you ought to remember that though the Crimean war afforded large sources of profit to British shipowners, I opposed that war and condemned it.

5. It is true that my "house on the banks of the Thames" is always, and I hope ever will be, open to the "representatives of oppressed nations," but not because they are "the bearers of lucrative contracts." Exiles have been there who have had nothing to give, and their welcome was warm for the cause they espoused; but I do not, as a rule, open my doors to Russian admirals or Austrian generals.

6. It is not true that I have any pecuniary interest whatever in the independence of the South. On the contrary, if that kind of interest had any influence over me I would have advocated the cause of the North.

I have now answered in distinct terms, as you request, your several inquiries and your charges.

Allow me in conclusion to express a hope that in future you will measure the motives which guide the conduct of public men by a somewhat higher standard than that which, for the last two years, appears to have guided your own.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

W. S. LINDSAY.

THE STEAM-RAMS.

The following correspondence, called forth by a letter of "Historicus," has been published in the Times:—

(To the Editor of "The Times.")

SIR,—"Historicus" has the pen of a ready writer. He has evidently the confidence of the Government, and has become the medium of explaining to the public the reasons which induced Lord Russell to seize the Liverpool rams. For these reasons I might not have ventured to question his conclusions if his facts could have been depended upon. But in this instance he appears to have reared his superstructure upon a quicksand. He says these vessels are without doubt for the Confederate Government and built to its orders, because certain "intercepted correspondence" makes it clear "that a special mission has been established and a special fund provided for the purpose of fitting out, equipping, and arming vessels in this country without her Majesty's licence, for warlike purposes, against the dominions, ships, and goods of a foreign State." "This is no matter of inference," he continues; "it is the express object for which the vote of the Confederate Congress was passed;" and therefore he arrives at the conclusion that her Majesty's Government was perfectly justified in stopping certain vessels now in course of completion at Birkenhead, and thereby inflicting a heavy blow upon a very important branch of British industry.

"Historicus" does not doubt the authenticity or accuracy of the "intercepted correspondence" sent by Mr. Adams to Lord Russell, and published in a blue-book by command of her Majesty; and though I cannot enlighten him on this point, I may state, for his information, that in the same blue-book there is another document sent by Mr. Adams to Lord Russell in which a somewhat unwarrantable use is made of my name. The book is not at present before me, but I think this document professes to give a list of twenty-two vessels which were about to run the blockade, and my name, or that of my late firm, is given as the owners or agents of no less than eighteen of these ships. Now, sir, to the best of my recollection, I never heard of any of these vessels till I saw them published in the blue-book, and though I have had many inducements, I never owned a ton of shipping or to the value of one sixpence in any vessel that ever ran or attempted to run the blockade.

So much for the value of the information and the accuracy of the documents furnished by the Federal Government, on the faith of which, I fear, her Majesty's Government founds its American policy, maintains its "impartial neutrality," allows munitions of war to a fabulous extent to be shipped to the North, shuts the door against all communications, official or otherwise, from the South, and stamps the broad arrow upon every ship supposed to be for the service of a brave and an oppressed people, who have already given abundant proofs that they are a nation. Is that neutrality? Is it justice, or is it English honour?

May not the "intercepted correspondence" be as inaccurate as the document to which I have just referred? I can at least assert, in regard to that correspondence, in which my name is also introduced, that the "naval store bonds" referred to in it were not negotiated by me nor by my firm, and that not one of the "six vessels" was built or contracted for by me or by my late partners, or by any of our correspondents.

Not satisfied with the quotations which referred to the part I was represented to take in these transactions, "Historicus", to attain a political end, under the immunities of an anonymous writer, impugns the motives and questions the veracity of the late Commissioner from the Confederate Government to England, by inferences derived from the same intercepted documents. To connect Mr. Mason's name in some way with these ships, "Historicus" states that his withdrawal from England was "timed" to evade any possible inquiries of the hypothesis, and the assent of the British public is challenged to the hypothesis.

Now, sir, every person conversant with the tone of public sentiment in the Southern States must be aware that the people there had been very indignant at the refusal of her Majesty's Government to have any relations, official or otherwise, with Mr. Mason, and were clamorous, through the press, for the termination of his mission. It is also well known that a resolution requesting the President to terminate the mission had been approved by a majority of the House of Representatives. To this feeling President Davis was at last obliged to respond, as is shown by the terms of the despatch of recall quoted by Mr. Mason in his note to Lord Russell. But if Lord Russell desired any information from Mr. Mason (having no official relations with him) he could address him with like propriety on the subject of these ships after his withdrawal as well as before. To such flimsy material has "Historicus" descended.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

W. S. LINDSAY.

Shepperton Manor, Middlesex, Oct. 24.

(To the Editor of "The Times.")

SIR,—Your correspondent ""Historicus"" has laboured to justify the seizure of Mr. Laird's steamers in the Mersey by trying to identify them with the vessels contemplated by my contract with the Confederate Government; and some of the papers treacherously stolen from my son (Major Reid Sanders, now in Fort Warren,) communicated to Earl Russell, and by him laid before Parliament, have been quoted by "Historicus". Two documents, purporting to be letters, are set forth by "Historicus". One is signed by me, and is genuine; the other, although without signature, is presented to the public as mine. The unsigned letter was neither written, dictated, nor in any manner suggested by me, nor did I know of its existence until I saw it in print. My handwriting is peculiar, and could not be mistaken, and is well known in the State Department at Washington. I leave it to Mr. Adams or Mr. Seward, or their subordinate tools, to explain how this spurious paper has been palmed upon the American people and British Government, which, so far as it is attempted to be fastened upon me, I utterly repudiate. Neither my own genuine letter, signed by me, nor those of the Confederate Secretaries of the Treasury and Navy, contain a syllable at variance with the perfect legality of the transaction. The contract in question, although requiring care to prevent any false appearance of illegality from being attached to it (which might lead to embarrassments being thrown in the way of its execution), was of a perfectly unimpeachable character, being simply a mail contract for steamers designed to ply between neutral and Confederate ports, and so constructed as to be able to enter and leave the latter without much regard to the shots they might receive from the Yankee blockaders en passant. Not even "Historicus" would contend that the building of such vessels involved the slightest violation or even evasion of any law, international or municipal. By thus running the blockade with regularity and impunity, such a line of steamers would indeed render important service to the Confederacy, and, therefore, the latter was willing to promote their construction by the contract in question. My contract with the Confederate Government is of the perfectly unimpeachable character above explained, and I am willing to show it to Lord Palmerston himself in proof of this declaration. Mr. Laird's steamers have not, and never have had, anything to do with it, directly or indirectly; nor, directly or indirectly, have I had any communication with that gentleman on that or any other subject.

It is but simple justice to Mr. Laird that the facts should be known, to shield him from the blow Historic aims at, and on the strength of this spurious letter; and it is with that view that this communication is made.

Respectfully,

Pimlico, Oct. 26.

GEORGE A. SANDERS.

THE REV. MR. BEECHER.—Rector Campbell has sent the following letter to the secretary of the Emancipation Society:—"Childwall, October 10, 1863. Sir,—In reply to your letter requesting me to inform my congregation that Mr. H. W. Beecher will 'deliver a lecture in the Philharmonic Hall on the American war and emancipation,' I beg to inform you that I decline to invite my congregation to attend a lecture on that species of emancipation which Lord Brougham, in my opinion, justly calls 'a hollow pretext designed to produce a slave insurrection.' I return you the platform ticket you have sent me, not intending to attend the lecture; being of opinion that persons professing themselves to be the ministers of a merciful God, 'the author of peace and lover of concord,' might be better employed than in advocating a fratricidal war, accompanied by atrocities which, as Lord Brougham says again, 'Christian times have seen nothing to equal, and at which the whole world stands aghast almost to incredulity.' Your obedient servant, AUG. CAMPBELL, Rector of Liverpool. Mr. Robert Trimble."—Liverpool Albion.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, Oct. 28.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

THERE is nothing to occasion fear or anxiety in the position of the general Money Market. If the rate is not increased by the Bank directors, we shall go steadily forward, the bankers and brokers being fully supplied. Trade is sound, and the prospect exists of its remaining supported. The only drawback that is likely to arise, if inconvenience is experienced, will be from the too rapid increase of public companies, and the gambling in shares, which appears far from being repressed. The rate for the negotiation of first-class paper is  $\frac{3}{4}$  to  $\frac{1}{2}$ , and six months bills have been taken at  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent., indicating that little undue stringency is expected here or abroad.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week has been exceedingly small, only £54,000, whilst on the other hand, £107,000 in sovereigns have been withdrawn for transmission to the East. The arrivals of specie have been rather large, being £517,299, all of which is from New York, and the Saxonia, from the same destination may be expected hourly with £36,555 more. The shipments of specie by the Ceylon steamers for Alexandria and Bombay were £540,100. This amount is chiefly for the payment of cotton, and is divided as follows: Alexandria gold £90,400; Bombay gold £74,050, and Bombay silver £375,650. The quotation of bar silver is firm, and may be called about 61 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 61 $\frac{3}{4}$ . There has been nothing doing in Mexican dollars, but the price is nominally 5s. 3 $\frac{1}{4}$ d.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for the English Funded Securities has been particularly steady throughout the week, nevertheless a fair amount of business has been transacted, but with scarcely a fractional alteration in prices. Consols closed this evening at 93 to  $\frac{1}{8}$  for money and 93 $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{4}$  for the account, which is precisely the same as they were on this day week. Exchequer Bills are also unaltered, being 1.10 to 2 prem. There has been less business doing in the Foreign Stock Market than for some time past, and the speculative movement appears for the moment to have subsided. Nevertheless a fair amount of business has been transacted in some of the fancy stocks, but without any material alteration in prices. The closing quotations of some of the chief descriptions were:—Greek, 30 $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{4}$ ; Mexican, 41 $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{2}$ ; Spanish Passives, 35 to  $\frac{1}{2}$ ; do. Certificates, 13 $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{2}$ ; Turkish Six per Cents. (1854), 92 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; do. (1862), 71 $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{1}{2}$ .

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Although there has been rather more doing this week in American Government and Railway Securities, business has been far from active, and prices do not present any improvement. The dealers are evidently waiting for some decisive news regarding the hostile armies, and till that arrives there will be very little disposition evinced to operate, either speculating or otherwise. The dealings have been as follows:—Virginia State Six per Cents. 38. Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 76; Ditto, do. Pennsylvania, do. 74 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 75 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 75, and 76 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; Erie \$100 Shares, all paid, 66, 65, and 66; Ditto ditto, Seven per Cent. Preference, 70, x. c.; Ditto, ditto, Third Mortgage, 66; Ditto, ditto, Fifth Mortgage, 70; Illinois Central, 82 $\frac{1}{2}$  and 83; Ditto \$100 shares, \$90 paid, 19 and 19 $\frac{1}{2}$  dis; Ditto, ditto, all paid, 74 $\frac{1}{2}$  and 74; Marietta and Cincinnati Railway Bonds, 71 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; Michigan Central Six per Cents., 70; Panama Railway, first mortgage 101, 10 $\frac{1}{2}$ , and 101 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; Pennsylvania Central Bonds, second mortgage, 86, 87, and 86 $\frac{1}{2}$ .

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A good business has been transacted in the English railway share market, and for most descriptions prices close at an improvement upon the quotations of this day week. In London and North Western there has been a rise of 1 per cent. In Sheffield and South Eastern, of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; in Great Northern, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, and North Eastern (Leeds),  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; and Great Western and Midland, of  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. On the other hand, there has been a decline of  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent., and in Brighton of  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. In the foreign railway market business has been rather quieter, but in general prices are fairly supported. With regard to shares in British Possessions, a full average business has been transacted, at uniformly steady prices.

BANK MEETINGS.

At the usual half-yearly meeting of the Oriental Bank Corporation, Mr. H. G. Gordon in the chair. The business of the meeting was solely confined to the declaration of a dividend of 35s. per share, being equal to 7 per cent. for the half-year. At the first ordinary general meeting of the proprietors of the Bank of Wales, the Chairman (Mr. Daniell) stated that the first branches were opened in May, others in July, and the last during the present month; the board were, therefore, not in a position to submit to the shareholders a profit and loss account. The prospects, however, of future success, with an increased capital, were, as far as their present experience enabled them to judge, promising.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

We have no change of importance to notice with regard to this security. The news from the States continues favourable, but is not of such a decisively favourable nature as was expected from the previous account. Hence the stock, after going to 66-68, has gradually receded, closing 64-66, with a steady market.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The Constantinople and Alexandria Hotels Company is started for the purpose of establishing superior hotels, replete with every accommodation that can contribute to the comfort of European and other families, at present unable to obtain the advantages and facilities required even at the most extravagant prices, both at Constantinople and Alexandria. At the former, a convenient site has already been secured, and one will be immediately obtained at the latter. The proposed capital is £300,000, in 15,000 shares of £20 each. The first issue to be restricted to 5,000 shares.—The prospectus has been issued of the Littlehampton, Havre, and Honfleur steamship Company. The object being to run fast iron steamers, to perform the passage from Littlehampton to Honfleur, calling at Havre, in eight hours. The Brighton and Western of France Railway Companies, having agreed to enter into satisfactory traffic arrangements. The capital required is only £150,000, in 15,000 shares of £10 each, of which only one-half is to be issued in the first instance.—The prospectus has been issued of the Staffordshire Joint Stock Bank, with a capital of £1,000,000, in 10,000 shares of £100 each. It is stated that arrangements have been made for the purchase, on very favourable terms, of a private bank of high reputation, whose principal will be a shareholder and director, and also that negotiations have been entered into for the purchase of a second private establishment. It is proposed to commence business immediately at Bilston and West Bromwich, and subsequently at Walsall, Willehall, and Darlaston.—The prospectus has been issued of the Mercantile Credit Association with a capital of £2,000,000, in 40,000 shares of £50 each; but of this number it is only proposed at present to issue 20,000, of which 10,000 are already subscribed for. The Company has been formed for the purpose of assisting the development of those constantly extending operations in all departments of trade and commerce, which present so extraordinary a feature in the industrial statistics of this country. It is not the purpose of the Company to assume the functions which belong to ordinary banking, but it will make cash advances upon the deposit of all sound and bona fide securities, such as debentures and dock-warrants, including approved bills of exchange.—The Gloucestershire Smelting Company is another new undertaking, with a capital of £70,000, in 14,000 shares of £5 each.—The Otea (New Zealand) Copper Mining Company is another new undertaking just brought forward, the capital required being £50,000, in shares of £2 each. The property is freehold, and it is stated that £30,000 worth of ore has already been sold from it. There is no land carriage, the mine being on the coast. The purchase-money is £15,000, two-thirds of which are taken in paid-up shares.—The Lundy Granite Company is established for the purpose of working the granite quarries of Lundy Island, which already possess considerable reputation, and the supply of stone is practically unlimited. The situation of the island and the advantages possessed for railway or shipping transit will, it is expected, prove of considerable importance. The capital proposed to be raised is £100,000, in 20,000 shares of £5 each; the deposit to be 10s. per share on application and £1 on allotment, after which no call will be made for six months.—The Deep Dale Mining Company has been established for the purpose of leasing and working an extensive and valuable mineral property at Fell, in Rhenish Prussia, about two miles and a half from the river Moselle, and held under a concession from the Crown Prince of Prussia. The required capital is £20,000, in 10,000 shares of £2 each; deposit 10s. per share on application, and 10s. on allotment.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting to-day of the proprietors of the Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, a report was read, which stated that the receipts compared with those of the corresponding half of last year, show nominally a falling-off of £11,566, but that as £30,007 was there included for hire of some of the Company's ships as transports, the ordinary business shows an increase of £18,441. At the same time there has been a reduction of £19,691 in expenditure, of which £7,807 was in coal, owing to the diminished consumption and reduction in cost. The freight traffic had increased, but the passenger traffic had been less, the latter having last year been augmented by the International Exhibition. Looking at the satisfactory return of the accounts, a dividend of £3 per share was recommended, together with a bonus from the insurance fund of 30s. per share. The Chairman (Captain Mangles) having referred to the satisfactory nature of the reports, concluded by moving that the report be adopted, which after some discussion was agreed to. The dividend and bonus are at the rate of about 15 per cent.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In these departments business has progressed for the most part slowly, but steadily, the New York advices having had little effect. In the cotton market purchases have been less extensive than they were last week, but they are still above an average; the late advance in prices is firmly maintained; the value of cotton goods is also supported, and confidence in the future course of the trade is undiminished. American provisions have ruled dull; fine butters have scarcely supported the recent currency, although the better sorts of Friesland have risen several shillings per hundredweight. Cheese is without essential change. The grain trade remains in the same dull state as noticed for some time past, and prices, although very moderate, have a drooping tendency, although no absolute decline can be quoted. Forced sales of petroleum by weak speculators have caused renewed depression in this article. At one period the price was as low as 1s. 11d. per gallon for refined Pennsylvania, but there was a recovery to-day to the rates quoted in our last. Consumption is very good, and the position of the market as regards supply and legitimate demand is considered strong. Turpentine has also been pressed for sale, and is now 5s. per ton. lower, 70s. per cwt. for French being the last price paid. Owing to heavy arrivals from St. Petersburg, tallow gave way in the early part of the week, but has to-day sustained a partial rally. We, however, have to reduce our quotations 6d. per cwt. The advance in jute has made further progress, fine qualities now ranging as high as £32 10s. per ton. In hemp there has been less doing, and quotations are unaltered. The speculative movement in sugar continued up to the close of last week, and another 1s. per cwt. was added to the enhancement already quoted under this head. Subsequently the tone became more subdued, and for inferior brown descriptions slightly easier rates have been accepted. Our quarterly sales of indigo have closed, having exhibited considerable animation throughout, one element in which was the demand that prevailed on American accounts. The proportion disposed of is the largest on record for ten years past. Prices averaged an advance of 3d. to 7d. on the rates of the preceding quarter, the greatest improvement being on good shipping Bengal and good Kurpah. Cochineal has risen 2d. per lb. since the public auctions a fortnight ago, bringing the rates for good and fine Honduras silver-grain up to 3s. 5d. and 3s. 7d. per lb. respectively. The demand for manufactured iron continues healthy, and the market for Scotch pig is steadier, at a slight improvement in value.

The following are the current prices of the principal articles of American commerce with this country, compared with the rates current at this time last year:—

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, October 28.
There has again been a considerable business transacted in the Liverpool Cotton Market, but still there has not been quite so much excitement as for some weeks previous. American Descriptions have been in more demand and an advance of from 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 2d. per lb. has been obtained. The sales this week have amounted to 60,000 bales, of which 28,000 bales were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time, are 2,209,650 bales, against 2,343,220 bales to the same period last year. The total imports this year have been 1,295,490 bales, and to the same period in 1862, there were 1,019,136 bales. There have been exported this year 382,691 bales, and to the same time last year 361,905 bales. The present computed stocks are 177,657 bales, whilst in 1862 they were 316,729 bales. Taken for consumption this year 1,124,550 bales, to the same period last year 979,500 bales. Taken on speculation this year 599,370 bales, and in 1862, 941,810 bales. MANCHESTER, October 27.

During the early part of the past week some little quietness prevailed in our market, owing to the extreme prices for which spinners and manufacturers held out; but the arrival of better telegrams from Calcutta on Monday caused buyers to enter the market and buy on the best terms they could, and some contracts were placed at very extreme rates, for late delivery even.

To-day there has been a good demand for home-trade yarns for which an advance of  $\frac{1}{4}$ d. per lb. has been obtained on the prices of last week.

Continental export yarns are also in good request, but for this class the advance is not quite so great as in that for home trade use, excepting Nos. 20 and 30 water twist in bundle which have improved in value 1d. per lb. in the week, owing to their scarcity.

For cloth the demand continues good, and manufacturers are, on the whole, in a good position.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT
OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country. Strange and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been slandered, abused, and libelled beyond any civilised people on earth, insult added to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality shielded and armoured-plated with the cry of neutrality, in position to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality!" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe it, —and think, on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course. But we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an inefficient blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over from this country, both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to neutral ports, the Yankees have been to the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater, sacrificing her commercial interests to a fear of War with the North. The so-called "neutrality" practised against the South has been their greatest hardship, and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. How strange and inexplicable has been our conduct towards the combatants!—the Confederate States having declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South is conquered, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence: nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North should blot out the South or not, or whether the South ought to have her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the freemen of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle men to be free, then surely they merit consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of concert of action among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire.

NOW READY,
THE FIRST TWO NUMBERS OF A NEW QUARTERLY SCIENTIFIC JOURNAL, ENTITLED
AND
Journal of the Anthropological Society of London.

THE ANTHROPOLOGICAL REVIEW is an effort to supply a want which has long been felt by all who have directed any serious attention to the philosophy or natural history of Man. It will be a repository of facts, an arena for discussion, and a medium of communication between Anthropologists and travellers all over the world. All relevant subjects will receive, in its pages, a free and fair consideration, irrespective of party or personal feelings, and it will be the aim of the Editors to see that every question is discussed purely on its merits, and that every shade of opinion shall be able to command a fair and adequate representation.

Neither will the work be a merely passive recipient of the communications of the learned or of the facts brought to light by travellers and explorers. It will actively seek, by every available means, to promote the study of Man "in all his leading aspects, physical, mental, and historical; to investigate the laws of his origin and progress; to ascertain his place in nature and his relations to the inferior forms of life; and to attain these objects by patient investigation, careful induction, and the encouragement of all researches tending to establish a de facto science of man." As a means of attaining these objects it will contain:—

- I. Original Articles, or Translations of Original Communications in Foreign Languages.
- II. Reviews of the principal British and Foreign Works on Anthropology.
- III. Short Notices of the Minor Works bearing on the Science of Man.
- IV. Miscellaneous Anthropological Intelligence.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly 23,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

THE Northern people have lately had plenty of exciting war news. Just as the advance of General Lee was being used by the Government to urge recruiting it was announced that the Confederate army had retired to the South of the Rappahannock. Great was the rejoicing. Gold tumbled down to something like 44 per cent.; and General Meade, who had been terribly below par, advanced rapidly. Some said Lee had gone back because he was afraid of the designs of Burnside; others that he was short of supplies; others, that he found the Northern army stronger than he expected; and there were some persons who settled the matter by declaring that the Confederate commander had been out-generated by Meade. In this hour of triumph the Government permitted a few unpleasant facts to transpire in reference to Meade's masterly retreat. Of course, numbers of victories had been won by the Federals, but, wonderful to relate, although the retreat was conducted in the most perfect order and the enemy was always repulsed, the Federal loss was heavy—very heavy. In men and material the Federals suffered as much as if they had been badly beaten in a general battle. We learn from the New York telegram that "3,000 dismounted cavalymen straggled into Washington, all of whom agreed in the statement that the Army of the Potomac had never sustained a worse disaster, and that no fewer than 7,000 men of that branch of the service had been rendered useless. In one engagement alone Meade lost 400 killed and 1,800 wounded, missing, and dismounted." The bad tidings did not disturb the Northern jollification over "the retreat of General Lee." As to the loss of materials and horses, it was good for the contractors; and as to the loss of men, are there not plenty of recruits in Old Ireland? Then came a sudden chill. The Confederates returned to the north of the Rappahannock on the 24th October, and drove back Gregg's cavalry with heavy loss. Gold went up to 49 per cent., and news from Virginia was anxiously awaited. The object of the Confederate advance is a mystery to the Federals, but they perceive that General Lee is, to use Mr. Lincoln's expression, "pegging away" at Meade's army.

Nothing has been done at Charleston. Gilmore is said to be getting ready for an attack, and it is reported that Admiral Dahlgren has been superseded by Captain Turner of the Ironsides.

The Confederates attacked the Federals at Waford, Tennessee, on the 21st October, and captured a battery of cannon and a portion of a wagon train. It is said they were afterwards beaten off, but as nothing is added about the recapture of the booty, it means, we suppose, that when the Confederates had done their work, they moved off with the Federal cannon and stores which they had taken.

President Davis has visited Tennessee. Although he travelled as privately as possible, he was the object of a spontaneous ovation at every available point of his journey. He was received by General Bragg's army with great enthusiasm.

The readers of THE INDEX must have been fully prepared for the announcement that President Davis has dismissed the British consuls from the Confederate States. The position occupied by those functionaries was one of extreme delicacy, and called for the exercise of considerable tact. They were permitted to continue in the Confederacy, and even to continue the execution of their office, by the generous forbearance of the Confederate Government. For the sake of British subjects, a high-spirited and jealous people were content to allow consuls to reside among them who have received their exequaturs from a hostile government, an excuse for this concession being found in the fact that these gentlemen had been accredited to the States, and might therefore remain, as the change in the General Government did not involve any change in the affairs of the several States forming the Confederacy. It might have been supposed that the British consuls would, under such circumstances, have felt themselves constrained to behave circumspectly, and to have embraced every opportunity of showing their appreciation of such high-minded consideration. We are sorry to say the conduct of some of them has been rude, aggressive, and we must add, exceedingly puerile. Earl Russell, with his marvellous aptitude for blundering, recalled the leading consuls, and left the consulates in charge of substitutes: gentlemen, possibly, of good intentions, but lacking experience; and, moreover, it appears that what every gentleman in England would indignantly denounce as a contemptible outrage upon the hospitality and courtesy of the Confederates, was the result of his Lordship's orders. In the despatch notifying to the British consuls their dismissal, Mr. Benjamin, the Confederate Secretary of State, says:—"It thus appears that the Consular Agents of the British Government have been instructed not to confine themselves to an appeal for redress, either to courts of justice or to this Government, whenever they may conceive that grounds exist for complaint against the Confederate authorities in their treatment of British subjects (an appeal which has in no case been made without receiving just consideration), but that they assume the power of determining for themselves whether enlisted soldiers of the Confederacy are properly bound to its service; that they even arrogate the right to interfere directly with the execution of the Confederate laws, and to advise soldiers of the Confederate armies to throw down their arms in the face of the enemy." Every one will, we are sure, agree with Mr. Benjamin, that "this assumption of jurisdiction by foreign officials within the territory of the Confederacy, and this encroachment on its sovereignty, cannot be tolerated for a moment;" and that President Davis has pursued a proper course in directing that "all consuls and consular agents of the British Government be notified that they can no longer be permitted to exercise their functions, or even to reside within the limits of the Confederacy." We are confident that the people of this country will share the indignation of the Confederates at the conduct of these consular officers, and still more at that of our Foreign Secretary who issued the instruction under which they acted.

For dauntless courage the late attack on the new Ironsides at Charleston will compare honourably with any achievement in naval history. A small steamer, the David, with a torpedo attached, was manned by a crew of four volunteers: Lieut. Glassell; J. H. Toombs, chief engineer; James Sullivan, fireman of the Chicora, and J. W. Cannon, assistant-pilot of the Palmetto State. A dark and lazy night was selected for the enterprise. About nine o'clock the little David was alongside her antagonist, her only armament besides the torpedo being a doubled-barrelled gun in the hands of Lieut. Glassell. The David was steered directly for the Ironsides. The look-out of the latter vessel hailed the steamer with "Take care! You will run into us. What vessel is that?" Lieut. Glassell replied by firing one of his barrels at the questioner, and then handed the gun to Pilot Cannon, bidding him take care of another Yankee who was leaning over the bulwarks. The Ironsides was struck and the torpedo exploded about fifteen feet from the keel. An immense volume of water was thrown up, covering the David, and at the same time pieces of the ballast got into the works of the little steamer, making her engine unmanageable. Volleys were then discharged from the Ironsides and from the Federal launches. As the steamer could not be moved, and as there was no shelter, Lieut. Glassell determined to surrender, and so hailed the enemy. No attention was paid to this, and the fire continued. Upon that Glassell, Toombs, and Sullivan jumped overboard, but Cannon, who could not swim, remained in the boat. Fortunately, as it turned out, Toombs was embarrassed with his clothing and returned to the boat. The David was then rapidly drifting from the Ironsides. Toombs found a match, and lighting a torch, went to the engine, removed the obstructions and got it into working order. At midnight the David reached the wharf in safety. Messrs. Toombs and Cannon were greatly exhausted, but rejoicing over their miraculous escape. Glassell and Sullivan were, it is reported, picked up by the enemy. When we read of such a deed, and also consider what the infant navy of the South has done, we do not wonder that it is a terror to the North, and that such dread should be felt at any prospect of its being increased.

President Lincoln's proclamation, in which he calls for 300,000 more men, deserves a careful reading. Volunteering was, according to Mr. Lincoln's own admission, utterly inadequate to the requirements of the Government, and, therefore, recourse was had to the draft. That, too, has failed, and now an attempt is to be made to work the two systems together. Mr. Lincoln, in effect, says, "Come into my 'slaughter-pens,' and you shall receive advance pay, premium, and booty: if you refuse to do so by the 5th of January, I shall drive you into my 'slaughter-pens,' and you will lose the advance pay, premium, and booty. There is no compulsion, only you must do as you are bidden." Mr. Lincoln, as well as issuing his mandate to the governors of the several States, condescends to address "the good and loyal people thereof, invoking them to lend their cheerful, willing, and effective aid to the measures thus adopted, with a view to reinforce our victorious armies now in the field." It occurs to us that to reinforce Mr. Lincoln's "victorious armies now in the field," neither volunteering nor drafting is required, and that General Halleck's pen could effectively accomplish the task.

We think, we have not the statistics before us, that Mr. Lincoln has called for 1,500,000 soldiers to put down the "rebellion," or as Mr. Seward describes it, the "insurrectionary party, which is located and is chiefly adjacent to the shores of the Gulf of Mexico." We are aware that Mr. Lincoln has not obtained all the soldiers he has asked for, and that "War Christians" and their friends have waxed rich on the rations for soldiers only existing on paper, but at a very moderate estimate Mr. Lincoln, from first to last, has had 1,000,000 of men. The total population of the Confederate States is 10,000,000, including the negroes, whilst the population of the United Kingdom is about 30,000,000: compared with England, then, the Confederates have had to resist a force of 3,000,000. But the proportion is much greater, as the negroes are not used for military service. Also, the North commenced with the entire navy of the old Union, for a portion of which the Federal Government is indebted to the Confederacy. But taking the naked fact, that 1,000,000 of soldiers have been unable to reduce the Confederacy, having 10,000,000 inhabitants, to submission, we submit, rather strong arithmetical evidence of the title of the Confederate States to recognition.

Governor Seymour, with a promptitude which shows that he has not forgotten the appearance of forty-five regiments in New York to keep the Democracy in order, has issued a proclamation in response to Mr. Lincoln's call for more men. His Excellency does not endorse his master's story of "victorious armies," but ventures to say that, "at this time the defenders of the national capital are menaced by a superior force; the Army of the Cumberland is in an imperiled condition; and the military operations of the Government are delayed and hindered by the want of adequate military power, and are threatened with serious disaster." This avowal will perhaps be forgiven, notwithstanding that the maxim of the Washington Government is, "to give utterance to the truth is a heinous and almost unpardonable crime. It would be unkind, when the dog is kicking the foot that kicked him, to punish him for a life feeble and harmless whining. Some months ago surprise was expressed at the contempt which the Confederates evinced for the Northern Democrats: that the attempt was justifiable is now manifest.

General Thomas is for the moment a favourite with King Mob in the United States, vice Rosecrans, who has been dismissed from command of the Army of the Cumberland. The Richmond Dispatch observes that very few Federal generals have been killed. Scott, McClellan, McDowell, Buell, Pope, Burnside, Hooker, and Rosecrans, are alive and unscratched. Nor is it difficult to account for their immunity from death and wounds. They may be all very brave, but they have had the knack or the luck of keeping out of the fighting. Scott did not go near Manassas. McClellan nearly always "came up" when the battle was over. Pope so strongly objected "to showing his back to the enemy" that he remained at such a distance from the front as to be quite out of sight and of shot. When Burnside sent his brave soldiers to storm the heights of Fredericksburg, he, perhaps not wishing to deprive his troops of any glory they might acquire, remained at the safe distance of three miles from the scene of battle. Rosecrans, it is alleged, was at Chattanooga whilst the battle of Chickamauga was being fought. About the smaller fry—the McCooks and the Crittendens, who set their soldiers an example of flight, and the officers who love Washington too well to go far from it—we need say nothing, though the proceedings will hereafter form an amusing page in the bloody records of this war. But whilst Federal commanders escape the perils of battle they are killed off (in a military sense) by their own Government. So far as their utility is concerned, Generals Scott, McClellan, McDowell, Buell, Hooker, and Rosecrans, might as well have died on the field of battle; and Pope and Burnside are reduced to accept inferior positions.

Though General Thomas succeeds Rosecrans he does so subject to the directions of General Grant, to whom the command of the armies of the Cumberland, Ohio, and Kentucky has been assigned. Grant is not "the demi-god of war" the Federal press at this juncture represents him to be, but he is one of the few able generals in the Federal service. We think, however, that his power will be overturned by the task now devoted on him.

General Rosecrans must have been surprised at his dismissal, and think his country very ungrateful, if he was sincere in the congratulatory order he issued to his troops on the 2nd of October. In that document he told the Army of the Cumberland, "You have made a grand and successful campaign." In reference to the battle of Chickamauga, he says, "You concentrated in the face of superior numbers, fought the combined armies of Bragg, which you drove from Shelbyville to Tullahoma, of Johnston's army from Mississippi, and the tried veterans of Longstreet's corps, and for two days held them at bay, giving them blow for blow, with heavy interest. When the day closed you held the field, from which you withdrew in the face of overpowering numbers, to occupy the point for which you set out, Chattanooga." It was strange that after giving "blow for blow, with heavy interest," the army should withdraw; but we see nothing remarkable about withdrawing "in the face" of the enemy: retreats are generally effected under such conditions. General Rosecrans tells his soldiers, "you hold in your hands the substantial fruits of a victory, and deserve, and will receive, the honours and plaudits of a grateful nation." Perhaps his opinion about the grateful nation is rather changed. Such an order as that we have quoted from, reflects infinitely more disgrace on a general than fifty defeats; at least, it would, except in the case of a Federal general, in the opinion of his fellow-countrymen.

From a Canadian paper (the Montreal Advertiser) we glean some information of the way in which the free negroes in the South are treated by their Yankee masters. Two reports, written by Federals and Abolitionists, have been published in reference to the working of some plantations in Louisiana, stolen from their owners. Mr. Brott, a New Englander, made an arrangement with General Butler, by which he became possessed of a fine plantation, with the hands on it. He has been working it with energy and profit. If his free labourers do not accept the terms offered, or if they are in any way disobedient, they are handed over to the military to be made soldiers of; that is, to be put within range of Confederate balls at the first opportunity. Mr. Brott compels his free negroes to work for ten clear hours per day. What they do beyond their allotted task is paid for in money; but the settled task is a good day's work. They receive half rations of flour, occasionally a little fresh meat, tea and sugar, the latter as a treat. Their pay at the end of the season, about their rations, will be one-twentieth part of the net profit, estimated at $70,000. There are 175 working hands, who divide $3,500, giving $20 a-year wages to each man, of which he has to maintain his family and clothe himself and them; the expenses other than for implements are reckoned at $13,400 a year, leaving $53,000 profit, to be equally divided between the Government and the contractor. We may be sure that if the system could be generally introduced in the South the increase in the negro population would be effectually checked, and in fifty years the remnant of the coloured race might be redeemed at a comparatively small cost. "For the moral effects of Yankee emancipation, the report says: 'I freely grant there is some foundation for the accusation so generally brought against the negroes, of laziness and dishonesty. I grant, too, that it is undeniably true that a great many of them are greater idlers and vagabonds than they were before the war commenced.'" Mr. Ware, a superintendent of contrabands on a Federal Government plantation, at Port Royal, South Carolina, reports malpractices on the part of Federal officers that would hardly be credible except on the evidence of a Federal, and attested by a warm Abolitionist. But lest we should do any unintentional injustice to Mr. Ware's report, we will give his own words. He says:—

I am sorry to be obliged to say that many of the Federal officers in power have done much to destroy the confidence of the negroes in their new masters, or rather employers, and to make them worse and more confirmed vagrants than ever before. A great many cases that happened last year have come to my knowledge, through sources which do not permit me to doubt their actual occurrence. Provost-marshal and their appointees, who had charge of the standing crops, induced the negroes to return to many plantations and take off the crop. They promised them most solemnly, in the name of the Government of the United States, that they should be paid at the end of their work. Their promises were enforced by the uniform they wore and by the authority they were known to possess. The negroes trusted them as implicitly as they would an angel from heaven. They asked for no security but the honour of a Union soldier, an official representative of the President of the United States. In many cases these promises were never redeemed. Overseers, provost-marshals, commissioners, lessees, brokers, and the whole tribe of scoundrels, banded together, to swindle the simple, confiding negroes—who relied solely on them for protection, and who looked up to them with humble admiration and grateful love, almost amounting to idolatry—to cheat them out of the miserable pittance by which they might have passed through the winter comfortably. On this very plantation the negroes were not paid a cent, though the crop was gathered and the sugar sold, and the next year's crop almost ruined by bad management. The cowardly scoundrels who have by these means made fortunes, and perhaps are still making them, will resign from the army, and return home with wonderful stories of the bloody battles they have passed through—the admiration and envy of their simple companions at home—while, if they had their deserts, they would be covered with infamy for evermore. The right of a trusted officer to cheat the Government seems now-a-days to be acknowledged. The right of a Federal soldier or officer to fill his trunk with silver plate, female apparel, jewelry, books and everything he can find belonging to a Southern resident, whether Union or rebel, has been conceded or rather assumed by the army, from General Blank down. But I think the most thoughtless thief or the most hardened speculator could hardly look with equanimity on the dastardly atrocities of those men who have prostituted the fair name of the Government they are sworn to protect, to their own avarice and lust, and have in the eyes of a whole race, put the finishing touch of infamy and injustice to the character which the South has done her best to earn for the American people. They have taken advantage of the responsible and sacred position in which the hand of God had placed them, to commit a crime the equal of which is not set down in the annals of man. The history of slavery shows nothing to equal this perfidy. That a Southern man should do this would not be wonderful, but such a crime committed by a Northern man and a United States officer, partakes of the miraculous. For such a monstrous and ineffable wickedness, the punishment of an ignominious death would be the sublimity of mercy.

Such facts as these need no comment, except that it is natural a Yankee taskmaster should be indifferent to the welfare of his negroes, and that, seeing how the free negro is used in the North, it is not surprising that the Northerners, when they have the chance, should maltreat them in the South.

Mr. Vallandigham has written a letter to the people of Ohio, in which he ascribes the defeat of his friends to the threats of the Federal Government and the presence of a large Federal force in the State. One dodge of the Government, that of not putting the names of the Democrats on the assessor's list, is exposed by an incident of the Pennsylvania election. Judge Woodward, the Democratic candidate for Governor, went up to vote at the polls in Philadelphia. He gave his name as "George W. Woodward," and was told it was not on the list. He replied, "Very likely, and yet I've paid more taxes this year than I ever paid before, and on less property." This remonstrance had no effect, but being recognised as Judge Woodward, the officer said, "Your name is certainly not here, but it ought to be. All right, sir, vote away." An unimportant person would have obtained no redress.

The New York Herald has a leader on "Seven Victories for the Union in as many days." Three of these are set down to the credit of the military, and are rather more than doubtful. The rest we grant are unquestionable victories for the Administration. The Herald says:—"Our other four victories were infinitely greater ones than these. They were won in the four States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Iowa. They were the victories of the people over an enemy more dangerous than the Southern soldiers, and they are not surpassed in grandeur by any four victories that our armies have ever won." It is true, in the South Mr. Lincoln's legions have gained no such decided triumphs; nor would he have done so in the United States, if the Northern Democrats loved liberty half so much as they profess.

There is a stoppage of the exchange of prisoners, which may probably lead to the disavowal of the cartel by both belligerents. The dispute is as to the number of prisoners with which each side should be credited. General Meredith, the United States Commissioner, contends that there is a balance of 10,024 in his favour, while Mr. Ould, the Confederate agent, says that more than 7,000 exchanges are due to the Confederate States. Mr. Ould announced to General Meredith that the Confederate Government now considers itself at liberty to pursue any course it thinks proper with regard to exchanges and paroles.

General Polk, in his farewell address to his command, says, "In consequence of an unfortunate disagreement between myself and the Commander-in-Chief of this Department, I have been relieved of my command, and am about to retire from the army. Without attempting to explain the circumstances of this disagreement, or prejudicing the public mind by a premature appeal to its judgment, I must be permitted to express my unqualified conviction of the rectitude of my conduct, and that time and investigation will amply vindicate my conduct on the field of the Chickamauga." The cause of the disagreement has not transpired.

Senor Rombo has returned to Washington as Minister for the defunct Juarez Government. As the Federals recognise a Government that has no army, no revenue, no capital, and no administration, they could not object to European Governments recognising the Confederate States. By-and-by they will be reminded of this precedent.

In one of his recent speeches Mr. Chase spoke of the President of the United States as "Old Father Abe." What may be the effect of this familiarity in the United States we know not, but on this side it is apt to breed contempt for the Federal Executive and his Ministers.

The fluctuations in gold have been considerable in New York. On October 22nd, it touched 39 per cent., owing to a report that Mr. Chase had effected a foreign loan, but it quickly rallied to 43. On the 23rd it was 44 per cent., on the 24th it rose to 46 per cent., and on the 26th the news of General Lee's advance caused a further rise of 3 per cent.

ENGLAND.

THE conduct of the authorities in the matter of Mr. Laird's steam-rams has been at once discourteous, ridiculous, and extravagant. Discourteous, because no opportunity has been lost of insulting grossly a firm of the highest honour and respectability. Ridiculous, because the precautions adopted to prevent an escape have been beyond all possible necessity. Extravagant, because the affair has already cost the country a considerable sum of money, and will, in all probability, cost yet more. No one doubts that secret weekly reports of the progress of the work have been furnished to the Government. It is pretty certain that rewards have been offered by Federal emissaries for sworn informants of conversations with men in the assumed confidence of the builders or their employees. It is believed that these sworn informants have been duly presented to Earl Russell by Mr. Adams, and that they have been adequately seasoned with threats of Federal vengeance in case of negligence or contempt on the part of the Secretary of State. However this may be, it is certain that on Tuesday, October 27th, Mr. Morgan, of the Customs, acting under the authority of the Treasury, formally demanded in writing the surrender of the rams and the instant suspension of all work. This proceeding was subsequent to the first formal seizure and the affixing of the broad arrow. Shortly after the officer had got possession of the rams, and an application to permit the uncovered turret-holes of El Monassir to be protected was peremptorily refused. Consequently, for more than twelve hours tons on tons of water found their way to the boilers and machinery. On Thursday, October 29th, Captain Inglefield appeared on the scene, dispossessed the Customs officials, and placed his armed officers, blue-jackets, and marines, on board of El Tousson in the great float, while another detachment entered Messrs. Laird's yard, fully armed, and installed itself in El Monassir. Finding the ship so unfinished that the men could not possibly remain on board, and finding, also, that the ship itself could not possibly move, the officer removed his men, and gave notice that on the next day El Monassir would be removed to the river. El Tousson was also to be removed from the great float. Now, as the latter vessel can only get out at high tide, and then only with the connivance of the Mersey Trust, and as a daring set of men might possibly get her out of the river, the folly of this removal is beyond conception. Moreover, in the Mersey the ship will incur as great a risk as if on a trip from Liverpool to Cork. Why, then, has this removal been made? The Mersey Trust has been insulted and a great risk incurred. It is said, too, that the object can only be to effect a surreptitious escape. Taking such a notion to be quite absurd, still it is not complimentary to Messrs. Laird to suppose that they are in such a plot. Such, however, is the present state of things. The property of private persons, men of honour and repute, and property of the value of £250,000, has been seized by an armed force, without a reason being vouchsafed for an act startling to Englishmen and abhorrent to English ideas. Moreover, at least 500 workmen have been thrown out of employ at a moment's notice. One more delightful episode in the story yet remains to be told. Captain Inglefield, with his sailors and marines, was not competent to prevent the escape of El Tousson and El Monassir; indeed, these ships must have been a nightmare to Earl Russell. So on Monday, October 26th, a telegram came to Devonport to have the new iron-clads frigate Prince Consort, 25, 4,045 tons, commissioned for short service, to send on board one captain, three subalterns, and 100 royal marines; to send two sergeants to prepare provisions, to take 450 seamen from three ships lying at Devonport, and to start for the Mersey. Thereupon, on the Wednesday, at noon, the beautiful and costly vessel left Plymouth Sound and stood out to westward on her course to obey the behests and calm the terror of Earl Russell. On October 30th, a telegram arrived from Dublin that the Prince Consort was lying off Kingstown greatly disabled, having encountered a fearful gale in the Channel. She had sprung a leak and was nearly filled with water. She would have sunk in the Channel had it not been for the immense exertions of the crew. There were seven feet of water in her, all her boats, guns, and tackle were in confusion, and many of her men disabled. Such, then, have been the results of Earl Russell's policy. Messrs. Laird and the Trustees of the Mersey Trust have been insulted; 500 workmen have been thrown out of employment in the month of November; a splendid vessel has been frightfully injured; many brave men have been disabled, and above all, we Englishmen have cringed to Mr. Adams. Beyond this there are the future risks of the steam-rams, and still worse, the costs, the incalculable costs, of heavy litigation. If the seizure of the steam-rams does not cost the country half-a-million of money, Earl Russell will have to thank his luck rather than his judgment.

The new steam yacht Taliah, destined for the service of his Majesty the Sultan, was tried last week, and attained the extraordinary speed of 17½ knots or 20½ statute miles per hour, being the highest velocity yet attained by any vessel of similar tonnage and power. The ship is of 912 tons burden, and has oscillating engines of 350 horse power. She was built by Samuda Brothers and supplied with engines by John Penn and Son.

The building of the new iron frigate Bellerophon has been commenced in Chatham Dockyard. In this vessel the double-bottom, or unsinkable principle, is to be adopted. It is well known that such vessels as the Warrior and Achilles have the immense defect of being quite unfit as places of residence for officers and men for a continuous period of two or three years. An iron ship is liable to great injury from the extreme weakness of its bottom, and to obviate this difficulty vessels of that class are divided into short lengths or sections by means of water-tight bulkheads running across them internally. Thereby they are cut up into a number of isolated tanks or air-tight wells, in which there is little or no ventilation. This evil will be avoided by the combination of the double bottom, such as has been successfully employed in the Great Eastern, and of the unsinkable principle, which has been applied by Mr. Langley, of Deptford, to the two Cape Mail steamers, the Briton and the Roman. Throughout the entire central portion of the Bellerophon, in which the engines, boilers, and magazines are placed, the bottom of the ship will be double, the inner and outer bottoms or hulls being placed from three to four feet apart, leaving ample space for cleaning and painting. The space between the two bottoms will be divided into numerous water-tight compartments in the usual manner, whereby will be formed a series of buoyant cells, any one of which may be injured without the sea penetrating the ship beyond the centre of the vessel at either end. Mr. Langley's plan will be used, the lower deck constituting an interior bottom, and the space below it being made available for stowage by means of iron water-tight trunks rising above the water-line. Thus a combination will be formed of water-tight trunks and water-tight decks, the former being intended as a means of entering below the latter. The Bellerophon will also be constructed with water-tight internal walls. It is expected that the frigate will be the most powerful and the most comfortable ship afloat.

A further trial of the merits of the double or twin-screw principle has been made with the screw launch Experiment. This vessel is but 42 feet in length, and of proportionate breadth and depth. Her boilers and engines occupy a space in the centre of the boat of only 6 feet 11 inches by 4 feet 4 inches. The nominal horsepower of the engines being 3 inches, the length of the stroke of piston 6 inches, and the diameter of cylinder 4 inches. The total weight of engines and boilers, with platform, coal-boxes, &c., and with boilers fitted, is 2½ tons. Each screw has a diameter of 2 feet, and a pitch of 3 feet 4½ inches. When put on the measured mile, the vessel attained, in six runs, a mean speed of 6.742 knots. The results of the trials, in describing circles, are however of the most importance. With both engines going ahead at full speed, with the rudder acting, a complete circle was made to starboard in 1 min. 9 sec., and to port in 1 min. 13 sec. With one engine shut off, and with the port engine standing (the helm still being used), a circle was made in 1 min. 31 sec., and with the starboard engine shut off in 1 min. 27 sec. Reversing the motion of the respective engines, and with the starboard engine going ahead, and the port astern, the circle was made in 2 min. 9 sec. Repeating this experiment, but with the starboard engine astern and the port ahead, the circle was made in 1 min. 45 sec. The diameter of the circles described was, with both engines going ahead and rudder acting, rather under three times the length of the launch; with one engine shut off, rather over that distance; with engines reversed and screws working opposite ways, the launch turned on a pivot just abaft her centre, and within her own length, gradually working spirally and astern. It is asserted that the double screw system will carry any given weight at one-third less draught of water than that required by a vessel driven by a single screw. At present our Minotours, Agincourts, and *Northumberland*s will require some eight or nine feet too great a draught of water to be available for work on a line of coast. If, by dividing the propelling power, the required draught can be greatly diminished, an enormous advantage will, in this respect, be gained by the adoption of the double-screw principle in addition to the facilities experienced in turning and manœuvring.

Mr. William Cubitt, M.P. for Andover, died on Wednesday, October 28, at Penton-lodge, Hampshire. Mr. Cubitt, had many years since, served the office of Sheriff of London and Middlesex, and was elected an alderman of the City in 1851. He was chosen a member of Parliament for the first time in 1847, and sat continuously for Andover till his death, with the exception of a short interval in 1861-62, when he resigned his seat for that borough and unsuccessfully contested the City of London. Mr. Cubitt was twice chosen Lord Mayor of London, and was undoubtedly the most popular chief magistrate of modern times. By his high sense of honour and justice, his splendid hospitality, and his readiness to take the principal part in all charitable and philanthropic acts, he gained the unbounded respect of the citizens of London, the ruling bodies, and the nation at large. Mr. Cubitt took a memorable part in originating the public subscription towards a national memorial of the Prince Consort, and he served on the committee nominated by the Queen to assist her in deciding on the form which the Memorial should assume. Lords Derby and Clarendon and Sir Charles Eastlake served on the same committee. At the time of his death Mr. Cubitt was President of St. Bartholomew's Hospital and Prime Warden of the Fishmongers' Company. Mr. Cubitt was in politics a Conservative.

The week of races, which has brought to a termination not only the season at Newmarket, but, with the exception of a few trifling county meetings, the season of England, was replete with sport, excitement, and dissatisfaction. Nearly seventy races were decided in the six days, for Newmarket kept holiday from Monday morning to Saturday night; and in the seventy races more than 400 horses contended. It was a week of more than ordinary excitement, for objections were raised to the winners of the two principal races, and for days the issue was in doubt. It was a week of dissatisfaction, for the defeated, like the Federal armies, claimed a victory, or bore their disasters with unmanly despair; while the weather, by the force of fogs, rains, and gales, did its utmost to try the temper and the constitution of every spectator. The sport of Monday, October 26th, may be dismissed with the single remark, that the thickness of the atmosphere entirely precluded the visitors from seeing the objects of their speculation at a distance of more than forty yards, and caused the postponement of the most interesting race till the following day. On the Tuesday, however, the Heath was seen in all its glory, the company, though almost insignificant compared with Epsom on the Derby Day, or Ascot on the Cup Day, was really prodigious, and the presence of the Prince of Wales, Prince Christian of Denmark, and the Duke of Cambridge, gave additional éclat to the proceedings. The Criterion Stakes, with a subscription of thirty sovereigns each, and with fifty subscribers, brought eleven two-year-old horses to the post, and served still further to perplex the public mind as to the respective virtues of the future candidates for the victory at Epsom in 1864. The Scottish Chief, Blair Athol, and Cambuscan, all winners in races of a similar character, were absent; but Ely, the Knight of Snowdon, Coast Guard, and Prince Arthur once more joined issue. Coast Guard, the son of Saunterer and Lady Elizabeth, was made the favourite, and certainly his magnificent appearance and the reputation of the stable, which boasts the famous Maccaroni, Isoline, and Carnival, seemed to justify the opinion of the public. The winner, however, appeared in Fille de l'Air, the daughter of Faugh-a-Ballagh, who, carrying extra weight as a penalty for former victories, yet defeated easily her renowned opponents; Prince Arthur by Weatherbit, was second, and Coast Guard was utterly out-placed from end to end. In the All-Aged Stakes, of 100 sovereigns each, Fairwater defeated Lady Clifden, Argonaut and Sou-champ; and in a plate for three-year-old horses, the good-looking and blood-like Johnny Armstrong was victorious over Croagh Patrick, Onesander, Wingrave, and the famous Caller Ou, the winner of the Great Saint Leger and numberless plates. However, the great event of the day was the race for the Cambridgeshire Stakes, the last and perhaps the greatest of the autumnal handicaps; originally 215 horses were nominated for the race, and it may easily be imagined that it was no easy task to assign such a weight to each competitor as to give an equal chance of success to all. It is a rule in this handicap that horses who have been, in the opinions of their owners, laden by the adjuster of the weights with too heavy an impost, may be withdrawn within a few days on payment of a penalty of £5, and of this provision advantage was taken in the case of seventy-eight horses; consequently, 137 horses were considered by their respective owners to have been justly dealt with. Of these 137 horses, ninety-seven were struck out of the list before the race, and for each of them a penalty of £10 was paid. The remaining forty came to the post, and for each the stake of £25 was paid. The total net value of the stakes was £2,355. The distance to be traversed in the race was one mile and 240 yards, the last three-quarters of a mile being run on a gradual but decided incline. No less a time than three-quarters of an hour was consumed in fruitless attempts to effect a start, and it was not until the twenty-fourth attempt that the starter lowered his flag. A more magnificent sight than the advance of this column of forty horses at terrific speed has seldom been witnessed; and as the distance of the race was short, the moving mass preserved its compactness until it reached the lines of the spectators. The shouts of these, the cracking of the whips of the riders, and the thunder of the horses' feet produced an effect not easily imagined or forgotten, while the tremendous struggle for the victory roused even the most passive spirits into energy, and rendered the anxiety of those interested in the event painfully apparent. The winner, Catch-em-Alive, who is the son of Flatcatcher and a mare called Rather High, secured the prize by a short head. Merry Hart was a like distance in front of Summerside, the property of Mr. Ten Broeck, and Summerside was a length in advance of Juliet. The weights carried by these horses admirably illustrates the principal of handicapping: that is, the imposition of weights on a sliding scale, according to the supposed or ascertained merits of the several horses. Catch-em-Alive is four years old and carried 7 stone or 98 lbs. Merry Hart and Summerside are three-year-olds, and the former carried 82 lbs. the latter, 79 lbs., while Juliet, who is more than six years old, carried only 85 lbs. One other weight may be noticed, namely, that imposed on Carnival, who being but 3 years of age, carried 120 lbs., and yet was in the front rank in the finish. The betting at starting was 9 to 2 against Catch-em-Alive, 100 to 7 against Summerside, 33 to 1 against Juliet, and 40 to 1 against Merry Hart; while Lemosina, who was second for this race last year, and also second for the Cesarewitch Stakes this year, was made the favourite, at the odds of 5 to 2. Indeed, it is said, that this mare was backed by her owner, the Earl of Stamford, to win £150,000, and there is no doubt that his lordship has lost a very large sum of money. The result of the race was to him so grievous a disappointment, that he, acting on a suspicion which really seems groundless, but to which his lordship adheres, has determined to sell his stud and abandon the pursuit of racing. The mare certainly ran as badly as she well could, and Lord Stamford believed she had been dosed. Perhaps in his calmer moments he will disabuse himself of this idea, and try the favour of fortune once more. He is undoubtedly the boldest and most liberal purchaser of race horses on the turf;

he has a stud of nearly 100 horses, and the loss of his support would be a serious blow to the interests of the turf. But the marvels of Tuesday, October 27th, are not yet told. Not only was it raised, by way of objection to the victory of Fille de l'Air in the Criterion Stakes, that she was in fact a filly of three years, not two years of age (a statement proved subsequently to be utterly unfounded), but it remained a question for nearly two days whether Catch-em-Alive was entitled to the Cambridgeshire Stakes. In fact, when the riders of that race returned to scale it was found that the rider of Catch-em-Alive was about two pounds deficient in weight. So, also, was the rider of Summerside, while the rider of Merry Hart weighed correctly. Upon this Lord Westmoreland claimed the Stakes as the owner of Merry Hart, and Mr. William Day confessed that Catch-em-Alive had not carried the true weight. Yet, before the race, the jockeys had been properly weighed. Suspicion was aroused, and it was discovered that some pieces of lead had been nailed on the weight side of the scale. Thereupon, the stewards were of opinion that the deficiency in weight was explained, and awarded the stakes to Catch-em-Alive. It does not appear that the riders were weighed afresh, and there is no proof that the deficiency in weight was equal to the weight of the lead. At any rate it is clear enough that Lord Westmoreland's horse carried nearly three pounds more than was necessary, and it is equally clear that if the weights of Catch-em-Alive and Merry Hart had been proportionately correct, Merry Hart must have won. It is not necessary to refer in detail to any other races of the week except the 1st and 2nd class Nursery Stakes, which is a handicap race of two-year-old horses with an entrance of 25 sovereigns each. The 1st class was won by Sheridan, a son of Cotherstone, the property of Lord Rendlesham; Prince Arthur, who was second in the Criterion Stakes, being second for this race also. The second class was won by Union Jack, an Irish horse, who carried no less than 125 pounds, or twenty pounds more than any other horse, and thirty pounds more than most of the horses in the race. This animal is not entered for the Derby of 1864, doubtless to the regret of his owner, for his chance of victory would be by no means small. Before the year closes race meetings will be held at Shrewsbury, Liverpool, and Worcester; but the hunting season has already commenced, and its charms are rapidly superseding the fading pleasures of the turf.

THE CONTINENT.

AFTER all the rumours of warlike despatches to St. Petersburg, it would now seem that Earl Russell has really addressed the English Minister at the Russian Court a communication of the mildest and most conciliatory character. His lordship has, it is said, confined himself to the expression of a hope that Russia will remember her promises after her victory, and will not forget that she holds Poland by treaties which give the Poles certain privileges and liberties. We do not, of course, assert that such has been the character of his lordship's despatch, but it is very confidently asserted by newspapers which are likely to have authentic information from St. Petersburg, and has been very weakly denied by his lordship's organs here. If this should be the correct version of the despatch the intervention, so far as England is concerned, is at an end.

The intelligence from Poland is not important. It is made up of arrests, executions, and assassinations. The Russian Government does not shrink now before any measure, however severe. It is prepared for an explosion in Warsaw, and probably is really desirous of provoking one.

From Paris there is little news. Everybody has been waiting for the Emperor's speech, which is to be delivered this day. There are war rumours and peace rumours, rumours about a new loan and about ministerial changes. Before these lines reach our readers the oracle will have spoken, and men will probably know whether it is to be peace or war. Oracles, however, are oftentimes enigmatical.

The Prussian elections have produced the anticipated results. The Moderate Liberals have sustained great losses to the profit of the Advanced Liberal or Fortschritt Partei. That party will number in the new House 150 members, and will be reinforced in almost every question by nearly 100 members of the so-called Left Centre, or Bockum Doff's party, which is hardly less radical. The old Liberals will count hardly a dozen, and the Chamber loses some of its best men. Herr von Vincke has been defeated—a defeat which some liberals seem to delight over. Von Vincke, in the last session, although going with the majority on the great constitutional question, showed a readiness for compromise, and gave some of the most vehement of the radicals some hard knocks. Hence thoughtless liberals rejoice at the exclusion of the ablest of Prussian statesmen, and the correspondents of English newspapers who take their original views from Berlin journals, re-echo the senseless jubilation. The Government has increased the number of its supporters from eleven to about forty. The less said about the means the better. The minor officials were driven to the poll like sheep; every kind of intimidation possible was practised. Amongst these forty is one minister: Herr von Roon, the Minister of War, the gentleman who, by his refusal to submit to the authority of the president, provoked the crisis last year; besides several of the most prominent of the reactionary leaders. This is a greater success for the liberals than for the Government. The number of the Ministerial party is too small to be mischievous; but the presence of the Ministers and of their outré supporters in the House will make it really a representation of all opinions, and give much more importance to its debates and resolutions. The Catholic faction has experienced a slight loss; it is reduced from 32 to 25. The Poles are about the same as before, 27;

but of this number two or three are out of the way, being accused of high treason.

The Chambers are convoked for the 9th. It is supposed that the session will be a very short one. The House of Deputies will speak out very decidedly, and that the King will not stand. He has since the elections already declared that he will not flinch from the position he has taken.

The Danish Government has given its answer to the summons of the Diet. The answer is to some extent a concession. The Danish Government is willing to enter into negotiations for a modification of the patent of the 30th March, which it recognises as having only a temporary character. This concession is the result of Earl Russell's influence. The answer proceeds to point out that all that the Diet could obtain by execution could be obtained by means of a well-considered understanding, and it concludes by saying that the Danish Government has a right "to expect that the Diet will submit the affair to a fresh examination before having recourse to any extreme and fatal measure, which, without insuring to the Confederation the realisation of a single legitimate demand, would result in nothing but injury to the most important and reciprocal interests." To this answer, presented to the Diet on the 21st of October, a supplement was added by the Danish Minister on the 31st, in which, on behalf of his Government, he observes, that "as the demands of the Diet tend to a further end than that of securing to the duchies of Holstein and Lauenburg autonomic independence, the question assumes an international character, and can only be settled amicably by negotiation, which would have a better chance of success if they took place with the participation of the Powers which have bound themselves to respect the integrity and independence of Denmark."

Earl Russell, nothing daunted by the cavalier reception of his previous despatches, has addressed the Diet for the third time, through Sir A. Malet, with a proposition for the arrangement of the dispute. His lordship says, on the 21st October, that it is the opinion of her Majesty's Government that if the German Bund and the King of Denmark were animated by a wish to bring the negotiations to an equitable conclusion they would find no great difficulties in the way. Of course; but that is the difficulty: there is not, on the part of the Diet, a desire for a fair and just settlement. His lordship suggests that all the questions which relate to the finances and legislation of Holstein and Lauenburg should be regulated according to the principles in force with the Diet, and that all those questions which have an international character might be brought to a peaceful and lasting settlement by the mediation, not arbitration, of friendly non-German Powers. What charming innocence! After all his experience of this wretched question, Earl Russell actually believes that Germany would agree to an equitable solution. As well suppose that a man who has made up his mind to swindle his neighbour out of all his property, and has good reason to think he has the means of doing so, would agree to an equitable settlement of the question: a settlement which, if equitable, would give him nothing, and brand him as a scoundrel.

The King of the Greeks has reached his capital, and has had a brilliant reception. If His Majesty will only act with a little vigour he may yet make something of his new subjects. The people are well-disposed and would like to be well governed. It is the politicians who are the curse of the country, and if His Majesty will only show that he does not mean to allow the government to be the prey of every party, he may regenerate Hellas. The Ionians, who, as we noted some time since, were ready enough to accept the union, but indisposed to pay their debts to England, had the impertinence to demand that the fortress should not be demolished. As they made too much noise about this, the Lord High Commissioner prorogued the Assembly for six months, whereupon the majority have made a foolish protest. It is the last ebullition of their childish vanity.

The Turkish budget has been published. It shows a small surplus. Is the account an honest one, or has it been "cooked" with a view to another loan, to be professedly applied to a redemption of paper money, the reduction of the floating debt, or anything else of the kind—but really to make up a deficit? Until some guarantee can be given of the genuineness of the figures, which at present we have only through the electric telegraph, it would be idle to bestow any attention upon them.

JAPAN.

Despatches have been published which tell the authentic story of the recent proceedings of the British chargé d'affaires and admiral in Japan. On Christmas eve in last year Earl Russell wrote to Lieutenant-Colonel Neale, instructing him to demand from the Japanese Government an ample and formal apology for the offence of permitting a murderous attack on British subjects, passing on a road open by treaty to them, and the payment of a penalty of £100,000, and on the event of refusal the chargé d'affaires was to call upon the admiral to adopt measures of reprisal. Earl Russell also directed the minister to demand from the Daimio Prince Satsuma, in whose service the murderers of Mr. Richardson were supposed to be, the immediate trial and capital execution of the chief perpetrators of the murder, and the payment of £25,000 compensation to the relations of the murdered man and the other victims of the affray. If the Prince should not immediately agree to the terms, the admiral was, at his discretion, to blockade the port or shell the palace of the Prince, situated, as Lord Russell was informed, at the south-west end of the island of Kiusin. The Japanese Government, after some demur, yielded to the threats of reprisal, made the apology, and paid the fine. Admiral Kuper and Lieut.-Colonel Neale then proceeded to Kagosima to enforce the demands against Prince Satsuma. To the summons they presented a reply was made by a request for delay, on account of the absence of the Prince. It was also said by the Japanese that they had attempted to seize the murderers, but that other Daimios protected them, and a little delay was asked on that account. In vain: Admiral Kuper told them that they were "barbarians." Colonel Neale, declared that evasion or delay could no longer be submitted to. The Colonel wrote to the Admiral to take measures to awaken the Prince of Satsuma to "a sense of the serious nature of the determinations which have brought Her Majesty's squadron to this anchorage." The Admiral seized three steamers belonging to the Prince, and anchored them before the Japanese forts. The Japanese, irritated by the proceeding, opened fire, an act which the Admiral, says, "it became necessary to immediately resent for the honour of the flag," and he forthwith shelled the town, said to contain 150,000 inhabitants. Before night came one-half the town was in flames; the conflagration illuminated the whole bay. The next afternoon, as soon as the weather would allow, the admiral resumed his work, shelled the palace and the side of the town which had escaped, and having reasonable ground for believing that the entire town of Kagosima "is now a mass of ruins," having received Colonel Neale's compliments, departed for Yokahama. The loss of the squadron was thirteen killed, including two officers, and fifty wounded: the loss of the people of Kagosima may be numbered by thousands. An industrious densely populated city, guilty of no crime, has been reduced to a mass of ruins. At peace with Japan, the English squadron has committed a deed at which even in war public opinion would revolt. The destruction of Kagosima is the most wanton act of atrocity which the world has heard of in this century. It will not pass unpunished.

ST. DOMINGO.

THE news is very unfavourable to the Spaniards. The blacks have generally proved victorious, and, according to some accounts, have used their victory to commit the most brutal excesses.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, October 10.

THE recall of Commissioner Mason from his equivocal position in London has given the most unqualified satisfaction to the people of the Confederate States. The just pride of the South has long resented the scant civility shown to this gentleman by the Government of England, and had the public feeling been consulted, he would long ago have ceased to solicit interviews with Earl Russell, only to receive discourteous notes of refusal. The general impatience on this subject would have found expression on the floor of Congress last winter, but for the vague belief that the presence of so able and judicious a statesman would, in some way not easily understood by the million, unfamiliar with the practices of diplomacy, advance the interests of the country. But time and recent events having shown that Mr. Mason's residence in London was wholly without advantage to the Confederate cause, the amour propre of our people accepted with a sense of relief the intelligence that he had been withdrawn. The state secret of his recall was better kept than such matters usually are, where the fact is known to not less than ten or twelve persons. The first news reached us from London, and the Enquirer was disposed to discredit it, before its official announcement in the Sentinel, on the ground that a step of this sort was likely to be known sooner at home than abroad. Mr. Benjamin may, therefore, be congratulated not less upon the close guard he maintains over the mysteries of the State Department than upon having placed it out of the power of Downing-street to insult us any longer.

No more popular order could now be issued by President Davis than a prompt "notice to quit" served upon all the representatives of Great Britain at present exercising consular functions within the limits of the Confederacy: it would be the complement and proper sequel to the withdrawal of Mr. Mason, and could be no matter of complaint to a Government which has never given us the slightest credit for the magnanimity of allowing the largest measure of protection to English citizens living among us. Two of these representatives have recently given us just cause of offence. Mr. H. Pinckney Walker, H.B.M. acting consul at Charleston, in a correspondence with Colonel E. Magrath, commanding the local guard of that city, informed the colonel that he had advised British subjects that they could not be expected to perform military duty when brought into conflict with the forces of the United States; or in other words, that they were to desert the ranks of the South Carolina militia at the very juncture, that of direct invasion, when their services would be of most importance. In like manner, Mr. Fullerton, who dates his letters from the "British Consulate" at Savannah, and signs himself "Acting-Consul" for Her Majesty, has held quite a voluminous correspondence with His Excellency, Joseph E. Browne, Governor of Georgia, in which he is pleased to state that he has instructed Her Majesty's subjects enrolled in the Georgia Militia to throw down their arms in the presence of the Federal troops. Governor Brown very properly informed Mr. Fullerton that in such a contingency he should deal with Her Majesty's subjects just as he would with recreant Georgians guilty of similar conduct. The case of Mr. Pinckney Walker was brought to the notice of the Confederate Government, whereupon Mr. Benjamin notified the military authorities at Charleston that the conduct of the consul was disapproved, and that "while the Government claims no military service from sojourners, those who have acquired residence in the Confederacy are bound by law to aid in its defence." Complications such as these are likely to arise at any time, so long as the anomalous relation continues, between the Government of the Confederate States and the representatives of foreign Powers which ignore that Government, whereby consular functions are permitted to be exercised by these representatives. The time is favourable for terminating this relation altogether, and if the President declines to discharge the consuls, Congress will most probably act in the matter at an early period of its approaching session.

The President left Richmond three days ago for the seat of war in Tennessee, for the purpose, as some say, of inquiring into the misunderstanding which has arisen between the generals of our army there. Generals Polk and Hindman have been put under arrest by General Bragg, charged with disobedience of orders at the battle of Chickamauga, in consequence of which two entire divisions of the army of Rosecrans, that would otherwise have been captured, were permitted to escape. It is more likely that the object of the President's journey is to get a look for himself at the situation of affairs before Chattanooga, and to confer with our military leaders upon the future conduct of the Western campaign. He travelled by the regular trains, and no notice whatever had been given of his intended departure, but he did not succeed in eluding public observation. At Weldon and at other points along the route he was loudly cheered, and addressed the enthusiastic multitude from the platform of the car with his accustomed readiness of speech and in his ever buoyant and hopeful spirit.

Nothing of a decisive character has been done at Chattanooga during the week. Heavy rains have so swollen the Tennessee River that Rosecrans's pontoons have been swept away, and he was engaged at the last accounts in throwing others across the stream. Our batteries at Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain had opened upon the enemy's lines and the town of Chattanooga, it was thought, with damaging effect. A house had been set on fire in the town. Rumours have been in circulation for several days that General Joe Johnston was advancing on Nashville, and it was even stated that he had occupied Murfreesboro, but no confirmation of these rumours has been received. From the Trans-Mississippi Department we have trustworthy information of a cheering nature. General Green has obtained a victory over the Federals on Red River. Guerilla and partisan warfare is successfully carried on along the banks of the "Father of Waters." A gun-boat and several transports have been sunk. A Confederate battery of three guns, which moves about from one point to another, seriously embarrasses the navigation of the stream. At last we have our own account of the brilliant affair of Sabine Pass, which turns out to have been one of the most remarkable successes on record. The Yankee expedition consisted of twenty-two transports, carrying twelve thousand men, under convoy of four gun-boats. Our whole force in the fortification was forty-two men. For several hours this little band fought the enemy's fleet and finally put it to flight, capturing two of their gunboats, the Sachem and Clifton, and three hundred and eighty-five prisoners! General Magruder at the latest advices had established his headquarters on board the Clifton, and the people of Texas were rushing to arms en masse to resist the invader.

The interchange of Columbiad compliments goes on as usual at Charleston, and the enemy's works on Morris Island are rapidly approaching completion, but the feu d'enfer has not yet been opened on the city. An attack was made on the Ironsides a few nights ago by the torpedo battalion, in which that monster is supposed to have sustained much injury. Throughout the succeeding day she was closely surrounded by steam-tugs, and the sound of the blacksmiths' hammers fastening new rivets in her iron sheathing, plainly announced that our destructives had found some cracks in her harness.

From the Rapidan we have nothing beyond the well-ascertained fact that Meade was retreating, two days ago, in the direction of Washington City, and that General Lee had undoubtedly crossed the river in pursuit. Ewell and A. P. Hill are with him, and his army is in high Chicka-hominy-and-maunga humour. Mosby, the indefatigable cavalry leader, is actively engaged in harassing the enemy's transportation, and last week succeeded in capturing, near Fairfax Court-house, one Colonel Dulaney, an aide of the pretended Governor Pierpont. Colonel Dulaney has been brought to Richmond, and will probably be held by Governor Letcher as a hostage for a member of the Virginian Legislature now a prisoner in the hands of Lincoln.

Apropos of Pierpont, it is exceedingly difficult for us to understand the exact status of the Western Virginia usurpation, and to know under whose gubernatorial authority we of tide-water are supposed to rest. One Boreman was inaugurated at Wheeling months ago, and this might have been reasonably thought to terminate Sancho Panza's brief and glorious reign; but in some extraordinary and incomprehensible way the Squire still maintains his official consequence, and has established his capital at Alexandria, with assumed jurisdiction over the oyster-beds of Accomac and the sweet-potato-hills of Nansemond. There is precedent, perhaps, for a dual executive, two claimants for the same office, two kings of Brentford smelling at the same nose-gay; but three governors of Virginia, it must be admitted, are de trop. And how this Yankee, Pierpont, who, even while he administered the twopenny affairs of his Western Commonwealth, had his dwelling in Washington, Pennsylvania, can with any show of right, set up a magisterial authority over Eastern Virginia is inexplicable.

Governor Letcher has just communicated to the Virginia Legislature an official statement of the contributions of men and munitions of war made by the Old Dominion to the common cause. The rolls of the War Department, admitted by the adjutant-general to be incomplete, show a sum total of 102,915 men, irrespective of recruits and conscripts, and the Governor is informed by the commandant at camp Lee that 30,000 or more Virginia conscripts have been sent by him to the army. The report of the chief-of-ordnance of Virginia sets forth 399 pieces of artillery, 103,840 muskets, and 20,000 other small arms of various kinds, as having been distributed to the Confederate troops. This is a noble quota, indeed, and may well excite the honest pride of the Virginians. On the other hand, it is a humiliating fact, as humiliating to the Yankees as to Virginia, that General George H. Thomas, whose obstinate fighting at Chicamunga, according to their own admissions, alone saved the army of Rosecrans from annihilation, is a renegade son of the good old Commonwealth. He was born in the county of Southampton, and in the old United States Army was one of the majors in that famous regiment of the 2nd cavalry, whose personnel has been so brilliantly distinguished in this war. The field-officers of this regiment were: colonel, Albert Sidney Johnston; lieutenant-colonel, Robert E. Lee; majors, William J. Hardee, George H. Thomas; among the captains were Earl Van Dorn, Edmund Kirby Smith, Nathan G. Evans, and the Yankee colonel, Stoneman; while John B. Hood was a first, and Fitzhugh Lee a second, lieutenant.

The commercial world of Richmond has been startled during the week by developments of extensive swindling. One Livingston, a fast man, who gave the pleasantest little suppers at the hotels, beguiled the brokers of the city into confidence, and went off with about $50,000 of their gold, for which he gave drafts on Savannah, that came back protested. Livingston went over to the enemy.

The New York Tribune tells a cock and bull story to the effect that the Hon. William Aiken, of South Carolina, is confined in the Libby Prison in this city for disloyalty. It is hardly necessary to say that there is not a word of truth in this statement.

The soft golden autumnal weather continues, and nature, in her gorgeous attire, seems to mock at the calamities of the war and the general shabbiness of soldier and citizen, town and country.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE. (From our Special Correspondent.)

THE people of Oldham, in public meeting assembled, and with every accessory that could give weight to the occasion or add emphasis to their voice, have set a spirited example to the other towns in the Cotton District, by declaring for a friendly mediation of European Powers in the otherwise endless struggle now going on in America. The meeting was convened on Thursday evening last, at the Town Hall, by his worship the Mayor (John Riley, Esq.) in accordance with the following requisition, which was signed by the local magistrates, by the members of the Corporation, by the leading mill-owners, as well as by numerous representatives of the trading and operative classes in the town:—

"That your memorialists, believing the events of the war in America to have fully demonstrated that the Federal Government cannot subjugate and hold in subjection the people of the Southern States, are of opinion that the protraction of the contest can only result in a useless destruction of life and property on that continent, and the infliction of a serious injury on the Cotton Districts of our own country; we, therefore, respectfully request that you will convene a public meeting of the inhabitants of Oldham, to consider the propriety of adopting a memorial to Her Majesty's Ministers, praying them to use all just and honourable means to procure a cessation of hostilities, with a view to afford an opportunity for the peaceful separation of the States."

The spacious hall was full to overflowing. To say there was no Northern opposition would be to deprive the occasion of some of its very salt. The few Unionists and Emancipationists in the place had taken the pains to issue a counter-placard, calling upon the "Radicals of Oldham" to attend the meeting and tell their story in full force; but it turned out, as in the case of the needy knife-grinder in the Sapphics, their story, when they did tell it, was of a far more matter-of-fact tenor than the "friends of humanity" desired. Among the visitors on the platform was James Spence, Esq., of Liverpool, who attended at the request of the Southern Independence Association of Oldham, and whose "powerful advocacy of the South," says the Chronicle, "has caused him to become so well-known and so much respected in that locality."

The Mayor having taken the chair, the following letter was read from J. T. Hibbert, Esq., M.P.:—

"The Grange, Urmston, Stretford, Near Manchester, Oct. 28, 1863.

"MY DEAR SIR,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter inviting me to attend your proposed meeting on Thursday evening next. I would willingly have done so, did I not feel that it was undesirable of me, as one of your representatives, to pledge myself to any particular resolutions which may be passed at that meeting, or to take sides on a question which must certainly come up for discussion in the ensuing session of Parliament. At the same time, I can unhesitatingly say that, while I approve of the principle of neutrality pursued by the Government up to the present time, I deem it equally their duty to take the earliest opportunity which may occur of offering a friendly mediation between the contending parties. Such has been my opinion for some time, and I need not any it has been strengthened by the wide-spread distress which prevails around us. I am, yours very truly,

"JOHN T. HIBBERT."
"MR. WILLIAM STEEPL, Hon. Sec.
Southern Independence Assoc., Oldham."

Mr. Councillor Harrop moved the following resolution:— "That in the opinion of this meeting the war in America is an injury to the world, and that the present aspects of the conflict afford no hope of its early termination, unless by means of the moral influence of Europe; we, therefore, earnestly urge upon the Government of this country to enter into communication with the European Powers, to concert with them as to the best means of bringing about peace." (Cheers.)

He believed that every Englishman wished this unfortunate war brought to a termination. (Cheers.) They all knew the suffering it was inflicting upon the working-classes throughout Lancashire, and he believed that, as the conflict was now carried on, it could not be ended except through the moral influence of Europe brought to bear upon the Americans by means of proposals for mediation. (Cheers.) Perhaps some people might ask—"What are the South fighting for?" and the same people would say, "The North are fighting for the abolition of slavery." He would contend that the South were fighting for their homes (hear, hear) and for that which Englishmen loved—freedom; while the North were fighting for power, self-aggrandisement, and the extermination of a brave and noble people. (Cheers.) How could men talk of the freedom of the Northern States? It was not such freedom as the people of Oldham, of Lancashire, of England, were now enjoying; but such freedom as was consistent with that most despotic deed of suspending the Habeas Corpus Act. (Applause.) Many of the people he saw before him had been starving for two years, and none but themselves could tell how they had suffered. (Cheers.) He hoped the result of the meeting would show an overwhelming majority in favour of the Government of England, and the other Governments in Europe, not going to war with the United States of America, but offering their mediation between the North and South, honourably and truly. (Applause.)

Mr. Councillor Milnes, in seconding the resolution, said, the North, so far from being actuated by motives of philanthropy, had not scrupled to excite the blacks to massacre the whites, and would, if they could, crown their extermination of the white man of the South with the subsequent extermination of the negro, whether bond or free. (Cheers.)

Mr. John Ashton, amid great disapprobation and uproar, rose to move the following amendment:—

"That this meeting is of opinion that the Americans should be left to settle their own domestic affairs (a voice: 'To kill all there is.' Hear,) and strongly approves of the policy of Her Majesty's Government." (A voice: "Aye, if th' might live on 2s. a week until th' war's done.") Laughter, and great uproar.)

He said: Gentlemen, I feel called upon, out of a sense of duty, not only to my country, but to my native town, to move that amendment, for I cannot in my heart believe—(interruption, and cries of "Turn him out!")—that Oldham, which from time—(interruption; a voice: "It's Mr. Wood, the teetotaler, here.") Another voice: "He's been to the pump!" laughter, and cries of "Let him speak!")—Oldham, that from time immemorial up to now has always been noted for its liberal principles, its devotion to free government and constitutional liberty, can be bamboozled into agreeing with that resolution, without giving at least a fair hearing to those who may have something to say against it. The people of this country have long since recognised the principle of non-intervention; and we have borne all the distress that has been brought upon us for the sake of maintaining that policy of non-intervention; and are we at this time, now we have borne all the distress—(A voice: "Is it over?" Another voice: "Sarat!")—now that we know we can do without their cotton—(A voice: "Sarat!" I hope you have got plenty.") Mr. Mayor, now we have borne all these things—(a voice: "Sit th' deawn!")—now that they, the Southerners, find their cause to be desperate, they are rising in favour of the glorious cause of slavery. They come by a side wind; they want, by false assumptions, to lead you to a false issue—to secure, by an alliance with France and other Powers, the putting down of the spirit of liberty in America—(great laughter, cheers, and counter cheers)—to establish—(uproar)—despotism, degradation—(Uproar. A voice: "Sit th' deawn, owd lad!" Laughter. The Mayor: "Cut it short, Mr. Ashton." A voice: "Sit th' deawn a bit.") Laughter. At this point the audience indulged in a general conversation. Mr. Mayor and gentlemen! ("Gie o'er—gie o'er!") the Southern sympathisers are now seeking to ally England with France and other Powers to save the slaveholding Confederacy, that boasts that they trample under foot liberty, equality, and fraternity! ("Oh, oh!" "Question," hisses and applause.) I repeat it. (Question.) I repeat it; they boast of it. (Hisses and uproar.) I repeat it, that they boast that they have established—(A voice: "Do they hang negroes to lamp-posts?"—applause)—in the place of liberty, equality, and fraternity, slavery and subordination. (A voice: "Who found the ships, and who fetched the slaves?" Radicals of Oldham—(Roars of laughter, uproar, and cries of "Question.") Radicals of Oldham, I know you are ashamed of listening to those who boast that, instead of liberty, equality, and fraternity, they will have slavery. (A voice: "They don't hang 'em up to lamp-posts.") Without deceit, without hypocrisy, without all the roundabout ways and side-winds of their English friends, they declare that the whole of civilisation is rotten at the core—(uproar)—cries of "Turn him out!"—that they will not have free discussion, free thought, free religion, free schools. (A voice: "And free ballies.") Laughter. Another voice: "Is s.d. a head, and the wife lying in." I shall not be long. (A voice: "It's toime th' d'ud nea.") In spite of the counsellors and aldermen of Oldham—(cries of "Question," and hisses)—the people of Oldham—(question) still know what is right. (A voice: "They dun that, and they'll let thee know to neet.") Another voice: "Tha's tow'd th' truth." In spite of all their treachery—(hisses and uproar). Gentlemen, one word before I sit down. (Cries of "Sit down now.") The Mayor: "You are losing time; if you would have listened to Mr. Ashton he would have finished long ago." A voice: "Nowt oth soart." I will give over in a minute. It is for you to judge whether you will help to establish a power that is based like a monument upon a pedestal of mangled human corpses, with their fiery bloodhounds and their bleeding human beings—(roars of laughter and cries of "Stuff!")—with pistols shooting down every man who protects his own flesh and blood—(laughter, uproar and hooting, amid which the speaker resumed his seat.)

Mr. John Tetlow, in seconding the amendment, was treated, like the mover, to plentiful interruptions in the choicest doric of the district. He felt satisfied that, without interference, the close of the war was not far distant. (A voice: "Thou's told us that many a year ago." Another voice: "Ninety days.") Laughter.) The only thing that affected us in England was the want of cotton, and the time was advancing rapidly when we should have a full supply of cotton. ("That's not true.") Would to God we could get our wanted supply from the States of America; but was it of more importance to them as Englishmen, lovers of liberty, that the slaves should be freed, or that they should have the privilege of using slave-grown cotton, wet with the tears, and matted with the blood of the slave? (Uproar.) The war could not be long sustained, for the progress of the Federal armies had been such—"Oh, oh," laughter, and cheers.)—he remembered—(uproar, and a voice, "Ball Run." Laughter.)—he remembered Fort Donelson. He was reminded of Bull Run, but he could remember Island No. 10; he could also remember Fort Donelson, Fort M'Henry, Memphis, New Orleans, Vicksburg. (A voice: "Ay, lad; and Fredericksburg, too." Laughter.) He was referring to the progress of the Federal armies. (Laughter.) From Columbus, at or near the confluence of the Ohio with the Mississippi, right down to New Orleans, the Federal armies had carved their way. (A voice: "They are going back.") They had gone from the Ohio right through Nashville and Murfreesboro to Chattanooga. (A voice: "Where are they going now?"—uproar and derisive laughter.) He cordially seconded the amendment.

Mr. James Spence rose to support the original motion, and was received with a tremendous burst of cheering, followed, however, by indescribable tumult on account of an objection being raised on a point of order. It was contended by a townsman (Mr. J. W. Mellor) that this was strictly a town meeting, and therefore it was not competent for Mr. Spence to address them. (A voice—"Thee got shaved!" great laughter, and shouts for "Spence!") Mr. Mellor continued to call out in most vigorous tones "None but townsmen, none but townsmen!" but his utmost vocal efforts were quite drowned in the clamorous shouting throughout the body of the Hall, of "Hands up for Spence!" Mr. Spence, with his arms folded, stood smiling, and in act to speak, but though continually called upon to begin, awaited the Mayor's decision as to the point of order.

The Mayor: When that numerous signed requisition was presented to me, as mayor of this borough, to convene this meeting, I did not see Mr. Spence's name, nor the names of certain other gentlemen on this platform. So far as I am concerned, I should have been very glad indeed to have heard Mr. Spence, but, since the question has been raised, I feel bound to give precedence to gentlemen who are inhabitants of the borough, if they wish to speak. I do not do this out of any disrespect towards Mr. Spence; indeed, it is a point which I myself would not have raised; but as it has been raised, I have decided it according to the best of my judgment. (Hear, hear.) Mr. Spence resumed his seat amid general cheering, and soon after retired from the platform. It was understood, however, that a special invitation would be sent to that gentleman to visit Oldham on an early occasion, so that the people of that enthusiastic borough will yet have an opportunity of listening to the English champion of the Confederate cause.

During the tumult, Mr. T. B. Kershaw, of Manchester, made his appearance on the platform, and was warmly received apparently by everybody in the hall. The cheering for him was renewed again and again, but of course the same ruling with regard to speech-making applied in this case as in that of Mr. Spence.

Mr. William Steeple, the honorary secretary of the Oldham Southern Association, supported the motion in a speech of some length and considerable power. He said it was the opinion of many who supported the South that if the Union were dissolved slavery would sooner die than if it were maintained, and that opinion had been supported by those who had professed to be the friends of the slave in America and opposed to the progress of slavery. Henry Ward Beecher, in 1856, declared that the dissolution of the Union would be the abolition of slavery. (Cheers.) George Thompson, in 1834, in a letter to Mr. Morrill, used these words, "Dissolution of the Union is the object to be kept steadily in view." (Applause.) Those who held those views at that time should not find fault with the friends of the South now because they claimed the same right for the South which the others had once claimed for the North. (Cheers.) But the proposition did not deal with the question of whether the States were right or wrong in this contest; it simply declared that the war was an injury to the world, and suggested mediation, with a view to the establishment of peace. What could there be wrong in that proposition? They did not propose an armed intervention of the Powers of Europe in the struggle, but they did say, in the interests of humanity, those who were calm, unimpassioned spectators of the conflict were bound to render such assistance to bring about a restoration of peace as could be rendered without interfering with the rights of either combatant. (Hear, hear.) They did not propose to help either North or South, but as the war appeared no nearer its termination than it did two years ago, they wanted to know how long the people would yet have to suffer. Their friends on the other side talked of feeling evils which they never had to bear. (Loud cheers. A voice: "He had a full belly when he was speaking, man.") When they had felt the sufferings of the poor, seen their children with insufficient food and clothing, when they had realised those things—(uproar)—then they might come and preach forbearance to the people. As a poet of the people eloquently said—

In broadcloth clad, with belly full,
A sermon they can preach;
But hunger, cold, and nakedness
Another song would teach. (Cheers.)

They said the war was for the extension and perpetuation of slavery, but the advocates of the South declared that the chief principle involved was the right of self-government, which Englishmen held dear—(Hear, hear)—that the question now submitted to the arbitrament of the sword was, whether the Southern people, from this time, should govern themselves or be governed by others. (Hear, hear, and No, no.) The question was, not whether slavery should be maintained or abolished. President Lincoln, in his letter to Horace Greely, declared that if he could save the Union without abolishing slavery or freeing a single slave, he would do it. (Hear, hear, and a voice: "I saw that in the New York Herald.") The profession of love for the slave on the part of the North was hypocrisy. (Cheers, and cries of "Go into them, Steeple!") If they knew anything of American politics, they would know that the vast proportion of the people of the Northern States—even those who opposed the extension of slavery into the Territories—would not only exclude slavery from the land, but the negro also, whether slave or free. (Applause, hisses, and a voice: "That's not true.") He could pity the ignorance of those not acquainted with the State constitutions. (Hisses.) He could stand hissing. (Cheers.) The State constitution of Illinois forbade the free negro to enter the precincts of that State, and since the war began, escaped negroes from the South taking refuge in that State, with those abominable laws, were seized and sold at public auction by the authorities of that State. (Hear, hear, and shame.) That was the freedom they gave to the negro. (Cheers, and a voice: "Go into them, but keep your temper, my lad.") They told them—(Uproar. The Mayor: "Order; allow Mr. Steeple to proceed.")—or, if they did not know he could tell them—that the State of Illinois was not the only State which excluded negroes. New Jersey and Indiana did the same, and a resolution to that effect had, in the last twelve months, been introduced in the Pennsylvania House of Legislature and, he believed, carried. (No, no. A voice: "It has.") They said the North were fighting for the abolition of slavery, but that was only a hypocritical pretence, and President Lincoln, their chosen champion, said he was not in favour of making the blacks and the whites equal. The object of the North was to secure an overwhelming preponderance of political power amongst the nations of the earth, and that was why they sought to perpetuate the Union they had set up as a brazen image to which they bowed down in worship. (Cheers.) He would conclude by stating that the proposition was, not that the South be recognised, but that the best means be used to bring about peace. And he hoped that by their decision they would give the lie to the statement of Earl Russell at Blairgowrie, that the majority of the people of this country were in favour of the North, and show Ward Beecher, before he left Liverpool, that this town, like other towns in Lancashire, would pronounce in favour of peace and against the continuation of the war. (Cheers.)

Mr. James Schofield, in supporting the amendment, obtained a hearing with great difficulty. He said Mr. Steeple had not told them that in the Confederate States there were 3,000,000 of slaves—(A voice: "How many are there in the North?") nor had he said a word about the slave-market of the South, but had said he was in favour of abolition, while he did all he possibly could in an indirect manner to uphold the principle of slavery.—("No, no!")—by supporting the slaveholders. ("Slavery has nothing to do with the question.") He was sorry Mr. Spence had left the room, because, he said, Mr. Spence, could have borne him out when he said the press of the South repudiated his statement that if the South were recognised they would abolish slavery. The Richmond newspapers declared that Mr. Spence was not authorised to make that statement. (Great uproar. A voice: "Why did you not let him speak, and then reply?" Another voice: "Backbiting again!"—"Thou art a coward." &c.)

No other speakers being forthcoming,

The Mayor: There is a resolution and there is an amendment, and I will just ask you to be as steady as possible, while I call for a show of hands. You may fully rely on my doing the fullest justice.

The meeting became at this stage perfectly quiet, and, therefore, presented a great contrast to its appearance at some parts of the evening. The audience had been uncovered from the commencement, and all faces were now turned towards the mayor, eagerly looking for the result of the vote. At this point a man called out for the votes to be taken North and South, instead of amendment and motion. Great uproar followed this suggestion, and when quiet was restored, his worship said he should put it amendment and motion; and, having done so, he declared the motion carried by an overwhelming majority. (Loud and continued cheers.)

Mr. Robert Harrop then submitted the following memorial for approval:—

"To the Right Hon. Lord Palmerston,
Prime Minister, &c., &c.

"The memorial of the magistrates, councillors, tradesmen, manufacturers, shopkeepers, and other inhabitants of the borough of Oldham, in public meeting assembled,

"Humbly sheweth: That your memorialists, believing that the war in America is an injury to the world, that its events have only demonstrated that the Federal Government cannot subjugate and hold in subjection the people of the Southern States, and that the present aspects of the conflict afford no hope of its early termination, are of opinion that the protraction of the contest can only result in a useless destruction of life and property on that continent and the infliction of serious injury to the cotton districts of our own country. Your memorialists, therefore, earnestly urge upon her Majesty's ministers to enter into communication with other European powers, and concert with them as to the best means of bringing about peace." (Cheers.)

He was astonished that men could come on that platform and set themselves up as the champions of the slave, and say that their opponents were the champions of the slaveholders, when four years ago the United States was the slaveholding nation, and yet they (the Northern advocates) were silent. Where were they then? Why did they not send forth then their Sinclairs and their Ward Beechers? Were they standing on a platform, advocating the cause of the slave then? (No, no.) No, they were spinning American cotton at 6d. per pound. (Cheers.) Four-fifths of the cotton they spun then was American, at 6d. a pound, and they spun it into 32's, and sold it at 1s. a pound. Four-fifths of that cotton came from America and "was matted with the slaves' blood," as they had been told on the platform to-night, but where were the newly-found friends of the slave then? They were pocketing the produce of the slaves' labour. (Loud cheers. A voice: "Go into 'em Bobby.") Those were the gentlemen who now were trying to palm their love of Abolition on the people. The Northern sympathisers were in the field first; they held meetings, passed resolutions, and said the feeling of the people of this district was in favour of the war. He said it was not. (Hear, hear.) It was not in favour of hounding fellow-beings to slaughter; it was not in favour of the American people imbruing their hands in each other's blood. Public opinion in these districts was not in favour of a sham emancipation, it was not in favour of killing the white men in order to free the blacks. (Cheers.) What they wanted was, justice for all. (Cheers.) As Mr. Hibbert said in that room, "We have to consider it not only as affecting three millions of slaves, but as affecting eight millions of whites." (Applause.) He felt strongly on the question, for a deal of humbug had been imported into it. If the advocates of the North taunted them with being friends of slavery, they could taunt them with the same. Where were the slaves of Delaware, Maryland, Kentucky? Where were the abolition measures that had passed the legislature of those States? They were nowhere—they were not in existence. Mr. Lincoln himself told them that Congress would not pay for or find the means for abolition. (Hear, hear.) For the reasons he had given, he had great pleasure in moving the adoption of the memorial. (Cheers.)

Mr. Councillor Halliwell seconded the motion, which was carried with loud cheers, only about twenty people voting against it.

Mr. Councillor Mellor said he was sure all would most cordially agree with the next proposition, which was for a vote of thanks to the Mayor. Whatever might have been the Mayor's opinions upon the question submitted to the meeting that evening, no man, from his conduct, could have the slightest clue to them. (Applause, and a voice: "He's been very fair.") The motion, having been seconded, was carried with enthusiasm.

The meeting then gave three cheers for the South, three cheers for Mr. Spence, and three cheers for Mr. Kershaw, all with great heartiness, and then dispersed.

THE SOUTHERN PRESS ON THE DISMISSAL OF THE BRITISH CONSULS.

(From the Petersburg Express.)

* * * We have read Mr. Benjamin's expositions of the reasons which led the President to the act which terminates British consular authority in the Confederacy, and although the Secretary has been anything else than a favourite of ours, candour and a sense of justice compel us to say that his statements and views have been very ably presented to the world. We have rarely read more lucid and convincing documents of the kind than his letters addressed Messrs. to Slidell and Mason. It is very well for Lord Russell that they are outside of the sphere of his official attentions, for he would find the task of answering them one of the sorest diplomatic trials that he ever had to go through.

The dismissal by him for the cause assigned of Consul Magee, of Mobile, forms, we will venture to say, one of the most remarkable episodes in the history of this or any other war; and that portion of Benjamin's letter to Mason, in which the facts and circumstances of the case are explained, is particularly worthy of the reader's notice. Magee, for simply remitting to England in gold the interest due by the State of Alabama to English capitalists, who had invested their money in her bonds, was summarily decapitated because the act of remittance was deemed an improper and contraband one—a violation of the blockade—a violation of neutrality—a violation of law and a violation of morals; for in all these aspects Russell and Lord Lyons (another precious Exeter Hall luminary) seem to have viewed this transaction. Mr. Benjamin's remarks in this connection are eminently happy, and we defy any enlightened and honest mind to resist his conclusions. When before has it ever been held that payment of a just debt was an illegal, immoral, and disgraceful affair, worthy of the special reprobation and severe punishment of the offender? Yet Magee, for receiving the money from the debtor and transmitting it to the creditors, was held by Lords Russell and Lyons guilty of a criminal breach of trust, and therefore removed.

The results of this movement of the President against the British consuls we will be curious to see. It seems to us that some functionaries are absolutely necessary to watch over British interest in the Confederacy, for there are such interests existing here. Commercial agents, we presume, with no consular powers, will be appointed and perhaps received, for the purpose of attending to such matters as cannot possibly bring them into collision with Confederate sovereignty and laws. Such an arrangement as this is alluded to by Mr. Benjamin in his letter to Mason. However, be the results what they may, we are glad that the measure has been adopted by our Government, and we are very sure that it will be unanimously approved by the people.

We do not think our contemporary, the Whig, is entirely consistent in its foreign policy and the grounds on which it desired our dismissal of the British Consuls to have been placed. It thinks the Government reached a right conclusion upon a wrong reason. It thinks we ought to have banished the consuls, not because of their own official delinquencies and offences, but on account of the general relations of England to this country. At the same time it says:—

"We hope that the new policy will be made still more pointed and significant by enlarging the embassy to France, and instructing them to negotiate, if practicable, a treaty of alliance and commerce with the Emperor, subject to the approval of the President and the Senate."

It becomes us to consider questions of the magnitude and gravity of that before us with candour and dispassion. Thus considered, we think it will be difficult to perceive any essential difference of principle between the attitude of the French Government and that of England towards this country. If England has refused to recognise us for three years, so has France. If England has had consuls here when we have none there, so has France. If England has respected the "blockade," although the "requirements of the treaty of Paris" forbade it, so has France. If England has declined to intervene with its good offices in our affairs, so has France; for, although Napoleon thought he ought to do so, yet he has preferred to maintain a purely voluntary engagement with England which forbade it.

If Napoleon has allowed our war steamer to refit in his ports, yet England built the steamer itself.

What are the great principles of national "honour" which, as we are taught, should have caused us to spurn from our shores such functionaries as English consuls, even if they had conducted themselves becomingly; while, at the same time, we should "enlarge our embassy to France," and assail Napoleon with fresh importunities?

The truth is, the difference is more of feeling than of principle or fact. Napoleon has borne himself with the politeness of a gentleman. Lord Russell has offended us with surliness and indecorum. So far as accomplished action is concerned, they have done about the same thing, and, doing it by concert, each shares the other's responsibility. But they have shown different tempers. If, however, the French Emperor has indicated more favourable views towards us than the English Queen, it must be admitted, on the other hand, that the English people have shown us more favour and done us greater service than the French.

We repeat, that we do not see on what principle we would have reason for rejecting without cause or personal offence, and therefore in a hostile manner, an English consul, and at the same time redoubling our caresses to France, that stands on the same platform. If our dealings with England were disgraceful to us, as our passions may perhaps suggest, we should but double the disgrace if we pursue the same course with France with the double zeal that is asked for.

For ourselves, we are glad that our Government has sought no quarrel with England, and offered no more indignity. We withdrew Mr. Mason from England because we saw no prospect of his further usefulness there. We have dismissed the British consuls here because they have behaved badly. All this we had an obvious right to do. We retain our commissioner in France, not because he has advanced any further there with recognition than Mr. Mason did in England; but, because we have more hope of his success. We allow the French consuls here, not because France has asked for exequaturs, or recognised us any more than England, but because they have confined themselves in their proper spheres.

The truth is, many of our countrymen are impatient and irritable on the subject of our foreign relations. It seems a hardship, and indeed it is, that we should be denied our just recognition so long. But yet it is by no means unprecedented. In the days of the Revolution nothing was dearer to the wishes of France than to see Great Britain lose her colonies. Yet Franklin, aided by two coadjutors, waited for three years in Paris before recognition came; and we do not read that our ancestors felt thereby insulted and outraged. But now, because other nations have shown a less protracted reserve in adopting our own opinion of ourselves, we are not only disappointed but grow angry.

Of course we cannot expect to influence a great and proud nation by a display of mere temper. If the late action of our Government shall have a valuable moral effect, as we believe it will, it will be precisely because we have acted upon reason, and with moderation and dignity.

It will not be inferred that we are not in favour of prosecuting our negotiations at Paris, and with all the vigour which can be added to them. We think that the interests even more than the partialities of Napoleon must, ere long, decide him to the course which we desire. We would encourage those dispositions by every means in our power. As we do not accept in the case of England, so now we reject in the case of France, those grounds of action which would cause us to break off all communication, merely because the blockade has been recognised, and our independence not. And if this be the right course as to France, we acted on the right reasons as to England.

The following is from the Macon Telegraph:—

"WITHDRAWAL OF MR. MASON.

"We are glad that the President has found it compatible with the interests of this Government to withdraw Mr. Mason from 'near the Court of St. James,' and trust that the next tender of friendly intercourse will be suffered to come from the British Government. One of the Richmond papers, in an article extensively copied, suggests that the withdrawal of Mr. Mason should be followed by an enlarged and elevated embassy to France. Why so? What has France done? She appears to have treated our embassy with ordinary courtesy, which cannot be said of England; but she has in no particular accepted our tender of friendly official intercourse. It is believed that she has once submitted a proposition to the English Court for a joint recognition of the Confederacy; but does not everybody know that France must have been well aware beforehand that it would be rejected? and that in hinging her action in the premises upon that of England, France is as safe from friendly commitments to the Confederacy as England herself? England, in truth, has been of some service to the Confederacy, but France none, so far as we are able to judge. In both we are the victims of a vulgar fanaticism, and a policy thoroughly and exclusively selfish. If France shows a more complaisant face now, it is due simply to the fact that we may be in some sort essential to the accomplishment of her own purposes on the American continent. We see no reason for any extraordinary diplomatic provisions in France, although others, doubtless, are able to see much more than we do. To the President, who has much fuller information upon the subject, we are quite willing to leave it.

THE WAR CHRISTIAN.

Dedicated, without permission, to the Rev. H. W. Beecher.

[The following lines, from the New York Daily News, are ascribed to a distinguished English poet, but have not to our knowledge yet found their way into the press of this country.]

What say the aisles and chancels,
Of old cathedrals dim?
What say the pealing organs
In chant and solemn hymn?
Fervour of adoration
And love in sweet accord,
Love for the meaneast mortal,
And glory to the Lord!

What saith the great "War-Christian,"
High perched above the crowd,
With his hands so white and dainty,
And his heart so black and proud?
He draws a little circle,
As narrow as his mind,
And shuts from all beyond it
God's mercy to mankind.

He rants, he raves, he blusters,
And from his sensual jaws
Pours vulgar slang, mistaking
Men's laughter for applause,
And when the land is deluged
With blood and widows' tears,
Incites redoubled slaughter,
And prates of guns and spears.

Forgetful or defiant
That He whose cause he shames,
Whose teachings he dishonours,
Whose Gospel he disclaims,
Was Lord of loving-kindness,
And taught that war should cease;
That swords should turn to ploughshares,
And nations live in peace,

I'd rather for my preachers
Have wild winds on the shore,
Or breeze amid the branches,
Or birds that sing and soar,
Or silence high and holy,
Than Christian such as he,
Who dares to counsel bloodshed
And knows not charity.

The following passage is from Senator Wilson's (of Massachusetts) speech in New Hampshire:—

There are forty-four noble and loyal regiments there to help the Government enforce the draft, and there is not a soldier among them who would not rather shoot a Copperhead—put a bullet through his brains—than a rebel soldier. And the poor conquered and whipped leader of the Copperheads knows it. . . . We shall subjugate the Rebel States—that's the word—subjugation! And we shall conquer the rebellion in New York; forty-five regiments are there to do it, every soldier of which, as I told you before, would sooner shoot a Copperhead than a rebel soldier.

REPLY TO THE ADDRESS OF THE CONFEDERATE CLERGY

THE following is a reply by Ministers of the churches in Scotland to the "Address to Christians throughout the World by the Clergy of the Confederate States of America."

We, the undersigned, ministers of the Churches in Scotland, in reply to the appeal made to us in the "Address to Christians throughout the World," recently put forth "by the Clergy of the Confederate States of America," feel bound to give public expression to our views, lest our continued silence should be misconstrued, as implying either acquiescence in the principles of the document or indifference to the crime which it seeks to defend.

We refer, of course, to a single topic—that of slavery—as it is handled in the Address. We desire to say nothing inconsistent with our country's attitude of strict neutrality as regards the war raging across the Atlantic. We do not discuss any of the political questions connected with its origin, progress, and probable issues. We offer no opinion on the measures adopted on either side; nor are we to be regarded as shutting our eyes to the past and present sins and shortcomings of the North in relation to the African races. The one object we have in view is to express the deep grief, alarm, and indignation with which we have perused the pleading on behalf of slavery in general, and American slavery in particular, to which so many servants of the Lord Jesus Christ have not scrupled to append their names. With the feeblest possible incidental admission of "abuses," which they "may deplore in this as in other relations of mankind," we find these men broadly maintaining, in the most unqualified manner, that "the relation of master and slave"—"among us," they add, to make their meaning more explicit—"is not incompatible with our holy Christianity." They thank God for it, as for a missionary institution—the best, as it would seem, and the most successful in the world. They hold it to be their peculiar function to defend and perpetuate it. And they evidently contemplate the formation of the Southern Confederacy upon the basis of slavery as one of its fundamental and permanent principles or elements, not only without regret, but with entire satisfaction and approval.

Against all this—in the name of that holy faith and that thrice holy name which they venture to invoke on the side of a system which treats immortal and redeemed men as goods and chattels, denies them the rights of marriage and of home, consigns them to ignorance of the first rudiments of education, and exposes them to the outrages of lust and passion—we most earnestly and emphatically protest. We do not think it needful to argue. The time for argument has for many a year been regarded by the whole of enlightened Christendom as past and gone. Apologists for slavery, attempting to shelter themselves and it under the authority of God's word and the Gospel of Jesus Christ, are to be denounced as really, whatever may be their intention, the worst enemies of both.

All reasonable allowance, no doubt, should be made for the circumstances of Christian ministers called in providence to labour where slavery exists. Some soreness, even, on their part, under what they regard as unjustifiable and dangerous movements on the other side, might be excused as not unnatural. And if we saw them manfully lifting their voice on behalf of universal liberty, and setting themselves to aim at the instant redress of the more flagrant of the wrongs incident to a state of bondage, we should be prepared calmly to listen to their representations as to the best and likeliest practical methods of promoting the present amelioration of the condition of the slaves, and securing, within the shortest period consistent with safety, their complete and final emancipation.

We are reluctant to abandon the hope that, upon reconsideration, and in the view of the sentiments now unanimously held and expressed on this subject everywhere else, all over Christendom, our American brethren may yet be induced to take up a position more worthy of our common faith than that which they at present occupy. But, at all events, the obligation lying upon us, as things now stand, towards them, towards ourselves, towards the church and the world, towards the Bible and the Gospel, is, to record, in the strongest possible terms, our abhorrence of the doctrine on the subject of slavery which the Southern clergy teach, and upon which they act; and to testify before all nations that any state, empire, or republic constituted or reconstructed, in these days of Christian light and liberty, upon the basis of that doctrine, practically applied, must, in the sight of God, be regarded as founded on wrong and crime, and as deserving, not His blessing, but His righteous wrath.

THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND MORE.

(From the New York Daily News, Oct. 21.

After nearly three years of active warfare, the Government proposes to create an additional military force, in itself sufficient in numbers to meet the exigencies of any ordinary warlike occasion. This formidable display of numerical strength argues well for the resources of the republic, but at the same time it suggests most painfully the terrible nature of the task that now taxes the energies of the North. Judging from the immediate past, the events to come promise a future of unprecedented horror and desolation. There are yet some sanguine fanatics who make the President's late Proclamation the signal for a renewal of those oft-repeated and unfulfilled predictions of the speedy overthrow of the Confederacy. Experience should have taught them how vain it is to measure prospective military success by the recruiting-sergeant's progress; but as they build upon their hopes and take no counsel of realities, with every fresh call for volunteers we may expect the worn-out prophecies to be paraded before the public. When seventy thousand men answered the first call of the President, the oracles asserted that force abundantly sufficient to crush the rebellion in its cradle. We now contemplate the necessity of a host of nearly one million to arrest the threatened discomfiture of Federal arms, and yet the prophets cling to their text, and point to the ever receding goal as won. They forget that the spirit of resistance intensifies in proportion as the means of compulsion multiply. As their estimate of Southern endurance erred in the beginning and erred throughout every phase of the struggle, there is good reason to believe that it will err to the end.

The swelling of the Federal ranks, to whatever extent it may be possible to carry it, does not coerce the inexorable fates. They will trace the history of this war at the dictation of a higher Power than that which reigns at Washington. The despots of ancient Asia, in their attempts to subdue the Grecian States, invaded first with two hundred thousand men and afterwards with a million; but it chanced that the more formidable host was the most easily repelled and the most thoroughly destroyed. Napoleon was never so utterly discomfited as when he had exerted his utmost influence to bring all the military elements of France into the field. The army that perished amid the snows of Russia was the mightiest that ever marched under the Imperial eagles.

But if we cannot estimate the result of military movements by the numbers of the combatants, it is not only possible but unavoidable to realise the enormous drain that the support of such vast armies makes upon the substance of the country. It is not within the power of the mind to compute whether they shall achieve victory or undergo defeat; but a very plain arithmetic teaches, with appalling certainty, that the cost of their maintenance will impoverish the land. One million of men transferred from productive industry to the labour of destruction, will accomplish the financial ruin of the North more surely than the political submission of the South. When, also, we take into account the blood that must be shed, the suffering that must ensue, the private griefs that will accompany the general misfortune; when we reflect upon the bitterness and hatred that must inevitably be engendered between the sections, whose almost entire active manhood is engaged in desperate conflict; the call for three hundred thousand more agents of contention suggests the confirmation of an irrevocable antagonism of sentiment more forcibly than any hopes of a friendly Union.

A political companionship that requires to be enforced by a million of armed men cannot be claimed as an illustration of self-government. The resistance that, after three years' strife, must be confronted by such an unprecedented military array, gives evidence of an intensity of feeling that can never be accommodated, upon compulsion, to the intention of the United States as constructed by our fathers. It is marvellous that the people of the North do not instinctively comprehend the absurdity of seeking to bring together discordant elements by intensifying those qualities that render them discordant. A raging fire is to be subdued, and they heap combustibles upon it. Hatred, distrust, and jealousy, are to be calmed, and they employ the incentives to those passions. They desire to reconcile a people, and they persist in those deeds that cancel every hope of reconciliation. What madness more ludicrous—if it were not so frightful—as the spectacle of enlightened men struggling like demons to whip their fellows into concord and fraternity! Dealing death-blows to promote friendship! Wielding the implements of hate to build a structure of amity and love! The three hundred thousand more will enable the North to shed a certain measure more of Southern blood. Will that appease the Southern antipathy? They will help to fill more Southern graves. Will that inspire the survivors with affection for the slayers? The more desperate our efforts to compel the South to our political embrace, the greater will be its repugnance to the already loathed connection.

ENGLAND'S POSITION.

THE Richmond Whig thus summarizes the positions which Great Britain has assumed, and declared her unalterable intention to maintain, towards the belligerents in the American struggle, to the great prejudice of the Confederates, as the Whig justly contends, and the incalculable advantage of their enemies. Although the indictment is drawn up with somewhat of acerbity in its tone, who will assert that it contains one false count?

1. That although the law of nations permits prizes captured at sea to be taken into the ports of neutral nations for condemnation and sale, this shall not be done during the present war.
2. That though the same law permits the vessels of belligerents to seek shelter, repair, refit, obtain necessary supplies, &c., in the ports of neutrals, this shall be done during the present war only to an extent that will be of no avail to the Confederate States.
3. That though it is lawful and customary for the ship-builders of one country to construct vessels of war for another country, provided they are not armed and equipped within the waters of the country where they are built, this privilege is to be suspended during this war; and, since the law is inadequate to enforce such suspension, the law is to be set aside by ministerial fiat, and a person is to be considered guilty unless he proves his innocence.
4. That although Great Britain is bound by the most solemn obligations a nation can take upon itself to a treaty which declares that a blockade to be recognised by neutrals must be such as actually to prevent the passage of vessels, yet that treaty is to be ignored and disregarded during the present war, and ports into and out of which vessels pass daily are to be acknowledged as legally blockaded.
5. That though it has been the practice of civilised nations, and none more frequently than Great Britain herself, to recognise as independent and sovereign any people who have shown a fixed determination to be free, and an evident ability to make good that determination, in the case of the Confederate States that practice is to be disallowed, and they are not to be received into the family of nations until they are first acknowledged by the Power that is seeking to crush them.
6. That while it is an obligation of the comity of nations, as well as the dictate of humanity, for neutral nations to tender their friendly interposition to adjust controversies and terminate hostilities between nations involved in them, yet Great Britain, though nearest in blood, in interest, and in responsibility to the belligerents, is not only not the first to tender such offices, but actually rejects, discountenances, and frustrates the desires of other neutrals to that end.
7. That though it is not unusual, and appertains to the prerogatives as well as to the duties of nations to protest against the employment of barbarous and unchristian agencies in war, yet no word of disapproval is uttered, no matter how ferocious the spirit or how fiendish the means employed against the Confederate States.

MR. LINCOLN'S CALL FOR THREE HUNDRED THOUSAND VOLUNTEERS.

By the President of the United States.

A PROCLAMATION.

Whereas the term of service of part of the volunteer forces of the United States will expire during the coming year; and Whereas, in addition to the men raised by the present draft, it is deemed expedient to call out three hundred thousand volunteers, to serve for three years or the war—not, however, exceeding three years:

Now, therefore, I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, and Commander-in-chief of the army and navy thereof, and of the militia of the several States when called into actual service, do issue this my proclamation, calling upon the governors of the different States to raise and have enlisted into the United States service, for the various companies and regiments in the field from their respective States, their quotas of three hundred thousand men.

I further proclaim that all the volunteers thus called out and duly enlisted shall receive advance pay, premium, and bounty, as heretofore communicated to the governors of States by the War Department, through the provost-marshal-general's office, by special letters.

I further proclaim that all volunteers received under this call, as well as all others not heretofore credited, shall be duly credited, and deducted from the quotas established for the next draft.

I further proclaim that, if any State shall fail to raise the quota assigned to it by the War Department under this call, then a draft for the deficiency in said quota shall be made in said State, or on the districts of said State, for their due proportion of said quota, and the said draft shall commence on the fifth day of January, 1864.

And I further proclaim that nothing in this proclamation shall interfere with existing orders, or with those which may be issued for the present draft in the States where it is now in progress, or where it has not yet been commenced.

The quotas of the States and districts will be assigned by the War Department, through the provost-marshal-general's office, due regard being had for the men heretofore furnished, whether by volunteering or drafting; and the recruiting will be conducted in accordance with such instructions as have been or may be issued by that department.

In issuing this proclamation I address myself not only to the governors of the several States, but also to the good and loyal people thereof, invoking them to lend their cheerful, willing, and effective aid to the measures thus adopted, with a view to reinforce our victorious armies now in the field, and bring our needful military operations to a prosperous end, thus closing forever the fountains of sedition and civil war.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this seventeenth day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-three, and of the Independence of the United States the eighty-eighth.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

By the President:

WM. H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

It has been asked why, if a Southern minority had a right to break up the Union, a Federal majority had not equal right to prevent it? and why, if the South used force to effect its object, the North may not do the same? These questions show the confusion that exists in the Federal mind. No State of the South ever claimed the right to break up the Union; what is claimed is simply the right to retire from it. It is one thing to go out of a house, and another thing to pull the house down. Nor do constitutional rights depend on numbers. 160,000 persons in Rhode Island have equal power in the Senate with 4,000,000 of the State of New York; and this condition cannot be altered, though the alteration were desired by all the other States and people of the Union, without the consent of that little handful of people. What would become of this indisputable right of Rhode Island on any principle of numbers? And there is no truth in the implied assertion that the South used force to break up the Union. Each of those States retired from it by the calm, deliberate vote of a Convention, duly summoned by an act of its Legislature. No force is needed to repeal a law. The force used is that of the North to subjugate the sister States, and that of those States to repel the attempt. Amid the gloomy prospects of the Federals, a ray of light is about to cross from this side to cheer them, in the person of the so-called "Reverend" H. W. Beecher. He will tell how he converted unbelievers, and bears back with him the sympathies of Exeter Hall, which represent those of England. It is true, that in connection with his addresses there does not appear the name of a single person of the smallest political, social, or literary weight. It was not, indeed, likely that Mr. Bright would lower himself to fellowship with this style of oratory, or that Mr. Forster would march through Coventry in such company. Nevertheless, numbers did attend from a natural curiosity to hear a speaker of so much notoriety. If Butler came over here, and escaped being mobbed, he would draw an immense audience. But what is there in these addresses that we have not heard hundreds of times before? What new light, or able suggestion, or thoughtful plan—what trace of that love which is the root of our religion, or of that spirit which we are taught to believe is greater than faith, greater than hope—charity? Instead of these we find some dozens of the exaggerated statements of Olmsted and Helper; a joke whenever it can be thrown in, or, better still, an innuendo; and, mixed up with these, a most irreverent use of the sacred name of God. These things, put, so to speak, into a kaleidoscope, and turned round and round, as bits of glass and straw might be, are made to produce an amusing variety of patterns. All this, "though it make the unskilful laugh, cannot but make the judicious grieve." It is suited to the calibre and the tastes of a New York audience.—S. (Letter in the Times.)

THE DISMISSAL OF THE CONSULS.—An impertinent and insulting correspondence which has just been had with the Governor of Georgia by one of the British consuls, exhibits something of the extent of the powers with which they are charged and the temper of the instructions they receive. A summary of this correspondence may be seen in another column, from which the reader will perceive that they are expected to exert a restraining power over our right to raise armies and to employ militia. Acting under authority from the Washington Government, and acknowledging no other, and receiving their instructions from the British Minister to that Government, who is known to be bitterly hostile to us, those uninvited, unrecruited and intruding functionaries arrogate to themselves the sovereign privilege of prescribing to the free Republics of this Confederacy the extent of their rights in providing for their own defence. They presume to bid a particular class of soldiers, in service by regular operation of law under certain circumstances to throw down their arms. They have the effrontery to admonish us that this war against independent and sovereign States, by a people who are foreign to us, and by a Government that was never anything more than our servant and agent, is a "civil war," and, consequently, that we are rebels and traitors. They dare to threaten us with "such representations" as will compel a compliance with their demands from Governments that will permit no "representation" from us.—Richmond Whig, October 7.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Boulevard-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

At Liverpool, to WM. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings, At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq., Manchester Southern Club Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PREIFFER and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4, Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1863.

The War.

THE recent movements of the Federal and Confederate armies in Virginia are not very readily comprehended in the haze which the correspondence of the New York press—our only source of information—has thrown around them. If we are to credit the ubiquitous staff of reporters who accompany the Northern army to illustrate its valour and recount its successes, General Lee's advance has been a most complete failure, and was, perhaps, from the outset, a purposeless demonstration. The object assigned to the Confederate commander is nothing less than the circumvention and destruction of Meade's entire army. General Lee's plan was, we are told, to march round the right flank of the enemy, plant himself upon his communications along the direct road to Washington, and thus compel Meade to assume the offensive and give battle. It was asserted with equal confidence that the Confederates began their advance in light marching order and with only seven days' provisions, trusting to the Northern commissariat for subsistence. As the plan was not carried out; as Lee failed to plant his army between two fires—between the defences of Washington and Meade's army—the Federal press is in ecstasies over Meade's generalship, and declares that the Northern commander has not only beaten but outmanœuvred his opponent. The truth seems to be, however, that Lee intended little more than to frighten the enemy back to the Potomac, and in this he most completely succeeded. It would be hardly possible to find a parallel to this precipitate retreat from the Rappahannock to Arlington Heights. Lee's army, at the outside, could not have mustered more than two-thirds of the Federal force. It had, comparatively speaking, no train. It had to march almost two miles to one. Yet, the moment the news of the advance reached the Federal quarters, it was "up stakes" and skedaddle. "Strategic reasons" were all powerful. Some faint attempts at cavalry reconnaissance were made, in which the Federal horse got fearfully mauled, but they only contributed to swell the grand panic, and for two days and nights those poor Federal soldiers toiled wearily on to reach a place of safety. Strange to say, nothing like an infantry fight took place. The Federal press speaks of Lee's army, drawn in battle array for the space of twenty-four hours, inviting attack, and of Meade's large force moving northward in four great columns, all prepared for instant action; yet the fighting seems to have been throughout done by cavalry and horse artillery. Even at Bristow's Station the affair magnified into the importance of a pitched battle, was but a cavalry attack upon the rear-guard. And when at last the grand Army of the Potomac took heart and breath under Arlington Heights, Lee was nowhere to be found; infantry and cavalry had altogether disappeared, and Meade, after cautiously exploring his ground, commenced a leisurely—pursuit, as the New York press terms it—of his baffled adversary. The results, according to the same reliable authority, are nil. Some forty miles of the Orange and Alexandria railroad had been destroyed, a few waggons had been captured. On the other hand, at Bristow's Station the North gained a brilliant victory. Southern advices tell a very different tale; they talk of an immense amount of stores burnt to prevent them falling into the enemy's hands, of repeated cavalry encounters, in which the Federals suffered the heaviest losses during the war, of no less than 10,000 prisoners, and nearly as many horses, the trophies of the raid, and of such damage done to the roads and railroad by which the Federal army and its trains advance as will effectually quiet the cry of "On to Richmond" until next spring. These are the natural results. But the moral effect is still greater. Lee's army has once more proved its ability to out-march and outmanœuvre the enemy. It has shown its power at any moment to drive back the invader to the walls of Washington; it has concluded the campaign in Virginia by a brilliant movement, which has more strongly than ever demonstrated the innate superiority of the Southern soldier, and the higher military skill of his leaders.

But we believe General Lee's object is not yet fully disclosed. He has not only prevented the despatch of reinforcements southwards; he has, there is every reason to think, covered the transport of a considerable body of troops to the scene of hostilities in Eastern Tennessee and South-western Virginia. It is said, that leaving a very powerful cavalry force, and two strong infantry divisions strongly posted on the Rappahannock, he has thrown a portion of his army by rail upon Burnside's line of operations, and that the real purpose of his recent advance was to make this movement. According to the latest intelligence, Burnside, so far from working his way through the mountains to Chattanooga, was moving northward along the line of the Virginia and East Tennessee railroads, and his cavalry was reported to have reached Bristol and Abingdon, the latter place 175 miles distant from Lynchburg, where there were large Confederate stores. To throw a powerful force upon this isolated corps would be quite in accordance with Lee's strategy, and we shall not be surprised to learn that Burnside has been compelled to concentrate his army and select a strong position for receiving the assault of superior numbers. There seems to be no doubt that for the next month or six weeks, if not through the winter, the whole strength of the Confederates will be brought into play in Eastern Tennessee, and that something like a crisis in the war is imminent in that quarter. The Confederates have enormous advantages in their unimpeded communications; the Federals have the larger numbers, but it is not certain that they can be brought to bear. Up to the latest date, there is no news of reinforcements from the Army of the West, having reached Chattanooga; on the contrary, the advance of Sherman's army of relief from Memphis, though it ultimately beat off its assailants, was very roughly handled by Confederate cavalry, losing prisoners, colours, and guns. Guerillas were pouring into Tennessee from all points; a large force was operating to effect a diversion in Kentucky. Altogether, there was a prospect of a campaign as interesting from a military point of view, as it was likely to be important in political results. In the midst of all this movement and activity, the North is thunderstruck by the news that Rosecrans is superseded. The whole Northern press, true to its instincts, kicks at the fallen hero, and there is no charge too vile to be flung at the man who, three months ago, was the hope of the republic. One paper states that he was asleep during the heat of the battle of Chickamauga; another, that he fled hopelessly panic-stricken from the field; a third, that he is utterly incapable of command. And yet, this is the man who has achieved the most notable successes of the Northern arms, who has wrested Tennessee inch by inch from the South, and who has organised the best army the North possesses. One error has shattered the pedestal on which he stood, and he shares with McClellan and McDowell the displeasure of Mr. Lincoln and the contumely of the fickle Yankee rabble. If anything could ensure reverses to the North, this change of command ought to do to. Grant, his successor, is an able, resolute soldier, but has yet to prove himself Rosecrans's equal; and unless common report has very much maligned him, his health has suffered so much from his excesses since his triumph at Vicksburg, that he is not very likely to prove himself fit for the tremendous responsibilities that now devolve upon him.

In the meantime the great Confederate triumph at Chickamauga is beginning to tell. Whether the victory has revived the spirits of the South, or the necessities of the Army of the Cumberland have drained the Federal armies, certain it is that the South is showing a threatening force at all points. In Arkansas we hear of 20,000 troops marching upon Little Rock. In Louisiana, General Herron has been defeated with heavy loss and superseded. At Chattanooga the South is defiant and jubilant. In Richmond the destruction of the Federal army, or its surrender, is regarded as almost a certainty. At Charleston the Confederates are opening new batteries, and General Gilmore's bombardment is postponed day by day, until the inhabitants of the Palmetto City have cause to believe their town impregnable, and have sworn to keep it so. Fortune smiles on the South. Towards the close of the third year of the war her armies are stronger and better equipped, better fed, and more efficient than ever they were, and there is promise that before the year has expired she will have yet more nobly vindicated her claim to independence, and a place amongst the nations.

The Dismissal of the British Consuls.

As early as the 10th of March of the present year we invited the attention of Parliament to a subject which can now be fully stated in precisely the same words we then used:—"We trust that in the debate which may be expected to ensue to-night in the House of Lords on Lord Campbell's motion, attention will be directed to one consideration of the subject of Recognition, which has heretofore been almost entirely overlooked. We refer to the fact that during the present anomalous condition of the relations of this country with the Confederate States, the large number of British subjects resident in those States, and the immense amount of British property located there, are dependent for protection at this time, when protection is most needed, upon the forbearance alone of the Confederate Government. The appointed protectors of the rights and property of their fellow-countrymen in foreign countries are the consuls, of whose office this is the most important duty. The British consuls who discharge this duty in the Confederate States are accredited to, and receive the permission to exercise their functions from, a Government with which the Confederate States are at open war. For two years they have continued at their posts solely by the toleration of the Confederate Government: a toleration, be it remarked, quite inconsistent with the strict theoretical construction of absolute de facto independence.

"Suppose the Confederate Government, weary of this inconsistency, weary of retaining this only remaining vestige of a repudiated authority, should decline any longer to recognise the official status of functionaries whose exequaturs and presence are a contradiction of its rights and powers. A proposition to this effect, viz., to dismiss all foreign consuls not accredited to the Confederate Government on the 1st of May next, is actually before the Confederate Congress. The number of British subjects and the value of British property thus left without consular protection in a country engaged in one of the fiercest wars on record, must be reckoned by tens of thousands of persons and scores of millions of money. We do not mean to imply that the Confederate authorities would seize this occasion to wantonly insult and injure the persons and property so unprotected. Far from it. On the contrary, we feel assured that every care would be taken to mitigate the evil and to relieve individuals from the inconveniences caused by a public necessity. But if consuls are deemed necessary to the protection of personal and property interests abroad in time of profound peace and of uninterrupted and rapid international communication, they can scarcely be dispensed with at a time and in a country where general conscription laws convert whole populations into armies, where military conflagrations complete or anticipate the work of retreating or advancing hosts, when Death, in many shapes, stalks over the land, and when, in fact, every part of the social and political fabric is strained in an agony of desperation. It is at such times and in such places that the foreigner most needs the advice and assistance of his country's representatives, and these alone can prevent or relieve much grievous individual loss and suffering.

"It is this humane consideration which has induced the Confederate Government to forbear, where forbearance from any other motive would have implied a want of self-respect. Its right to dismiss summarily from within its jurisdiction all consuls exercising their functions by virtue of an exequatur from the Washington Government is unquestioned. It is undeniable, also, that were it to-day to enforce this right, no one could justly accuse it of a lack of moderation in the enforcement. It has given the other Governments of the world two years to consider upon the propriety, expediency, or convenience of establishing with it the usual relations which obtain among Governments. If, after two years' consideration, the other Governments conclude such relations to be improper, inexpedient, and inconvenient, we could not well blame the Confederates for accepting the conclusion as final, and refusing in their turn that convenience of relations which is refused to them. As matters now stand, the forbearance of the Confederate Government affords to foreign nations all the essential advantages resulting from recognition, without reciprocity. The dismissal of the foreign consuls, although not a step which we are prepared to advise, would simply place all parties on the same footing. Sooner or later, if recognition is indefinitely delayed, the Confederate Government will be forced to this measure."

The contingency which we then foreshadowed, has now actually arisen. The telegraphic summary of American news during the past week tersely informs us that the Confederate Government has dismissed all British Consuls from its jurisdiction. We are credibly informed from Richmond, under date of the 10th October, that a full publication, in the form of a despatch to one of the Confederate representatives in Europe, of the reasons which induced this measure, would immediately be made, and until this document is before the public it would be premature to indulge in any extended comments. Meanwhile, we may rest assured that that Government, having forborne so long, and resisted a popular pressure in this direction at a time when it was much stronger, has not come to its present decision without weighty and sufficient reasons. Nor are we left altogether to guess what these reasons are. The correspondence of Mr. Fullarton, Her Majesty's Acting-Consul at Savannah, with the Governor of Georgia, which we summarised last week, displays an excess of presumption and official arrogance on the part of that functionary, which has not only aroused a feeling of just resentment among the people at large, but has compelled the Government, in very self-respect, to vindicate its violated sovereignty. Mr. Fullarton assumed to set his consular fiat above the laws of the Sovereign States composing the Confederacy, to regulate and prescribe the duties of individuals residing within their jurisdiction, to encourage and protect certain of these individuals in open mutiny when under arms, and even to decide the character and morality of the war in which those Sovereign States are engaged.

It is a matter of notoriety that the Confederate Government, in its desire to preserve amicable relations with neutral countries, and to avoid even the appearance of giving offence, has erred, if at all, rather by being too prone to waive incontestible rights than by unnecessarily asserting them. This it has done, although well knowing, as one of our ablest contemporaries on the ministerial side expressed it last spring, "that one of the chief reasons why the Confederate States had not been admitted into the family of nations was, that their non-admittance had not been heretofore felt as a serious inconvenience;" in other words, that they delayed their own recognition by not making other nations experience the same inconveniences of non-intercourse which they themselves were made to experience. The soundness of that policy it is not for us here to discuss; about its moderation and conciliatory object there can be no question. Thus, for a considerable period after the conscription first went into effect, the Secretary of War, acting rather according to his wishes than to a rigid construction of the law, habitually ordered the discharge of foreign subjects conscripted in the Confederate armies. At last the evil became so great, the consuls used their power of exemption by certificates of alienage in so loose and wholesale a manner, that the subject had to be referred for official decision to the Attorney-General as law-adviser of the Confederate Government. His opinion, given at some length, was, in substance, that aliens temporarily sojourning in the States were exempt from the obligation of military service, but that such as had acquired, or had by word or deed proved a fixed intention to acquire, a permanent residence, by engaging in any profession or avocation, becoming possessed of landed property, and similar acts, were as much liable to such service as native or naturalised residents. We doubt whether this decision was ever strictly enforced; still, to the extent that it was enforced, it gave rise to several adjudications under the Habeas Corpus Act, both before State and Confederate tribunals, and in every case the judgment of the court sustained the view taken by the Attorney-General as conformable to common sense, to municipal law, and to international usage. It is remarkable that Mr. Fullarton himself, in the extraordinary correspondence to which we have referred, admits the justice of this view, but affects to draw a distinction between the liabilities of aliens in a foreign and in a civil war; and treating the war between the Confederate and the United States as of the latter class, admonishes his fellow-subjects to fight in defence of their adopted home against all enemies except the Yankees, but on the approach of these to throw down their arms.

If we are to believe Mr. Fullarton, his conduct is not, as we should prefer to regard it, simply that of an over-zealous and indiscreet official, but he is, according to his own assertion, only obeying the "strong instructions" he has received from the Foreign-office. Indeed, without feeling amply assured of the approval of his superiors, we should scarcely think that so vicarious and humble a functionary would have undertaken to threaten in so insulting a manner the Government of a great country which, in its acts and professions, has always manifested the most friendly disposition towards his own. We are prepared, therefore, to see in this occurrence another of those consequences of Earl Russell's singularly unfortunate diplomacy. He has succeeded in forcing the Confederate Government to take action on a question which it has shown every wish, for two years past, even against its own interests and a strong popular opinion, to leave in abeyance. The result is, that with a country in whose fortunes Englishmen have a greater interest than in almost every other—during a war which involves a larger amount of British property, and in which England as a neutral has more at stake than in any other of modern times—this Government has no intercourse whatever, whether direct or indirect. The Confederate States, successfully waging the greatest conflict of the age, supporting armies of many hundreds of thousands of men, whose exploits are in every mouth and fill every newspaper, are still, by a curious fiction of the Foreign-office, represented by Mr. Adams at London, and not so much of a de facto government as even to have a consul accredited to them.

The Reply of the Scottish Clergy.

AN "Address to Christians throughout the World, by the Clergy of the Confederate States of America," which originally appeared in these columns, and has since been very extensively circulated through the advertising sheets of various magazines and other periodicals, has provoked a reply, similarly circulated, from "the Ministers of the Churches in Scotland." Among the names appended to this "Reply" are those of nearly if not quite all the leading divines of Edinburgh, Glasgow, and other towns of Scotland, and in a note it is stated that nearly one thousand signatures have already been received.

Courtesy to so highly respectable and influential a body of signers, as well as the fact that of those they address many will thus be reached more easily and speedily than through any other medium, require us to give a place to this document in our columns. We cannot, however, do so without accompanying it with some comments and reflections, which we hope to offer without being wanting in respect to so many distinguished gentlemen, and without offending sensibilities which we have no right to wound or even to ignore. Compared to the hackneyed abuse of the South, the Reply of the Scottish Clergy is moderate in its tone; it certainly stands in striking Christian contrast to the vehement excommunication of Mr. Newman Hall, who declared that he would neither admit to his house, nor to the Lord's table, nor include in his prayers, the slaveholders of the South. Strong language, indeed, the Scottish ministers use, but it is the earnest language of men who, from the depths of an honest conviction, protest and exhort against what they believe to be a most heinous and deadly sin. If, then, we charge them with injustice to their fellow Christians in the Confederate States, we hasten to absolve them of any wilful intention of so doing, and we moreover record our testimony, that the injustice is not theirs, but rather that of a falsely informed but honest public opinion. This injustice consists in charging the Southern clergy or the Southern people with the defence or justification of wrongs or crimes which they would be the first to denounce and as sincere as their accusers in abhorring. It is not true that the "Address to Christians throughout the World" is a "pleading on behalf of slavery in general." "Slavery in general," is associated in all men's minds with wanton and cruel abuse of power, with a disregard of human rights and of Christian duties. For these no Christian minister, and least of all they who signed the Address, could plead, and they would deem it a fearful sacrilege to use God's Word to justify such crimes. Our ideas of slavery are derived from the enormities of African pirates, from the wail of suffering humanity that went up to an offended Heaven from the West Indies, from the horrors of the slave-ship, and more recently from the novels of Mrs. Beecher Stowe, and the sensational fiction of a depraved and debauched press. Had such ideas been associated in the minds of the Southern clergy with the relations between the whites and blacks among whom they live and preach the Gospel, they would have hid their heads in shame, or they would have addressed the Christians throughout the world only to beseech their aid and counsels and prayers to save themselves and their countrymen from the retributive justice of Providence. True, they had slavery under their eyes, but it was not "slavery in general," nor was it the slavery of the West Indies; for under the latter the African race decreased as rapidly as under the servitude of the Southern States it has increased. But it is not even true that the Address was a pleading in behalf "of American slavery in particular." Had it been such a pleading they would have said, and must in justice to themselves and their congregations have said, that the white master claims over the soul and body of his black bondsman no greater rights, or at least that usage and society allow him no greater rights, than has the employer in any land over his hired servant, or the father over his minor children. They would and must have said that the word "slavery," as that word is generally understood, is an unfortunate misnomer; that in reality it is an apprenticeship for life, which can fairly be charged with no greater moral wrong than that it considers a whole race, instead of individuals only, in tutelage. They would, while deploring many shortcomings and admitting many grievous defects, have proved by irrefutable evidence that this apprenticeship does not in practice open the door to wilder or more lawless passions than systems of more complex and more perfect machinery. They would have pointed to the general morality, the general well-being, the wide-spread piety of their fellow-countrymen of either colour; and they might have sincerely joined with their Scottish brethren in protesting against "a system which treated immortal and redeemed men as chattels; denies them the rights of marriage and of home, and exposes them to the outrages of lust and passion." They would not in this description have recognised the features of any system with which they were personally connected, but to the extent to which they might have recognised a resemblance, however faint, they would have deplored it, and pledged their unremitting efforts to reform. This the Confederate Clergy might and would have done, had their object been to plead for slavery; but as they knew that these truths were contrary to the preconceived opinion of those they addressed, and the expression of them would unnecessarily give offence, and as their object was to bespeak the prayers of their fellow-Christians for a country in deep distress and in the agonies of a great calamity, they contented themselves with the assurance, not obtrusively but meekly made, that they recognised and were striving to discharge their duties to their coloured fellow-man. The manner in which they spoke, in the few brief sentences at which our Scottish friends have taken offence, of the material and spiritual interests of the African race, shows how very far they were from regarding them as mere chattels, to whom the rights of marriage and of home might be denied, and whom they were willing to expose to the outrages of lust and passion.

It is a common error, when Southerners deny false charges brought against them, to accuse them of defending or pleading for slavery. Now, apart from the fact which we have endeavoured to make clear, that the slavery which the Southerner knows is a very different thing from that against which the "Reply of the Scotch Clergy" inveighs, it would be as rational to say that a man approves and justifies an offence which he denies having committed. All that right-minded Southerners ever claim for themselves is, that in circumstances which they did not create and for which they are not responsible, they have conscientiously tried to do their duty; that they are prepared to continue to do that duty, and should the nature of that duty alter with altered circumstances, they will still do it then. England planted slavery in America; she abolished it in her distant island colonies where it was comparatively easy and involved no crisis of her whole imperial fabric; she fed it on the continent by being the largest buyer and consumer of the products of slave labour. If there is moral guilt, then, in the system per se, independently of its incidents, she shares it at least equally with the Southern States. If each of the reverend gentlemen who sign the reply were placed for six months in charge of a Southern congregation, they would be in a position to testify whether the Southerners had done or were trying to do the best that could be done with existing facts; few of them, we opine, would advise, at the imminent peril of white and black, an immediate emancipation. Meanwhile, it would only be Christian charity to take the word of their brethren on the spot.

It is painful to find, in a document which, despite its errors of fact, commends itself by so many titles to respectful consideration, an assertion which we had thought belonged exclusively to the stock-in-trade of political hucksters. The signers evidently take for granted that the struggle of the South for independence has no other object than to perpetuate slavery; apparently forgetting that a vigorous people of eight millions, of English blood, inhabiting half a continent, and differing, as this war has shown, so widely from their late associates, might have abundance of better reasons for desiring to live under a government of their own choice. It would be dragging these gentlemen too far into the field of politics to tell and to prove to them that the South, if it would but have the Union, might have slavery, unmolested, and that in securing independence it forfeits many safeguards for that institution and many opportunities for its expansion; but as they had obviously in mind Mr. Stephens' famous "corner stone" speech, though they do not quote it, a very few words in that connection may not be an improper conclusion to our friendly quarrel with the ministers of the churches in Scotland. Be it known, then, to our esteemed Scottish friends, that Mr. Stephens, so far from being a leader of the secession movement, was its most determined opponent up to the last moment: that he was the last public man of note who abandoned the cause of the Union, and that despite his eminent talents and great local popularity, his election to the purely passive office of vice-president was solely due to a desire on the part of the Secessionists to propitiate a supposed Union sentiment in the seceding States. This is the connection with the Revolution of the only Southern statesman who ever uttered words which could warrant such an interpretation as is hinted at in the paper before us, and he himself doubtless would disclaim such an interpretation as most unfairly perverting his real meaning.

MAGAZINES FOR NOVEMBER.

JUDGE REDFIELD, of the United States, has written a letter to the Law Magazine and Law Review, on "American Secession and State Rights," in reply to an article which appeared in that periodical in August last. The writer of that article observed, "Now, from what has been said, it is apparent that the States of the American Union, being Sovereign States, cannot be legally bound to the Union; that as they are not legally bound, their Secession from it is not an illegal act, and that the Federal Government, in attempting to adjudicate upon the right of dissolving the Federal compact by the respective parties to it, is clearly going beyond its delegated powers and acting ultra vires." Judge Redfield rejoins, that "all this array of damaging consequences depends upon a merely gratuitous assumption," and he proceeds to argue that the States were not sovereign, but parts of a sovereign power. It is somewhat singular that in the midst of war this question should be so much discussed. At the outset it was natural that the South should urge her title to rank forthwith as an independent Power, and it was equally natural that the North should zealously oppose the claim. Europe gave judgment in favour of the North by declaring that the issue should be determined by the sword. If public opinion had been as well informed in 1860 of the merits of the quarrel as it is now the bloodshed of the last three years would probably have been averted; but the opportunity was lost, and it now seems idle to debate the constitutional question. Yet, as long as the partisans of the North persist in setting forth perverted and fallacious doctrines, the friends of the South must reply, lest silence should be construed to mean consent.

Judge Redfield rests his case mainly on two points: on the circumstances which led to the establishment of the present Federal Government, and on the text of the Federal Constitution. He repudiates the assertion that, it appears, some persons have been ignorant enough to make, that the Articles of Confederation were anything more than a contract between a number of Sovereign States, and upon this admission he constructs about the shallowest theory ever invented. He quotes from the Federalist some remarks of Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Madison, in which the League is denounced for its weakness, and a National Government advocated. From these premises he jumps to the conclusion that as those leaders disliked a league of Sovereign States, and wanted a single Sovereignty, it was impossible that they could sanction a mere Federation. This is indeed deducing a mountain from a molehill. It is known that some of the fathers of the Union were in favour of anarchy, if it had been possible; and, therefore, adopting Judge Redfield's logic, we must conclude that Mr. A. Lincoln is, not a president, but a king. It is, however, of little consequence what Messrs. Hamilton and Madison thought; we are only concerned with what was done. We have the Constitution by virtue of which the Federal Government exists, or rather, did exist, until the Lincoln despotism usurped its place. What says this deed about the matter?

Judge Redfield contends that the preamble: "We, the People of the United States," &c., proves him to be right. Is it possible he does not know why that formula was adopted? The draft of the Constitution began with "We, the people of" such-and-such "States," and the draft was accepted, but referred to a Committee for revision as to style. This Committee was confronted with a difficulty about the wording of the preamble. If nine States seceded from the articles of Confederation, and gave in their adhesion to the new Federation, that would be sufficient to constitute a government. It was uncertain whether all the States would come into the Union, and therefore their names could not be stated in the preamble. On the other hand, to exclude some that might come into the Union would have been awkward, for at every fresh accession to the Union it would have necessitated the repassing of the Constitution with an amended preamble. The problem was solved by the convenient device of "We, the people of the United States," an expression which is sufficiently general to be both inclusive and exclusive.

Judge Redfield's argument upon the text of the Constitution amounts to this, that the Federal Government must be sovereign because so many specific sovereign powers are conferred upon it. Without stopping to show that these powers had reference to external relations, for which the Federal or General Government was constituted, we think it must be apparent that the granting specific powers, and stipulating that the sovereign powers not so conferred are reserved to the States, is an unanswerable proof that the Federation was the creature and not the sovereign, of the States. Surely, if it had been intended to change the Articles of Confederation into a Nationality and not into "a more perfect Union," the change would have been solemnly announced, and the States would not have conferred special powers on the Federal Government, reserving to themselves the rest appertaining to sovereignty. If Judge Redfield will read the debates that occurred in the various legislatures upon passing the ordinances of accession to the Union, he will find that there was a very jealous anxiety to preserve inviolate the sovereignty of the several States. Not to weary our readers with a multitude of proofs of that which no man out of the United States disbelieves, we will on this head content ourselves with the following interrogatories. If it was intended to weld the States into one Nation, was it not curious that the seat of the National Government, instead of being at New York or at Philadelphia, or at some other city in the Empire, should have been fixed at Columbia, a small plot of neutral ground? If the Federal Government was to be a Sovereign, was it not remarkable that the President should have to ask the permission of the Governor before he could send Federal forces into or through any State? If the Federal Government was to represent a united People, and not a union of States, is it not exceedingly strange that Mr. Abraham Lincoln is President, in spite of being in a minority in the popular vote, and because he obtained a majority of State votes? Why has Rhode Island, the smallest of the States, the same representation in the Federal Senate as New York, the most populous of the States?

Judge Redfield falls into the blunder of confounding nullification with secession. He tells us that President Jackson and Secretary Livingston, both Southern men, prepared that memorable message in reference to the nullification of South Carolina in which occurs the following passage:—"I consider, then, the power to annul a law of the United States assumed by one State, incompatible with the existence of the Union; contradicted expressly by the letter of the Constitution; unauthorised by its spirit, inconsistent with every principle upon which it was founded, and destitute of the great object for which it was formed." Without entering into the merits of the question of nullification, it must we think be conceded that a secessionist may consistently hold that President Jackson was so far correct, and that so long as a State is in the Union, it has no right to annul an act of the Federal Government. What then? What does it prove? That a State has no remedy for the violation of its rights? That if, for example, the slaveholding States had been in a majority, and had determined to impose the institution of slavery upon Massachusetts, that Massachusetts was bound to submit? No, it only proves that secession, and not nullification, is the proper remedy for a State grievance. That no State, nor any number of States, can lawfully impede the machinery of the Federal Government; but if it or they are injured by the Union, it or they must seek redress by going out of the Union. Judge Redfield confesses that the Federal prospects are gloomy, and that it would not surprise him "to find the Republic ultimately broken into more than two irreconcilable sections." And what gives him the greatest uneasiness is the threat of the dominant party in the North to treat the South as conquered territory, if the South can be conquered. He argues that as the States were not sovereign, and as the allegiance of the citizens of the several States was due to the General Government (an assertion, by the way, which is the precise reverse of the truth) there cannot be any forfeiture of State rights. He says:—

"And we have never been able to comprehend the theory which treats the Southern States as having forfeited any of their State rights. If the rebellion is put down, and the people of those States return to their allegiance, we cannot comprehend why or how any of the laws or constitutions of the States will have ceased to be of binding force. The claim that they have ceased to be of binding obligation seems to us to rest wholly in misconception of the true relations of the States in their corporate capacity of the national sovereignty. And the claim of any such forfeiture of the State laws and constitution seems to us as truly a usurpation as the rebellion itself, so far as the theory of the thing is concerned. And such a theory must necessarily interpose a very serious barrier against the future restitution of the empire in its original character."

We quote this passage as an illustration of the confusion of thought and ideas which results from the attempt to defend the policy of treating secession as rebellion, and simultaneously to uphold the Constitution of the United States. It must, we should think, be manifest to everyone, that rebellion is a greater crime than breaking off an alliance and compact with an independent power; and that if the Confederate States are Sovereign States they would have a much greater claim to the consideration of the North if they were conquered, than they would have if they had been parts of a national territory. Judge Redfield thinks, or is rather driven to argue, differently. We hold that the men of the North, who are always selling the skin of a lion which there is no prospect of their killing, are right enough in theory; though of course we do not approve the savage use they would make of their power as conquerors. Rebellion, as we have remarked, is the most heinous offence and demands the severest punishment; but though the Confederate States did not rebel, they seceded from the Union, and in so doing, gave up all their rights under the Constitution of the United States. The Confederacy is now engaged in a foreign war, and cannot avoid the consequences of failure. The Confederates know this, and therefore treat with the contempt they deserve propositions of peace based on reconstruction. The Republicans in the North are aware of the rights of conquest, and profess their firm intention of using them, if they conquer. Even the Democrats, whilst prating about the Constitution and standing idly by consenting to its destruction, are obliged to let the truth out. They ask Mr. Lincoln to grant an amnesty. Now an amnesty means an act of mercy on the part of a conqueror, and if the Confederates accepted such a measure they would acknowledge that they hold their property by the grace of Mr. Abraham Lincoln. For the South there is no other alternative than independence or subjugation; and for the North—assuming, for argument's sake, that the conquest of the Confederacy was at any time possible—the choice was, (we no longer think is) between letting the South go, or the establishment of a military despotism.

Another American lawyer, the Hon. W. B. Lawrence, the editor of "Wheaton's International Law," and who dates from Newport, Rhode Island, contributes to the present number of the Law Magazine. He calls attention to the unreasonableness of Mr. Seward's complaining that the European Governments were too prompt in recognising the Confederates as belligerents; seeing that the Supreme Court of the United States decided in March last "that a public territorial war, as contradistinguished from a personal insurrection, had existed since the proclamation of the President in April, 1861," and which decision, we should think, must be rather perplexing to those Northern advocates who contend that the South began the war. The Supreme Court was very emphatic in the terms of its judgment. Mr. Lawrence remarks that "it pronounced the existence of a public war, with all the attributes of an international war, having a territorial locality. What was somewhat at variance with the views of those who had hitherto denied the right of secession; it recognised the war as made by the States in their political capacities, and, as a corollary therefrom, it declared all the inhabitants of the seceded States, on account of their residence, and without regard to their individual locality, alien enemies. Indeed, among the first condemnations of the prize courts were cases where the sole inquiry was the place of residence of the claimants." Mr. Lawrence denounces the conduct of his Government in regarding the Confederate States as alien enemies, and yet not exempting them from municipal penal legislation. "Disregarding," he says, "the time-honoured principle, as well of our Common Law derived from our English ancestors as of international law, that protection and allegiance are reciprocal, the statute book already contains provisions which virtually confiscate the property of Southern residents, from whom all pretence of protection had been withdrawn, especially of those in anywise engaged, even in a judicial capacity, in the administration of the de facto Confederate Government, as well as of the governments of the several States that have joined the Southern Confederacy, which conflict with no existing authorities, while their organisation is essential to the maintenance of order and the prevention of anarchy." In short, the Federals are avowedly bent on doing that which no nation has hitherto ever openly attempted. Not content with seeking to recover their real or imaginary sovereign rights in the South, they declare their intention of confiscating Southern property, and of holding every Southerner guilty of the civil and municipal crime of rebellion—that is, holding every man in the South liable to be hanged or shot. No doubt, if the Federals conquer, they will be fully entitled to treat the South as conquered territory, without paying any regard to the former political connection—but that does not include the right to treat the Southerners more brutally than their Imperial ally the Emperor of Russia has treated the Poles.

Mr. Lawrence touches upon several points of maritime law. He notices a dodge of Mr. Seward's, which was short-sighted, dishonourable, and unsuccessful. The Confederate States had not any commercial marine, and therefore privateering was not of much use to the North; the United States had a large commercial marine, and therefore privateering was of great use to the South. Mr. Seward therefore offered to accept the privateer clause in the declaration of the Paris Congress. Mr. Lawrence observes: "the history of the negotiation as to privateering shows that it had its origin in objects wholly unconnected with the improvement of the maritime code. The attempt to gain a technical advantage is not the less disreputable to our diplomacy; because, as the archives of his department, and especially the correspondence of John Quincy Adams, when Secretary of State, will abundantly show, no treaty concluded subsequent to the de facto disruption of the Union could have had any effect on the relations of foreign Powers to the Confederate States." When the history of Mr. Seward's diplomacy is written, when his gross unscrupulousness and his disreputable chicanery are thoroughly exposed, his conduct will not be thought the least extraordinary or the least infamous feature in the present contest.

Mr. Lawrence is very outspoken on the subject of the sale of war vessels. He says: "As regards the sale of ships, whether armed or not, in neutral ports, as matters of commerce, I cannot think that, under the law of nations, they stand on any less favourable footing than the sale of munitions of war . . . . nor, according to the decision of our courts, do I consider the case altered by any provisions of our Neutrality Act." And he adds:—"The gist of the matter is, using the neutral territory as the basis of a hostile expedition; and in that respect, where the ship was built or to whom it belongs is immaterial. It falls within the same category as carrying on hostilities in neutral waters, or using them to watch the enemy." So Earl Russell, in stopping the rams in the Mersey, because he is told they are Confederate property, is doing that which is condemned by the common sense of mankind, and also by the independent jurists of the United States. Our Foreign Secretary will find a policy of servility is as dangerous and inexpedient as it is unjust and dishonourable. How can we wonder that the Federals think we are truckling to them when their own independent lawyers are of opinion that we are taking in their favour, and against the Confederates, proceedings that are not called for by international law?

An article in Blackwood, entitled "Our Rancorous 'Cousins,'" deals with the American question from a purely English view. The conduct of the Federals to this country is peculiar. "No covert or overt hostility on the part of France can rouse this sensitive people to remonstrance—no servility on the part of our own Government can induce our 'Cousins' to refrain from threatening to punish our partiality for their antagonists with immediate war." This Blackwood aptly calls a policy of sheer impudence. Does it succeed? Our press, except a few Federal organs, that "are perhaps a little more frantic than the North in abuse of their own country and peremptory demands for sympathy," is favourable to the South. Yet the sympathy for the South is very mildly expressed, and the North is treated with great consideration. "Nobody ever talks of our Southern cousins; nobody ever asserts Southern rights. . . . Heroism is all very well to be sentimental about; but for solid, appreciable success, give us good steady impudence." But the important question for Englishmen is, whether or not the policy of our Government is patriotic and good for our country. If it was right to permit Lancashire to suffer, let us confess it was not from any other reason than that some of our statesmen thought intervention would lead to hostilities with the North, and that the loss of our trade in cotton would not be so great as the loss entailed by such a war. Our forbearance could not arise from gratitude to the North for its friendship to us; or from our approbation of despotism as established by the Lincoln Government; or because we think the Union is essential to human happiness; or because we think it is a righteous thing to exterminate, or to seek to exterminate, an entire population. But the grotesque part of the business is this: whilst the Anglo-Federals have exhorted us not to do "injustice" to the North for the sake of our interests, they now turn round and ask us to do injustice to the South for the sake of our future well-being. "Having just disputed the assertion, that where no law forbids we must not pursue our own benefit, we have to face about to meet an argument which affirms that in pursuit of our own benefit we may enlarge the bounds of our law. Such is, in reality, the argument of the gentleman who, under the signature of 'Historicus,' has undertaken to lecture the public on international law." For instance, it is evident that a blockade is for the benefit of the belligerent, not for the benefit of neutrals. Therefore it is not an offence to break a blockade, though vessels trying to do so are liable to capture. Mr. Adams, Mr. Sumner, and Historicus take a different view. They regard trading with the South as a sinful act. The last-named writer, going a trifle further than his Federal coadjutors, says the trade to Nassau and Matamoros is suspicious, and asks, "Can we profess to be ignorant that the great majority of vessels bound to these ports are engaged in adventures which the American navy are entitled to prevent?" Now, it is as honourable to ship quinine to Wilmington as it is to ship rifles to New York, though in the former case there is the liability of capture. But, according to international law, there is no such liability in shipping to a neutral port like Matamoros. Yet when complaints are made of illegal captures the merchant is told "that he must expect no sympathy when he engages (unheard-of crime in a merchant!) in an uncertain enterprise for the sake of gain. An extension of the argument would abandon our traders to the mercy of pirates." The real argument is, however, that we, as the leading maritime nation, have an especial interest in extending the law of blockade. This is a grave error. In times of peace our commerce suffers more than any other by blockades; in time of war, "as the strongest of all maritime Powers, we are best able to derive from the present rights of blockade the fullest effect. By a fictitious extension of them we are best enabling weaker Powers to approach the measure of our strength." Probably the next session of Parliament will prove whether England is willing or not to commit such a breach of neutrality, and whether we are so blinded to our own interests by the sophisms of Federal advocates, as to change our law in favour of the United States. In May last, Earl Russell wrote to Mr. Adams, that when Her Majesty's Government are asked "to overstep the existing powers given them by municipal and international law, for the purpose of imposing arbitrary restrictions on the trade of Her Majesty's subjects, it is impossible to listen to such suggestions. . . . The Federal Government cannot expect that Great Britain should frame new statutes to aid the Federal blockade, and to carry into effect the restrictions on commerce which the United States, for their own purpose, have thought fit to institute." But in September last, Federal impudence had done its work, and his lordship was as subservient as the most exacting Yankee could desire. He declared that, if necessary, "the sanction of Parliament should be asked to further measures." That is, our neutrality, already very favourable to the Federals, is to be rendered still more unfavourable to the Confederates. We have no doubt what kind of answer the House of Commons will return to such a demand.

There are several points in the article before us worthy of notice, but hoping that it will be read as extensively as it deserves, we shall give only one more quotation from it. Commenting on the equivocal declaration of Earl Russell, that it would "have been for ever infamous if, for the sake of interest of any kind, we had violated the general laws of nations, and made war with the slaveholding States of America against the Federal States," it is observed: "Though there can be no disgrace for the best of us in an alliance with a country defended by Lee and Jackson, yet we will venture to say that most English gentlemen would think their good name blemished if they were compelled to make war in alliance with Butlers and Turchins, with Popes, Milroys and Hookers, or even with Gilmores and Grants."

We have devoted so much space to the articles on America that we can barely mention many others of merit and interest that appear in the Magazines for November. In Blackwood there is a clever paper on the progress of geography, and a sketch of "The fall of King Otho," which is by far the best account that has been published of the affair, and has evidently been written or inspired by some one who has been behind the scenes. The Cornhill accomplishes a wonderful work; that is, it makes "The Story of the Mhow Court-Martial" intelligible. Whether Colone Crawley be guilty or not of the crimes laid to his charge, it is impossible to differ from the conclusion that our administration of military justice is disgraceful and loudly calls for amendment. One of the remedies frequently suggested is to let the civil tribunals take cognisance of military disputes and offences, except during an actual campaign; and it is hard to see how military discipline would suffer from officers and soldiers knowing that he who commands and he who obeys are alike amenable for their conduct to an independent tribunal. "Domesday Book" is a popular account of one of the most useful and curious of our national records. The essayist points out the analogies between the Englishman of 1085 and of the present age, and they are neither few nor far-fetched. "Unctuous Memories" is rather a commonplace essay on the well-worn adage, that hunger is the best sauce; or, if the author does not mean that, we must confess we are unable to understand the object of the paper. Mr. Thackeray contributes "Strange to Say, on Club Paper." The codicil of Lord Clyde's will was written on club paper, and as it was signed at Chatham, and not in London, some good-natured gossips invented a story of his lordship's meanness, and charged him with pillooting club stationery. The explanation is, that Lord Clyde's solicitor, being a member of the Athlone, wrote the codicil at the club and sent it to Chatham, and his lordship signed the original draft. Mr. Thackeray administers a severe rebuke to scandal-mongers.—In Macmillan we have the first part of a new story by Mr. Henry Kingsley, called "The Hillyars and the Bartons." The first chapter presents a vivid picture of colonial life, and promises a better novel than "Ravenshoe,"—by which remark we do not mean to infer that "Ravenshoe" was not a very excellent work of fiction. "On Maritime Captures and Blockade," by Lord Hobart, is an exposition of the views of those who think that not only ought free ships to make free goods, but that all private property at sea, even that belonging to the enemy, ought to be free from capture, as it is—at least in theory—on land. Lord Hobart condemns "commercial blockades." He admits that when a blockade is necessary for military purposes it is a legitimate military proceeding, but that "it is surprising that the right of excluding the commerce of neutrals by blockade should have been considered to hold good when the blockade is what is termed 'commercial';" that is, when it is established for the express and single object of excluding that commerce, and not for any purpose which can be termed military." We agree with Lord Hobart, that it is doubtful whether England, with her large commercial navy, does not lose more by the law of blockade than she could gain in time of war by her naval superiority. Besides, our naval superiority would not be relatively diminished by the proposed changes, and the laws of blockade, like all other laws, are more for the protection of the weak than the advantage of the strong.

A NORTHERN ESTIMATE OF ENGLISH LIFE.*

WE confess that we have never been able to understand the popularity of Mr. Hawthorne's romances; and still less the favour with which they have been received by the critical world. We began to read "The Scarlet Letter," and gave up the attempt in despair after the few first chapters, equally disgusted with the subject and the author. We made more progress with "The House with the Seven Gables," a thing begun it under a strong sense of duty; but we found it utterly impossible to get beyond the middle of that dreary and incomprehensible story. The reviews of "Transformation," all eulogistic, disclosed enough of its character to determine us not to make the attempt. "Our Old Home" is, therefore, the first of Mr. Hawthorne's works that we have read through; and certainly nothing but professional duty would have sustained us through so wearisome a task. We have read few works more disagreeable in themselves, or more completely proving the unworthiness and unmanliness of the writer.

Had the consular experiences been omitted, and the author's name concealed, we should certainly have attributed these volumes to a woman, and to a woman of that most disagreeable class—the American variety of the species yeclapt "strong-minded." Had we been asked to name any one person as the probable authoress, we should have named Mrs. Stowe. The book is full of the worst faults of the worst female writers. It has the conceited tone of Mrs. Stowe's "Sunny Memories," the maudlin sentimentality of Miss Wetherall's Nursery Novels, and the insufferable egotism of the lady so mercilessly caricatured in Mr. Lowell's "Miranda." It is pervaded by that spirit of petty malice and insidious spite which we call feminine, not, thank heaven, because it is characteristic of women, but because it is almost unknown among men. There is also discernible a vein of brutal coarseness which we should not readily attribute to any writer of the other sex, had we not recently had occasion to read and review the scandalous journal of the divorced wife of Pierce Butler. In one word, the best comment we can make upon the work is this: that it is hard to understand how it can have been written by a man, and impossible to conceive that it could have been written by a gentleman. It suggests the reflection that the brutality of a Butler or the virulence of a Beecher are simply extreme exhibitions of the innate character of New England, and by no means contrasts and exceptions to the general disposition of her people, as their advocates in this country would have us believe. We know the measure of the Abolitionist orators and the robber-generals of Massachusetts; we know that the policy of that State was controlled, and her people represented to foreign nations, by men whom their own public language proved to be as brutal and as ignorant as the lowest and most vulgar of our own demagogues. We knew that the place of Sumner, and Cheever, and Beecher, and their associates, was with the Thompsons and the Barkers, or at best with the Spurgeons and the Peter Taylors of England: men who never, in this civilised land, find their way to honour either in the State or in the Church. But we were told that the prominence of such creatures was merely the result of the disrepute into which politics had fallen in the North; that there were in New England gentlemen as honourable, refined, and well-bred, as those of the mother-country; and we tried to believe it. If we had asked for the names of any such men, those who knew him only by repute would certainly have inserted on their list the author of "The Scarlet Letter." He may be taken as a type of Massachusetts refinement; he is the friend of a late president, he is one of the most distinguished of American authors, he has received a high tribute of praise from one of the ablest and severest of American critics, Mr. James R. Lowell. This man comes among us; he enjoys our hospitality; he is treated by us with distinguished attention, partly because he is a favourite author, and still more because he is an American of note, through whom we can render courtesy and display goodwill towards his country. He is feted in public; he is caressed in private; he is admitted to the intimacy of some of the most agreeable society in England. Now we admit that foreigners who come among us without introductions, who fail to find the password that admits a stranger into English homes, and who, therefore, live in England for years without seeing anything of English life, go home and abuse us with great heartiness and with tolerable excuse. But whenever a Frenchman, a German, a Russian has really had access to English society, and has had the opportunity of understanding England, he has borne testimony to the cordiality, the kindness, and the substantial courtesy of her people, and has returned home in charity and goodwill towards us. It is only Americans who come here, are received with open arms, and go home to revile us. Few Americans have ever been more kindly welcomed than this New England novelist, and none has ever written a book so unscrupulous in its misrepresentations, so vulgar in its abuse, so mean and carping in its criticism. We received this man as a type of the best society of his country; we know by his return for our hospitality what he is worth, and feel entitled to judge his countrymen by him; and so judging, we are bound to pronounce that, with all her civic virtues, her religious pretensions, and her military boasts, the State of Massachusetts appears to have a soil and climate eminently unfavourable to the development of that product of Christian and chivalric civilisation which we call a gentleman.

Mr. Hawthorne's fitness to understand England is incidentally demonstrated by his selection of a third-rate watering place for his abode, and the evident satisfaction which this most American form of English life afforded him. His intellectual shallowness is made equally apparent by the frequency with which he contrasts the English love of what is old—old laws, old homes, old customs—with the restless love of change which distinguishes the Yankee. If he had the least glimpse of the terrible meaning underlying the disastrous phenomena of which his country is now the scene, he would have avoided this contrast or inverted the moral he draws from it. For it is this want of reverence for the past, this want of love for ancestral homes and ancient usages, this utter absence of a conservative instinct in the people of the Northern States, which has undone the work of Washington and Hamilton, and first reduced the State republics to unlimited democracies, and then let loose the passions fostered by democracy to the destruction of the Union and the ruin of liberty. But Mr. Hawthorne finds nothing to admire in England. Our institutions are out of date, our social usages provoke a sneer by their simple cordiality, our charities are feudal and ostentatious, our people gross, earthly, and stolid. There is something ludicrous in the mingled envy and contempt with which the Yankee rears to the traditional diet of Englishmen, and refuses to see in the most stalwart race of men that the world has produced—the soldiers of Waterloo, the seamen of Trafalgar, the statesmen who have made England the first Power in the world—anything more than modifications of beef and ale. To Nelson only does he allow any higher attributes, any finer composition; and Nelson, he will have it, was not an Englishman! It would a little astonish Nelson to hear this off-hand estimate of his relation to the country which he loved with all his soul, and which returned to him with such hearty enthusiasm; but Mr. Hawthorne hardly deserves refutation. We will only ask him what he would think of the Englishman who, premising that Washington was not an American, should go on to say that his memory alone seemed capable of stirring up to its depths "the gin-sling and beef-steaks" of the Yankee composition? Certainly, Americans eat at least as much as Englishmen; and their diet is hardly choicer. What they do eat, however, at least in the North-East, does not agree with them quite so well; and the national malady of indigestion has done more to affect the individual and national character of the Yankee than beef and ale have done to mould the nature of the Englishman.

But the "male Bull" is more civilly treated by Mr. Hawthorne than his partner. It is difficult to conceive that the vulgar abuse of Englishwomen, and the carping criticism of English girls, which crop out at every page of this disgusting book, were really written by a man. They bear the stamp of a woman's mind; of the mind of a woman fading into unloved middle age, with waning charms and feeble health, hating the women of her own age for their healthful, honest, matronly womanhood, and detesting the maidenly beauty of their blooming daughters with an envious malignity of which only a decaying coquette is capable. The sickly delicacy of an American complexion, the unnatural beauty which illness lends to the girl who was fed on beef-steaks and pastry at three years old and "brought out" into society at thirteen—the languor which tells of rooms heated by hot air; the "intellectual pallor" which bespeaks a brain tasked at school beyond the powers of girlhood—these Mr. Hawthorne calls "refinement." The loveliness of an English girl, whose pure, fresh complexion bears the hue of health, whose rounded figure tells of fresh air and wholesome exercise, whose maidenly modesty assures us that she was not forced into premature self-consciousness before she had ceased to be a child—this is, in his opinion, the loveliness of a dairymaid and not of a lady. English girls, he informs us, are rarely "genteel." That is a merit which we are willing to leave to the undisputed possession of New York waiting-maids and Massachusetts factory-girls. In England, the word and the thing are only known in the families of second-rate tradesmen. A "genteel" servant would be intolerable to an English gentleman. We expect every woman to be modest, well-behaved, and womanly; every lady to be ladylike; but we recognise in the affectations of "gentility" the stamp of low breeding and a bad education. And the "gentility" of the men and women of New England is one of the qualities which most profoundly move the contempt of English travellers.

We recommend, in conclusion, to those of our contemporaries who have given to this book a praise which it little merits, the following choice description of an English matron:—

"Oddly enough, the only figure that comes fairly forth to my mind's eye is that of a dowager, one of hundreds whom I used to marvel at, all over England, but who have scarcely a representative among our own ladies of autumnal life, so thin, careworn, and frail, as age usually makes the latter."

"I have heard a good deal of the tenacity with which English ladies retain their personal beauty to a late period of life; but (not to suggest that an American eye needs use and cultivation before it can quite appreciate the charm of English beauty at any age,) it strikes me that an English lady of fifty is apt to become a creature less refined and delicate, so far as her physique goes, than anything that western people class under the name of woman. She has an awful ponderosity of frame, not pulpy, like the looser development of our few fat women, but massive with solid beef and streaky tallow, so that (though struggling manfully against the idea,) you inevitably think of her as made up of steaks and sirloins. When she walks, her advance is elephantine. When she sits down, it is on a great round space of her Maker's footstool, where she looks as if nothing could ever move her. She imposes awe and respect by the muchness of her personality, to such a degree that you probably credit her with far greater moral and intellectual force than she can fairly claim. Her visage is usually grim and stern, seldom positively forbidding, yet calmly terrible, not merely by its breadth and width of feature, but because it seems to express so much well-founded self-reliance, such acquaintance with the world, its toils, troubles, and dangers, and such sturdy capacity for trampling down a foe. Without anything positively salient, or actively offensive, or, indeed, unjustly formidable to her neighbours, she has the effect of a seventy-four-gun ship in time of peace; for, while you assure yourself that there is no real danger, you cannot help thinking how tremendous would be her onset, if pugnaciously inclined, and how futile the efforts to inflict any counter-injury. She certainly looks tenfold, nay, a hundredfold, better able to take care of herself than our slender-framed and haggard woman-kind; but I have not found reason to suppose that the English dowager of fifty has actually greater courage, fortitude, and strength of character than our women of similar age, or even a tougher physical endurance than they. Morally, she is strong, I suspect, only in society, and in the common routine of social affairs, and would be found powerless and timid in any exceptional strait that might call for energy outside of the conventionalities amid which she has grown up.

"You can meet this figure in the street, and live, and even smile at the recollection. But conceive of her in a ball-room, with the bare, brawny arms that she invariably displays there, and all the other corresponding development, such as is beautiful in the maiden blossom, but a spectacle to howl at in such an overblown cabbage-rose as this."

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, October 20.

MILITARY operations have been comparatively languid since I wrote you last week, except in Eastern Virginia. By one of those sudden and rapid movements with which General Lee surprises his friends and astonishes his enemies, the Confederates made an advance movement last week, which compelled General Meade to withdraw his whole army from the line of the Rapidan and post it so as to cover Washington City. He and the Department at Washington are still in doubt as to the plans of Lee—whether he meant to outflank Meade and force a battle, or to make another march into Pennsylvania, or only into Maryland. There seems to be a total ignorance, not only of what General Lee's plans are, but what is the amount of his forces. At present it is considered "brilliant strategy" in General Meade to have succeeded in retreating with so little loss into the environs of the Capital; and therefore we can be assured that he is so posted as to be able successfully to resist any attack upon him, and that Washington is beyond peradventure safe. They who wish well to Lee are equally in doubt as to his strength and his objects, but they feel as much confidence in his discretion as in his bravery and skill, and are disposed to feel proud that, after a war of two years and a half, the guns of the terrified Confederates are heard within twenty-five miles of Washington City. The Army of the Potomac is congratulated upon having made a masterly escape, and that it is the Federal, and not the Confederate, capital, which has been disturbed by the advance of an enemy.

In the dearth of news from the South, where they practise reticence about their military affairs, and the general ignorance and falsification of what little is known at the North, it is impossible to conjecture what amount of force General Lee detached to the support of Bragg in Tennessee, and to what extent his army has been recruited. When the Federals desire to account for Meade's enforced retreat, they show Lee to have nearly a hundred thousand men; when they want to prove that the "rebellion" is nearly crushed, and the Confederate Government incapable of raising any more armies with which to resist the "victorious" troops of the Union, they tell you just as positively that it is not possible that Lee can have 50,000, "and may not have more than 30,000 men." The truth is, they know nothing of the strength or resources of the Confederacy, or of General Lee's numbers or plans.

It is evident, from the new call for 300,000 more men just issued, that they have little confidence in their own gasconading declarations that the rebellion is practically crushed and the spirit of the rebels broken. With a million of men on the pay roll, an impending conscription of one in five of the whole military population of the country, the Government demands 300,000 more, as volunteers, but with the alternative, that unless the volunteers are obtained before January, a new conscription shall be had for the deficiency.

"Military necessity" has been the apology for a great many extraordinary acts by this Administration. The hardest necessity they have yet confessed, is the need of 300,000 more men, and the threat of a second conscription, towards the close of the third year of a war to suppress a little insurrection, which is holding the two finest armies of the Union behind entrenchments, one at Washington and the other at Chattanooga, both sending out convincing assurances that they cannot be captured!

The position at Chattanooga is not altered. There is no evidence that any large bodies of the troops sent to reinforce Rosecrans have yet reached him, and there is evidence that the Confederates are harassing his rear, and occasionally cutting off his supplies. The movements in East Tennessee are hard to be comprehended at this distance. We can only gather here that Rosecrans is sadly straitened, and wonder why the decisive action, which both parties appear to think inevitable, has not been brought on. I continue to think that all the Confederate movements are directed to the making of East Tennessee the battle ground for the next great struggle, and that Lee will permit no great battle to be fought in Virginia this winter. If he does, it will be because he has found the opportunity for striking a blow near Washington. There is a rumour in town that Rosecrans has been removed from the command; no successor named.

* Our Old Home. By Nathaniel Hawthorne, Author of "Transformation," "The Scarlet Letter," &c. &c. In Two Volumes. London: Smith, Elder, and Co. 1863.

The Texas expedition is getting on slowly towards the Sabine, without having, as yet, met with any check or obstruction from the Confederates. Nevertheless the tone of the Texans is confident.

The elections in the Middle and Western States ended as I wrote to you in advance that they probably would end. The Radicals carried them all—Ohio by a very large majority, Pennsylvania by a decided one; somewhere near 15,000, on a poll of more than 400,000 votes. In all the elections held, the Radical war party gains votes over last year's elections. Vallandigham in Ohio, a peace man, who is for stopping the war, and endeavouring peacefully to reconstruct the Union by consent, got about 200,000 votes for Governor; but Brough, who is for war to the utter extinguishment of all armed resistance before he will consent to treat of terms with "traitors," received in all ways, in the State and in the camps, nearly 300,000 votes. This, too, notwithstanding the issue was distinctly made on the questions of the arbitrary and cruel arrest of Mr. Vallandigham by President Lincoln for a political speech, and the sending him into banishment without colour of law. A majority of 100,000 in Ohio have by this vote said that they would support and submit to every degree of unconstitutional and arbitrary power in the Executive Department at Washington, rather than listen to a proposition for a suspension of arms, until the Southern States are scourged into unlimited submission. In Pennsylvania, Judge Woodward, the candidate of the opposition, the Conservative Democracy, as it delights to be called, represented the prevailing Democratic idea that the war is to be prosecuted in all contingencies, until the South is subjugated into submissiveness. He is a War Democrat, one of those who charge the Administration with unspeakable crimes against the South, and with meditating, and having partly accomplished, by their management of the war and the war powers, the overthrow of constitutional liberty at the North and a disastrous change in the form and functions of Government; but who, nevertheless, support the war, with the protest that they would prefer it to be conducted constitutionally, and for constitutional objects, and by lawful, constitutional, and Christian means; but as the Administration will make war in their own bad way only, they will support it, rather than that the South should escape the extermination they describe as its doom, at the expense of any loss of power or territory or dominion to the North. With all these concessions to the Radicals, Judge Woodward was defeated in Pennsylvania; the majority was small, compared with that which rejected the peace candidate in Ohio. Between a War Democracy of that sort and the Radicalism of the Administrative war party, there is so little for choice to a friend of the South or to a real lover of the principles of constitutional liberty and the old theories of self-government in the American republic, that it is of small importance which wins in an election. In Ohio it is tolerably certain that a very large part of the two hundred thousand who voted for Vallandigham really desire peace without conditions; except that they would be glad to give liberal terms for a reconstruction of the Union. This is something, though not much, in the face of the vast majority, which declared for war to unconditional subjugation. In Pennsylvania, it is only decided, that the party which is for war, in the whole Administration sense, without conditions, phrase or reservation, is stronger than the party which is for war, with an if and a though.

The moral of these elections is, that there is no peace party at the North, and that there is no real constitutional party at the North. The passion for dominion and plunder has engrossed the thoughts of the great majority of both parties. They do anything, and submit to anything, and sacrifice everything, rather than consent to surrender their hold upon the territory, whose six or seven millions of inhabitants desire to be emancipated from their control and to govern themselves.

The New York elections will follow in November—a few days hence. There is no reason to expect a different result from that in Pennsylvania, and little cause for any friend of the South to desire it. The Democracy, as they call themselves, are for war and blood as stubbornly as Mr. Lincoln and his partisans are. Indeed, their organs watch the opposite faction keenly, to find some expressions which can be construed into a willingness to make peace on terms short of Southern independence, and denounce it as a disloyalty which no Democrat will countenance. On a canvass so conducted no friend of the South can look with any sympathy. It does not content him that either of the sides, both of which are its enemies, should succeed over the other. The bases on which these election contests are fought, and the modes in which the canvass is carried on, serve to confirm the deliberate judgment of the people of the South that there is no party here fit to be trusted as their friends under any circumstances, and that reunion, under the ascendancy of either or any of the parties would be unmitigated slavery and total destruction.

The next demonstration of Democratic devotion to the war on the South will be in the effort to get the 300,000 men which the President's new proclamation calls for.

The conscription ordered in July has failed to get over 35,000 or 40,000 men, when 300,000 were counted on. The Western States were, however, exempted from the operation of the draft for various reasons alleged; but the principal and real reason was undoubtedly partly a desire to avoid the reaction against the Administration if the law were sternly enforced where men have more independent ways and are less within the control of the military power than the helpless crowds who were placed within the range of Federal guns in the City of New York. Where the draft was enforced, the exemption boards discharged so many that the drafting produced few men and comparatively little money. The exemption fees, instead of $25,000,000 produced somewhere, as estimated, about $9,000,000.

Still the men must be had; and while the people go to the polls and vote clamorously that the war shall be prosecuted, very few consent to do the fighting themselves. When Mr. Lincoln ordered the late draft, the Democrats opposed and denounced it, and denied that it was made necessary, as the Administration claimed, by the unwillingness of the people to volunteer. They asserted that if they were permitted to appeal to the people, sufficient inducements would be found to obtain all the needed troops without compulsion. The Administration, in the new draft, apparently, but not really, abandoned its own plan and adopted theirs. It calls for the 300,000 volunteers, and appeals to the governors of the States to bring them out within two months. At the same time it gives notice that if the troops be not forthcoming before the 1st of January, the drafting will be resorted to, as before, to make up the deficiency. It is a very adroit political movement. It imposes on the opponents of the Government policy the task of carrying out their own policy at their own expense. If they fail—as they must fail, for a want of cordial aid by the Government would defeat the best-laid plans—the Administration will come in with its own substitute, and hold the conscription as a necessity, demonstrated by its adversaries to be unavoidable. The movement has thrown the War Democracy into great perplexity, and really it does greater credit to the party strategy of the Cabinet than their field operations do to their strategy in war.

The pro-Russian furor is settling down into a chronic mania, of which the most marked symptom is animosity towards England and France, for having done that which the Czar did not do—granting belligerent rights to the Southern Confederacy. The municipal banquet given by the corporate authorities yesterday to the Russian Admiral and his officers teemed with proofs of this. The adulation of Russia as the greatest and most magnanimous of modern nations, and of the Emperor of Russia as the most beneficent of monarchs, and the wisest of statesmen, was measured and balanced by angry denunciations and loud threats of the punishment which the united arms of Russia and America are to bring upon those two Powers of Western Europe, which have stood between Russia and Poland in Europe, and refused to pander to Northern lust for power in America against the struggles of the South for political independence. The British and French Ministers and officials were fortunately, or wisely, absent, when a banquet, given in the name of the city, was made the occasion for pouring out taunts and threats against their several nationalities; but it is not very creditable to the sense of propriety of the Russian officers, that they sat silently and listened complacently to such indecent philippics. From the position they hold, the public character in which they were entertained, and the official character of their hosts and many of the guests about them, the exhibition has greater significance than any mere popular manifestation of national prejudices could possibly have had.

The resentment against England has not been much mollified, in the highest official quarters, even by Earl Russell's Blairgowrie speech, in which he took so much pains to soothe the American restiveness under the operation of the British neutrality laws, and made haste to promise that to avoid difficulties with this country, he would propose to Parliament to assume statute obligations favourable to the North, which the law of nations and the existing law of England do not impose. The speech of Mr. Chase, the Cabinet Minister of the Treasury, made at Cincinnati on Monday of last week, just before the other election, shows in what spirit the master mind of the Administration and of the dominant party in this country receives this truckling of England to the powerful at the expense of the weak. It was Earl Russell's reasoning, that peace is the first interest of England. The Confederates, however wronged, could not make war; but the Northern Government is powerful at sea, and it might, even when it is in the wrong. Therefore, reasons Earl Russell, by his acts, special legislation should be interposed to remove every doubt and create new rights, in favour of the party which is strong enough to resent—and against its rivals; because being weak, the interests of peace will be preserved by making the oppression fall upon them. This is not my version, only, of Earl Russell's policy, as defined by himself; it is the interpretation by Mr. Chase of the motives by which the English Cabinet is directed; and he has no reserve in stating it broadly to the people of Ohio. The following passage is a key to his opinions of the ruling principle of action in England, towards the United States: "I hate, which would destroy this Government, if it could, and fear of its power as the only restraint upon its enmity. 'You know what has been done in England; you know that a great deal of sympathy has been manufactured for the South; but just in proportion as we advance, partly through the proclamation and partly through the success of our armies, the sympathy has become less and less available, and just in proportion as we carry this war on will they think less and less of interference with us. I am asked now and then what I think of intervention, and while I am here among my old friends in Ohio I can tell you what I think myself. It is this: if we are weak they will interfere; but when despotism sees we are strong it will sink away. (Cheers.) I think we have demonstrated some strength in the field. What nation before ever maintained such armies in the field and was so lavish of its strength? We are showing our strength to the nations of the earth; and I think if we simply go on thus showing our strength there is no danger of intervention. No danger, because it won't pay. (Cheers.) It is true that Great Britain has behaved a very unneighbourly part towards us. We used to think that this great Anglo-Saxon family was to stand together the world over on Anglo-Saxon principles; such as the freedom of the press, the freedom of the ballot, free thought, free speech, and freedom for all men. But of late years we have seen manifestations of an unkind and unfriendly spirit, and sometimes I have felt as if I should like to take old Mother England by the hair and give her a good shaking. (Great applause.) I am not sure that this would be the wisest plan; but of one thing I feel well assured—that England won't send any more piratical ships to prey upon our commerce. And of another thing I feel certain: that when England looks this matter over calmly, and considers that a certain ship, the Alabama, was fitted out in a British port, manned by British sailors, and armed by British guns, and has since been roving over the seas, plundering American vessels, without daring to bring a single prize into port, she will conclude upon the whole that it is best to pay American merchants for all the damage the Alabama has done." (Great cheers.)

These are not very courteous phrases for a Cabinet Minister here to throw back into the teeth of your Foreign Secretary, in reply to gentle expostulations about American unreasonableness and copious promises of more decided friendship hereafter. It is a very Western brusquerie to tell Earl Russell that his courtesy is begotten by his fears, and that England slinks away from the side of the South simply and only because she sees how capable the North is of punishing her interference. There is a good deal of Western stump-oratory in the gasconade about the freedom of the press, the freedom of the ballot, free speech, free thought, and freedom for all men, as the peculiar law of a republic which is engaged in stamping them all out for six or seven millions of men born free; but this was in Ohio, where an election was coming on, and the old cant phrases were still powerful to extort the applauses of the crowd. But it is worth noting, that this leading member of the Federal Administration thought it needed, in order to please the Ohio populace, to talk of the English people in the language of ribaldry, and more so, that he should give out there an intimation that it is part of the policy of the Government he belongs to not to be content with the coerced friendship of the British Cabinet in their dealings with the United States hereafter, but to look for and require indemnity for the past. Mr. Chase looks to Great Britain to pay for all the damages which the Confederate privateers have done to American commerce. Will Earl Russell, in order to keep on terms of peace with this dangerous Government, apply to Parliament for authority to settle and pay that little bill?

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, November 3.

I HAVE described to you the uncertainty which marks the present phase of French politics and the daily-varying conjectures which diplomatic mystery gives rise to. While other newspapers have ventured upon foreshadowing, each of course in its own sense, the gist of the Imperial speech, the Pays more boldly comes forward to deny altogether that there is any need of such ill-directed ingenuity. Only those who have not watched the Imperial career, or who have done so with little profit, can be so blind as to suppose that some great revelation may be looked for in the speech. The Emperor, as it says, does not confine his public speech to the annual meeting of the legislative bodies. He is always thinking for France, and always speaking, for his acts speak for themselves. It is satisfactory to know, on official or semi-official authority, that the popular ideas of the Emperor's systematic love of silent mystery are false, and that he who runs may read his intentions, but with the knowledge that before this is in print you will have the text of the speech, I shall not risk writing myself down an ass by anticipations on the subject.

The Empress's tour in Spain was not only a triumph, but, what triumphs rarely are, a most enjoyable holiday. A part of the time at least she was free of all the restraints of state, and returned to that private life which sovereigns are apt to long for. She even managed to come in for a little of the roughing, which is the real zest of a "play." At San Lucar, where she went for a single day's hunting, as the guest of the Duke of Ferdinand, being tempted to prolong the diversion, the whole party was put up in a hunting lodge of only seven rooms, sleeping accommodation being obtained only by a general contribution of mattresses and straw beds from the neighbourhood. Fortunately, in the absence of a change of linen, there was a laundress in the suite, thanks to whom her Majesty was not reduced to wearing the Isabella colours. The evenings were spent in front of the lodge, where a huge bonfire was kindled, in the light of which the dances of the south were performed to accompaniment of guitar and castanets. There is a geniality in the Empress's character, of which such little traits are specimens, which is most attractive to all who have the honour of approaching her.

Much speculation has been excited by a paragraph copied into the Moniteur of Saturday from the Daily News, to the effect that the building of ships for the Confederates had been forbidden in France. The expression used, namely, that the permission had been withdrawn, renders the story suspicious, as one can hardly suppose that the previous permission of Government would be asked. What is much more authentic, is the order given to the Captain of the Kearsage, in the port of Brest, to put out the fires, which he had kept alight for the purpose of giving the Florida chase whenever she should sail. The papers have of late contained only insignificant allusions to the American war, but the public in general is rapidly arriving at a just appreciation of the merits of the case. The ignorance which prevails here on the affairs of all foreign countries, the obloquy attaching to the word "slavery," while its real significance is unknown, had done much to warp French judgment. The gallantry of the Southern armies, and the sufferings which the civil war is occasioning among the manufacturing classes here, combine at length to change the general feeling. Any step taken in favour of the South would now be received with universal approbation. Some of the papers regard Marshal Forey's return by way of New York as symptomatic of another attempt to stop the present effusion of blood; but as the last was so ill-received, it is more likely that the Marshal, in calling at New York, has only taken the most convenient route home from Mexico. He has certainly not gone to enjoy the civic hospitalities.

Having little to boast of the feats of French diplomacy in these last weeks, the press has made itself merry with the defeats of Lord Russell. The Hudson correspondence was simply a scandal, as at present interpreted, which might arise with any minister who has Scotch brothers-in-law to provide for; but the telegraphic interception of the "prave words" which he had addressed to Russia, at first discredited and now so nearly proved that it is everywhere believed, have given a text for commentaries in every paper. Some of them see in the whole conduct of the question a studied attempt to urge France into a war with Russia, from which England would have kept aloof; while others, who do not give the English Secretary credit for the talent such a plot would have required, content themselves with pointing out how our country has sunk in European influence since her foreign policy has become so wavering that only the telegraph is rapid enough to register its changes.

It is this evening announced that, although the yellow-book will not be distributed until after the verification of the return as a résumé of its contents will be distributed the day after the opening. M. Foul's report is also to be held back till the discussion of the budget comes on, and the necessity for this is probably the reason that the other is delayed.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—November 3

1863. Dr. James Hunt, F.S.A., President, in the chair—five new members were elected. A paper was read by C. Carter Blake, Esq., F.G.S., on the "Anthropological Papers read at the British Association at Newcastle," and another by Prof. John Marshall, F.R.S., on the "Superficial Convulsions of a Microcephalic Brain," which had been already described before the society by R. S. Gore, Esq., of Bath. Mr. George E. Roberts, F.A.S.L., read a paper by himself; and Prof. Bask, F.R.S., on the "Opening of a Cist of the Stone Age on the Moray Frith," in which some remarkable human remains, obtained by the former gentleman, were described. The last paper of the evening was by Captain Eustace W. Jacob, on "The Indian Tribes of Vancouver's Island." The society adjourned till the 17th instant, when Dr. James Hunt will read a paper on "The Negro; his Place in Nature."

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 4.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

The warnings given of the uncertainty of speculation have at last been realised. The Bank directors suddenly placed the rate of discount at 5 per cent. on Monday, and the consequence has been a rapid fall in prices, with general tightness in the money and discount markets. Notwithstanding the large imports of American gold, and the fair supply of Australian, the financial position of France is so critical, and the efflux of coin to the East Indies and Egypt for the payment of cotton so extensive, that no balance has been left to increase the resources of the national establishment. In this state of things, with rates rising on the Continent, there was no other recourse, and while it has nipped unnecessary speculation in the bud, the variation will rectify the course of the exchanges. The fall in securities and new shares was to be expected from the late excess of gambling, and if it should be necessary for the Bank further to apply the "screw," the consequences may prove extremely disastrous. Five per cent. is the lowest charge now for first-class commercial paper; 4 months bills being 5½ to 3, and 6 months 5½ to 6. The French loan of £16,000,000, if introduced, would further affect the future prospects of the money market.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion movements at the Bank have, within the last few days, undergone a complete change. During the last week there has not been a fraction of gold sent in, whilst, on the other hand, there have been daily withdrawals for transmission to the Continent, the total, down to this evening, being £391,000.

The arrivals of specie this week have been large, amounting to £698,356, but of this only £94,740 is from New York, the remainder being from the West Indies, Port Phillip, and the Brazils. The India and China mail steamer Poonah takes out specie to the amount of £167,239, of which £148,060 in gold is for Alexandria and Suez, £600 in gold for Madras, and the residue of £1,620 in gold, and £16,959 in silver for China and the Straits. The silver market is very active; bar is in good demand, and the price has improved to 5s. 1½d.; the Mexican dollars brought by the last mail have been sold to-day at 5s. 3½d., being an advance of ½d. on previous sales. The only gold ship at present known to be on its way from Australia is the True Briton, with £138,000 in gold.

ENGLISH AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

A very steady business was transacted in the early part of the week in the English Funded Securities, but without any alteration in the prices which had prevailed for some days previous. But, on Monday, as soon as it became known that an advance had been made in the Bank rate, the dealings became more animated, but prices declined, and have continued to do so down to the termination of business this evening. The closing quotations of Consols were 92½ to 3, for money, and the same for the account, which, as compared with this day week, is a fall of ½ per cent. Exchequer Bills, from 1s. dis. to 2s. premium, have declined to 4s. dis. to par. There has been a brisk business transacted in Foreign Stocks, but chiefly in Greek and Mexican, though the variations had not been very great—Greek having oscillated between 31 and 28; and Mexican, between 42 and 39½. The latest official quotations were, Greek, 28 to 28½. Mexican, 39½ to 39½. Spanish Passives, 34 to 34½. Do. Certificates, 12½ to 12½. Turkish Six per Cents. (1854), 92 to 93. Do. do. (1862), 70½ to 71.

BIDDINGS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 40,000,000 rupees in bills on India, took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta 22,000,000 rupees, to Bombay 16,000,000 rupees, and to Madras 2,000,000 rupees. The minimum price declared was as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11½d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 283 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11½d. will receive about 90 per cent.; on Bombay at 2s. 0½d. about 28 per cent., and on Madras at 1s. 11½d. all.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The business transacted in American Government and Railway Securities has been on an exceedingly limited scale; in fact, there is scarcely anything whatever doing. Prices have nearly all a downward tendency. The dealings comprise Maryland Five per Cents, 76 and 75½; United States Five per Cents, 61; Atlantic and Great Western, New York section, 76½; Do. do. Pennsylvania ditto, 76, 75½, 76, 76½, and 76; Erie $100 shares, all paid, 67½; Do. Third Mortgage, 70; and Panama Railway, Second Mortgage, 104½.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Business in the English Railway Share Market has been particularly brisk, and in the early part of the week prices had considerably improved, but after the alteration in the Bank rate, with the decline in consols, railway securities immediately declined to a much greater extent than had been previously regained. As compared with this day week, there has been a decline of 1½ per cent. in South Eastern; of 1 per cent. in Bristol and Exeter, Edinburgh and Glasgow, Great Northern, London, and North Western, North British and North Staffordshire, and of ½ per cent. in Caledonian, Great Eastern, East Anglian, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Chatham and Dover, London and South Western, Sheffield, Metropolitan and Midland. On the other hand, there has been a rise of 1 per cent. in North Eastern (Berwick), and of ½ per cent. in do. (Leeds), and do. (York). In foreign railway shares, business has been more quiet, but the fall in prices has not been quite so great as in other descriptions. In the shares of British Possessions the dealings have been more numerous, and for the majority, fair prices have been obtained.

BANK MEETINGS.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the London, Buenos Ayres, and River Plata Bank, the resolutions passed by the directors on the 13th ultimo, in favour of increasing the capital from £500,000 to £1,000,000 sterling by the creation of 20,000 new shares of £25 each, to be offered at a premium of 30s. each to the holders of existing shares, were confirmed. The chairman stated that having carefully examined the accounts up to the 31st August, he had every reason to believe that a satisfactory dividend will be paid in due course. Increased capital was necessary on account of the extension of business. So far, he had not been able to trace a single bad debt.—At the first annual meeting of the London and Colonial Bank the report, which was of a satisfactory character, was adopted. It stated that the short time which had elapsed since the bank commenced business enabled the directors to look forward to a permanent and solid success.—At a meeting of the Standard Bank of British South Africa a resolution, passed by the proprietors at an extraordinary meeting on the 28th September, relative to the alteration in the articles of the association, was confirmed.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been very steady all the week, and only limited business doing. In spite of the heavy fall in most of the speculative stocks this maintains its value, and closed to-day, with a good tone, at 65 to 66.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting of the shareholders in the Great Central Gas Consumer's Company, Mr. Alderman Dakin in the chair, the report of the directors was adopted, and a dividend of 5 per cent. for the half-year, and 1 per cent. on account of arrears of dividends from 1857, declared.—At an adjourned general meeting of the proprietors of the Great Ship Company, on Tuesday, a rather lengthened report, with reference to the employment of the vessel on long voyages was read and adopted, and resolutions passed reducing the qualification for directors from 1,000 to 500 shares, and recommending that Mr. Hawes, Mr. Frowse, and Colonel Brownrigg should act as directors.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

Several very large and important Joint Stock undertakings have been brought forward this week. The first in point of magnitude is the English and Swedish Bank, which is introduced under the auspices of the London Financial Association. The object of the undertaking is to afford increased banking facilities in Sweden, where banking accommodation has not kept pace with the increase of trade. It is also intended to embark in the large financial transactions between Sweden and England. The capital is £2,000,000, in 40,000 shares of £50 each, but the first issue is to be limited to 20,000.—The National Steam Navigation Company, Limited, is another large undertaking, for which a capital of £2,000,000 is also required, in 20,000 shares of £100. This important project has been chiefly fostered through the circumstance of a long list of London mercantile firms of the highest standing having affixed their signatures to a paper affirming that "a great and urgent necessity exists for the establishment of a line of screw steamers between the two ports, in consequence of the large and increasing trade between New York and London, and vice versa," and promising to the undertaking their warmest support. According to the prospectus, the first object of the Company will be to place on the New York station a fleet of screw steamers from Liverpool and London, of large size and great capacity, which will be able to carry almost if not quite as cheap as sailing vessels, while at the same time, from the regularity of their passage, they will command a full share of the steam trade; and the directors also intend sending steamers to the American cotton ports when the war is brought to an end and the trade re-opened. They have also under consideration the wants of the Brazil and other trades.—The prospectus has been issued of the City and County Assurance Company, with a capital of £500,000, in 25,000 shares of £20 each. The chief objects of the Company are to meet an increasing necessity for fire-insurance companies, to be conducted under a less arbitrary system of business than that adopted by most of those at present established, and to transact life assurance business upon the most improved principles, consistent with sound and profitable.—The Merchant Banking Company of London, Limited, is another of the levithian undertakings which is seeking a capital of £2,000,000 sterling, 20,000 shares of £100 each, but the first issue will be limited to 10,000 shares. The class of business proposed to be carried on, is briefly described as that of "merchant bankers," a business which has long been conducted with success by many mercantile firms. The Company, it is explained, "will grant negotiable or other credits, by and upon their foreign agents, to importers of produce in this country, on the continent of Europe, and in America." They will also make advances on the manufactures of this country under documentary bills or consigned to their agents abroad, for such periods as may be necessary to realise the sale of such goods. Deposits at interest will be received by the Company in London, and employed through their agents abroad, the intention being at the same time to avoid costly foreign establishments.—The Australian Mortgage, Land and Finance Company, Limited, is introduced under most influential auspices, and will rank amongst the best of the mortgage, land and finance undertakings, in consequence of the experience, which will be brought to bear in connection with its management. It is explained that the object of this Company is to afford a safe medium for the investment of capital on mortgage in the Australian colonies, including New Zealand. It is proposed, in fact, to carry out in that extensive field the Crédit Foncier principle, already so successfully developed in many parts of Europe. Capital is to be borrowed in England by the issue of debentures, and employed at higher rates in the colonies. The Company will also act as agents for negotiating government, municipal, or other loans, in the colonies, for the collection of debts and the management of estates. The capital is £1,000,000, in 20,000 shares of £50 each. But the first issue will be for £500,000 only.—The London and Caledonian Marine Insurance Company, Limited, seeks a capital of £500,000, (with power to increase to £1,000,000) in 20,000 shares of £25 each, the deposit being £1 per share on application, and £2 on allotment. The Company, it is said, is formed to supply the want of a new Marine Insurance Company for Scotland, where a number of the first firms have already promised their support to the undertaking. It is intended that the head office shall be in London, with offices at Glasgow, Greenock, Dundee, and other Scotch towns, as well as at Manchester, where also support has been secured.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In American produce, transactions since our last have been upon a diminished scale, owing principally to the increased caution usually observed, under the circumstance of an advance in discounts. The markets, nevertheless, maintain a healthy position, and prices almost without exception continue to be well upheld. The most perceptible change has, perhaps, been in cotton, but even here the reaction has scarcely exceeded ½ per lb. The grain trade is still inactive. In what is passing, however, late rates are paid. The provision market is, at the moment, rather unsettled. American cheese sells readily at 98s. to 100s. for fine, whilst bacon is difficult to move off at 2s. per cwt. decline. In lard the variations have not been important; but purchases are confined to the mere provision for immediate requirements. For petroleum the market has again proved very uneven. Shortly after our last issue, the demand increased, and at 2s. 1d. per gallon for refined Pennsylvania a good deal was done. Subsequently the tone became heavy, and 1s. 11d. and 2s. must now be quoted for all this year's delivery. The clearances of this article continue very satisfactory, and present low prices evidently are stimulating consumption very materially. Crude has not been largely dealt in, and may be purchased upon easier terms. The depression in turpentine is unrelieved, a further reduction of 2s. cwt. per having taken place. French new oils at 68s. to 69s. 6d., and American is nominally quoted 85s. per cwt. Rosin keeps very firm, American more especially so. In the oil trade but little change has occurred. Linsed is a point lower, whilst sperm is nearly stationary. Oil-cake sells steadily. Tallow, since the advance in the Bank rate, has been rather pressed for sale, recent heavy arrivals having helped the movement. Another 6d. per cwt. must consequently be taken off our reduced quotation of the previous week. Neither dearer money nor the pause in the cotton market has had effect upon jute, in which the dealings have greatly extended, whilst prices have further risen fully 30s. per ton for the better qualities, which now range up to £33 15s. Russian hemp maintains a firm position, but is inactive, whilst Manila is 20s. to 30s. per ton dearer; good roving £31 per ton. The sugar speculation has made further progress, quotations being again 1s. per cwt. higher, although business is quiet at the close. The late advance in cochineal is well supported. Manufactured iron is active, and Scotch pig maintains its previous value. In drugs and drysaltery articles a steady business is passing, without quotable change in prices.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Nov. 4.

The Cotton Market in the early part of the week was exceedingly buoyant, the demand both by the trade and by speculators was very active, and the market was further stimulated by improved advices from the East Indies, and prices advanced from ¼d. to ¾d. per lb.; but subsequently holders have shown less firmness, and the advances have not been maintained, and to-day there has been an additional decline of about ¼d. to 1d. per lb. The sales this week have been 35,000 bales, of which 15,500 bales have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 2,273,470 bales; to the same period last year, 2,355,690 bales. Imported this year, 1,318,614 bales; to the same period in 1862, 1,032,890 bales. Exported this year, 398,164 bales; to the same period last year, 371,487 bales. Present computed stocks, 163,550; at the same time last year, 313,090 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 1,146,300 bales; same period in 1862, 987,200. Taken on speculation this year, 631,400 bales; to the same period last year, 943,870 bales. The latest official quotations are Middling Orleans, 29d. Mobile, 28½d. to 29d. Upland, 29d. Estimated fine Egyptian, 29½d. Surat, 17½d. to 28d.

MANCHESTER, November, 3.

From the date of our last report up to Saturday last, our market maintained a firm position, and a good steady business was done from day to day, both in yarn and cloth, at extreme rates.

On Monday, the directors of the Bank of England, having unexpectedly advanced the rate of discount from 4 to 5 per cent., caused merchants to pause from placing further contracts at present, and to await the further development of affairs weighing on the money market just now.

Some few of our merchants are under the impression that we shall see a further advance this week of one per cent. in the rate of discount, and that the result of this will be a great shock to the speculative excitement which has prevailed in our Liverpool cotton market for some time past, and consequently, a rapid decline in the value of the raw material.

To-day, Tuesday, our market has been very flat, very little business having been transacted. Home trade yarns have suffered a decline of fully ¼d. per lb., and other kinds, although not so depressed, are almost as much neglected.

Manufacturers being well under contract for some time to come, will not feel this depression, even if it should continue, until a little before the time arrives for the execution of their orders now in hand.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country. Strange and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been slandered, abused, and libelled beyond any civilised people on earth, insult added to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality, shielded and encouraged by the cry of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality!" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been any understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe it, —and think, on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a large degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an inefficient blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over from this country, both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater sacrifice, her commercial interests to a fear of War with the North. The so-called "neutrality" practised against the South has been their greatest hardship, and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. How strange and inexplicable has been our conduct towards the combatants!—the Confederate States having declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most friendly relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South is conquered, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence: nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North should blot out the South or not, or whether the South ought to have her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the freemen of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country enable men to be free, then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of concert of action among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire.

Offices open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., at 7, St. Mildred's-court, Poultry, E.C. Meetings every Wednesday at one o'clock, p.m., at the above place.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COURTIS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

At the Annual Meeting of the Proprietors, held at Liverpool, on the 21st October, 1863, BERNARD HALL, Esq., Chairman of the Company, in the chair, the Director's Report for the year stated:—That the Fire Premiums for the year amounted to £70,300 being an increase over the preceding year of 22,830. That the Life Premium Receipts for the first three years were 15,219 and for the last three years 49,557 being an increase in the latter triennial period over the former of 28,308. That the amount accumulated since last Meeting, as a Fire Reserve Fund, was 23,427 and the amount added to Life Fund was 13,743. That during the past five years the Company had paid for Claims 106,515. The Actuary reported that the Life Liabilities had been valued on the soundest principles, viz.: Net Premiums, at 3 per cent. interest, and that the Bonus to participating Policy-holders averaged as much as 46 per cent. per annum of the Premiums paid, while, in some instances, it was as high as 65, 70, and even 71 per cent. A dividend was declared to proprietors at the rate of eight per cent. per annum. J. MONCHEIFF WILSON, Manager & Actuary. JOHN E. LEYLAND, Secretary.

AMERICA.

THE war intelligence of the week reminds us of the Irishman's stone soup, which was nothing without the water, and the meat, the vegetables, and the condiments. Take away from the New York telegrams all the surmises and contradictions, and all that was known before, and all that is known to be false, and of war news there remains almost nil. The reported success of Hooker at Chattanooga, even if true, does not amount to much. The Federal army is still shut up and suffering from short supplies; the troops being on half rations, and the horses dying of hunger. In Virginia, nothing is reported since the advance of the Confederates on the 24th Oct., when the Federal cavalry was beaten with heavy loss and driven back on Bealton, and from Bealton to Liberty. Gilmore has thrown a few more Greek-fire shells into Charleston, and bombarded Fort Sumter without effect. General Bragg officially reports that on the 20th October his cavalry defeated the Federal cavalry at Philadelphia, Tennessee, capturing 700 prisoners, fifty waggons, ten ambulances, six pieces of artillery, and a large number of horses and mules. It is asserted by the Federals that on the 25th they recaptured the waggons. General Banks has returned to New Orleans. Such is the sum total of the war intelligence we have to record, except one item, which we will give in the words of the telegram, lest we should fail to do justice to it:—"Deserters from the Confederate camp bring reports of a fight between a brigade of Tennesseans and the main force of Bragg's troops. It seems that the Tennesseans wished to desert to the Federals, and had to be prevented by main force. These reports are, to say the least, greatly exaggerated, and it is doubtful whether they have any foundation whatever." According to the Federals the Confederate soldiers are few in number, unclad, half-starving, beaten on every field, and now, we are told, are in open mutiny. What a wonderful thing it is that under such circumstances the magnificent Northern armies have not long ago annihilated their enemy!

We elsewhere publish an address of President Davis to the Army of Tennessee. We learn from it that the Northern assertions of the immense superiority of General Bragg's army, said to be obtained at the cost of depleting all the other armies in the Confederacy, are the reverse of the truth. President Davis says, "When your countrymen shall more fully learn the adverse circumstances under which you attacked the enemy, though they cannot be more thankful, they may admire more the gallantry and patriotic devotion which secured your success." In the hour of defeat, President Lincoln and his subordinates told the Northern people that their task was nearly completed; in the hour of triumph, President Davis tells the Southern soldiers that "very much remains to be done."

In a recent report Mr. Memminger observes that the precious metals have become in the Confederate States, owing to the blockade, simply articles of merchandise, and that the price of gold in relation to the currency is merely nominal. The North has all along had the means of selling its produce to foreign nations, and so the price of gold—that is, the currency price—has been comparatively moderate. When the Southern ports are open and Southern produce can be sent to European markets, it is evident that the price of gold in the South will quickly fall, not to par, but to a premium that is equivalent to the then inflation of the currency. Of the truth of Mr. Memminger's assertion that the precious metals are now merely articles of merchandise, of which the price is enhanced by the supply being cut off by the blockade, we have a proof in the fact that in Richmond gold is 25 per cent. dearer than silver. That is, gold is quoted at $11 50 cents., and silver at $9 50 cents.

A very important judgment has been delivered in the New York Supreme Court in reference to the Indemnity Bill passed in the last Session of the Federal Congress. The Honourable G. W. Jones, of Iowa, on his return from Bogota, where he occupied the position of United States Minister, was arrested at Washington and confined in Fort Lafayette, by order of Mr. Seward. Mr. Jones brought an action for false imprisonment against the Federal Secretary, and the latter moved for the transfer of the case from the State Court to the United States Courts. Mr. Seward based his application on the 5th Section of the Indemnity Bill, which provides that if any suit has been or shall be commenced against any officer, civil or military, or any other person, for any arrest, imprisonment, trespass or wrong done, or any act omitted to be done, during the present contest, "by virtue or under colour of any authority derived from or exercised by or under the President of the United States or any act of Congress," the defendant may remove such action into the Circuit Court of the United States for the district where the suit is brought, on complying with certain requirements stated in the Act. Justice Clerke, before whom the motion was argued, delivered a judgment that must seem inexplicable to those who look upon the Federal Congress as a National Parliament, who think with Lord Palmerston that the late United States is "a nation split in two," and who forget that the Federal Government, Congress included as the creature of the States, is bound to observe the laws of the Powers that founded it, and that only those Federal acts are lawful and command obedience, which are in accordance with the Constitution, and which do not exceed the specific jurisdictions conferred by that Constitution. Justice Clerke did not inquire whether the 5th section of the Indemnity Bill was applicable to the case before him; he did not inquire whether the suit met the requirements of the Act; but the issue that he felt first called upon to decide was, whether the Act itself was valid, whether the Constitution of the United States had granted the Federal Government any such power as that claimed by Mr. Seward. If not, the Federal Government could not assume it. It is well to bear in mind a truism that Justice Clerke did not think it necessary to repeat. The Constitution of the United States distinctly prescribes the functions of the several parts of the Federal Government. The President does not create the Congress or the Congress the President, and neither can augment the authority of the other. Congress cannot make the President a dictator, any more than the President can give up a portion of his authority and make the Speaker of the House of Representatives the commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States. In a word, Congress cannot give to the President powers that are not at its disposal. The point to be decided, then, is, whether, under the Constitution of the United States, the President can assume or be invested with dictatorial authority, such as that claimed by Mr. Seward, or as Justice Clerke puts it, "has the Constitution of the United States invested its chief executive officer with power to arrest or imprison, or to authorise another to arrest or imprison, any person not subject to military law, at any time, or under any exigency, without some order, writ or precept, of some civil Court of competent jurisdiction?" In set terms it has not done so. Has it done so indirectly? Justice Clerke declares that the Constitution is totally opposed to such a theory. After being "anxiously and deliberately considered and thoroughly discussed by the people at large and by their delegates in the Convention," a Constitution was adopted, "conferring extremely limited powers, concisely and minutely defined," and "any man proposing to confer unlimited power, on any pretext whatever, would have been deemed insane." The object of the Constitution was to establish a limited and delegated Government and not a despotic Government. Justice Clerke aptly remarks that the fathers of the Union were exceedingly jealous of personal liberty, for they knew its importance, and the long struggle that it had cost Englishmen to achieve it. There is nothing in the Constitution that, either directly or by implication, gives the President dictatorial power. And, indeed, it is but fair to say that no one whose opinion is worth noticing, has attempted to justify the arbitrary conduct of Mr. Lincoln on any other plea than that of military necessity, and that plea Justice Clerke thoroughly refutes. No doubt, as commander-in-chief, the President of the United States can lawfully arrest men without the intervention of a civil tribunal. Yes, but then, according to the usages and laws of all nations, and according to the plainest behests of common sense, the area of the despotic power of the commander-in-chief is limited, strictly limited. He is, so far, in the position of a general in charge of an expedition. His fiat can only suspend the civil rights of those who are within his lines. Justice Clerke illustrates this by a reference to the recent operations in Tennessee. He says, if General Rosecrans "discovered any plots to mar those operations, or to give intelligence to the enemy, or to afford them any kind of aid or comfort, he would have a right to try the offenders, whether civilians or soldiers, by a court-martial. But this power does not extend beyond his lines. If a man at Cincinnati has a correspondence with Bragg, giving him intelligence of the plans of Rosecrans, the latter cannot have the offender arrested at Cincinnati, brought within his lines, and tried by court-martial. This man is, indeed, emphatically a traitor; he is guilty of high treason against the United States of America; but he is to be tried by a civil tribunal, according to the course and practice of the established law, on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury. His case has not arisen in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger. (See 5th amendment of the Constitution.)" The reply made to this is, that the commander-in-chief can by virtue of his office proclaim martial law throughout the country and so, by a ruse, everywhere usurp the authority of the civil tribunals. Justice Clerke might have shown that such an assumption is utterly incompatible with the whole theory of the Federal Government; but instead of so doing, he pointed out the absurdities of the argument. He says, if the President possessed such power "a whisky insurrection in western Pennsylvan would authorise him to abrogate the law of liberty in Massachusetts or any other State." There never would be wanting a pretext for suspending the operation of the laws, and personal liberty would at all times be at the mercy of the Executive. Moreover, as it is claimed that the arbitrary power belongs to Mr. Lincoln, not because he is President but because he is commander-in-chief, it follows that as commander-in-chief he has no more power by reason of his Presidential office. Justice Clerke on this suggests a very pertinent question. "Suppose," he says, "the Constitution vested the command in chief of the army and navy in some person other than the President: could this functionary subvert the Constitution and laws of the land on the plea of military necessity? Surely not, and if he could not do it, neither can the President, unless the Constitution has empowered him to do it in his civil capacity." Justice Clerke, in conclusion, says, "The President, therefore, whether in his civil capacity or as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, has, unquestionably, no power to authorise the act of which the plaintiff complains. The ground upon which this application is made has no colour of right. It cannot, in my opinion, be entertained as a question in any State or United States Court. The only questions in this action worthy of consideration, and which can be entertained, do not arise under the Constitution of the United States, but are fitly within the jurisdiction of this Court," and therefore, he rejected Mr. Seward's application, and so impugned the validity of the Indemnity Bill. From this decision Mr. Lincoln and his subordinates will learn that it is in vain for those who violate the law to seek for the protection of law in their illegal proceedings; and that the power acquired by the sword can only be upheld by the sword. The practical effect of the lesson will be to make them cling to power with increased tenacity, because, in their continuance therein lies their only hope of personal safety.

Lieutenant Glassel, the gallant leader of the attack on the Ironsides off Charleston, was, as we stated last week, picked up by the Federals. Instead of being treated with the respect due to his rank, and as a prisoner of war taken in action, he was heavily ironed, and in that way led to the marshal's office, where he was subjected to an insolent examination. He refused to answer any questions, and said, "I am William T. Glassel, Confederate States Navy. I was born in Virginia. I decline answering any more questions. I was captured by the naval forces off Charleston, and they know all about me at Washington." Still being ironed, he was, after the examination, sent to Fort Lafayette to await the instructions of the Government concerning his final disposition. Such is the way the Federal authorities treat a brave enemy.

There was a "Union demonstration" at the Cooper Institute, New York, on the 23rd of October. The first speaker was Senator Lane, and, as usual, he was very ferocious and very blasphemous. He said, "This God-accursed rebellion has no cause. . . . He would negotiate on the bloody battle-field. His message of mercy should be sent at the cannon's mouth and on the point of the sabre and the bayonet." He approved of the Emancipation proclamation, and said it gave the "rebels" warning "to flee from the wrath to come;" meaning, that if the amnesty of Mr. Lincoln had been accepted, the Southerners might have kept their slaves. How grateful the pious emancipationists ought to feel to the Southerners that they refused to keep slavery in the Union on the terms proposed! Senator Lane, excited by the cheers of his audience, attained to a pitch of frenzy that even Parson Brownlow might have envied. He protested against the term of "our Southern brethren," and declared that "no rebels were brethren of his. He had but one brother, whom he loved as himself; and if that brother were a rebel against the Government he would, as God was his judge, take him in his arms, as Abraham did Isaac, and offer him on the altar of his country." He added, that the Southerners "had to-night but two rights—a divine and a legal right: a legal right to be hanged as traitors upon earth, and a divine right to be damned as traitors hereafter." This sentiment was received by the meeting with applause; and was soon followed by the remark, that "he had no doubt of the suppression of the rebellion. To doubt it would make him an infidel—would make him doubt the justice and omnipotence of God in heaven." So far as he was personally concerned, Senator Lane said "he would sell the garment off his shoulders and be buried as a pauper at the public expense, before he would see the rebellion triumph over his country." It did not occur to this human bloodhound, to this "War Christian," that whenever the hungry spoilers of their country are ruined, the country itself will be bankrupt and not have the means of paying for his funeral.

Senator Lane was followed by the Hon. Lyman Tremaine, who made a long attack upon the Democratic party in general, and on Governor Seymour in particular. Mr. Tremaine wound up by saying, "I believe this wicked rebellion will be overthrown. When that grand result is accomplished, let the welkin ring with loud huzzas, and once more may heaven's vast space re-echo with Hosannas to the Highest." A few days later a meeting was held at the same place, on which occasion Governor Yates, of Illinois, told one of Mr. Lincoln's profane jokes. Governor Yates said he had telegraphed to "Old Abe" to issue the Conscription Act and Emancipation Proclamation, and Mr. Lincoln telegraphed back to him, "Dick, wait and see the salvation of God."

For want of more important matter, the telegraph wires have lately reported the sayings of some Richmond editors, who, assuming the alleged proprietorship of the Mersey rams as a fact, forthwith conclude that Great Britain has allied herself with Mr. Lincoln against the South. Though there is probably as little foundation for the assumption as there certainly is for the precipitate deduction, our Richmond contemporaries are so far excusable that Earl Russell's action in regard to these ships, by whomsoever owned, was avowedly taken at the instigation of the Federal Government; and, moreover, was made most unnecessarily to assume all the characteristics of a military demonstration.

In his reply to the Missouri Committee, Mr. Lincoln refuses to remove General Schofield and draws a rather graphic picture of "unity" in the North. Putting aside all those who are against the reconstruction of the Union, he says there are "at least four sides, even among those who are for the Union. Thus, those who are for the Union with but not without slavery—those for it without but not with—those for it with or without, but prefer it with—and those for it with or without, but prefer it without. Among these again is a subdivision of those who are for gradual, but not for immediate, and those who are for immediate, but not for gradual extinction of slavery." To this Mr. Lincoln might have added that on other questions besides slavery there is a like difference of opinion. Thus, those who are for the Union with but not without a Constitution—those who are for it without but not with—those who are for it with or without, but prefer with (War Democrats)—and those who are for it with or without, but prefer without (the Republicans). Some wish the Southern people to be exterminated, and others will be contented if they are only decimated. The Republicans wish to get hold of all the property of the South, and the Democrats wish to have their share. Can Mr. Lincoln point out a question on which his subjects agree?

General Rosecrans has delivered a speech at Cincinnati, which is a strange commentary on his removal. He told his audience not to forget their duty to the Government, whatever might happen to individuals, and that "the question as to how he had been used, he desired to leave for future time to answer." Having said this, he forthwith proceeded to deny there was a shadow of excuse for his removal from command. About his reported ill-health, he observed, "The army of the Cumberland thinks I am well enough, and so do I." He treated the report about his taking opium with disdainful sarcasm: "As for the quantity of opium I have eaten, consult my druggist." So far from Generals Crittenden and McCook intending to make charges against him, he said they had assured him "that they regretted that such false reports should be started." Finally, he announced that "since the battle of Chickamauga he had received a letter of approval from the President for his action in that affair." Perhaps there were political reasons for the dismissal of General Rosecrans.

New York is to contribute 60,378 men toward the call of the 17th October, and to make up a deficiency of 46,657 men under the August draft, together making the number of soldiers to be furnished by that State before the 5th of January 107,035. We expect Mr. Lincoln's enrollment officers will require the aid of many regiments to get that number, or even half of it.

The World complains of the injustice of this demand. If the draft failed in New York, it also failed in other States, and yet New York is called upon to make up her total deficiency, and it seems that no credit is given to the State for commutations that were paid. The World also remarks, in reference to the quota of 60,378, that "it is plain the quota assigned to New York is excessive when we state that the apportionment to the city districts is precisely the same as in the original quotas for the draft last summer, which were so glaringly absurd that President Lincoln reduced them by one-half."

The Federal Provost-Marshal, General Fry, has, under date of October 10th, reported to Secretary Stanton, on "certain general facts connected with the draft." He states that of those drawn, eighty per cent. reported themselves; of those examined, thirty per cent. were exempted from physical disability, and thirty per cent. for other reasons. This left forty per cent. of the examined held to service. Of these one-half paid commutation, and of the remaining half, one-third have gone to camp in person, and two-thirds have found substitutes. That is to say, for every 100 men conscripted, Mr. Lincoln has obtained sixteen soldiers, but of these rather more than ten were substitutes, so that rather less than six per cent. of the conscripted men have gone into the army. Thus does Provost-Marshal Fry testify to the utter failure of the draft. He does not give any returns of the number of substitutes that have deserted.

A beautiful instance of Republican loyalty has come to light. It appears from the returns of the recent elections in Ohio, that Highland county alone gave to Mr. Brough, the Republican candidate, a majority of 502 votes more than its whole population. What chance had Mr. Vallandigham against such zeal?

The New York Herald, commenting on the removal of Rosecrans and other generals from their commands, warns the Federal Government "to look well to its own record in these matters, or we shall learn some day before a great while that the people have 'relieved' the Administration, and have found a new commander-in-chief for the armies and navies of the United States."

On the 30th of October money was tight in New York. Gold was quoted at 45½ per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

HER MAJESTY the Queen of England received on Monday morning, November 9th, an autograph letter from His Majesty the Emperor of the French, containing a request to the Queen to send representatives to a Congress of the chief European States, with the object of recognising the points in which the treaty of Vienna has been infringed, and adopting such measures with respect to present complications as may best secure the general peace. Her Majesty's ministers met in Cabinet on the two following days to consider of the answer to be returned by Her Majesty to the Emperor of the French. We elsewhere publish the Imperial letter.

The Very Rev. Richard Chenevix Trench, D.D., Dean of Westminster, has been nominated to the Archbishopric of Dublin, vacant by the death of the late Dr. Whately. Dr. Trench is the second son of the late Mr. Richard Trench, a brother of the first Lord Ashtown, in the Irish peerage, and his family has its original seat in the city of Galway. Dr. Trench was educated at Trinity College, was ordained in 1832, and placed in the curacy of Alverstoke by the then vicar, Samuel Wilberforce, now Bishop of Oxford. In 1845, Lord Ashburton presented Dr. Trench to the vicarage of Ithen-Stoke; two years later the vicar of Ithen-Stoke became professor of theology in King's College, London, and in 1856 was appointed Dean of Westminster by Lord Palmerston. Dr. Trench is known as the author of two volumes of poems entitled Sabbatien, Honor Neale, and the Story of Justin Martyr, and also as the author of many works of merit on theology and general literature, among the former of which his treatises on our Lord's parables and miracles may be specially mentioned. Dr. Trench has not shown himself a party man in religion or in politics, nor do his works betray any leaning to either extreme in the doctrines embraced by the Church of England. His appointment to the Primacy of Ireland has given general satisfaction.

The Rev. Dr. Stanley succeeds Dr. Trench as Dean of Westminster. Dr. Stanley is a son of the late Dr. Stanley, sometime Bishop of Norwich, was educated at Rugby School under Dr. Arnold, and graduated in the University of Oxford, in 1837, as a first-class-man in classics. He became fellow and tutor of University College, and was Secretary of the Oxford University Commission. In 1851 he was nominated by Lord John Russell to a canonry in Canterbury Cathedral, and in 1858 he was made Regius Professor of Ecclesiastical History at Oxford, and Canon of Christ Church. Dr. Stanley is known as the author of an admirable life of Dr. Arnold, of the famous work "On Sinai and Palestine," and of many theological efforts. Dr. Stanley accompanied H. R. H. the Prince of Wales in his tour in the East, and also has up to the present time discharged the duties of examining chaplain to the Lord Bishop of London.

On Monday, November 9th, Alderman Lawrence was installed Lord Mayor of London with accustomed rites and with ancient splendour. The civic dignitaries assembled at Guildhall, and the cavalcade started thence at noon by way of Gresham-street, Moorgate-street, King William-street, Cannon-street, St. Paul's, Fleet-street, and the Strand, to Westminster. The Lord Mayor elect was escorted by the late Lord Mayor (Mr. Alderman Rose), by the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, and the principal officers of the corporation. The 12th Lancers formed a military escort, and the bands of the Grenadier and 1st Life Guards, with the City Artillery Company, the 3rd Tower Hamlets Volunteer brigade, and the Irish Rifle Volunteers, assisted to constitute the cortege. On arriving at Westminster Hall the civic dignitaries entered the Court of Exchequer into the presence of the Lord Chief Baron Pollock and the Puisne Barons. Thereupon the Common Sergeant, in the absence of the learned Recorder, presented the new Lord Mayor, and signified that the choice of the Livery had, through the Lord High Chancellor, received the gracious sanction of Her Majesty. The Common Sergeant then told how the Lord Mayor's father had laid the foundation of his fortune in the work of rebuilding and adorning important portions of the City; how he had served in the Court of Aldermen, and in the office of Sheriff; and how death alone had prevented him from attaining the civic chair. Then he told how his two sons became aldermen within five years from the father's death, and how the present Lord Mayor had been sheriff at the time of the marriage of the Princess Royal of England with the Crown Prince of Prussia. Then the Common Sergeant spoke of the late Lord Mayor, of his splendid hospitality, of the magnificent reception by him and the City of London of the Prince of Wales and his bride, and of the reward for the patriotic conduct of the Lord Mayor not consisting, as was universally expected, in honours bestowed by the Crown, but in the approval of his own conscience and the applause of his fellow citizens. The Lord Chief Baron then made reply, in which the state of the country, the loss of the cotton trade, the endurance of the people and the generosity of the wealthy were dwelt on, and the question raised whether philanthropists and philosophers would always believe that it is right that the act of a belligerent should injure those with whom he is at peace more than his foe. The Chief Baron then praised the loyalty of the City of London and its constant vindication of the liberties of the people; and thereupon the Queen's Remembrancer administered the oath to the Lord Mayor, and the Lord Mayor invited the learned Barons to the banquet at Guildhall. Then the civic authorities returned, accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, by way of Ludgate-hill and Cheapside to the Guildhall.

In the evening of the same day the accustomed banquet was held in the Guildhall, to which ministers of State, judges, members of both Houses of Parliament, envoys and ambassadors, to the number of 800, had been invited. The hall, the vestibule, corridors, lobbies, and court-room were gorgeously decorated; coats of arms, trophies of Prince of Wales' plume in spun glass, heraldic bearings of the guilds, banners and antique armour in the great hall, contrasting with paintings, sculpture, exotic plants, and ferns in the lobbies, and with a lovely panoramic view of Chamoyni by moonlight, in the court-room. Lord and Lady Palmerston arrived at seven o'clock, and were received with enthusiastic applause; and immediately afterwards the company sat down to dinner. After dinner, and after the loving cup had been passed, the healths of the Sovereign, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and the Royal Family were given in due order. Then the Lord Mayor gave "The Navy, the Army, and the Volunteers," to which toast the Duke of Somerset and Earl de Grey and Ripon responded. His Excellency, Mahmoud Khan, returned thanks in Persian for the Corps Diplomatique. Lord Palmerston spoke on behalf of Her Majesty's Ministers, Earl Granville for the House of Lords, and Mr. Cardwell for the Commons. The speech of Lord Palmerston contained nothing new or worthy of note. The Premier spoke of the lamentable struggles in the East and the West, of the failure of all remonstrances against the conduct of Russia, and of the neutral attitude of the Government in respect of the war in America. He also referred with pride to the commercial and material prosperity of England at the present time.

Monday, November 9th, was also the anniversary of the birth of the Prince of Wales, in celebration of which the royal town of Windsor was decorated with banners, the bells of St. George's Chapel were rung, and salutes were fired; also, at King's Lynn guns were fired, banners waved, and at night there was a general illumination. In the metropolis there were illuminations at the shops of the royal tradesmen, who, to the number of 150, dined together at St. James's Hall, His Royal Highness contributing a present of venison for the entertainment. The Inner Temple was illuminated, and the benchers, barristers, and students of the society dined together in the hall. After the dinner, Mr. Ingram, M.P., the Treasurer of the society, proposed "the Health of the Prince of Wales" in highly complimentary terms. At Sandringham, the country seat of the Prince of Wales, the children belonging to the schools of the three villages over which the estate extends were entertained at dinner, as were also the cottagers and work-people. The Prince and Princess of Wales and the Princess Royal were present at the children's dinner.

A cabman, named Parker, on Saturday evening last, was hailed at the Great Eastern Railway Station, at Shoreditch, by a respectably dressed man, who got into the cab with a woman about thirty-five years of age, and two little girls of the ages of seven and four respectively. The cabman first drove to the Green Dragon, Bishops-gate Street, where, at the orders of the man in the cab, the driver dismounted and purchased a pint of half-and-half, which he handed to the man. The cabman, being at his horse's head, did not see who drank the liquor. The man having emptied the remnants of the half-and-half on the pavement, gave the pewter pot back to the driver, who took the same into the inn. The driver then drove through Cornhill to Furnival's-inn, Holborn, where the man got out of the cab, shut the door, paid the driver his fare, with sixpence over, and bade him drive to the Royal Oak, Westbourne-grove. The driver did so, and having arrived there dismounted, and opening the door of his cab discovered the woman lying on her face at the bottom of the cab, with the elder child in her arms. A doctor came up at the time and pronounced the woman and the two children to be quite dead. All three smelt very strongly of prussic acid. The bodies were taken to St. Mary's Hospital, where a post-mortem examination was held, and the stomachs removed and sealed up for analysis. At present there is every reason to suppose that the death of the three persons was caused by prussic acid. The driver of the vehicle and the landlord of the Green Dragon inn both expressed their ability to identify the hirer of the cab. The distance from the Green Dragon to Furnival's-inn is rather more than a mile, and from Furnival's-inn to the Royal Oak more than four miles. For two days after the death of the woman and children no trace was discovered of the murderer, but the suspicions of a neighbour being excited by the description which appeared of the murdered persons, information was given to the police, and the murderer was arrested in his own house, in Camberwell, on Monday evening. However, while the police were breaking open the barred door the man found time to take poison, from the effects of which he died an hour after his apprehension. The murderer was employed as traveller for a firm of "seedsman, herbalists, and druggists," and had a small laboratory fitted up in his own house. He appears to have lived unhappily with his wife, and had often threatened to "do" for her. He had been at his regular employment all day on the Monday, and towards the evening was in high spirits. His body has been identified by the cabman Parker, and by another cabman who had driven him from Camberwell to Shoreditch.

The steam-rams El Tousson and El Monassir have been valued, in accordance with instructions from Government. The valuers were Mr. C. W. Kellock (Curry, Kellock, and Co., of Liverpool), Mr. Jordan, surveyor to the Liverpool underwriters, and Messrs. Luke and Hobbs, of the Admiralty. El Tousson was valued at £106,000, and El Monassir at £80,000. The builders' measurement of each vessel is 1,800 tons. Messrs. Laird refused to disclose the contract price. It is said that the Government wish to purchase the vessels from the French owners, Messrs. Brevey.

The Alexandra case has advanced one stage in its journey of litigation. The seizure of this ship in May last, in the yard of Messrs. Miller, at Liverpool, was, as may be remembered, followed by a trial on an information of 98 counts, pursuant to the clauses and verbiage of the Foreign Enlistment Act, before the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer. At the time of the trial we endeavoured to put before our readers the contents of the Act of Parliament under which the information was laid, and we gave a general report of the evidence adduced by the Crown to prove that the ship in question was being built to be used in war in the service of the Confederate States. It will also be in the recollection of our readers that the jury returned a verdict for the defendants, and that the Crown officers were so dissatisfied with the interpretation of the Act propounded by the judge as to tender a bill of exceptions to his ruling. Now, according to the system of procedure in England, all actions, whether between subjects, or between the Crown and a subject, in which last case the action is called an information and lies at the suit of the Attorney-General, issue originally out of one of the supreme courts at Westminster. In the present instance the information issued out of the revenue side of the Court of the Exchequer. Where matters of fact are at issue, and therefore where the intervention of a jury is required, the case is tried at Nisi Prius, or, in other words, a judge is commissioned to try the case with the assistance of a jury. After the decision of the jury is obtained, the record of the case comes back to the court whence the writ issued, in order that final judgment may be given, or, if necessary, the proceedings stayed for further inquiry. Now, supposing the counsel at a trial before a jury is dissatisfied with the ruling of the judge on a point of law, he has two courses open to him. He can either tender a bill of exceptions to the judge before the verdict is given, or after verdict he may make an application at the commencement of the next legal term to the court whence the writ issued. Supposing that he tenders a bill of exceptions—which is in reality a simple statement of those portions of the ruling of the judge to which he objects, it is essential that he obtain the signature of the judge to the bill. If he obtains that signature, then the case does not go back to the court whence the writ issued, but, passing over that court, ascends to the Court of Error or Court of Appeal, usually called the Court of the Exchequer Chamber, and thence by a regular process to the Supreme Court, the House of Lords. Now, in the present case, the Attorney-General, on the part of the Crown, tendered a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the Chief Baron, which the latter refused to sign, for the simple reason that the bill tendered put words in the mouth of the judge which he absolutely denies that he ever used. In point of fact, the bill made the Chief Baron say that unless the vessel was "armed" there was no offence; whereas the Judge declares that he left the case to the jury in the alternative, using the very words of the Act of Parliament; that is, the judge said to the jury, "if you think this vessel was 'armed,' or 'equipped,' or 'fitted out,' or 'intended to be armed,' or 'fitted out' or 'equipped,' your verdict must be for the Crown; if not, it must be for the defendants." Under these circumstances it is clear that the Attorney-General was compelled to abandon the bill of exceptions and to resort to any other method of reviewing the question which the law offers. Now, in ordinary civil actions, the course open to counsel is, on one of the first four days of the term next ensuing after the trial, to move the court whence the writ issued to grant a new trial, or to set aside the verdict and enter judgment for the other party on certain grounds, which he must allege at the time moving the court. Then the court, on giving judgment on this motion, may also, if it think fit, grant leave to the party against whom it has given judgment to appeal to the Court of Error, and thence to the House of Lords. That the same rule held good in cases where the Crown was plaintiff is not so certain, and in the course of the case the Attorney-General applied to their lordships to make a general order, applying to the proceedings on the revenue side of the Court of Exchequer the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, which held good in civil actions. This, however, is a point to which attention need not be drawn.

Now the Attorney-General, finding, after a discussion before the Court of Exchequer, that he must abandon his bill of exceptions, (though, it may by the way be observed, that the learned counsel, in a somewhat unseemly manner, endeavoured to set aside Baron Pollock's interpretation of his own language and to convict him of contradiction, and to show that the finding of the jury was consequent on the judge's words, all of which the Baron stoutly denied,) fell back on one of his remaining remedies, and on November 5th moved for a new trial or the reversal of the verdict, on the ground of misdirection by the learned judge, and also upon the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. Immediately on the opening of the case, Baron Bramwell, on behalf of the bench, said that he wished it to be clearly understood, first, that the bill of exceptions is abandoned; second, that the court would take the Chief Baron's own report of his direction to the jury; and third, that there should be no appeal from their lordships' decision except on a point of law. Thereupon the Attorney-General proceeded to state all the facts connected with the case as disclosed at the trial, the names of the defendants, and the nature of the charges alleged in the information. He endeavoured to show on that evidence that the Alexandra was destined to be a vessel of war, and was able to take the seas as such at the time of her seizure; next, that she was built for the service of the Confederate States; and lastly, that the effect of that evidence was to bring the vessel within the condemnation of the Act. This he did by showing the reasons for which the Act was passed and the mischief which it was intended to obviate. After hearing the address of the learned counsel the court adjourned, and on the return of their lordships into court, the Lord Chief Baron said, that "without in the least saying what the opinion of any member of the court was, as to the ultimate fate of the rule, they were all of opinion that what had fallen from the Attorney-General was unquestionably matter fit to be discussed. If the Attorney-General was satisfied to take a rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside as contrary to the evidence, or as not being warranted by the evidence, or on the ground of misdirection by the judge on the trial, or on the ground that although there might have been no positive misdirection, that there was a want of information furnished to the jury to enable them to discharge their duty fairly—if he were content to take a rule on these two grounds, dividing the second ground into positive misdirection, or imperfect direction, he might take a rule to show cause at once." The Attorney-General having assented, the rule was granted. A short discussion then ensued, in which the Chief Baron said that he had laid down the law as he understood it to be laid down by the highest possible authority, at least now, in what is called "another place," that he thought himself remarkably safe in taking that course; but that, perhaps, after all he was wrong: a charming piece of irony, in which the Chief Baron quoted against the learned counsel the opinion of the head of that Government for which the Attorney-General was retained. Our readers will clearly understand that at present only a rule nisi has been granted; in other words, the necessary step has been taken to re-open the question before the court. Within a short time the case will come on again, and be fully argued by the counsel on either side. What is obtained at present is a mere permission to the Crown lawyers to argue the case. It should also be understood that the discretionary judgment of the court as to the granting of a new trial or reversing the verdict will be final, and from it no appeal will lie; but, on the other hand, there will be an appeal on any matter of law, which appeal will be to the Court of the Exchequer Chamber, and thence to the House of Lords.

We may shortly expect to hear that Earl Russell has seized another vessel. "The Glasgow Emancipation Society," which really seems more justly to deserve the title of the "Lincoln and Seward Spy Society," has addressed a memorial to Earl Russell, stating that a vessel has lately been launched from the building-yard of Messrs. James and George Thomson, and is now being fitted in Glasgow Harbour with great rapidity; that she is of similar construction to the Alabama, and that Earl Russell's attention is requested to the matter. Lord Russell has replied that the attention of Her Majesty's Government has already been directed to the matter. The vessel in question was formerly named the Canton, but is now called the Pampero.

The Right Hon. C. P. Villiers, M.P. for Wolverhampton, addressed his constituents on Monday night, at a dinner given to the retiring mayor of that borough. The experience, the talents, and the virtues of Lord Palmerston, Lord Russell, and Mr. Gladstone were duly proclaimed, and unduly admired by this somewhat more humble member of the Cabinet, and the very consolatory notion was expressed that it would not be wise to overturn the present Administration, and thereby excite the feelings which an angry political contention was sure to provoke. These, however, are sentiments that only too readily fall from the lips of a man in office who is thoroughly satisfied with himself, his place, and things in general, and being expected, as a matter of course excite no inordinate surprise. There is a part, however, of Mr. Villiers' speech to which attention may be more properly drawn. The right honourable gentleman, having extolled the principle of non-intervention, proceeded to say that "he wished that this forbearance could be fully carried through, and that they would be very careful of their criticisms; that nations would be more careful of saying anything which would be likely to provoke hostile feelings. Severe measures had been meted out to the Federals in their misfortunes. He had heard the bitterest remarks made against the President of the Union for endeavouring to maintain the Union; and also against the Southern States for endeavouring to retain possession of their property." Now this, from the mouth of an advanced Liberal, who is deified by the extreme Radical party, is rather too much for human endurance. We are told simply that we are not to make remarks on men and things on the other side of the Atlantic; not to express our horror at Butler, McNeil, and Turchin; not to refute the revolutionary doctrines of Chase and Stanton, nay, not even to laugh at the blustering Hooker, or the follies of the frivolous President. Were it not for the reasons given for this forbearance, we should be inclined to think that the Liberal Mr. Villiers would be a valuable addition to that Cabinet which has gagged the press and suspended the Habeas Corpus Act. But the reason follows:—"Such criticisms provoke hostile feelings." Mr. Villiers, like Lord Russell, is afraid. He has an overwhelming idea of the indignation and power of that North which is vainly endeavouring to overwhelm a country of eight millions of people. But what follows? Mr. Villiers goes on to say that "he had been in Parliament during the agitation for the repeal of the Union with Ireland. Those who advocated the repeal of the Union stood in the same relation to that measure as the Southerners did to the North. He never saw one member who was not ready to oppose it, and who was not ready to say that he should be guilty of treason if he voted for it." Surely Mr. Villiers must read history in a style peculiar to himself, or he must have thought such an illustration good enough for Wolverhampton voters. He would do us a great favour if he would repeat this curious illustration on the first opportunity in the House of Commons. What possible analogy can there be between a conquered country that has been under the sceptre of the ruling Power for nearly 500 years and a Confederacy of Sovereign States which have seceded from a Union into which they entered of their own free and sovereign will, preserving even after that entrance their ancient sovereign rights? We take it that a case must be a very poor one when it has to be supported by so absurd an illustration as that which is the latest and worst invention of this humble member of the English Cabinet.

THE CONTINENT.

THE speech in which the Emperor of the French opened what is called the legislative session of 1864, is probably the longest, as it certainly is the ablest address ever delivered from a throne. That it has been understood, differently in London and Paris, by the partisans of war and the partisans of peace, is not the fault of the author. His words speak plainly enough, and if men will set themselves to work to find hidden meanings, they can always make that which was distinct appear indefinite, if they cannot turn white completely into black. We give the full text of this important manifesto in another column. As we have said, this speech has been differently interpreted. We can have no hesitation in accepting the words in their literal sense. The Emperor does not deem it the duty of France to go to war single-handed in behalf of Poland, but he is desirous of effecting a fair solution of that question as of the other questions agitating Europe. With this object he renews his proposal of a general congress, which shall substitute a new fundamental pact for the broken one made at Vienna. If the Emperor really intended war, he would never have summoned this congress. Whether the congress meet or not, the situation is altogether changed. Russia no longer stands on one side, with Europe on the other. Poland is no longer the battle-field. The Emperor demands the revision of the treaties of 1815, and on the questions which that demand raises the enemies of yesterday will be the friends of to-day. If the Emperor means to go to war in the spring, he would never have taken a measure which would make that war one waged by France and Italy against the whole of Europe. We have no doubt about the sincerity of the Emperor's language, and if we cannot hope for any successful results from the congress, or even for its meeting, if we believe the self-love and the jealous rivalry of nations still too strong for such a harmonious arrangement, we acknowledge the noble purpose which has prompted the proposal, and earnestly desire that our doubts may be proved groundless.

The Corps Législatif held its first sitting on Friday. The Duke de Morny, its president, opened the proceedings in a speech full of liberal sentiments and in excellent taste. He observed that the late elections had awakened political aspirations which had long been slumbering. "The name of liberty had often been pronounced; the Government would not be disturbed by its repetition," the Emperor himself being the first cause of the movement. The Duke referred to the liberal measures enumerated in the speech, and expressed his personal satisfaction with them. He had been brought up to admire English society, to which he paid a glowing tribute. "Liberty," he said, "can only be peaceably established by the sincere co-operation of a sincerely liberal sovereign and a moderate Assembly." He was glad that the suffrage had replaced amongst them old parliamentary celebrities. "Their adhesion is a homage to the form of the Government which is not that of their political school, and I hold them in too great estimation to doubt for an instant the loyalty of their intentions. . . . The Government could only gain by being investigated." The Duke concluded with an appeal to the members to try and enlighten each other by loyal and courteous discussion, and to seek to solve pending questions with the sole object of promoting the real interests of the country, and by a feeling tribute to the memory of M. Billault.

The English despatch to St. Petersburg has been published. It answers to the character we gave it last week. The despatch, which is dated October 20th, and is probably the shortest Earl Russell has written during his career as Foreign Minister, acknowledges the receipt of Prince Gortschakoff's despatch of the 7th September, declares that Her Majesty's Government have no wish to prolong the correspondence for the mere purpose of controversy, that they receive with satisfaction the assurance that the Emperor continues to be animated with intentions of benevolence towards Poland and of conciliation towards other Powers, that they acknowledge that the relations of Russia towards European Powers are regulated by public law; but that the Emperor has special obligations in regard to Poland, Her Majesty's Government having shown in their despatch of the 11th of August that the rights of Poland are contained in the same instrument which constitutes the Emperor of Russia King of Poland. And so ends, as far as England is concerned, this most unfortunate diplomatic intervention, from which the Poles at one time hoped so much and by which they have been so grossly injured.

From Cracow we have accounts of Polish victories' which bear, however, on their face the assurance that they are inventions. From Warsaw we have accounts of arrests and executions about the veracity of which no doubt can be entertained.

Langiewicz has addressed an appeal to the Austrian Government to set him at liberty, that he may retire to Switzerland, or to hand him over to the Russians. The latter request is a pretty safe one. The Austrian Government may not let him go to Switzerland. It certainly will not hand him over to General Van Berg.

The Polish cause has sunk a great deal in public favour in Austria since the barbarous murder of Von Kuczynski, a councillor of the Lemberg tribunal. Kuczynski executed the duties entrusted to him with a little more zeal than some of his colleagues; he was charged with the management of the prosecution against Prince Sapieha, had been denounced by a secret National journal published at Lemberg, and some fourteen days before the murder had received a letter threatening him with death. The Czar of Cracow has published a notice professing to emanate from the National Government in Warsaw, denying that the assassination had been committed by the order of a revolutionary tribunal in connection with it, or that any such tribunal exists in Galicia, but the statement has found little credence. It has been shown, in the first place, that it was quite impossible that such a declaration could have reached Cracow from Warsaw within the dates assigned, and, granting the denial of the National Government, no one believes it. That a revolutionary tribunal does exist in Galicia is generally believed; that Kuczynski was murdered because he did his duty as a judge towards political offenders is certain, and the Austrian Government, getting alarmed at this lawlessness, has, it is said, resolved upon the adoption of severe measures even to proclaiming the state of siege. Von Kuczynski's death will cost the Poles dear.

The King of Prussia has opened the session of the Landtag in a speech which puts an end to any faint hopes which might have been cherished of conciliation. His Majesty indeed professes his "earnest wish for a termination of the differences between the Government and the Chamber;" but he hastens to add, that he "can only assent to such a budget as will ensure the maintenance of the new organisation of the army." In plain words, His Majesty will be happy to be reconciled with the House of Deputies on condition that they give up their claim to hold the purse-strings. As they will not do that there will be little opportunity for the consideration of the programme which the Ministry has prepared for the session. Long before the balance sheets for 1859, '60, and '61, the bill for establishing the expenditure and receipts of 1862—that is, for authorising the expenditure which the rejection of the budget made illegal; the budgets for 1863 and 1864; the bill for regulating the rights of the Government in case of the budget not being legally settled, i.e. for filling up the Lücke, or void in the Constitution which the Government supporters discovered in the autumn of 1862, and in filling up the gap to deprive the House of Deputies of its constitutional rights; the bills with regard to the legal position of associations and the press ordinances of June, &c., can be taken into consideration by the House, and the conflict provoked by the declaration of the King that he holds fast to his point, will have broken out, probably in an address, and the House will be prorogued or dissolved. His Majesty indeed offers one concession: he says that the bill regulating the period of military service has been modified; but as the three years service is a main feature of the reorganisation the modification cannot be important. The revenue is in a very satisfactory condition, but should the Federal execution in Holstein require extraordinary means the Lower House will be asked to vote them, and would probably be blind enough to do so. The Government, the King said, was endeavouring to secure the continuation of the Zollverein, whilst maintaining the commercial treaty with France—a labour almost certain to be vain. He concluded thus: "We live in an agitated time, perhaps stand upon the brink of a more agitated future. I ask you, therefore, the more urgently to bring about an understanding upon the solution of home questions." That understanding the King could easily bring about; he refuses, and he must take the consequences.

The King of the Hellenes—a protocol, signed at London on the 13th October, recognises this title, which the Russian Minister at first declined to acknowledge—has addressed a manifesto to his people. Although it promises much the proclamation is yet modest in its tone. King George says, "I bring to you neither wisdom nor experience, but I come to you with confidence and sincere devotion, with a firm belief in the prosperity of our future, to which I promise to devote my whole life. I shall respect and conscientiously observe your laws especially the Constitution, that keystone of the Greek edifice. I shall also endeavour to love and respect your customs and language—everything that is dear to you, as I love you already." Could a lover promise more to his mistress? "I shall collect around me the best and wisest men among you, without any regard to past differences. My ambition is to make Greece the model State of the East. The Almighty will give strength to my weakness and enlighten my efforts. He will aid me not to forget the obligations which I have contracted towards you." His Majesty proposes to himself a noble and an arduous task: a task in which he cannot succeed unless his subjects will cordially help him. There is the difficulty. The Greeks may show that they are true patriots, that they can bury personal rivalries in cordial action for the common good, but hitherto they have given no signs of such a virtue.

The session of the Spanish Cortes was opened by the Queen on the 4th. Her Majesty expressed her pleasure at seeing herself in the midst of the national representation, "an institution accessible to all the constitutional opinions which aspire to exercise a legitimate and advantageous influence upon the Government of the State, and a sure guide for the Crown, which with its support resolves pacifically the most arduous problems and overcomes the most formidable conflicts." Referring to the dissolution, she observed that "the electors came in great numbers to deposit their votes in the urns"—a statement which, considering that the great majority abstained from voting, is rather bold, and she accepts it as "a sign of the progress which constitutional education has made among us." "Our relations with foreign powers are pacific and friendly." Her Majesty then enumerated several projects of law which the Government will present in the session; amongst others, a definitive regulation of the constitutional reform voted in 1857, comprising an hereditary senate, measures for the reform of military and naval jurisdiction, for the organisation of commercial courts, a law relative to municipal corporations, in a decentralising sense, a law regulating the liberty of the press, a reform of the electoral law for military Cortes; finally, a budget will be submitted to the Cortes, which apparently is not to be very favourable. "In epochs of encouragement and progress, like ours, in which immense material ameliorations are undertaken and executed, we must resign ourselves to the sacrifices they require in the confidence that they will be largely compensated by the ulterior development of the public wealth." Peace has only been troubled in St. Domingo, and the Government has hastened to take the necessary measures to restore it. The Government also devotes itself to the amelioration of the administration of the provinces beyond the seas. Her Majesty concludes by hoping that "God in his mercy will favour her projects for the happiness of her dear country, and counts upon the co-operation of the senators and deputies." Her Majesty's gratitude to the nation is boundless. "It has surrounded my cradle and defended my right, imposing upon me the sacred duty, which I fill with eagerness, of giving to its happiness the priority over mine and that of my children. In short it has made me the personification of its new social state—(God forbid!)—and has identified me with the constitutional institutions of which I shall always be the axis and the support." Very touching!—if we could only fancy that the words were Her Majesty's and not her minister's, and if we did not know that a large proportion of the Spanish people is as discontented as it well can be, not with Her Majesty but with her Government.

Another royal speech. The King of Saxony has opened the session of his Diet. The only points of general interest in the speech are the expression of His Majesty's expectation that the approaching conference at Berlin will result in a universal understanding upon the commercial treaty and the maintenance of the Zollverein (a very sanguine expectation, indeed,) and a promise that the Federal execution in Holstein shall be carried out. Tant pis for the unfortunate Saxons who have to carry it out.

The New Fundamental Law for Denmark and Schleswig has been adopted by the Rigsraad. The amendments were rejected by 40 votes to 14. It is affirmed very confidently by the Danes that the treaty of alliance between Denmark and Sweden has been signed, and denied as stoutly by the Germans. A few days will tell which are in the right.

The King of Italy has been at Foggia in Naples to open a new railway. His Majesty reviewed the Italian Fleet at Naples on Monday. His stay in the South will be short, as he must be in Turin to open the session of the Chambers on Monday.

The Austrian reply to the Prussian criticism of the Reform Act has reached Berlin. It consists of a short memorandum: the purport being to show that the Prussian Government, by Prussia before entering into negotiations—the veto, the direct election to the Federal House of Representatives, and the parity of Prussia with Austria—are inadmissible, and to invite Prussia to enter frankly, and without any such stipulations, upon friendly negotiations.

Yet, another royal speech. King Leopold, who has been spending some time in Italy by the Lake of Como, opened the session of the Belgian Chambers on Tuesday. The speech is devoid of general interest. The King thanked the country for the testimonies of affection it had given him, enumerated the measures which would be submitted to the Chambers, and announced that the financial condition of the country was satisfactory.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE. (From our Special Correspondent.)

It turns out that the above heading is not broad enough to cover all that has to be written under it. The Confederate cause has just asserted itself with singular success in Cheshire. Stockport, with its 50,000 inhabitants and its smokeless factory chimneys, has declared for the South, by a majority as overwhelming as in any town in Lancashire.

"One of the largest meetings," says the Stockport and Cheshire County News, "that have been held in Stockport for some time, took place in the Hall of the Mechanics' Institute on Wednesday night week, for the purpose of giving expression to the public feeling on the great American question. Long before the hour announced for the opening of the hall doors the various approaches to the building were crowded with people anxious to obtain admittance. When the proceedings commenced every available position in the hall, either for sitting or standing, was occupied, and there could not have been fewer than 2,000 individuals present, notwithstanding which several hundreds were unable to gain admission. The vast majority of the audience were evidently warm sympathisers with the South, the Northern sentiment being chiefly represented by a small knot of individuals located in the front of the gallery. In common with the other parts of the hall the platform seats were crowded, amongst the occupants being many members of the Corporation and other gentlemen of influence. The following gentlemen attended as a deputation from the Southern Independence Association: James Spence, Esq., and Charles Pooley, Esq., of Liverpool; and J. H. Clarke, Esq., and T. B. Kershaw, of Manchester. The chair was taken, according to previous announcement, by Mr. Councillor W. Fernley."

The chairman opened the proceedings of the meeting amid loud and continued cheering. He rejoiced, he said, to see the meeting so crowded, because it proved to him that the sympathies of the people of Stockport were with the South. (Loud cheering and "No—no.") At a previous meeting on a similar occasion, he had confidently made the assertion that 9 out of every 10 of the people of Stockport were staunch supporters of the Confederate cause. (Loud cheering, again followed by "No—no.") He knew the heart of the people of Stockport was in the right place: while they hated the slavery of the black, they loved the freedom of the white man. (Cheers.) He believed there was not one present who would not vote against the maintenance of slavery. But the question was—How could slavery be abolished? If President Lincoln was really the "friend of the black man" he professed to be, he would have set about abolishing slavery in a very different way. (Cheers.) The abolition of slavery must be looked for from the South. (Cheers.) Everybody in this country, and specially in the cotton districts, was tired of hearing of the mutual destruction and bloodshed now going on between the North and South; and as nobody could tell when that horrible carnage would end, he thought the time had arrived for the Powers of Europe to offer their friendly offices. When they saw two men fighting and tearing each other to pieces, was it not merciful to step forward and try to pacify them? and had we not motives, as well of interest as of kindness, prompting us to interpose between North and South? (Cheers.) The working-classes had suffered quite enough, and were tired of working "Sarat." (Cheers.) So long as the American war was permitted to continue, they could still be subject to the same hardships they had been experiencing for two years, and therefore the question ceased to be a domestic one for the United States, and became an international one for the world. (Loud cheers.)

Considerable confusion was caused at this stage of the proceedings, on account of some gentleman rising in the body of the hall to protest against the tenor of the chairman's remarks. The gentleman was eventually ejected from the room.

Mr. William Leigh, a member of the Stockport branch of the Southern Independence Association, rose to move the following resolution:—

"That, in the opinion of this meeting, the war in America is an injury to the world; and the present aspects of the conflict give no prospect of an early termination, unless by means of the united influence of Europe. We, therefore, earnestly urge upon the Government of this country to enter into communication with the European powers, and concert with them as to the best means of bringing about peace."

(Loud cheering and some expressions of disapprobation.)

He had remarked, during the forcible ejection which had just taken place, it was a pity the majority of the meeting should make an ungenerous use of its power. (Cheers and laughter.) The North formed a small minority in that meeting, and he thought the South might have permitted some little dissension without opposing it by force. (Cheers.) The resolution he had just read was one which ought to conciliate North and South; at all events, it was one of which the people of the cotton district could not but approve. They all wanted peace as unanimously as they wanted the emancipation of the negro. (Loud cheers.) But the Northern Abolitionists were murdering the white people without emancipating the black; and that was a system of abolition with which Englishmen could feel but little sympathy. (Applause.) Justice, like charity, should begin at home. Although there were a million of slaves in the Northern States, the President had so high a regard for the Constitution, that he refrained from declaring them free; but our sympathy was invited for him, because, in the Southern States, he had pretended to extinguish slavery, on paper, as a war measure, and not for the sake of the negro. (Loud cheers.) What was the worth of a President like that? What claim upon our sympathies had such a policy as that? (Cheers.) But, as it was stated in the resolution, the war in America was an injury to the world. They had an instance of it in the sufferings they had gone through in Stockport. (Cheers.) A great part of the working classes had already become paupers; the capitalists had been compelled to shut up their mills. And yet we were asked to remain neutral. (Cheers.) Our so-called neutral policy, he contended, was not a neutral, but rather a belligerent policy—a policy of hostility to one of the parties in the conflict. (Cheers.) If the people of Stockport wished to be really neutral, let them urge Her Majesty's Government to take sides with other neutral powers, and ask for a cessation of hostilities. (Cheers.) At the commencement of the war, Earl Russell uttered a sentiment which found an echo throughout the whole of the country; but owing, apparently, to the visit of a certain reverend stump-orator, his lordship had changed his views, for now, he said, Englishmen were chiefly on the side of the North. Perhaps, when in that district as well as others, the people had unmistakably spoken out as they would do on that evening, Earl Russell would come back again to the truth. (Loud and continued cheers.)

Mr. Spence was the next to address the meeting. We need not say that his speech was exhaustive of the subject, and we regret that our space is so limited that we cannot do more than glance at its leading points. Mr. Spence said that whilst sympathising with both North and South, for the war was injurious to both, he also sympathised with the people of Stockport, a cotton district, who had suffered greatly from this deplorable war. It was not their fault, or owing to a blight that they were without cotton. The planter had cotton and was willing to sell, and the manufacturer was willing to buy, but a third party stepped in and forbade the transaction. It was, therefore, with us a domestic question why the Government of this country would not so much as lift a finger or speak a word to mitigate the evil. The only objection that could be urged by the Northern sympathisers to our Government seeking to bring about peace was, that the North was fighting for emancipation and that we ought not to interfere with that object. Mr. Spence declared that emancipation was a hollow sham, and discussed the question at length. He sided with the South from a sense of right and justice, but it was unfair to charge him with sympathising with slavery, as he had never said or written one word in defence of it. He was not an Abolitionist, but he objected to slavery, not only for its own sake, but because he held it to be a great evil to the people of the South. But slavery had no part in the objects of the war. Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone had testified to this; and Lord Brougham and those who bear the names of Wilberforce and Buxton had told them that the anti-slavery pretence of the North is an artifice and an imposition. The persons who tried to mislead the public as to the real object of the war have formed an association, which they call the "Union and Emancipation Society." Now, the two cannot co-exist, the one being destructive of the other. If any one is for the Union he cannot have Emancipation, for the Union is bound by a Constitution, under which slavery is "protected, sustained, and invested with political power." If any one desires Emancipation he must give up the Union, for emancipation is a violation of the Constitution, and as soon as that is violated, the Union is at an end. A real emancipation by the success of the North can only result in a Yankee Russia and a Southern Poland, and 4,000,000 slaves being made free, and 8,000,000 of freemen being made slaves. Let them not prostitute the word by calling such a state of affairs a Union. Now, how was it all their anti-slavery zeal was directed against the Confederate States? Were the members of the "Union and Emancipation Society" ignorant of the fact that slavery existed in Cuba, Brazil, and in Turkey? Had they never heard of Dahomey? And how was it that before the war broke out, Federal slavery was not equally denounced? In further proof of his assertion that emancipation is not the object of the war, Mr. Spence read extracts from the Republican manifesto of 1860, and Mr. Lincoln's inaugural address, which distinctly repudiated an emancipation policy. He also cited the Act passed by the Federal Congress on 3rd March, 1861, "that no amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorise or give Congress power to abolish or interfere within any State with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labour or servitude by the law of said State." Mr. Lincoln had distinctly told the negroes that they must emigrate to foreign parts; and in a letter to the Union Committee, dated August, 1863, he says he issued the proclamation to aid in saving the Union, and that when that object is effected "it will be an apt time then for you to declare you will not fight to free negroes." The negro is hated in the North, and the emancipation proclamation was issued to deceive Europe. Mr. Spence then commented on the failures of the North, and expressed his belief that the negroes could only be emancipated gradually and by their Southern masters. In his opinion this would be brought about by the break-up of the Union; for he thought that should the South be under the direct influence of European sentiment, that the "system of slavery can no more be maintained than you can hold a handful of darkness in a room after you have opened the door and let in the light of heaven." Mr. Spence, after exposing the real objects of the war—national vanity and a desire to monopolise the Southern trade—said it was now the duty of Europe to endeavour to stop the bloodshed, and that the three years of war had removed the pretence that secession was the act of a band of conspirators, and not of the Southern people. Interest and duty alike demanded that we should try what could be done by moral intervention. Mr. Spence was loudly cheered throughout his speech and on resuming his seat.

Mr. E. O. Greening, one of the secretaries of the Union and Emancipation Society, moved the following amendment:—

"That this meeting, whilst deploring the continuance of the war, would yet deprecate such a departure from the governmental position of neutrality as would necessarily array England on the side of the slaveholders of America." (Groans and cheering.) The speaker had ten minutes allotted him by the chairman, but so great was the uproar during the whole time that, beyond a few introductory sentences, in which he promised that Mr. Spence should be answered on some future occasion, scarcely a word was audible. He complained that the chairman did not exert his influence in obtaining a more favourable hearing for him.

A Mr. Apperson, of Cincinnati, Ohio, seconded the amendment, but beyond the "stump" character of his speech, there was little of note in what he said, except that he complimented Mr. Spence as a gentleman whom he considered "a noble specimen of an Englishman."

The meeting was then addressed by Mr. T. B. Kershaw, who, to expose the malevolence and trickery resorted to, as he said, by the Northern party in Manchester, read a letter addressed to his employer, and written, as he contended, with a view to injure his material prospects and welfare:—

"Is Mr. — aware that the two men in whom he reposes the greatest confidence and responsibility, are devoting his time to their own interest in public matters? Does he know that last winter his premises at a night were frequently deserted the greatest part of the night, and on more than one occasion the whole of the night? Hours of Mr. —'s time are spent by these two servants with reckless regard to his interest."

"A WELL-WISHER."

A scene of great uproar followed, during which Mr. Apperson and others denied, for their part, any knowledge of the slanderous document.

Upon a show of hands being called for the "North" and the "South."

The chairman declared, as he had stated before, the Confederacy had it by 10 to 1. (Cheers.)

The meeting terminated with thanks to the chairman, and three cheers for the "South."

From the peace party in Lancashire to the peace party in New York is no very wide step. A leading merchant in the Empire City, in writing to one of the largest cotton-spinners in Mr. Cobden's constituency of Rochdale, makes the following remarks:—

"That speech of Dr. Channing's in Liverpool contained about as many falsehoods as it did lines, and to all who know the truth upon the subjects discussed in it it could of course have no weight whatever. Upon the culture of cotton and the immense superiority of the 'slaves,' now that they were transformed into 'freemen,' the better quality of cotton they produced, and the low rates at which it would be furnished—upon these subjects the remarks of the speaker were rich in the extreme. How can a person calling himself a minister of Christ stand up and breathe forth such a string of the most palpable untruths?"

"And Beecher, too, I see, is blazing away with his blasphemous doctrines. It is such men as he and Channing that lit up the flame of our fratricidal war; and for all that England and Europe are suffering because of our war these men are responsible. Let the honest thinking people of England remember that important fact when they would gather round and applaud those who were forced to flee from their own country for shelter. This man Beecher was 'egged' in the public streets of Brooklyn, he was pointed at with derision, personal violence was threatened if he did not abandon his vile and incendiary language, and he made good his escape to Europe until the bitterness then existing against him should subside."

"The dismissal of the British consuls from the Confederacy is probably as important an item of news to England as the present steamer will carry out. The step has been meditated for a year past, but its execution was delayed until Her Majesty's consuls assumed the 'right to interfere directly with the execution of the Confederacy's laws, and to advise soldiers of the Confederate armies to throw down their arms in face of the enemy: and when this was found to be the case, President Davis was not long in ordering the summary dismissal of every British consul in the South. At best they occupied a false position, inasmuch as they professed to represent a Government which did not exist in localities to which they were accredited. They were never sent by England as Her Majesty's representatives to the Confederate States of America, and their residence in those States during the war was, of course, permitted only by the courtesy of the Confederate Government. It maintained that courtesy to the utmost limit, and has now only performed an act which most nations would have done long since.

"The responsibility is now thrown upon England of leaving her subjects without the protection of even a representative; nor can she send such without first recognising the independence of the Confederacy.

"The residence of French Consuls, or indeed the consuls of any other nation, you will note, is not interfered with, though in point of fact there is no difference in the position between these and the consuls of Great Britain, except perhaps the interference with the "Confederate laws," of which, in the case of the latter, Mr. Benjamin complains.

"New Orleans will most likely be an exception to the 'order to quit,' for the reason that the Confederacy is just now unable to enforce the order in that city: so the consul there will probably remain, unless the British Government should see fit to recall him. In this, however, it must be its own judge whether New Orleans belongs to the United or the Confederate States. Any map will show that it clearly belongs to the latter, and though temporarily occupied by an invading foe, it is none the less the property and a portion of the Confederate States.

"And a very pertinent query might here be put. Was it fair to give Mr. Mason the cold shoulder and yet continue representatives in all the States, the Government of which it had thus far refused to recognise? I have myself admitted that England was right in refusing official correspondence with Mr. Mason when it had not recognised the Power that sent him; but it was none the less right that she should have also recalled her own consuls without waiting for the Confederacy to dismiss them.

"There is a report that the Confederate Government has permitted the agents of France to remove the tobacco purchased by them in the South, provided it is taken away in French ships. It is understood, however, that the authorities at Washington object to this, although some three months since they agreed with M. Mercier to let the shipments be made, on condition that it was not construed into a precedent or as a warrant for other shipments at any future time. . . .

"Cotton has been weak since Saturday, under what I regard as a false impression that at large lots will reach New Orleans. It is offered to-day at 86 cents for Middling, some of the brokers quoting it one cent below this figure."

THE IMPERIAL LETTER.

The Moniteur publishes the text of the letter addressed to the Sovereigns of Europe by the Emperor of the French, proposing a general Congress to settle the affairs of Europe. The following is a translation:—

"Most High and Most Illustrious Sovereign Princes and Free Towns which constitute the High German Confederation:—

"In presence of the events which every day arise and become urgent, I deem it indispensable to express myself without reserve to the Sovereigns to whom the destiny of nations is confided.

"Whenever severe shocks have shaken the bases and displaced the limits of States solemn transactions have taken place to arrange the new elements, and to consecrate by revision the accomplished transformations. Such was the object of the treaty of Westphalia in the 17th century, and of the negotiations at Vienna in 1815. It is on this latter foundation that now reposes the political edifice of Europe; and yet, as you are aware, it is crumbling away on all sides.

"If the situation of the different countries be attentively considered, it is impossible not to admit that the Treaties of Vienna upon almost all points are destroyed, modified, misunderstood, or menaced. Hence, duties without rule, rights without title, and pretensions without restraint. The danger is so much the more formidable because the improvements brought about by civilisation, which has bound nations together by the identity of material interests, would render war still more destructive.

"This is a subject for serious reflection; let us not wait before deciding on our course for sudden and irresistible events to disturb our judgment and carry us away despite ourselves in opposite directions.

"I therefore propose to you to regulate the present and secure the future in a Congress.

"Called to the throne by Providence and the will of the French people, but trained in the school of adversity, I am perhaps bound less than any other to ignore the rights of the sovereigns and the legitimate aspirations of nations.

"Therefore I am ready, without any preconceived system, to bring to an International Council the spirit of moderation and justice, the usual portion of those who have endured so many various trials.

"If I take the initiative in such an overture, I do not yield to an impulse of vanity; but as I am the Sovereign to whom ambitious projects are most attributed, I have it at heart to prove by this frank and loyal step that my sole object is to arrive without a shock at the pacification of Europe. If this proposition be favourably received, I pray you to accept Paris as the place of meeting.

"In case the princes, allies and friends of France, should think proper to heighten by their presence the authority of the deliberations, I shall be proud to offer them my cordial hospitality. Europe would see, perhaps, some advantage in the capital from which the signal for subversion has so often been given becoming the seat of the Conferences destined to lay the basis of a general pacification.

"I take advantage of this opportunity to renew to you the assurance of my sincere attachment and of the lively interest which I take in the prosperity of the States of the Confederation. Whereupon, most high and illustrious Sovereign Princes, and Free States which constitute the most exalted German Confederation, I pray God to have you in His holy keeping.

"Written at Paris on the 4th of November in the year of grace 1863.

SPEECH OF THE EMPEROR NAPOLEON.

The French Chambers were opened on the 5th instant by the Emperor, who delivered the following speech:—

"Messieurs les Sénateurs,

"Messieurs les Députés:—

"The annual assembly of the great bodies of the State is always a happy opportunity for bringing together the men who are devoted to the public welfare, and for manifesting the truth to the country. The frankness of our mutual intercourse calms anxiety and strengthens our resolutions. I, therefore, bid you welcome. The Legislative Body has been renewed a third time since the foundation of the Empire, and for the third time, in despite of some local dissents, I can only congratulate myself upon the result of the elections. You have all taken the same oath to me: that is a guarantee to me of your support. It is our duty to attend to the affairs of the country promptly and well, remaining faithful to the Constitution which has given us eleven years of prosperity, and which you have sworn to uphold.

"The exposé of the situation at home will show to you that, despite the forced stagnation of labour in certain branches, progress has not been slackened. Our industry has contended successfully against foreign competition, and, in presence of undeniable facts, the fears engendered by the Treaty of Commerce with England have vanished. Our exports during the first eight months of the year 1863, compared with those of the corresponding months of the year 1862, show an increase of 233,000,000*fr.* During the same period our shipping trade shows an excess over that of the preceding year of 175,000 tons, of which 136,000 are under the French flag. The abundant harvest of the present year is a blessing of Providence, which will assure to the population a cheaper price of food. It is also a proof of the prosperity of our agriculture.

"Public works have been actively carried on. About 1,000 kilometres of new lines of railway have been thrown open to traffic; our ports, our rivers, our canals, our high roads have been continually improved. As the Session has met earlier than has been customary, the report of the Minister of Finance has not yet been published. It will be produced shortly. You will find therein that, if our expectations have not been fully realised, the revenues have followed a continuous rise, and that without extraordinary credits we have been able to meet the expenses caused by the war in Mexico and in Cochin China. I shall have to point out to you various reforms which are deemed advisable; among others, one relating to the freedom of the baking trade, one which will render the maritime conscription less onerous to the populations on the coast, a project for modifying the law on joint-stock companies, and one for suppressing the exclusive privileges for theatres. I have also ordered a Bill to be taken into consideration with a view to increase the powers of the general and communal councils, and to remedy the excess of centralisation—in fact, to simplify administrative formalities, to modify the laws applicable to the classes deserving of all our solicitude. This will be a step in advance to which you will gladly associate yourselves.

"The sugar question will also be submitted to your consideration, a question which stands in need of a final solution by a more distinct enactment. The project submitted to the Council of State tends to grant to home produce the facility of exportation which is granted to sugars of other parts. A Bill on registration will abolish the double décime, and will replace that impost by a more equitable repartition.

"In Algeria, despite the anomaly which subjects the same populations, some to the civil some to the military authorities, the Arabs have learnt to understand the mild and equitable sway of the French rule, while the Europeans do not place the less confidence in the protection of the Government.

"Our ancient colonies have seen removed the barriers which obstructed their transactions, but circumstances have not been favourable to the development of commerce.

"The recent establishment of credit institutions will, I trust, improve the state of affairs. In the midst of these material considerations nothing has been neglected which concerns religion and public morals. Religious and benevolent institutions, science and public instruction, have received great encouragement.

"Since 1848 the population of the schools has increased one-quarter. At the present day nearly 5,000,000 children (one-third of them gratuitously) are admitted into the primary schools; but our efforts must not be slackened, as there are still 600,000 devoid of instruction. The higher class of studies has been encouraged in the secondary schools, where special instruction is under re-organisation.

"Such, gentlemen, is the substance of what we have already done, and of what we still intend to do. Assuredly, the prosperity of our country would advance still more rapidly if political anxieties did not disturb it; but in the life of nations unforeseen and inevitable events occur which must be boldly and fearlessly faced, and met without shrinking. Of this number is the war in America, the compulsory occupation of Mexico and of Cochin China, the insurrection of Poland. The distant expeditions which have been the subject of so much criticism have not been the result of any premeditated plan; they have been brought about by the force of circumstances; and yet they are not to be regretted. How, in fact, could we develop our foreign commerce if, on the one hand, we were to relinquish all influence in America; and if, on the other, in presence of the vast territory occupied by the Spaniards and the Dutch, France was to remain alone without possessions in the seas of Asia? We have conquered a position in Cochin China which, without subjecting us to the difficulties of the local government, will allow us to turn to account the immense resources of these countries, and to civilise them by commerce. In Mexico, after an unexpected resistance, which the courage of our soldiers and of our sailors overcame, we have seen the population welcome us as liberators. Our efforts will not have been fruitless, and we shall be largely rewarded for our sacrifices when the destinies of that country, which will owe its regeneration to us, shall have been handed over to a Prince whose enlightenment and high qualities render him worthy of so noble a mission. Let us, then, put faith in our expeditions beyond sea. Commenced to avenge our honour, they will terminate in the triumph of our interests; and if prejudiced minds will not see the good promise of the seed sown for the future, let us not tarnish the glory achieved, so to say, at the two extremities of the world—at Peking and in Mexico.

"The Polish question needs a fuller explanation. When the Polish insurrection burst out the Governments of France and of Russia were on the most friendly footing. Since the conclusion of peace they were always agreed upon the great European questions, and I do not hesitate to declare so.

"During the war in Italy, as well as at the time of the annexation of Nice and of Savoy, the Emperor gave me his most sincere and cordial support. This good understanding demanded forbearance, and it was only the Polish question very popular in France, that could induce me not to hesitate to compromise one of the first alliances of the Continent, and to raise my voice in favour of a nation rebellious in the eyes of Russia, but, in ours, heirs to a right inscribed in history and in treaties. Nevertheless, this question touched upon the most serious European interests. It could not be treated by France alone. An insult to our honour or a menace against our frontiers alone imposes upon us the duty of action without preliminary concert. It therefore became necessary, as at the time of the events in the East and in Syria, for me to come to an understanding with the Powers who had equal rights and similar reasons as ourselves to express an opinion. The Polish insurrection, which from its duration assumed a national character, aroused sympathy on every side, and the aim of diplomacy has been to attract to its cause as much adhesions possible, so as to bring to bear upon Russia all the pressure possible of the public opinion of Europe. This almost unanimous expression of wishes appeared to us to be the best means of persuading the Russian Cabinet. Unfortunately our disinterested counsels have been interpreted as an attempt to intimidate; and the steps taken by England, Austria, and France, instead of putting a stop to the struggle, have only tended to embitter it. Excesses are being perpetrated on both sides, which, in the name of humanity, must be equally deplored. What, then, is to be done? Are we reduced to the sole alternative of war or of silence? No. Without having recourse to arms, and without remaining silent, one means remains to us: it is, to submit the Polish question to a European tribunal. Russia has already declared that conferences at which all the other questions which agitate Europe shall be discussed would in no wise offend her dignity. Let us take note of that declaration. Let it serve us to extinguish once for all the ferments of discord which are ready to burst forth on every side and from the disquietude itself of Europe, which in every quarter is mined by the elements of dissolution, let a new era of order and of peace arise. Has not the moment arrived to rebuild on new foundations the edifice destroyed by the hand of time, and piecemeal by revolutions? Is it not urgent to recognise by new conventions that which has been irrevocably accomplished, and to carry by common accord what the peace of the world requires? The treaties of 1815 have ceased to exist. The force of circumstances has upset them, or tends to upset them. They have been discarded nearly everywhere—in Greece, in Belgium, in France, in Italy, as upon the Danube. Germany is agitating to alter them, England has generously modified them by the cession of the Ionian Islands, and Russia treads them under foot at Warsaw. In the midst of these successive infringements of the fundamental European pact, ardent passions become over-excited, powerful interests demand solution in the South as well as in the North. What, then, can be more legitimate and more sensible than to convoke the Powers of Europe to a Congress, in which self-love and resistance would disappear in face of a supreme arbitrament? What can be more in conformity with the ideas of the age, with the wishes of the greatest number, than to address ourselves to the conscience, to the reason, of statesmen in all countries, and to say, Have not the prejudices and rancour which divide us already lasted long enough? Is the jealous rivalry of the great Powers incessantly to obstruct the progress of civilisation? Shall we be constantly casting defiance at each other by exaggerated armaments? Are our most precious resources to be indefinitely exhausted in vain ostentation of our strength? Shall we eternally preserve a position which is neither peace with its security nor war with its chance of success? Let us no longer give factitious importance to the subversive spirit of extreme parties by opposing ourselves with narrow calculations to the legitimate aspirations of nations. Let us have the courage to substitute a regular and stable state of affairs for an unhealthy and precarious condition, even if it should cost sacrifices. Let us meet without a preconceived system, without exclusive ambition, animated by the sole thought of establishing an order of things based henceforth upon the well-understood interest of the sovereigns and of the peoples.

"I cannot but believe that this appeal would be listened to by all. A refusal would lead to the supposition of secret projects which fear the light of day; but even if the proposal should not be unanimously adopted, it would have the immense advantage of having shown Europe where lies danger and where safety. Two ways are open: the one leads to progress through conciliation and peace; the other, sooner or later, conducts fatally to war, by the obstinacy of maintaining a past which is rolling away.

"You know now, Gentlemen, the tone which I propose to adopt towards Europe. Approved by you, sanctioned by the public assent, it cannot fail to be listened to, for I speak in the name of France."

PRESIDENT DAVIS'S ADDRESS TO THE ARMY OF TENNESSEE.

The following Address was published on the 16th October, and received with the greatest enthusiasm:—

Head-quarters, Army of Tennessee,
October 14, 1863.

SOLDIERS—A grateful country recognises your arduous services, and rejoices over your glorious victory on the field of Chickamauga. When your countrymen shall more fully learn the adverse circumstances under which you attacked the enemy, though they cannot be more thankful, they may admire more the gallantry and patriotic devotion which secured your success. Representatives of every State of the Confederacy, your steps have been followed up with affectionate solicitude by friends in every portion of the country. Defenders of the heart of our territory, your movements have been an object of interest, anxiety and hope.

Our cause depends on you, and happy it is that all can rely upon your achieving whatever, under the blessing of Providence, human power can effect.

Though you have done much, very much remains to be done. Behind you is a people providing for your support, and depending upon your protection. Before you is a country devastated by your ruthless invaders, where gentle women, feeble age and helpless infancy have been subjected to outrages without parallel in the warfare of civilised nations.

With eager eyes they watch for your coming to their deliverance, and homeless refugees pine for the hour when your victorious arms shall restore their family shelters from which they have been driven and forced to take up arms to vindicate their political rights, freedom, equality, and State sovereignty, which were a heritage purchased by the blood of your Revolutionary sires.

You have but the alternative of being slaves of submission to a despotic usurpation, or of independence, which a vigorous, united, and persistent effort will secure.

All which fires a manly breast, moves a patriot, or exalts a hero, is present to stimulate and sustain you. Nobly have you redeemed your pledges, given in the name of freedom, to the memory of your ancestors and the rights of your posterity.

That you may complete the mission to which you have devoted yourselves will require of you such exertions in the future as you have made in the past, and the continuous self-denial which rejects every consideration at variance with the public service as unworthy of the holy cause in which you are engaged.

When the war shall be ended the highest meed of praise will be due, and probably be given, to him who has claimed the least for himself in proportion to the service he has rendered. And the bitterest self-reproach which may hereafter haunt the memory of any one will be to him who has allowed selfish aspiration to prevail over his desire of the public good.

United as we are in a common destiny, obedience and cordial co-operation are essential. There is no higher duty than that which requires one to exert and render to all what is due to their station. He who sows the seeds of discontent and distrust prepares for a harvest of slaughter and defeat.

To your gallantry, energy and fortitude you crown this harmony with due subordination, and cheerful support of lawful authority.

I fervently hope that this ferocious war, so unjustly waged against our country, may soon end, and that, with the blessing of peace, you may be restored to your homes and useful pursuits; and I pray our Heavenly Father may cover you with the shield of his protection in your battle and endow you with the virtues which will close your trials in victory complete.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

PRESIDENT DAVIS AND THE ARMY OF TENNESSEE.—A letter in the Memphis Appeal says:—The President, attended by Generals Bragg and Longstreet, held a review. The ceremony was not different from all other occasions of the kind, except that the brigades were not so full as usual, by reason of the strong details on picket and at work. The cortege rode down the line, the bands played, the President, with hat off, saluted the war-worn banners, so often stirred by battle breezes, and then moved on from right to left. As the cavalcade progressed, it gathered strength and interest, and by the time it reached the division of General Hood, now commanded by General Jenkins, of South Carolina, presented a striking appearance. We saw grouped together, in a picturesque cluster, around the chief of all, officers, whose traces have been written on every battle-field and whose names are household words. General Bragg, Lieutenant Generals Longstreet, and D. H. Hill; Major Generals Cheatham, Buckner, Breckinridge, McLaw, Walker, and Stewart; Brigadier Generals (commanding divisions) Preston and Jenkins; Brigadier Generals Mackall, and others, whose names I do not at present recollect. Attending the President were Colonels Chesmit and Johnston, of his personal staff, Generals Curtis, Lee, Colonel Preston, of Kentucky, and most of the day, and I learn that the President ex-Lieutenant General Pemberton. The review occupied the President his gratification at the general appearance of the army. The President was, during a portion of the time, within one thousand yards of the Federal batteries. The Federal pickets, during the review, were in plain sight. Subsequent to the review the President rode up the Lookout Mountain and inspected the Yankee camps.

LORD PALMERSTON AT THE GUILDHALL.

The following is a report of Lord Palmerston's speech at the Lord Mayor's Dinner on Monday last, in reply to the toast of "Her Majesty's Ministers":—

My Lord Mayor, Ladies, and Gentlemen,—For myself and my colleagues I beg to return you our most sincere thanks for the kind manner in which the last toast has been proposed and received. I can assure you that those who are charged with the conduct of the affairs of this country must always feel the highest gratification at being permitted to be present at the splendid hospitalities of this great city. And not only do we receive personal gratification, but we feel that on these occasions that which takes place cements that union between the different classes of the community which is so important to the interests of the whole. It is well that those who are engaged in carrying on those commercial transactions upon which the wealth, the strength, and the happiness of this great country depend, should mix from time to time with those who are the responsible advisers of the Crown in conducting the political affairs of the nation. I do not mean to say that when we meet at your festive board matters of national importance are discussed—we are too much engaged in enjoying the festive hospitality which surrounds us for that (a laugh)—but acquaintances are formed on these occasions which ripen afterwards into friendships; and it is well-known that the transactions of business are made much more easy when those who meet to carry them on know and like each other. (Hear, hear.) Therefore, I say, these gatherings are of great political importance by bringing together those who are charged with the commerce of the country and those who are responsible for its political government. There have been occasions when it was the lot of those who had to explain the state of affairs to congratulate you on the tranquil condition of the civilised world. I am afraid I cannot do that in the present instance; for, although I trust there is nothing in our horizon which can grow into a cloud of war, yet we see on all sides—in the far West and in the distant East—struggles going on of the most lamentable character, and scenes enacted which make us shudder for humanity, and excite our deep compassion for the countries in which they are occurring. (Hear, hear.) In the far West we see a nation of the same race, the same language, the same religion, the same manners and literature as ourselves, split into two, slaughtering each other by hundreds of thousands, and carrying on a contest the result of which it is impossible to foresee, and the end of which now, after more than two years' duration, he would be a bold man indeed who would venture to predict. (Hear, hear.) Lamenting that state of things, the Government of this country have felt it their duty not to yield either to the entreaties or the oburgations of the one party or the other. (Cheers.) Blandishments on the one side and threats on the other have equally been fruitless to affect our course. (Renewed cheers.) We have felt it our duty to abstain from taking any part in that deplorable conflict. If, indeed, we had thought it had been in our power to put an end to it by friendly intervention, no efforts would have been wanting to accomplish so holy an object. (Cheers.) But we felt that our interference would have been vain, and we deemed it our duty—and in that I am sure we but followed the wishes of the country—to maintain a strict and impartial neutrality. (Loud cheers.) In the East also scenes of a lamentable character are taking place. We there see, on the one side a barbarous system of deliberate extermination carried out, and on the other side revenge venting itself in acts of murder and assassination. (Hear.) We endeavoured to enlist the feelings and opinions of civilised Europe in a joint remonstrance against that which we thought was unjust. Those remonstrances have failed. We have done our duty; and we can only hope that those who have the conduct of affairs in the Russian empire may at length cease to pursue that course which has drawn upon them the condemnation of Europe, and that peace may be restored upon terms of equity and justice in that unfortunate country. (Hear.) Well, though abroad things look ill, and much misery and calamity are sustained, this country forms a happy exception to that which seems to be the prevailing condition of nations. We have been blessed by Providence with an abundant harvest; we have been preserved by the conduct of the Government and the sense of the country from the misfortunes of war; our population are contented and loyal, and they feel that for a long course of years the Legislature has been occupied in remedying grievances, in removing defects from our laws, in sweeping away those obstructions which the less enlightened policy of former times had placed in the way of the productive industry of the nation. By all these means, I am happy to say, I believe that the commercial and material prosperity of the country has reached a point which it never attained at any former period. (Hear, hear.) Those who know the course of the commerce of the world will tell you that year by year this great city of London is growing more and more to be the centre of all the commercial transactions of other States, that bills are drawn upon London to pay debts all over the world, that commodities destined for other countries are sent in deposit here—a tribute paid by the people of other nations to the industry, good management, integrity, and high honour of our own commercial community. (Hear, hear.) I congratulate you, my Lord Mayor and Gentlemen, on this happy state of things, and I trust that the people of England will feel that they are greatly indebted for it to the reign of that beneficent Sovereign under whose mild and enlightened rule they have the good fortune to live. (Hear.) My Lord Mayor, I beg again to thank you on my own part and on that of my colleagues, and to assure you that we derive the highest gratification from being allowed to join this festive board. (Loud cheers.)

Respecting the affair at Charleston, Shenandoah Valley, on the 18th October, General Lee reports as follows:—

Head-quarters, Northern Virginia,
October 23.

To General S. COOPER,—

General Imboden, on the 18th, attacked the garrison at Charleston, Shenandoah Valley, and captured 434 prisoners with their arms, transportation, and stores. To this add the prisoners already forwarded, making 2,462.

(Signed) R. E. LEE.

The total number of prisoners held in Richmond on the 23rd October was a fraction under 12,000.

SHALL WE HAVE AN EIGHT YEARS' WAR?

(From the New York World, October 23.)

Is the Union worth an eight years' war? Except for illustration, this is an idle interrogatory; for it is certain that the war cannot last eight years on its present gigantic scale without engulfing the country in hopeless bankruptcy.

The war has already lasted two years and six months, and in that time we have accumulated a national debt amounting to about $2,000,000,000. Each year of the war must cost more than the year next preceding, for the constantly increasing inflation of the currency will cause a corresponding increase in the cost of military supplies. With the same number of men in the field it is probable that, taking one year with another, at least thirty per cent. will be annually added to the cost of supporting the war. A simple calculation will show the impossibility of the war continuing eight years without bankrupting the nation. It may fairly be doubted whether it can continue five years from its commencement, or double its present duration, without prostrating the credit of the government.

As an offset to this we may be told that the rebel government, being so much weaker in resources, is certain to break down financially much sooner than ours. This is very true; but the rebel war debt will never be paid, and the accumulation of a great debt is a very different thing where it is to be wiped out with a sponge from a debt no part of which is to be repudiated. Whatever may be the result of the war, the United States, as a long established government bound in honour to pay its debts, or at least the interest on them, will remain. It is absurd to argue this question as if the United States were running a financial race against the rebels. We are not to judge of our debt by comparison with a debt that will never be paid, but by our ability to pay the interest on it. It is clear that a war even for the Union cannot be indefinitely prolonged; and consequently that an Administration which spends much and accomplishes little will, if continued in power, bankrupt the nation, and fail to restore the Union at last.

"The Union at any cost!" is a well-sounding cry till you come to examine it. Do we want the Union at the expense of national honour? Ought we to purchase the Union by national bankruptcy? We are shocked by such questions; we recoil from the alternative they present. But if the thought of either part of the alternative is intolerable, what shall we say of an Administration that is so managing the war as to threaten us with the accumulated horrors of both? If the war continues to be mismanaged as it has been—that is to say, if the Republican party continues in power another four years—we shall have a nation bankrupt and dishonoured, without the compensation of a Union restored.

"But the war has made considerable progress." If you look only at the credit side of your balance sheet, and shut your eyes to the debit side, you may easily fancy yourself rich. It may be satisfactory to have an omelet on your breakfast table, but if you have paid enough for the omelet to buy a house and lot you have really very little to show for your money. In proportion to the number of men called into service and the amount of debt accumulated, the Administration have accomplished very little. "Washington is safe,"—and so is Richmond. "Vicksburg is ours,"—but a cry comes from all the western cities that the Mississippi is no more open to commerce than when Vicksburg was in possession of the enemy. "The Army of the Cumberland is in Chattanooga,"—but it was driven there defeated, and stands there on the defensive. The Administration has called successively for 75,000 men; for 500,000 men to end the war early by a single overpowering effort; for 300,000 men to save Washington and repel the invading rebels; for 300,000 men again to serve nine months and end the war within that time beyond all peradventure; for 300,000 men still again to replace the nine months men who were mustered out, with Washington again menaced and the North again invaded; and now the President calls for still another 300,000 men, to be allowed for, he tells us, on a future draft!

Unless the war makes a more rapid progress in proportion to the colossal scale of our expenditures, our resources will give out before the rebels give up.

THE "TIMES" NEW YORK CORRESPONDENT.—Charles Mackay, correspondent of the London Times, left this city in the Persia on Wednesday, having received leave of absence for one month. At the expiration of that time he proposes to return and resume his duties. Dr. Mackay came to this country with an unprejudiced mind, prepared to receive impressions according to the result of an impartial observation. As the correspondent of the first newspaper of the Old World, he aimed to transmit facts as they happened, and to suggest theories as they occurred to his unbiased judgment. He has accomplished this difficult task with a faithfulness and sagacity that fully justify the London Times in its choice of a representative in this region of political convulsion. Holding himself entirely aloof from influence of a partisan nature, and scanning the progress of events and the tone of popular feeling with a cosmopolitan spirit, he has given his countrymen to understand the actual condition of American affairs. Dr. Mackay's sojourn in this city has procured him many friends. His rare intellectual qualities and social attributes are of a kind to elicit both admiration and esteem. He evinces in private life the depth of feeling and sincerity that, as the first lyric poet of the day, he has imparted to his lyric verse. It is well for his American friends and his European employers that his absence is to be of short duration.—The New York Daily News, October 23.

LORD RUSSELL has withdrawn himself from the clutch of the Tartar whom he so unwisely caught. The despatch which was published by the Foreign-office on Friday is a formal retreat from the neighbourhood of the unreasonable Russian who refused to be frightened. Lord Russell has had to do with a man who would not stand when he was bidden, and he has been fain to follow neighbour Dogberry's advice, and take no note of him, but let him go. "Her Majesty's Government have no wish to prolong the correspondence on the subject of Poland." This is the end of the cogent demands, of the half-suggested menace, of the loud tone of dictation, and of the feint to form a league for armed coercion. The threat has broken against the defiance. The bear holds his victim in his hug, and the bystanders, who cried "shame" and threatened spears, fold themselves up in their cloaks and withdraw in undignified dudgeon when he shows his long teeth. Lord Russell has been the first to perform this inevitable ceremony of retrenchment, and he has done it in this curt and sulky despatch, the most lame and impotent conclusion of an ill-advised policy.—Times.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOIZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:

At Liverpool, to WM. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings, Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq., Manchester Southern Club Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to MESSRS. PFEIFFER and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4, Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1863.

Mr. J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund acknowledges the receipt of the following additional subscriptions—

J. N. Beach, Esq.	£5 0 0
Wm. G. Crenshaw, Esq.	50 0 0

The Premier on the Great Questions of the Day.

UPON the sensitive ear of one who cherishes and glories in the imperial traditions of England, Lord Palmerston's reference to the two greatest questions of the day, at the Lord Mayor's dinner on Monday last, must jar painfully, as he compares the dainty and debonnaire handling of momentous topics with the bold and commanding words of the representative of a more heroic age. On each hemisphere there is a brave people freely pouring out its heart's blood in self-defence against attacks as wicked in design as barbarous in execution, and the predominant feeling which this spectacle moves in the mind of the Premier of England is one of complacent self-congratulation at the uninterrupted tranquillity and prosperity of these islands. Some commonplace expressions of compassion and of unfeigned aversion to scenes of bloodshed and unparalleled suffering he does indeed feel due to his self-respect and as a tribute to humanity, for Lord Palmerston is essentially a kind-hearted man. Such expressions a lady of delicate nerves might use at being unwillingly made to witness a surgical operation. But here is the man, venerable for years, respected for a long life of public services, enjoying an unbounded popularity and almost equally unbounded power—a man on whose lips a whole nation hangs attentively, and who, when he speaks, speaks to the civilised world:—in the mouth of such a man, such expressions, however proper in themselves and however genuinely felt, sound, if made empty, like cruel mockery.

Lord Palmerston's speech is certain to be applauded, because it is his. Men will praise its wisdom, its caution, its reserve, because it chimes admirably with the love of ease, the lack of earnestness, the political lethargy that characterise our unchivalric age, and we do not blame Lord Palmerston for understanding the present temper of his countrymen. Yet we will not believe that prosperity has so thickly coated with animal fat the British heart as to make it impervious to noble and generous thoughts; and had the Premier addressed himself to the conscience of the nation, and risen above the phrases of meaningless sentimentalism to the announcement of great purposes and a magnanimous policy, we believe that he would have awakened an echo so loud and universal, as to drown the timid ex-postulations of the counting-rooms, or the impotent curses of Yankee-maniacs. But Lord Palmerston, perhaps from habit, perhaps from other motives, has chosen, not to lead, but to follow—and follow somewhat in the rear—the public opinion of the hour. We may be told that "a festive board" at the Mansion-house is not the proper place, or a Lord Mayor's dinner the proper occasion, to promulgate startling views on affairs of State; but immemorial usage has made the attendance of the Ministers at these civic banquets a political event, and the time of their annual occurrence—marking the transition from the topics of one Parliamentary session to the unshaped topics of another—has given to the Ministerial utterances on those occasions a significance peculiarly distinctive. Viewed in this light, the practical indifference and unconcern revealed in Lord Palmerston's speech at the Lord Mayor's dinner, will wound those with whom he faintly professes to sympathise, more deeply than the blundering diplomacy and dexterous balancing of contradictions of Earl Russell or the denunciations of avowed enemies. Lord Palmerston's is an honoured name in Poland and in the Confederate States, and in both countries his frigid commonplaces will dispel cherished illusions.

The drooping spirits of Poland, just abandoned by Lord Palmerston's cabinet to worse cruelties and more inhuman outrages, after sufficiently irritating her foe by a species of diplomatic phlebotomy, will scarcely be cheered by his declaration that within her bloodstained borders "scenes of a lamentable character are taking place," or by the assertion, in which there is nevertheless more truth than in another part of the noble lord's speech, that the struggle is "on the one side, a barbarous system of extermination," and on the other "revenge, venting itself in acts of murder and assassination;" or even by the mildly-expressed hope that the bird of prey will be gently reasoned into mercy to his clutched victim. It is not, however, with Lord Palmerston's treatment of the Polish question that we desire especially to find fault. Poland has her own champions, and she has gained little by their being generally found in the camp of the enemies of another and, to say the least, equally deserving nationality.

It is of the jaunty, careless dismissal of the whole of the grave issues involved in the American struggle that we, and history after us, may justly complain. Two great peoples, whose radical dissemblance is now as patent to all the world as that between the English and the French, are lightly spoken of as "a nation" unhappily "split into two." We might pardon even the chief Minister of England for the slipshod style which treats as a nation a Confederation of States whose very name refutes the idea, whose whole history disproves it, and on none of whose statute books or official acts the words "nation" or "national" are to be found, were it not that this slipshod style in this connection sanctions the miserable slang of the aggressive party in this war, and by a single word justifies the whole scheme of national murder for which the war is waged. Even Earl Russell had the grace to say that the North was fighting for empire, the South for independence. Even the most bigoted partisans of the Federals on this side of the water, even the most passive sympathisers of the South, have not altogether blinded themselves to the inevitable issues of a contest waged with such motives. Lord Palmerston will not thus deprive the North of hope and discourage it from further efforts. To his indifferent eye, "it is impossible to foresee the result." The dignified reserve of the aggrieved side, the uncomplaining endurance, the unobtrusive argumentative assertion of their rights by the Southern people, the calm imperturbable Premier smilingly treats as "blandishments," to be placed in exactly the same scale and to have exactly the same weight as the "threats" of their blustering opponents. Not a word has he to tell the nation over whose destinies he presides, that in so gigantic a struggle they cannot ignore the questions of justice, and that in an issue between moral right and brute force they cannot remain indifferent. He has taken Mr. Seward's view that this war is "an insurrection chiefly confined and adjacent to the Gulf of Mexico," and while he "deplores" this "lamentable state of things," as doubtless Mr. Seward also does, he has felt it the duty of England—to do what? "To maintain a strict and impartial neutrality,"—so he says; but in reality to disregard, to the prejudice of the weaker side, the Paris Convention on the subject of blockades—to exercise the undoubted right of every Government over its own ports in so unusual manner as to exclude the only belligerent who could make prizes on the commerce of the other—to discountenance all other Powers likely to interfere and stop the war—to strain the law against the belligerent who wants ships, and to relax it for him who has the seas open and wants men and munitions—to goad a high-spirited but patient people by repeated insults into absolute non-intercourse—in brief, to use Earl Russell's frank and expressive confession, "to construe the law of nations liberally in favour of the North," i.e., the stronger side.

The Confederate States will not be disappointed by this speech of the Premier's, except in so far as it affects the elevated estimate which had been popularly entertained there of his personal character. They have long since abandoned all expectations, as President Davis has just expressed it most emphatically at Mobile, of aid from Europe. Nor would we be understood as pointing censure against Lord Palmerston individually. In the language held at the Mansion-house he simply represented a transient phase of English thought, or rather, want of thought. His worst fault is, that he was content to represent and express, instead of endeavouring to correct and improve it. This phase is so callously, and yet unconsciously selfish, that most men who now unquestioningly accept it would recoil from its avowal were it nakedly presented to them, either by some living voice that could enforce attention or by the mirror of history. But is it to be wondered at, that when the poised and well-weighed words of the leaders of a nation embody and crystallise such a phase of thought, and become significant only by their poverty of generous purposes, of a fixed policy, or of lofty motives—can it be wondered at, when this is the case, that of such a nation the strong should think that it can be insulted with impunity, and the weak that its friendship is not to be trusted? In other words, can we wonder at the growing arrogance of the Yankees, or the alienation of the Southerners, which statesmen of the Earl Russell school seem industriously, though we trust ineffectually, bent upon rendering permanent and incurable?

From the sentimental cant, which expends itself in fine phrases, without ever solidifying into an honest effort to punish or avert the iniquities it professes to deprecate, we turn with real relief to words which have the old English ring about them. In an article, every sentence of which is the embodiment of ripened thought, and from which we only regret that our space does not permit us to quote more fully, Blackwood's Magazine puts the touchstone of a vigorous manly logic to the false coin of hypocrisy and sophism which has gained such extensive currency among the unwary and thoughtless. It thus concludes its vivisection of "Our Rancorous 'Cousins':"

It would then be a great benefit to clear the question of the ideas or phrases of "cousins," "domestic quarrel," "alliance with slaveholders." It is extraordinary how easily people accept such counterfeit coin, merely because they don't take the trouble to look at it. People write seriously about our American cousins, who are not ambitious of claiming cousin Butler, or cousin Lincoln, or cousin Ward Beecher, or cousin Sumner, as their kin—and, if not these, why so affectionate to the people who seem to regard these as their most famous men? Cousinship is an extremely pleasant relation, as many young persons in this and other countries can testify; but if the term is to be made so inclusive as to take in the American nation, it will become, as Doll Tearsheet says, "as odious as the word occupy, which was an excellent good word before it was ill-sorted." . . . . . We have been frequently told, in the course of this quarrel, especially when any new insult has been inflicted on us, that it is the duty, both of our press and Government, to be extremely forbearing. This transference of the duty of forbearance from the assailant to the assailed is certainly a new doctrine in ethics. And is it consistent with our own character? Is it a fact, that we have attained to our present position, and expect to maintain it, by persevering patience under insult? Do we intend to pursue this course rigidly in future, and to hold out our cheeks alternately to the smiter? In that case, we shall find plenty of hands ready to smite: but we shall scarcely be entitled to rate ourselves as before. Or are we to make this policy of poltroonery applicable only to our relations with the North? If so, excellent reason should be shown for a course that must sink us in the world's esteem and in our own. But if we are bound, as of yore, to uphold, under gravest penalty our honour and independence, as things too sacred to be made the sport of a shifty policy, let us reply to insults, menaces, and aggressions in a tone which can leave no doubt possible that we are prepared to use our power for the assertion of our rights.

The Struggle for East Tennessee.

THE movements of the Federal and Confederate forces, though difficult to trace through the confused and one-sided accounts which reach us from Washington, possess at the present moment an interest which has not been surpassed during the war. At no time since the first encounter at Bull's Run, or the battles on the Chickahominy, have such important issues been involved; nor on any prior occasion has one point of conflict so completely attracted to itself the whole energies, strength, and resources of the two Powers. It would seem as if the whole fury of the war were about to culminate in East Tennessee, and Chattanooga were destined to be the Armageddon of North America. From all parts the Northern armies are being put in motion for the relief of General Thomas's beleaguered force; North, South, and West, are being drained of Federal troops to recruit the thinned and famished battalions standing on their defence in the midst of a hostile country. Roads are forming, long trains of camels are picking their way through well-nigh impassable tracks; great convoys, armies in themselves, are dragging painfully through swelling fords and heavy mud, and with them every available soldier is hurrying to the great battle-field. The Federals boast that General Grant is at the head of 200,000 men, and announce that Chattanooga is safe and East Tennessee won to the Union. But the truth is, that the only reinforcements which have reached the Tennessee River belong to the army which Hooker has pushed along from Nashville via Shelbyville and Tullahoma, and that at the latest date, even including Burnside's isolated corps, the Federal forces available for action in East Tennessee did not reach half that number. We hear of large forces en route from Memphis through Corinth, but we know that their advance had been attacked and badly handled by the Confederate cavalry, and that at Tusculum, on the direct line of march, a formidable body of troops are concentrating and entrenching to bar their future progress. We know, too, that close to their route General Wheeler was in command of an efficient cavalry force, ready at any moment to be thrown upon a weak point and sweep off their wagon trains and mules. A Georgia paper reclaims, as the produce of this active officer's recent raid, 1,160 wagons, 1,000 of which he destroyed, 3,500 mules shot, and 1,000 horses captured; at McMinnville he destroyed thirty days' rations for Rosecrans's entire army, and two trains of cars laden with military stores. If his numbers are anything like as great as they are represented, we may expect to hear of another dash upon the invaders' line of communication, attended with similar results; and in that case the reinforcements that may reach General Thomas will be rather in the way than otherwise. The last reports from Chattanooga were to the effect that they are suffering from want of rations, and that the horses were dying off rapidly, in consequence of the impossibility of obtaining forage. Let our readers picture to themselves the difficulty of transporting forage for the horses of an army of 100,000 men, some 200 miles, over bad roads and through a hostile country, and they will at once see that this want of forage is likely to become a serious danger to the Federal army. The hills of East Tennessee at this season are not good feeding grounds. The Confederate army under General Bragg has for months

"subsisted" in the neighbourhood. We may be sure, therefore, that very little has been left for the invaders. General Thomas may possibly hold his position at Chattanooga against any direct attack for months to come; whether he can feed his troops is another question; for at the present season every day must increase his difficulties, and even an augmentation of his strength may only involve him in greater straits, as swelling the number of mouths to be fed. Advance he cannot. The moral effect of a retreat would be hardly less disastrous than that of a decisive defeat; and we can readily understand why Richmond is exultant as it has never yet been, and why the destruction or capitulation of the Army of the Cumberland is not thought beyond what the South may hope for and even expect.

President Davis is evidently alive to his advantage and determined to press it home. His tour in the South is something more than an inspection. It is an appeal to the people to enable him to make Bragg's victory at Chattanooga the turning point of the war—and a successful one. He asserts that the invading army is in his power if adequate efforts are made by the citizens of the South; and we may rely upon it that nothing which skill, enterprise and gallantry can do, will be left undone by the Southern leaders and their troops. It would seem, indeed, that every movement of Southern troops, with the exception of those engaged in the defence of Richmond and Charleston, and in the campaign in the Tche, is connected with the operations against the Federals at Chattanooga. In Arkansas and Mississippi the Confederates are pressing forward with a view to prevent the despatch of reinforcements to General Thomas. From Mississippi, Alabama, and Georgia troops are marching for East Tennessee. Guerillas are active in Kentucky, and all along the Federal lines of communication between Nashville and Chattanooga. Long before Grant's army can reach the scene of conflict, Johnston and Hardee, with their 60,000 veteran troops, can join Bragg, with the whole resources of Georgia and Alabama at their backs. It is true, Hooker's successful advance may be construed as a sign of Confederate weakness; but we have no reliable accounts of his movements. Unless he has learned modesty by repeated failures, his report of his last battle in no way suggests a decisive victory, and we may still learn that the affair was only a night surprise, and that the Confederates claim all the advantages. If the object of General Thomas were to fight a general action at once, the arrival of Hooker might ensure his safety. If he is only striving to maintain his position throughout the winter, Hooker's force may prove almost an encumbrance. For it is now quite plain no direct attack is intended. The Confederates have withdrawn from the right wing of Thomas's army, and thrown a considerable force between Knoxville and Chattanooga. The communications of the two Federal armies are therefore interrupted, and the object of General Bragg is doubtless to secure the defeat of Burnside's corps as a preliminary to a blow against the communications of General Thomas.

If we interpret General Lee's recent movements aright, they had reference rather to East Tennessee than Washington, and any day may bring us news of Burnside having been compelled to fight against a superior force. But if any disaster befalls Burnside, Kentucky will be open to the guerillas, and the Federalists in Tennessee will be in terrible danger. It would be hardly possible to retain Nashville or Murfreesboro, and keep open the communication from the Cumberland River to Chattanooga after such a blow; and the fall of Nashville means nothing less than the loss of Tennessee to the Union and the destruction of a great portion of the army under Grant. In a week or two we may hope for more precise accounts of the operations and plans of the Confederates. But we believe that the struggle in East Tennessee is only just commenced, and looking at the position, strength, and resources of the two armies, we see no reason to doubt that it will end as it has begun, favourably to the South.

The Imperial Speech.

THE King of Prussia would do well to take a lesson in dignity and courteous language from Napoleon III. We can hardly suppose that the result of the elections was altogether satisfactory to the Emperor. Though we suspect that he neither directed nor approved the violent language and strong measures of his Minister of the Interior, it can hardly have been agreeable to him to see how promptly and angrily the challenge imprudently offered by M. de Persigny was taken up by some of the chief constituencies of the Empire; and the return of some of the members of the anti-Imperial coalition must be displeasing to him, not merely as a sovereign, but as the upholder of civil law and social order in France. But instead of rebuking the country with the petulant ill-humour of his brother monarch, the Emperor accepts its decision gracefully, and thanks the people for the proof of unshaken confidence in his government which the nation at large has given him. He does not ignore the return of some thirty of his personal and political enemies; but he speaks of it frankly as what it really was, the result of local misunderstandings. And, if M. de Persigny had been a little more discreet, it is possible that the election of some of the leading opponents of his policy might not have been displeasing to the Emperor. While the Chambers contained only Imperialists, it was possible for Republicans, Orleanists, and Legitimists to say that the real voice of France was stifled, her real feeling unrepresented, and her true policy subordinated to purely selfish or dynastic objects. Above all, a strong sympathy was excited abroad for men who were supposed to have more liberal views of foreign policy and more honest intentions towards foreign Powers than the Emperor or his Ministers. If we are not greatly mistaken, the session now opened will dispel all these delusions. The factious coalition of the parties hostile to the Government will be speedily dissolved, and their mutual antagonism will prove the utter futility of all hopes founded on the supposed possibility of a fusion among them. Legitimists and Orleanists, Royalists and Republicans, the party of Lamartine and that of Louis Blanc, hate one another far more bitterly than they hate the Emperor; and when they are allowed to speak their minds it will soon be patent that each faction has objects of its own, neither consonant with the welfare nor agreeable to the feelings of the French nation. "Give them rope and they will hang themselves." They will prove themselves impracticable, irrational, reckless of consequences, and contemptuous of principles. They will satisfy France that she has everything to fear from them; they will prove to Europe that, under any of them, France would be far more dangerous than she has ever been deemed while Napoleon III. has directed her policy. These men would not abandon Rome; they would not give up Nice and Savoy; but they would make war in the name of Poland for the frontier of the Rhine, and they would probably pick a quarrel with England in the hope of "avenging Waterloo." We suspect that the little knot of orators and editors who constitute the French Opposition will speedily make both France and Europe thankful that they are, and are likely to remain, powerless to do the evil they contemplate. Without admiring the system or justifying the conduct of the Emperor, it is impossible not to prefer his rule to that of the Republicans and his principles to those of the Socialists. Guizot has damned himself on paper. Thiers will do the same in the tribune. Nothing but silence could preserve for these men the sympathies of Europe; it is well, therefore, for the Emperor, that they should be allowed to speak. Let them once declare to Europe that they approve the occupation of Rome, and condemn the occupation of Mexico; that they would fain help the Federal Government to crush the independence of the South, and establish that of Poland against Russia; that they abhor war in Cochin-China, but would welcome war on the Rhine; that they condemn the liberation of Italy, but approve the annexation of Savoy; that, as some of the most eminent and moderate among them have declared, they would forgive the deeds of December to any sovereign who would restore the glories of 1802; and Europe will rest satisfied for the future that the reign of Napoleon III. is the best for the world, and far too good for the French Liberals.

Napoleon III. has a good right to congratulate his country on the development of her commerce and the progress made by her industry. It is to him, to his own statesmanship, and his thorough comprehension of her wants, to the courage which has induced him to carry through, in despite of popular alarms, the measures which he saw to be necessary for the public good, and to the firm will and decision judgment which refused to be frightened or argued out of a wise commercial policy, that France owes the vast improvement in her condition which has taken place since 1851. The Emperor has given her order: the first necessity of commerce. He has given encouragement to trade and manufactures, which was sorely needed in France, though it might seem superfluous to English observers. He has contrived to utilise the hoardings of the peasants; he has instituted financial operations which have succeeded so admirably and done so much to develop the resources of the country, that we are beginning to imitate them in England. With a heavy taxation and an increasing debt, France has grown rich under his guidance. He has so greatly improved the condition of the labouring classes, that he feels able to relax the laws which were thought necessary, some years ago, to prevent the continual risk of that most dangerous form of discontent which arises from the fear of famine; and the promised relief of the bakers from the restrictions on their trade, trifling as it seems in itself, is the result and the proof of great achievements in the field of social amelioration. It was an enemy who, reviewing the present and past condition of France, remarked: "Perhaps, after all, it was not the First Napoleon that was Napoleon the Great." And certainly it is not to the First Napoleon that France has most reason to be grateful.

Those who imagine that the policy of the Emperor has no object but the maintenance of his dynasty, and that he looks for the accomplishment of that end to achievements popular with the army and gratifying to the vanity of the nation, if they are not silenced by the results of his domestic administration, ought to be convinced by a very cursory glance at his foreign policy. That has been anything but consonant with their theory; it has been sometimes prudent, sometimes generous, often brilliant and almost always successful; but it has never been popular. The Emperor is in advance of the country; his enterprises are too farsighted, his diplomacy is too patient and temperate, to suit the taste of France. The Crimean war was extremely unpopular; the English alliance is approved by statesmen, but is not relished either by the army or the multitude; the Italian campaign was exceedingly obnoxious to a great proportion of the people; the distant expeditions in which France has lately engaged are the work of the Emperor alone, and would never have been sanctioned by a plebiscite. A campaign in Belgium—a war for the left bank of the Rhine—a quarrel with England—would suit the temper of the people and gratify the army; but these distant wars, which condemn the soldier to years of exile, in which France does not see the glory she is winning, and by which her neighbours are not humiliated nor her frontiers extended, do not tend to make the Emperor a favourite either with the troops or with the populace. The expedition to Mexico is the most honourable and useful in which the French armies were ever engaged. It has given back to civilisation and commerce the richest region of the earth. It has restored order and prosperity to a great empire. It has broken for ever the arrogant pretensions of an insolent and encroaching republic. It has created for France an ally with the finest position in the world; with ports on two oceans and holding the key to two continents. It has given her a claim on the gratitude of her greatest and nearest continental rival. It has done more for the promotion of French commerce and the perpetuation of French renown than the liberation of Italy. But it has not added to the popularity of the Emperor, and it will be the topic of fierce and angry denunciation in the Chambers. The Emperor serves France too well to secure her gratitude; it is enough if she forgive him for understanding her interests better than she does herself.

The speech is almost silent in regard to the American war; noticing it only as a drawback to the commercial prosperity which France has recently achieved. From this silence some of our contemporaries have inferred that the Emperor intends under no circumstances to interfere in that war. Without pretending to any information on the subject which is not open to all the world, we venture to question this inference. If such had been the determination of the Imperial speaker it would prob-bably have been announced in plain terms; first because it would have silenced the unfriendly criticisms of the Federalist organs in America, France, and England; and secondly, because it would have been but an act of justice and courtesy to the Powers most interested in the matter. Is it not possible that the Emperor's reserve is to be attributed to the fact that he was dissatisfied with the past and uncertain as to the future? It is notorious that he wishes well to the South, and has only been restrained from giving effect to his wishes by the strenuous opposition of England; and we can well understand that he does not care to parade this restraint before the French Chambers. It is not likely that, whatever his future policy, he will proclaim it to the world before the moment at which he is prepared to act. He will neither give notice to England that he is thinking of separating his policy from hers until he is convinced that such separation is inevitable, nor will he invite the United States to pick a quarrel with him until he sees that a quarrel must come and that the time is ripe for it. The only thing, then, which seems to us certain is, that his silence does not mean that he is determined to do nothing; but simply that he is not determined to act immediately. For our own part, we have always warned the Confederate States that their independence must be achieved by themselves. All they can hope from Europe is that, when her patience is exhausted, she will for her own sake put a period to the war. Neither France nor England will go to war, or incur the chance of war, out of pure good-will to the South; neither Power is likely to persist in the policy of non-intervention after it is convinced that that policy is dangerous and disastrous to its own interests. The days of national chivalry, we fear, are past.

Some people, we know, think otherwise. There are some who wish England to draw the sword in the cause of Poland. There are a good many Frenchmen who wish France to do so; though few of them intend that Russia shall be her only enemy, or Poland the sole gainer by the collision. The Emperor, if not a better, is a wiser man than any of these enthusiasts. He knows that France will, under no circumstances, be allowed to possess herself of the Rhenish Provinces. He knows that France would not be satisfied if a Polish war had no other result than the liberation of Poland; if it added a hundred millions sterling to the debt of France, without adding an acre to her territory. He is not, moreover, partial to European wars. They involve great sacrifices and great dangers, and they promise no commensurate prizes. At the same time he is anxious to serve the Poles, and he knows that on this point the sympathies of France are with him. He sees, also, that the Polish question is not the only one that menaces the peace of Europe. The dispute between Denmark and Germany, the aspirations of Italy, the condition of northern Turkey, the discontent of Hungary, all promise ill for the future; they must be settled by the sword, if not by negotiation; and in no one of these questions will it be possible, the sword being once drawn, for France to remain neutral. Therefore, the Emperor desires a general Congress to revise and correct the work of the Congress of Vienna; and if it were probable that such a measure would accomplish the object in view the world would have cause to be grateful to its originator. The national pride of France, which is concerned in the dissolution of the treaties of 1815, could not be gratified more cheaply; the peace of Europe could not be secured in a manner more satisfactory or more honourable.

Unhappily we see no reason to hope that such a Congress could be successful. That of Vienna sat just after the conclusion of a great war, which had effaced all the landmarks of Europe, and made a tabula rasa, on which the Congress could draw what frontier-lines it pleased. This is not the case now. Again, in 1815 the preponderating voice rested with England, which had nothing to ask and nothing to resign; and nevertheless the Congress was forced to do many unjust and undesirable acts to gratify the selfish ambition of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. We see no reason to think that Russia and Prussia are more reasonable now; and we see great reason to think that they will pay less regard to the moderating voice of France—the Power which must take the lead in 1864—than they paid to England in 1815. Again, they will be called upon, not to renounce aggrandisement at the expense of others, but to resign what they already possess; and we see no hope that they will consent to make such a sacrifice. We have little hope that Austria will voluntarily give up Venetia; we have no hope whatever that Russia will relax her gripe on Poland, or Prussia abandon her designs on Holstein. We fear that the proposed Congress can result only in a diplomatic quarrel and a general state of distrust and mutual resentment. And therefore, while we give full credit to Napoleon III. for a sincere desire to earn the gratitude of Europe by a great peaceful revolution and reorganisation, we confess our own belief that revolutions must be made by force, and that reorganization must be preceded by such a dissolution of existing ties as the sword only can accomplish.

GENERAL SAM. HOUSTON OF TEXAS.

We hear from Texas, through the Richmond papers, of the death of a noted personage in General Sam Houston of Texas. There have been several previous reports of his death, since the beginning of the war, which have proved to be premature; this is probably authentic, for time and place are given. He has had a long and chequered career, and figured in important affairs that have had great influence on the destinies of this Continent; and though he survived to the patriarch's age of three-score-and-ten, they who have lived nearest to him are at a loss to decide whether he was a sincere man, an able man, or even a brave man, or only a successful charlatan in politics and war.

Houston was born in the State of Virginia, in 1793; but the conclusion of the war with Great Britain, in 1815, found him an officer in General Jackson's army, in the South-west. He settled in Tennessee, in the profession of the law, but soon got into political life. His first civil office was that of District Attorney; he became then Major-General of the State Militia, and was Representative in Congress during the presidency of Mr. Adams, in opposition to whom he joined zealously in the support of General Jackson. He did not make much figure in Congress, being remarkable only for a certain recklessness of private conduct and political radicalism, which at that time distinguished the young members from the West. During the Jackson excitement Houston was elected Governor of Tennessee, at which point his political career in the United States was brought to an abrupt suspension, by a domestic incident, the mystery of which has never been cleared up. He had addressed a young lady of Tennessee, and the marriage took place, it was said at the time, less through the persuasions of friends than the attachment of the bride. If that were true, it is singular that it should have been he that deserted her, which he did, a few days after marriage. The common version of the story is that it was the next day. They were never reconciled, and no reason was ever assigned for his extraordinary conduct. The public opinion ran strongly against him at home. For that cause, or from the original cause of grief, he abandoned his home, renounced civilised life, and went to dwell among the Indians, giving himself up to their customs and way of life. Some years afterwards he re-appeared at Washington in Indian costume, but soon discarded that and emigrated to Texas, which was then in the first throes of the revolution, for independence from Mexico. Houston soon became identified with that struggle, and rose rapidly to be President of the republic, and commander-in-chief of her armies, and was in that capacity at the battle of San Jacinto, where Santa Anna was defeated and made prisoner and the war practically closed, for no subsequent attempt was ever made by Mexico to reconquer the territory. The early popularity showered upon Houston in Texas is attributed by his adversaries to the favour in which he was supposed to be held by General Jackson, then President of the United States, which combined in his favour, the great confidence and admiration entertained towards General Jackson, and the political results to be hoped from him in the interests of Texas.

The battle of San Jacinto was a culminating point in his military career, and afforded him an inexhaustible capital for his subsequent political advancement. With the voters he was always the "Hero of San Jacinto," the founder of Texan Independence, especially with that multitude who thronged in to fill up the country. General Houston became the leader of a party, and every impeachment of his title to these epithets was resented by his followers as springing from the malice of rivals. But there is nothing more unsettled in contemporary history than Houston's conduct in that battle. The old Texans generally, and especially the officers who were with him in the army, have denied him any military merit, and even disputed his personal courage. Numerous pamphlets have been written by military men of unquestionable character, averring, and giving specifications of their charges, with names and places to sustain them, that he was destitute of military knowledge and capacity; that he never succeeded except through the greater blunders of the Mexicans or by the superiority of some one of his subordinates; and that at the battle of San Jacinto, so far from having shown soldierly qualities, he would not have fought at all if he had not been forced into it by his officers, and that throughout the battle he was bewildered and panic-struck. It would be a marvel if some of these were not true—though much is doubtless exaggerated—for never was such a mass of accusations heaped upon a general after a victory and in the hour of a national triumph. Such things could not be without any cause. It may be said for him, for as much as it is worth, that these charges, constantly repeated, and many serious faults besides, did not break his hold upon the voting masses of the State as the undoubted hero of San Jacinto, even when most of the intelligence of the State was against him. It used to be noted in Texas that an educated person travelling, in the State, and associating with persons of his own class would rarely meet with a political supporter of Houston and would infer that his career was closed; but when the elections came on his supporters would be found triumphant at the polls and in the legislature, and acting with them would be discovered many who in private abused their chief. A man of whom this could truly, that he had through a series of years, managing a wild and turbulent population, lived down his manners, associated with them constantly, skilfully managed their prejudices, and still kept his hold on their imaginations so as to retain popularity, may have lacked the capacity to be a statesman and failed as a military commander, but must have had rare and vigorous qualities. He may have been unstable and unprincipled, but could not be imbecile or a poltroon.

As soon as the battle of San Jacinto secured the peace of Texas commenced the agitation in both countries for annexation to the United States. General Houston was President of Texas during a good part of the time, though not at the time when the union of the two countries was effected, and in that capacity directed his cabinet and foreign ministers, and afterwards wrote voluminously on the subject as a citizen; and yet has left it in doubt whether his inclinations were ever really in favour of annexation. He never seems to have assented cordially to either of the two propositions by which the measure was mainly defended: that Texas could not by possibility maintain a government strong enough to support her independence against the encroachments of European Powers; and that her accession to the Union was indispensable in order to frustrate the schemes of France and England, as well against Texan independence as against the power and progress of the United States, and especially against the peace of the Southern States. He either did not believe in such schemes or was indifferent to them, if they could be turned to the use of upholding Texas. He was, therefore, but a cold and capricious advocate of annexation. When it was effected under his successors, amidst the enthusiastic plaudits of the people of Texas, and he was taunted for not having been its friend, he replied that he had been merely "coquetting" with France and England, only to stimulate the desires of the people of the United States. But the suspicion which was entertained at the time never died out entirely, that he would have defeated annexation, if he could, and had believed possible to maintain the republic until his ambitious dream could be realised of extending itself in the opposite direction and building up a new confederacy with the States of Mexico.

When Texas was received into the Union, General Houston was elected one of the first two senators in the United States senate and was re-elected. His career there was not distinguished by any remarkable statesmanship or ability. It was eccentric and ambiguous. He was scarcely heard of during the Mexican war—in which annexation had involved the United States—but when peace was made, and territory was acquired, and the question sprung up concerning the rightful disposition of it he was found temporising with the objects of his early animosity—the political fanatics of New England—and joining with them in assailing the more sturdy supporters of the Southern Rights as enemies of the Union they were striving to make worth preserving. These new associates suddenly changed their old contemptuous estimate of him into judicious laudation, and talked of him occasionally as a possible candidate for the Presidency, on whom a Conservative success might be obtained against the Democratic party, whose half-way and equivocal support of the Southern views of constitutional rights began to be imputed to them as sympathy with disunionism. Conservatism, among the people of the North, had come to mean so much prudence and policy in the prosecution of schemes for sectional aggrandisement, as not to alarm the South into unity of resistance; and, at the South, to mean the positive support of the Union, in the hope that in some unexplained way it might be made consistent with their safety. General Houston was among those hopeful compromisers, giving way on the compromises of 1850 and in the Kansas controversies which followed. He grew into favour with the North but began to lose his hold on the people of Texas. They were not prepared for the extreme measure of separation for what had occurred; but they had begun to see that compromise and conservatism were preparing the way to utter subjugation, and that with every new concession from their constitutional rights the power of resistance was growing weaker and their ruin made more certain. For the first time in his career General Houston fell into a minority in his own State, and seeing the set of the tide against him, withdrew from the field, and at the conclusion of his term went into private life—a martyr as Northern friends asserted, to his love for the Union. But his political vitality was not so easily extinguished. The Union feeling was still strong in portions of the State; and skilfully availing himself of that and of the internal quarrels of the Democratic party, and aided by local topics of irritation—he became an independent candidate for Governor, and was elected by a large majority. He held that place during the Presidential election of 1860, but was not heard of much, the State feeling being largely in favour of J. W. Breckinridge, the candidate of the party of the South.

The secession of South Carolina followed, and yet General Houston had given no sign on which side he was to be in the struggle, which had commenced. The excitement in the State was universal, but the Governor was mute. He withheld all co-operation in the measures proposed, by which the sense of the people of the State on the nature and duties of the crisis could be taken. It is not necessary, in order to trace his course, to review the whole progress of the controversy. The people of the State persisted in their primary action and called a convention, which was approved and concurred in by the State legislature, regularly chosen, and by their decision Texas joined the Southern movement for liberation and independence. General Houston acquiesced, but by no means graciously, and seemed to go with his State. It was constantly avowed, however, at the North, that he was opposed to the Southern Confederacy, and would co-operate in any effort to restore the Union. It has been denied for him by his Southern friends that he ever entertained either the hope or the design. It may be doubted, considering his temperament, and looking into his history, how far his acquiescence in the actions of his State might have been relied upon, if the Administration of the United States had conducted the war on different principles. Houston was in private life, aged and infirm, and there was no motive left for him to become prominent in public affairs. But it is as certain as anything can be said to be, that, after the development of the war policy of Mr. Lincoln General Houston declared to his friends against it, against the Administration, and against the policy of re-union or re-construction, without reservation. Several short speeches, into which he had been drawn, breathe the utmost abhorrence of the war and the most uncompromising adherence to the cause of Southern independence.

The Northern journals which speak of him continue to praise him as a "good and great" man, who would have been prepared to assist in the reconstruction of the Union, such as a successful war would make it. They over-rated even his endurance, as they do that of many others, who, because they could once be reckoned as adversaries of secession, are counted now as possible partisans of the North. Nothing can be more delusive than such notions. The most prominent men in the Southern Confederacy and the most resolute in their adherence to Southern independence, at all costs and to the last extremity, the most unmeasured in their denunciation of every form of possible re-association with the North, are the men who hesitated longest before accepting the necessity, and who refused to believe the hideousness of the Northern character, until the war developed it in all its effrontery of crime. Of such men are Alexander H. Stephens of Georgia, Vice-President of the Southern Confederacy, and Thomas H. Watts, of Alabama, now Governor of that State, late Attorney-General of the Confederate States; William C. Rives, of Virginia, formerly United States Minister to France; John Bell, of Tennessee, once United States Secretary of War, and Conservative candidate for the Presidency in 1860; and E. Geo. Rencau, of Louisiana; and I might name scores of others. Confining myself only to old line Union Whigs—men of the most unblemished character, who were long and late Unionists, but are now straining every nerve to kindle and sustain the Southern resolve, never again, come what may, to submit to the rule of a Government in which the North has any part.

General Houston is not to be classed with these men in their political steadfastness or in weight of character; but it is true of him, as of them, that the North made it impossible for any man of the South to be a unionist without being poltroon or traitor, or both.

A SOLDIER'S STORY.*

We have had a good many books on the American war, from different points of view. Curiously enough, not a single work of interest or value has emanated from any Northern writer: probably because no one could write on that side without making up his mind either to be torn in pieces by his countrymen for speaking the truth, or to be consigned to ridicule and contempt by the rest of the world, as the most unscrupulous liar that ever wrote history. It is impossible for any one, except such experienced authors of fiction as Mr. Seward and Mr. Stanton, to write an account of the war which shall not call down upon the Federal Government, its officers and a large proportion both of the army and of the people of the North, the execration of the civilised world and the ridicule of all military readers. There are but two works on the Northern side that it is possible to read. The political argument of Mr. Ellison, and the military narrative of the French Princes. The South has as much the best of it in the literary conflict as on the field of battle. Mr. Spence and General Williams have unanswerably disposed of the question of moral and political right; Mr. Pollard is the sole "historian" of the war; Captain Chesney's "Review of the Campaigns in Virginia," though written with strict impartiality, is, from the necessity of the case, a tribute to the superiority of Southern strategy; even the false and malignant narrative of a pretended colonel and probable spy who once served under General Wise, though written with a violent Northern bias, serves inevitably to prove the case of the Confederates; and a dozen narratives of experiences in Southern travel have met in this country a reception which proves the popularity of the subject, and a kind of hostile criticism which shows what has been their effect, in the opinion of Federal partisans, upon public feeling in England. In its way, the work before us is perhaps the best that has yet appeared. It is not of much value as a history of military operations and strategic policy; for a subaltern never knows very clearly either what the commander-in-chief actually designed, or what the troops have contrived to accomplish. He sees the general result; he knows the part which his own corps has borne in the strife; he hears the experiences and opinions of others; but he does not see what is taking place throughout the field, nor has he any peculiar means of appreciating the difficulties encountered and the strategy employed. The interest of these volumes is of another kind; and the best passages are those which relate the personal adventures and observations of the author, or describe the scenes in which he was an actor. Writing with great naïveté, and with an unusual freedom from offensive egotism or conscious purpose, he gives us an excellent idea of camp life, especially during the earlier stages of the war. He is too much accustomed to Southern peculiarities to think it needful either to conceal or to comment on them; and when he incidentally notices the faults inherent in the character of their troops, or the mistakes originally committed in their organisation, he does so with a simple good faith which convinces his readers that he is stating the exact truth, as it appeared to him; not softening a disagreeable fact which he is reluctantly compelled to admit, or stating a part in order more effectually to conceal the whole. He writes with perfect frankness; and his soldierly freedom from all affectation of straitlacedness allows him to say, with amusing insouciance, things which would afford to writers more prone to moralise occasion for grave condemnation or evasive excuse. That the Southern soldier drinks, after the manner of his nation, more than his officers think good for him, seems to the good-humoured English combatant no reason either for shame or sermonising; that insults are now and then resented with the bowie-knife, instead of the more deliberate method of a challenge and a duel in cold blood, suggests to him, not the propriety of stricter discipline, but the necessity of refraining from such provocations as a freeman cannot be expected to endure, even at the hands of a military superior. The naïveté which allows him to relate such things without comment or surprise is a guarantee for the fidelity of his story, and the truthfulness of his enthusiastic praises of his comrades. The life-like character of his sketches and the vivacity of his style make his book very pleasant reading. But we could wish that the letters which relate the simultaneous progress of events in different parts of the Confederacy had been omitted. We don't believe in their genuineness. They resemble the rest of the book in style, and they differ from it in this: that they want for the most part the internal evidence which conclusively proves the narrative of the Virginian campaigns to be the work of an eye-witness. On the whole, however, we fancy that readers who sit at home at ease will obtain a better idea of "what the war is like," from these volumes than from any other source; and we hope that they may enjoy the popularity they certainly deserve.

Of some of the advantages enjoyed by the South, which have counterbalanced the Northern superiority in wealth, numbers, navy, and every species of military material, these volumes give us a very good idea. They bear testimony to the universal enthusiasm of the people; the eagerness with which companies and regiments were filled up, and the envy with which those who were first ordered to the seat of war were regarded by the comrades they left behind; the willingness with which the conscription was admitted, in spite of its questionable legality—discussion on that point being postponed till the war should be over—the high spirit and loyalty of the conscripts as they came in; the thorough devotion of the people to the cause; the patriotic enthusiasm of the women, and the pressure brought by them to bear upon all men of military age. The "English Combatant" remarks that the position of a private, as involving greater hardships and greater sacrifices for the common cause, was deemed more honourable than that of an officer, and was a readier passport to the favour of the ladies; whose attention to the wounded is affirmed, perhaps with some gallant exaggeration, to have made the chances of a rifle ball or sabre cut seem almost desirable to those who were suffering the wants and privations of a campaign. Of the superiority of the Southern Generals it is hardly necessary to speak; but one remark is made by our author which ought not to pass without notice. Very few general officers, and none of the highest rank, in the Northern army have fallen on the field of battle, and wounds have been rare among them. They are seldom seen in front, and rarely exposed to personal danger. The Confederate commanders expose themselves with exaggerated indifference. One commander-in-chief has been killed, and another wounded, in pitched battles; several generals of the second rank—Stonewall Jackson, Zollicoffer, Ashby, McCulloch, for example—have been killed in the front of their troops. Without accusing the Northern Generals of cowardice, it is only just to their troops to remark that that superior disregard of danger which characterises the Southerners is not less remarkable in the highest ranks than in the lowest; that in their greater caution and reserve under fire, the Yankee soldiers only imitate the example of their leaders.

Two other facts deserve to be mentioned in regard to the Southern leaders. One is the unselfish patriotism with which the best men employed in the service of the Union threw up their commissions, declined all Northern offers, and without stipulation or hesitation—often at great personal risk and sacrifice—offered their swords to their native States. The other is a statement made in "camp gossip," by one of the author's comrades, that this conflict had been long ago foreseen and provided for by President Davis; who had noted down the names of promising students at West Point and of distinguished officers in the army, with their respective capacities and peculiarities, when Secretary of War under the Federal Government, so that he knew at once who and where were the men on whose knowledge and character he might rely, and who were fitted to fill high military offices under his Administration.

Mr. Davis has been accused of many crimes and misdemeanours, and among others of actual cowardice during the advance of McClellan upon Richmond. It is said that he had packed up everything for flight, and by so doing had spread a general panic through the city. The "English Combatant" takes a very different view of the President's character and conduct. He remarks that no man could possibly be guilty of all the charges brought against him, as personally responsible for every unpopular act or military blunder:—

"Of President Davis I knew something, but nothing in his character was like the picture angrily drawn of him by the unthinking. He could not attend to everything; after appointments were made, the most he could do was to suggest on matters pertaining to the duties or requirements of those in the various chairs of office. It would not only be presumption, but gross ignorance, to suppose that he did this or ordered that. His own duties were more than any dozen men except himself could have pretended to perform; still, although labouring night and day, planning, consulting, providing, receiving visitors, writing, speaking, he was blamed for everything that went amiss. He bore it all, however, without murmuring. The press might abuse him, office-seekers annoy him, petty councillors bore him, mistakes and bickerings of his Cabinet vex him; State, political, social, or religious deputations pester him with demands, petitions, and a thousand other daily annoyances; yet, the poor, pale, hard-working President bore it all with philosophic equanimity. Putting on his blue flannel overcoat, he would mount his chestnut mare, smoke a cigar, and take a quiet ride, unattended, through the streets in the afternoon, as calmly and unostentatiously as if he were merely Mr. J. Davis, proprietor of a 200 acre farm, with a round dozen of bouncing babies. Heigho! who would envy the poor President? If a negro were worked a twentieth as much, his master would be imprisoned or fined for inhuman treatment."

It is not true that the President set or encouraged the example of panic in Richmond. The panic was very general; but those who were in the confidence of the Administration did not share it. "There was not the slightest trepidation observable in the government offices; all things went on as usual, and President Davis took his evening ride as placidly as ever." Indeed, it was a positive assurance given by him to Governor Letcher, that Richmond should be held to the last, which alone sufficed to allay the general consternation.

The "English Combatant," like most men who have seen anything of slavery, has no sort of sympathy with the Abolitionists. He finds the negroes heartily loyal, thoroughly happy, attached to their masters, contemptuous of the Yankees and far more likely to fight for than against the Confederacy. He tells us some amusing stories of negroes who could not be kept out of the fight by the energetic commands of their masters; but who insisted on leaving the cookery and camp equipage to take care of themselves, while they followed the regiment to which they were attached into action. Some of them captured negro camp-followers of the enemy, and were by no means sparing in the epithets of abuse and contempt bestowed upon them. The following estimate of the negro's condition, by a Southern slaveholder, is worth attention, as a contrast to the pictures drawn by Mrs. Stowe and other Abolitionists, who knew no more of slavery than Mr. Beecher does of Christianity or General Butler of chivalry:—

"I know districts in Mississippi where there are not more than one or two old white men to a slave population of from 3,000 to 5,000. In fact, all our plantations are conducted by the negroes themselves, in the absence of overseers or masters. I have offered large salaries for overseers for my places, but they never stay long—they are all off to the wars. My wife informs me that all things are progressing quietly and favourably as ever—my mulatto boy Bob superintends the Upper, and Black Jim the Lower Place, and have raised excellent crops in my absence. Talk to me of our darkies rising to massacre the whites! Why, I wager my life that all the inducements in the world could not draw off my servants from me. Most have grown up from childhood with me, and lived as I have done; and when one of these rabid Abolitionists counts the cost of keeping servants, he would be loth to expend as much upon white labour. Just look at Nick out there, round the camp fire, kicking up his heels in a dance! That boy costs me much more—yes, double what I should have to pay for cook hire in Europe; and more than that, when he gets old, no matter how much money he may have by him, I am compelled by law to provide for all his wants. Think you that the major's boy would buy his freedom, although to my knowledge he has 2,000 dollars in gold, hid away in an old stocking? You know as well as I do, that all our boys are making money—some as much as twenty dollars per week—by washing, cooking, selling things, and the like; but reason with them about buying their freedom, at ever so low a figure, and they grin, jingle the dimes in their greasy pockets, and tell you, 'Massa likes better dan I kin, and when dis chile gits ole, Massa must take care ob him.' And sure enough we must. They argue, and to the point it seems to me, thus:—'I am master's boy, and must do what he tells me. No matter what the price of things may be, I must be well fed and clothed, and my health carefully attended to by his own physician, or some other, even should he have to pay ten dollars for a visit. He gives me from one to two dollars every week for spending-money. I live in the house with him, grow up with him, attend him in all his sports; my wife lives with me, and he takes care of both, in sickness or health, in youth or age. If I do not act properly, he sells me, but few negroes are sold who mind their business.'"

"Count up the cost in times of peace, and tell me whether this and my other boys do not cost me more than two and a half or three dollars per week, the average wages of two-thirds the labourers in Europe. And more than this: I can't tell one of my boys 'I don't need your services, when grown old; the law forbids it, even if I were so inclined. But who would be inclined to part with a boy, even like grumbling Nick yonder, who played with him when a child, whose mother rocked him in the cradle, and whose father taught him the first use of a gun, how to swim, how to catch and ride a horse, and a thousand other things? There may be, and no doubt are, many who feel differently; but, speaking for myself, I could not part with my negroes, even if assured that the capital invested in them would return me five times as much as in ordinary commerce. They receive three suits of clothes every year, and shoes as often as they need; their holidays are fixed by law; in wet weather they are kept within doors; they have good, comfortable cabins, plenty of fuel, and little garden-patches to cultivate for themselves; as for their hen-roosts, they are better stocked than my own. If I want eggs or garden-stuff, I buy from them while Nick yonder, and several others of my boys, have full license to cut all the timber they desire into cord-wood, and sell it to steamboats for their own pocket-money. Three of these fellows have sold $400 worth of cord-wood to the boats in one year; many other boys also; and none of the masters ever get a cent for the timber. In fact, I have frequently acted as clerk for them when in the field, and sold hundreds of cords to steamboats—the money being handed over to the black rascals, who trot off to the first store and spend it. I tell you, Tom, you cannot induce one of my boys to leave me, at any price. My motto is, 'If my servants are discontented with all I do for them, let them run off if they choose.' They always come back again, I notice, and behave better than before."

THE "CHURCH AND STATE REVIEW" for November. The present number of this periodical contains several able articles on political and ecclesiastical topics. We cannot agree with the opinions expressed on the Polish question. We think that there is no analogy between the positions of Ireland and Poland. The one has become an integral part of the Empire, and is fully and firmly represented in the national journals. Irishmen occupy the highest position in the State, not because they are Irishmen, but because Irishmen are British subjects. With Poland we need not say all this is different. Probably the conduct of Russia has been in some instances misrepresented, and her faults often grossly exaggerated, but enough is known to justify the condemnation that has been passed on her by the civilised world in respect to her treatment of the Poles. "Our American Policy" is a sensible contribution, and points out that our so-called neutral policy is in fact an alliance with the North against the South. The diary for the month will be found a useful compilation.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, October 27.

THE army news, since the sailing of the last Cunard steamer, is not very fruitful of events. Of rumours and speculations there have been plenty. General Lee, after advancing and driving the army of Meade before him, almost into the entrenchments about Washington, withdrew at his leisure, destroying roads and bridges behind him, so as to make it impossible for the Federal armies, however strongly recruited, to make any forward movement in force towards Richmond for at least five or six weeks. The Northern journals, which discovered masterly strategy only in Meade when he was forced back, and burned some of his stores in his hurry, amused their readers with stories about Lee's flight, and the "hot pursuit" which was made after him. He went back very slowly, and has since turned up on this side of the Rappahannock, routing the Yankee cavalry and infantry with heavy losses. It is now confessed in the Washington telegrams that the Army of the Potomac is in all probability to be laid up for the season in quarters about the capital, or in the mud between there and the Rappahannock. There is some talk of a change of bases, and mysterious hints are given out of some new movement, which is to be sudden, brilliant, and successful; but the signs confirm the opinion I have expressed, that the campaign on the Potomac is substantially over for the season.

Both parties are concentrating their forces for a great struggle in East Tennessee. The manoeuvring of Lee in Virginia is thought now to have had the design of covering the movements for sending large reinforcements from the armies in Virginia to the support of Bragg, and of placing such obstructions in the way of any advance upon Richmond as would release him from the necessity of keeping so large a number of his best troops there. This is the theory of the various movements going on in the great field of operations, extending from the Potomac to the mountains of Georgia, and west to the Mississippi. The reports from the South-western expedition—from New Orleans into Texas—are not encouraging to the Union arms. The first column was, as you know, repulsed at the Sabine Pass. The second, by the way of the Red River, after burning a town or two, by way of diversion, returned, re-infecta. The main body then made its advances from Berwick Bay directly for the Sabine River, in large force, and the New Orleans journalists gave the most cheering accounts of its progress: scattering a few bands of guerillas, and penetrating, with scarcely any obstruction, into the interior. Private correspondence, however, tells a very different tale. The natural difficulties of the country, aggravated by the care of the Confederates to remove or destroy everything which could be of service to an enemy, and assisted by the weather, which has converted the roads into bog-holes, are said to have wearied out the expedition before it had got half through its march to the Texas frontier. It is found almost impossible to carry food and drag artillery; and, besides, the feuds between the Eastern and the Western troops have grown up into such a height as to demoralise the whole army. The Western soldiers, who call themselves for distinction "Grant's men," have a hearty contempt they are not slow in expressing, for the Yankees, who have been shipping off the plunder of Louisiana to New England, and freeing and stealing negroes, while the men from Illinois and Wisconsin and Indiana were taking Vicksburg and Port Hudson. The Western soldiers have a great hatred of New England puritanism and fanatical abolitionism, and it is said, and believed, that these feelings have broken out on the march into bickerings and quarrels that have sadly damaged the expedition. A great deal of this is confirmed in detail, by letters from officers in the army, which have not been printed; and it goes to strengthen the reports which are now in circulation, that the entire expedition is a failure and will be recalled. It is certain, that at the latest accounts, General Banks and General Franklin were both in New Orleans, having returned from the army; and report goes, that the invasion of Texas is to be attempted at another point, by an expedition entirely re-organised. The point intimated is Matagorda Bay.

Among the strange military incidents of the week, is the removal of General Rosecrans from the command of the army of the Cumberland. General Thomas succeeds him. The strangeness of the incident is, that until within a few weeks, in fact, until after the battle of Chickamauga, General Rosecrans has been the most universally popular commander in the Federal armies, not excepting General Grant, who since the capture of Vicksburg has risen to be the popular idol. He has been called of as the very bravest and best of the Union generals, who ought to be general-in-chief, or at least to command the army of the Potomac and be the captor of Richmond. Since the battle before Chattanooga he has been very unpopular with the Administration, and has now been removed. Immediately, the organs of the Administration at Washington assail him in the most abusive terms, for faults and delinquencies which, if true, would destroy his military and personal character; not only in respect to the battle in which he suffered his late defeat, but for a long period before. He is charged with military incapacity, even cowardice in the field; and with a long course of complicity in the most infamous transactions, for speculation and gain, within his military department. If half of what is written of him be true, as it is published in the Government journals at Washington City, under the very eyes of the Secretary of War, Rosecrans has been as rapacious, as mean, and as cruel as Butler himself. These charges, whether true or not, to the extent in which they are made, prove, at least, one thing, which is worth noting, as illustrating the morals which its own friends attribute to the administration of the Government. It is alleged that all these offences have been known to the administration for a twelvemonth, and that they have been authenticated and pressed upon its attention by the highest Union authorities in the department of Tennessee, where the incidents occurred; and that no action was taken, because the Administration was not prepared to deal with a successful and popular general. The excuse for them, is that they countenanced and supported a man guilty of infamous offences because he was useful; and that they have discarded him now, not for his crimes, but because he has ceased to be useful; not because they knew, as it is alleged, they knew all the time, that he has been incompetent as a commander and dishonest as a man; who had, neglected his public duties and abused his authority in order to enable unworthy favourites to enrich themselves by the basest practices—but that he was no longer valuable as an instrument. He has friends who insist that it was not the loss of the battle of Chickamauga which was the cause of his removal, but that the delinquencies charged against him are ex post facto inventions of his enemies to break the force of their persecution of him, because he has not been so zealous a supporter as they expected him to be of the Government policy of extermination in the South. However that may be, the fact remains, that the nearest organs of the War Department and of the President are justifying the removal of Rosecrans, on the ground that he had been long known at Washington to be immoral and imbecile, but nevertheless kept in office and publicly applauded.

The November elections will be held next week in the States of Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, West Virginia, Minnesota, and Wisconsin.

These are merely State elections, with the exception of Maryland and West Virginia, in which members of Congress are to be elected: five from Maryland and three from West Virginia. There is also a representative to be chosen in Delaware in place of the member who was elected at the regular State election and has since died; and one in the Albany District, New York, in place of Mr. Corning, who was elected and has resigned. These elections will complete the Congress, which meets the first Wednesday of December next, unless the Administration should think it expedient to have elections ordered in the subjugated parts of the seceded States by its military authority. In that case, some new Administration members will be brought in to determine the political character of the House of Representatives and make sure of the Radical ascendancy there.

There is no reason to question the success of the Lincoln ticket for State affairs in all these States—except, perhaps, in New Jersey and New York, where the Opposition have hopes. In Maryland, there has been such a direct intervention of the military powers that no public meetings can be held for the nomination of candidates unless they are in the interest of the Administration. Instances have occurred where men have been arrested for merely having called together one of the customary nominating conventions, and were only released on taking an oath before the United States provost-marshal that they would not put up, nor vote for, nor assist in electing any person to office who is opposed to any part of the policy of the Administration of Mr. Lincoln. They have not reached to this degree of political proscription, by military means, within the States of New York or New Jersey. They carried Pennsylvania, week before last, by a military coup de main, in sending from the army and from the Departments at Washington, at the public expense, enough voters of their own stripe to make up quite the majority by which their favourite candidate was chosen governor. The same plan has been adopted in respect to New York. An order has been issued by the Secretary of War, granting a furlough to all disabled and sick soldiers to return home and remain until after the elections, and transportation is to be furnished them home and back. As in the case of the New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania elections, these furloughs are only given to Administration voters; and the indisposition which is certified as good cause for permission to go home, consists in the disposition and the promise to vote the Administration ticket. The majority for Governor Seymour last year was only 10,000 or 11,000 out of about 600,000 votes, and there is no reason to suppose that the party is stronger now than it was then. A few thousand voters from the army may throw the balance on the other side.

Besides, there is unquestionably a weakening of the party which supported Governor Seymour, from the disappointment of the hopes which were anticipated from his election. It was confidently believed that something would follow therefrom to arrest the progress of the war or change its character. There was a general rally to his side of all that number, be it large or small, who believed the war to be unjust in the beginning, and desired that it might be stopped, as wrong in principle and as having in its progress been altered entirely in the objects for which it was originally undertaken, and by which it was alone excused to the consciences of those who sustained it. These hopes have been bitterly deceived. There has been no progress made towards peace by the Democratic victory in this State last year. On the contrary, the leaders of the successful party have strengthened the war passion by proclaiming a rivalry with their adversaries in zeal for the prosecution of the war and in the furnishing of men and money for that object. They are fighting this political battle as the better war party than the Administration party is, and they seal that pledge by the public declaration that all the questions they have been raising of Constitutional rights, State sovereignty, personal liberty, and public credit, and of the wrongs and cruelties of which they accuse the Administration in its dealings with the South, are entirely secondary in their estimation to the great Yankee demand of undivided dominion over the continent. The Democratic platform here has resolved itself into a sentimental declaration in favour of Constitutional government, if it can be had without sacrifice of territory, but for a consolidated despotism over the whole, rather than two Constitutional republics. There is no room here for a man of constitutional principles, who has no hope for their ascendancy in the further prosecution of this detestable war, to give a vote which will lead to peace; and hence there are thousands of voters in this State, who may give only a cold vote for the Democratic ticket against the Administration, and thousands more who feel a positive indifference between the parties, and do not care much which succeeds.

This sort of disinclination to both war parties prevails very much amongst the poorer classes, by whom the war pressure begins to be felt with increasing severity. While the immense expenditures of the Government in irredeemable paper have given a fictitious value to every species of property and set speculation wild, the depreciation of the currency has raised the prices of every article of daily consumption to a rate which makes the wages of the ordinary labourer almost famine rates. To show the steady increase of the cost of all leading articles of consumption with the price of gold, which is measured by the increase of the paper currency, the following table has been prepared by one of the commercial papers of this city, giving the value of fifty-five leading articles, in units, at the different dates mentioned, and the premium on gold, and the amount of irredeemable paper money afloat at each date:—

	Gold.	Prices. 55 Articles.	Paper outstanding.
January, 1862....	Par.	804	$20,550,326
April, 1862.....	1½ pr'm.	844	105,880,000
January, 1863....	32 pr'm.	1,312	244,366,251
February, 1863...	72 pr'm.	1,400	298,378,201
March, 1863.....	54 pr'm.	1,524	345,553,500
July, 1863.....	25 pr'm.	1,323	408,854,456
October 10, 1863..	54 pr'm.	1,455	410,000,000

The general price of these commodities is eighty per cent. higher this October than it was in February last year. Fifty-five articles, of which the price was $804 then, cost now $1,453. These articles of daily consumption for fuel and food, may be taken as an illustration of the effects of this rise in prices on the poor. Take coal, per ton, and sugar and coffee per 100 lb.

	Coal.	Sugar, $100 lb.	Coffee, $100 lb.	Total.
January, 1862....	$4 25	$6 87	$17 25	$28 37
April, ".....	4 50	6 00	20 50	31 00
March 1863.....	7 00	9 25	28 50	44 75
July, ".....	8 00	10 25	28 50	46 75
October 10 "....	9 00	10 75	30 50	50 25

Wages have not risen in this proportion, and the consequence has been an immense amount of suffering. The rise extends to all articles of clothing and subsistence, while the daily earnings are so little more than their real amount, that the trades are everywhere struggling with their employers, demanding more wages to keep them from starvation during the winter, which threatens to be unusually long and severe. In all the principal cities mechanics are in strikes to extort higher wages from their employers. This puts into the hands of the bad men in power the means for recruiting their armies out of the necessities of the unwilling poor. The poor men must take the bounties and go to the wars, to escape starvation at home, with the alternative, that if his sense of right and wrong would keep him from shedding the blood of people at a distance whom he believes to be fighting for their rights and liberties, Government will come along with a strong hand and put him into the ranks, whether he would or not, and shoot him if he refuses to take the blood money.

This is the unhappy class upon whom the new conscription will fall. The armies of the Union are no longer filled with willing soldiers, who love their flag and fight for the Union because they believe it to be their duty, but the poor, whom the necessity which the Government has created compels to enlist that they may get food, or whom it takes by violence.

The new draft for 300,000 will call for about 60,000 men from the State of New York. The Government has very adroitly turned the tables on its opponents, who, professing the greatest zeal for furnishing troops, attacked the late draft as unjust, oppressive, and totally unnecessary, insisting that with proper inducements, men enough could be obtained by voluntary enlistments. The President, in his proclamation, gives the States until January to supply their quota of this 300,000 by volunteers.

The Conscription Act will be enforced only for the numbers then deficient. The onus is thus placed upon the President's adversaries to raise men for the Government, on their own system, and at their own cost, for all the unusual exertion and expenditure that may be needed. If they fail, he will demand of them unreserved acquiescence in his plan, as a demonstrated necessity. The Democratic governors of New York and New Jersey are out warmly in favour of volunteering, and proffering extraordinary State and individual contributions to offer additional bounties. The Republican Governors do not trouble themselves, and Republican journals are throwing obstacles in the way, in order to obtain the triumph of the Administrative policy, by a recurrence to drafting in January. The President has outwitted his adversaries, and will have his draft with their acquiescence, even if it does not bring him the men.

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, November 10.

This week I can write about nothing but the Emperor's speech, because it, and it alone, is in every one's thoughts. It reigns paramount in the Paris papers, the provincial press, foreign journalism, and the "talk of the saloons"—as private conversation is here euphuistically termed. But to write of the speech, which is a week old, or of the Congress it announces, which is not yet born, are alike difficult tasks, for they have by this time served as themes to the best pens in Europe. And under the diversity of judgment, all of them laudatory, and very unlike each other in their interpretations, there is one point of resemblance: incredulity as regards the proposed Congress. Of the Paris papers, the Presse and the Orleanist Débats alone read the speech as decidedly pacific; the moderate papers find in it a threat, the violent a declaration (in petto) of war; but all agree, hardly even excepting M. de Girardin, that the Congress is a Utopian scheme, and pronounced only as the cover for some more practical one—a means of gaining time for peace—or a mask, however transparent, to conceal the settled purpose of war in spring. During the delivery of the speech Prince Napoleon was seen to gesticulate approbation, and his organ, the Opinion Nationale, exclaims that it is no longer Poland which awaits its fate from the decision of Europe, but the fate of liberal Europe which is involved in the destinies of Poland. Such expressions may be thought more candid than prudent; they may make those who are less "Liberal" than the Opinion, reflect on their meaning, and if sufficiently insisted on, they may go far to change the current of popular ideas—for liberalism is still at a great discount here. Assuredly, they will not tend to convert a King of Prussia, nor even a liberal Emperor of Russia.

It seems a sad satire on human nature to assert that a Congress can only follow a war; that the European council can assemble only to give its sanction to the violations of public law which force has consecrated; and that our statesmen, like dogs, must be beaten to make them amenable to reason; but Experience points to the Treaties of Westphalia, Utrecht, and Vienna, and Reason cannot say her nay. The Emperor Napoleon has created a chimera, which, if he can get the better of, he will be the greatest of past or possible sovereigns. The moralist must wish him this, and all other success, for he aims at a moral victory which even England cannot grudge him, and which the better feelings of all will hail with joy. He will represent Civilisation triumphing over Force, and stand out in history by many columns' length taller than his uncle, who, since I last wrote, stands with a winged Victory in his hand, every inch a heathen Emperor, on the summit of the Place de Vendôme column. When a future generation erects a statue to him, he may claim to bear the Athenian wingless Victory, for the conquests of reason and conciliation are not fleeting. Though such a Victory would be wingless, we may believe that she would not be fettered, and that by some art or other she would make herself felt on the other side of the Atlantic as well as in Europe, and end at length the war which desolates the New World. All the arguments that are used to justify interference in Poland—except that worn-out one of the dead treaties of 1815, killed off after dinner at Blairgowrie, but long since worn out, because if they meant in this respect what is now pretended they should have been enforced thirty years ago—are alike applicable to America. The same arguments—the duration of the struggle, the atrocities perpetrated (in America, all on one side), the guarantee of rights, so far at least as France is concerned, by the treaty of 1772, which, recognising the sovereignty of each State, constituted a defensive alliance with each separately as well as collectively—all plead more strongly for interference in the American than in the Polish struggle.

Of America, the Emperor said nothing in his speech; his silence was of course significant, but of what it is significant there are two opinions: neither interpret it as sympathetic to the North.

The Mémorial Diplomatique, of Sunday, has an article explaining the grounds of the dismissal of the English consuls from the Confederate territory.

"The Confederate Government has just taken a resolution of extreme gravity. It has signified to the English consuls and consular agents resident in the South that it could no longer permit them to exercise their functions or even to continue in the country. The following are the facts which led President Davis to take this decision.

"To understand the displeasure, in fact, indignation, with which this last letter of Mr. Fullarton (consular agent at Savannah) was received in the South, we must put ourselves in the position of the Confederates, and remember that their entire political system reposes on the principle of the Sovereignty of the States: the principle which is the true cause of the American Revolution.

"When the English consul, in an official correspondence, called the American war a civil war, he was saying to the governor of a Sovereign State, whose Government is as regularly conducted as that of England herself, 'You are a rebel, the war you support is a rebellion.' He, the representative of a neutral nation, was thus violating neutrality.

"The Richmond Government did not think fit longer to tolerate on the territory of the Confederation the presence of consular agents so little circumspect, and who had already several times meddled in its affairs.

"In a despatch addressed to Mr. Slidell, Mr. Benjamin charges the representative of the South to assure the Imperial Government that no measure of this sort will be taken against the French consular agents, whose relations with the Confederate authorities continue, as they have been all along, perfectly satisfactory."

It seems that the objection taken to the term "civil war" is rather a strained one, but all impartial persons must agree in acknowledging that the Confederate Government only exercised an unquestionable right in dismissing men who advised soldiers to throw down their arms in sight of the enemy.

A curious question relating to greenbacks engages the attention of the Government of Italy. Two years ago a New York builder obtained a contract for the construction of two iron-sided frigates for that Government. The price was thirteen or fourteen millions of francs. Since then the war has introduced a new circulation, and, taking advantage of the laws of the country, the Turin Government proposes to pay in greenbacks. Mr. Webb's patriotism does not go the length of admitting that this is a sufficient payment. He insists upon gold, which the Italians, who understand economical questions of this sort admirably well, refuse. The affair is to be brought before the courts. In equity, the builder has evidently justice on his side; but a decision in his favour would upset, not only Mr. Chase's theories, but also a large part of the transactions of the last two years.

Although there is not much hope entertained here that the Emperor's proposed congress will come to anything, a general feeling is gaining ground that the chances of a war are diminished. The first impression on financiers on reading the speech was unquestionably that of alarm. The last warning paragraph seemed to them a declaration of war. But the more the speech is studied the more pacific it seems, and now the feeling of security is gaining the upper hand. The Bourse has not recovered, but this is to be ascribed to the high rates of discount and not to political motives. The symptoms of an understanding with Russia, every day more evident, tend to the conviction that if war there be it will not be for Poland.

SLAVERY AND THE BIBLE.

(From the Standard, November 10.)

A certain class of theologians in this country have taken upon themselves to add a new dogma to the Christian faith. A bull issued from Exeter Hall, and recently republished in Scotland, with the enthusiastic approval of several reverend and frantic divines of that country, informs us that a Mr. Newman Hall, by and with the counsel and consent of divers substantial grocers, dissenting preachers, and Deistical authors, decrees that from henceforth it shall be unlawful for any Christian man to hold slaves—or, as our translation of the Bible calls them, servants; and that any one offending in this respect is to be treated as a heretic and apostate, and rejected from the communion, whatever it may be, of which Mr. Newman Hall is a pastor, and, as it would seem, a Pope. We were not aware until now that the doctrine of "development" had found acceptance among Protestants. But we are bound to say that in our opinion the form in which that doctrine is affirmed by the Church of Rome appears to us preferable to that in which it is taught on the platform of Exeter Hall. If new articles of faith are to be forced upon our consciences we had rather receive them at the hands of a synod of lawfully ordained bishops, presided over by one who traces his episcopal authority back to the days of Clement, if not of Peter, than at the hands of men who have made themselves ministers, and who have picked up, they best know where, some sort of diploma in divinity. It is needless to inform any educated man that this new dogma is only of yesterday. A hundred years ago no one dreamed of declaring that slavery was wrong; fifty years ago, not even a Wilberforce would have dared to pronounce it un-Christian, except in the same sense in which we all hold every unlovely and disreputable thing to be inconsistent with Christian wisdom and purity. Buxton—a better Christian than either Mr. Newman or Mr. Newman Hall—would never have conceived himself entitled to refuse the hand of Christian fellowship to a West Indian planter. He held slavery to be an abomination, but he knew that others, as good men and as thorough Christians as himself, were of a contrary opinion, and he knew that they had as good a right to their belief as he to his. But we cannot expect these self-elected prophets to imitate the Christian charity and pious reserve of good and honest men. Creatures who are not ashamed to insult the sorrow of a widowed Queen, because she thought fit to inscribe on her husband's monument a sentence from the Apocalypse, are hardly to be restrained by any sense of duty or decency from any outburst of fanatical folly that may suit the taste of their congregations, and their curses affect sensible and pious men about as much as the Pope's bull affected the comet.

We expected better things from Churchmen, even in America; and it is with deep surprise and regret that we have learnt the existence of a very angry controversy on this subject in the Episcopal Church of the United States. The Bishop of Vermont, having thought proper, in January, 1861, to publish his views on the question of slavery, considered in regard to the teachings of the Bible, and his letter on the subject having been recently reprinted, the Bishop of Pennsylvania and several of his clergy have taken occasion to publish a vituperative denunciation thereof. It seems that the Bishop of Vermont confined himself to proving that slavery is distinctly sanctioned by the Old Testament, and in no way forbidden or interfered with by the New; and had rebuked, on this account, the fanatics who had raised a religious issue on a matter of purely secular concern. For this he is visited with "indignant reprobation" by his brother of Pennsylvania; and his doctrine is declared "unworthy of any servant of Jesus Christ." Passing over certain other charges, obviously and simply false, which the Pennsylvanian letter of abuse contained, we would ask the Right Reverend Dr. Potter whether his copy of the Scriptures contains a certain emphatic prohibition to judge another man's servant? We would ask him whether he has entirely forgotten the peremptory refusal of his Master to become a temporal judge and lawgiver? We would ask him whether he would deny the salvation of the slaveholder Abraham, in the face of a very distinct statement as to the eternal condition of the patriarch pronounced by our Lord himself? And if it were lawful for Abraham to hold slaves, when and how has slaveholding become, in a religious point of view, unlawful? But argument is wasted on a man who has only discovered that slavery is un-Christian since the separation of the Southern and Northern Churches; and we may leave the bishop and clergy of Pennsylvania to the crushing condemnation which is contained in the simple fact that they were in hearty fellowship and communion with their Southern brethren up to the day on which Abraham Lincoln was elected President of the United States.

If Christianity were a complete system of social ethics, a code of political regulations, a civil and canon law for all nations, we might expect to find in it a prohibition not only of all things that are essentially wicked in the sight of God, but also of all things that are wrong and culpable because they lead to confusion and mischief among men. In that case we should be justified in affirming that, since the Old Testament legalises and regulates the system of slavery, and since the New Testament contains no censure upon it, and, indeed, in several places tacitly recognises and permits it, therefore slavery is right and abolitionism wrong. This is the view of a very few extreme advocates of slavery; it is also the view of a good many extreme abolitionists. So well aware are the latter that the Bible is against them that they cannot, in face of Scripture, pretend to denounce slavery as a crime against Heaven—that they reject Scripture altogether, and blasphemously clamour for "an anti-slavery Church, an anti-slavery Bible, and an anti-slavery God." But inasmuch as Christianity is a religious faith, and not a civil code, we find that Scripture is silent on almost every question of political and social law. Neither despotism nor democracy, neither slavery nor socialism, neither wine-drinking nor total abstinence, is enjoined by the Saviour or His Apostles. We are left free on all these subjects to do that which seems to us wise and just. We are free, as nations, to be ruled by kings or by presidents, by parliaments or bureaucracies, by oligarchical senates or by universal suffrage. We may abolish property altogether, or maintain it in any form and degree that seems convenient. No sane man ever pretended that the Maine Liquor Law was contrary to Christianity, or that a Christian may not lawfully drink beer and smoke tobacco. So, no man whom fanaticism has not made mad can pretend that slavery is forbidden to Christians. Clearly, if slavery be bad for the slave—if it be certain to deprave, demoralise, and debase the master, if it lead inevitably to worse evils than abolition, no man has a right to hold slaves. But these are questions on which Christians may and do differ; and we have no right whatever to excommunicate those who differ from us on these points. We hold slavery to be iniquitous, pernicious, and immoral; our cousins of South Carolina hold it to be wise, just, and wholesome; but neither of us conceive that our difference is one of religious faith or principle, and therefore we must agree to differ. Much wiser men than Mr. Francis Newman, much better Christians than Dr. Candlish, much soberer men than Mr. Newman Hall, have held slaves and do hold slaves. This being the case, though we are at liberty to say that slavery is sinful and detestable, we are not at liberty to deny that slaveholders are good men and pious Christians, or to refuse to join with them in the common rites of Christianity and the ordinary good offices of social life. What right have any of us to add new laws to those of the Bible—to impose new dogmas on those who accept the faith that was taught by the Apostles? Or how, if we dare to do so, are we to escape the condemnation pronounced on such as "with lies make the heart of the righteous sad, whom God hath not made sad?" or how be acquitted of an impious presumption, if we deem that Revelation has been left so imperfect as to need correction and addition at our hands?

MISSISSIPPI ELECTIONS.—General Charles Clarke has been elected Governor by a large majority. In the First District, J. A. Orr has been elected to Congress, and in the Second, — Holden. These two districts were represented in the last Congress by J. W. Clapp and R. Davis. In the Third and Fourth Districts, Israel Welch and H. C. Chalmers have been elected. In the Fifth District, it is reported that Colonel A. P. Hill has defeated the Honourable O. R. Singleton. In the Sixth District, Barksdale is re-elected in the Sixth District. In the Seventh District, the returns indicate the election of J. T. Lumpkin over Governor McRae.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 11.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

At their weekly meeting on Thursday last, the directors of the Bank of England further advanced the rate of discount 1 per cent, making the minimum 6 per cent., an advance of 1 per cent, having been announced only on the previous Monday. It was generally anticipated that this course would be adopted, as the first advance had not the effect of arresting the large withdrawals of specie from the Bank. It is still a question whether the directors will not find themselves under the necessity of adopting more stringent terms, as the withdrawals of gold continue to a large extent, whilst there is nothing whatever sent in. Following the course pursued by the directors of the Bank of England, the Bank of France on Saturday, also raised their rate of discount to 6 per cent. The applications for discount both out of doors and at the Bank have been tolerably active, but without any particular pressure. The brokers, however, refuse to do business under the Bank minimum, but the Joint Stock Banks are making advances at  $5\frac{1}{2}$  to  $5\frac{3}{4}$  per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

Again there has not been any bullion sent into the Bank of England, but there have been withdrawals for transmission abroad to the amount of £363,000. The arrivals of specie this week amount to £348,424, of which £220,460 was from New York, and £117,960 from Port Philip. There continues to be a strong inquiry for gold of all descriptions for exportation, but owing to the rise in the rate of discount the demand has now slackened. Bar silver is still in demand, but the price remains nominally unchanged. The steamer for the East to-morrow will take out a considerable amount. Mexican dollars have also been in good demand, but the supply in hand is very limited; the price remains at 5s. 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Telegrams from Australia announced that the shipments of gold since the last mail from Melbourne amount to £247,500. All the other gold-ships from Melbourne have now arrived, the last having been the True Briton from Port Philip, with £138,000, which came in yesterday.

ENGLISH AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

All the markets have been more or less affected this week by the changes made in the rate of discount by the Bank Directors, and it could not but be expected that a rise of 2 per cent. within four days must have a very depressing effect. In fact, for a time the operators appeared paralysed, and refrained from dealing except under special circumstances. Prices in the meantime gradually gave way, but subsequently there has been a rather better feeling, and this evening consols closed at 92 $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  for money, and 11 $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  ex. div. for the account, which is an improvement of  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. as compared with this day week. Exchequer Bills have further declined to 9s. to 4s. dis. There has not been a large business doing in Foreign Stocks, but with the exception of Mexican which have further declined 3 per cent. Spanish Passives, 1 $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and Turkish about 1 per cent., prices generally do not present any very great alteration. The latest quotations were:—Greek, 30 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 31; Mexican, 39 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 39 $\frac{3}{4}$ ; Spanish Passives, 33 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 34 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; Do. Certificated, 12 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 13 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; Turkish Six per Cents. (1854), 91 to 92; and Do., (1862), 70 $\frac{1}{2}$  to 70 $\frac{3}{4}$ .

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The dealings in American Government and Railway Securities have been unusually limited this week. In the present very unsatisfactory state of affairs as regards the Federal forces, dealers show not the slightest inclination to speculate, and capitalists invest in what they consider a safer description of securities. Where dealings have taken place the tendency in prices is weaker. The following are the only transactions recorded:—Maryland Five per Cents, 74. United States Six per Cents, 68 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Virginia State Six per Cents, 37 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Atlantic and Great Western Railway (Pennsylvania Section), 76 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 75 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 76 and 75 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Erie \$100 shares, all paid, 68 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  and 66 $\frac{1}{2}$ . Illinois Central \$100 shares, \$90 paid, 19 and 6 $\frac{1}{2}$  dis. Panama Railway, 1st mortgage, 100.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Business in the English railway share market has been particularly influenced this week by the advance in the bank rate, and the dealers have consequently been acting with extreme caution. Still, on the whole, a fair share of dealings has been recorded, but in general at considerably reduced quotations. In Great Northern the decline is  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; in Caledonian, Edinburgh, and Glasgow, London, Brighton, and South Coast, and North Eastern (Berwick), 1 per cent.; in Great Eastern, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, Chatham and Dover, Metropolitan and South Devon  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; and in Great Western and Manchester, Sheffield and Lincolnshire  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. On the other hand, there has been an improvement of  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. each in North British and South Eastern. The dealings in foreign railway shares have only been to a limited extent, but prices, as compared with the other departments, have been fairly sustained. A fair average business has been done in British Possession shares, but prices are not quite so good.

BANK MEETING.

At a special meeting of the proprietors of the Union Bank of Australia, held this afternoon, a proposition was submitted by the board of directors to increase the capital from £1,000,000 to £1,250,000, by the creation and issue of 10,000 new shares of £25 each, at a premium of £20. Part of this money, when raised, was to be appropriated to the reserve fund by adding £50,000 to it, and paying £75,000 off the account of bank premiums. After some discussion, the proposition was agreed to.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The political news of this week has been unimportant, as regards a movement in the value of this security; but the depression of the Stock Exchange has not been without influence, and the market has ruled dull at 63 to 65. To-day closes with a heavy tendency, at 62 to 64.

DRAWINGS ON INDIA.

The Indian Council have announced that until further notice, they will increase the amount of their bills on India from their present rate £700,000 per month to £900,000.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The London and Caledonian Marine Insurance is the only new public company announced this week. The directors, who are influential, announce that the business will be conducted on a sound basis, with extensive connections, the directors being capable of ensuring a vast amount of legitimate marine insurance transactions. The capital is fixed at £500,000, with power to increase to £1,000,000, in 20,000 shares of £25 each. The deposit £1 per share on application, and £2 on allotment.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

THERE has been very little change in the general aspect of the American produce markets since our last, but the caution then observed, from the influence of monetary affairs, has somewhat increased. Prices continue for the most part to be well maintained. Cotton, however, is an exception, quotations in this instance having given way 1d. per lb. Our grain markets remain in the same state of inactivity as noticed for some time past, with prices nearly stationary. In provisions a moderate trade is passing. Fine American butters have sold freely at 98s. to 100s. Cheese also meets a fair inquiry at steady rates. Prime American bacon, being still relatively cheap, is purchased to a fair extent, whilst other imports are saleable only at a reduction in price. Lard moves off in limited quantity without quotable change in value. Petroleum sells very steadily at 21s. per gallon for American refined. The extensive and extending use of this article is telling perceptibly upon the consumption of tallow. In crude we have not heard of much doing. French turpentine is more saleable at the recent decline, and at the close to-day the tendency was in an upward direction. Rosin firmly supports its value. Tar, owing partly to an American demand and partly to speculation, has advanced to 23s. to 23s. 6d. for Stockholm, and 25s. 6d. for Archangel. Linseed and rape oil must be quoted at 1s. per cwt. lower. The former sells at 41s. 6d., and the latter at 39s. per cwt. for brown. Oilcake is without essential change. Tallow recovered a little at the close of last week, but is decidedly dull of sale to-day, bringing prices back to those quoted in our last report. Jute still holds on its upward course, fine qualities, which we last quoted at £33 15s., now bringing £34 10s. to £35 per ton. Manila hemp is firm, but can hardly be quoted dearer, and Russian continues at £40 to £42 for clean St. Petersburg. During the last day or two the activity in the sugar speculation has subsided, but there is no giving way in price. The periodical sales of cochineal have gone with less animation, and rates in some instances are a point weaker. In manufactured iron trade is still active, and quotations firm. Scotch pig has, however, receded 1s. 3d. per ton. Foreign tin is also easier to buy; but lead keeps up in price. The colonial wool sales have been in progress since Thursday last, and have established an average advance of 1d. to 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. on the rate of the last series for fleece wools generally. In drugs and chemicals the only change worth notice is a decline of 1d. per lb. in bichromate of potash.

OUTFLOW OF SPECIE FROM NEW YORK.

The recent large amounts of specie sent from New York to this country satisfactorily show that the Money Market there is sustaining a severe pressure, and it will be interesting, under the circumstances, to watch the progress of future events. Annexed is a return of the specie received from New York from the 1st September to the present date, the gross amount being £1,773,322; but it remains to be seen whether, during the next two months, the arrivals will continue to a similar extent. At present there certainly does not appear to be any falling off.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Nov. 11.

Since the late rise in the value of money, the cotton market has been in a very restless state; comparatively little business has been done, and for almost every description prices have receded from 1d. to 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. Manufacturers and speculators evince at present very little disposition to operate, as the general belief entertained here is that there will be a further advance in the rate of discount to-morrow; if so, an additional decline in prices may be looked for. At all events, anything like a revival in business cannot be expected till the money market is again in a more settled state. The sales this week have been only 29,000 bales, of which 11,000 bales were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present period have been 2,303,380 bales; and to the same state in 1862, 2,402,300 bales. The total imports this year have reached 1,335,934 bales, and to the same period last year 1,044,934 bales. The exports this year have been 413,271 bales, and to the corresponding period in 1862, 378,249 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 1,163,000; to the same period last year 1,009,300 bales. Taken on speculation this year 639,050 bales; same in 1862, 962,090; computed stocks, at the present time 149,020; and at the same time in 1862, 296,310 bales. The decline in prices in American and Egyptian is from 1d. to 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per lb. Brazils are also nominally 1d. per lb. cheaper. Surats are irregular at about 1d. decline. The closing quotations are Middling Orleans, 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 28d.; Mobile, 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 28d.; Uplands, 27d. to 28d.; estimated fair Egyptian, 27d. to 28d.; and Surats, 16d. to 28d.

Manchester, November 10, 1863.

The further advance of 1 per cent in the Bank rate of discount on Thursday last produced an uneasy feeling amongst both buyers and sellers, although this action of the Bank Directors had been pretty generally anticipated.

On Friday the individual reports of the market were very conflicting. Sellers of home trade yarns were willing to concede 1d., 2d., and even 3d. per pound on the prices of the week before; whilst sellers of 40s. mule yarn for India were asking and getting higher rates than the week before. Manufacturers of cloths, being well under contract, are very little affected at present by these things. Saturday was an extremely quiet day, and very little business was transacted. Monday was rather more cheerful, owing to receipt of telegraphic advices from Calcutta, dated 14th October, reporting a hardening market both for yarn and cloth; but Liverpool showing signs of weakness counteracted the effect of these better India advices.

To-day, Tuesday, has been a dull day, and the only gleam of sunshine has been a demand for 44-inch jaconets and shirtings, also 40s. mule in bundle, for India; but as these were wanted out of stock, very few sales were made. Liverpool showing great depression, and a belief gaining ground that we shall see in a few days a further rise in the Bank rate, tend to produce a dull state of affairs here.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT

OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake!! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than the liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country. Strife and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been slandered, abused, and libelled beyond any civilised people on earth, insult added to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality, shielded and armoured-plated with the cry of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been pursued. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality!" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe it, and think on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an intricate blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over from this country, both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater sacrifice has been our conduct towards the combatants!—the Confederate States having declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South is conquered, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has proached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this farthest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence: nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North should blot out the South or not, or whether the South ought to have her Independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the members of this great and noble association to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle men to be free, then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the harbours so richly merited? We write all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of concert of action among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire.

Offices open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., at 7, St. Mildred's-court, Poultry, E.C. Meetings every Wednesday at one o'clock, p.m., at the above place.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pangs of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, out off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

AMERICA.

THE mechanical ingenuity of the Yankees is proverbial, and has been eminently displayed during the war. We do not mean to disparage the courage of the Federals in saying that, whilst to the Confederates belongs nearly all the glory of the sword, to them is due nearly all the honours that have been won by the spade. With admirable precision and wonderful rapidity they have again and again thrown up entrenchments that have cost the Southerners dearly, and frequently deprived them of the fruits of a hard-earned victory. But all this makes their utter poverty of invention, in every case where mechanism is not concerned, so much the more remarkable. Not one of their generals has devised a campaign or a movement that has the remotest claim to originality. But perhaps the greatest wonder is, that in the false reports that are put in circulation to rig the New York money market, or to prop up the Administration, or to deceive Europe, there is not the slightest variety. Their commanders, like youthful chess-players, never hit upon new openings or fresh combinations, and their purveyors of news can do no more than repeat their threadbare canards.

Take the last mail as an example. Any one reading the telegraphic summary might well pause to glance at the date of the paper, to be satisfied that he had not taken last week's or last month's Times. Charleston is being furiously bombarded, and so it has been often bombarded. As on former occasions, there are no casualties on the Federal side. The sea-wall, or outer wall of Sumter, has been battered down, just as it was battered down at the beginning of the siege. The capture of Sumter is announced as it was announced months ago; and before the announcement is twenty-four hours old we are told, just as we were on the former occasion, that the rumour was false, merely a Yankee fabrication. From Virginia the news is equally stale. Once more the "Army of the Potomac" has advanced and driven in the Confederate outposts; and New York is a little excited, for the Federals hold that to overcome the pickets of the enemy is to gain a substantial victory. As usual, the Federals claim to have captured a large number of prisoners (1,800), and in a moment of frankness admit a heavy loss (800 killed and wounded). The Federal capital is not taken, but the commander of the "Army of the Potomac" contemplates "a change of base," and for about the thirtieth time the credulous subjects of His Sublime Majesty of the White House are informed that the naughty rebels are evacuating Richmond. This sameness is really marvellous, but it answers the purpose of the Federal Government in enabling them to keep "pegging away" at the pockets of their dupes. And if we turn to Tennessee we look in vain for novelty. The beaten army of the invader is still "safe"; the Confederates are still threatening the Federal communications; General Bragg's army is still being depleted for some "mysterious" object; reinforcements are still fast joining the beleaguered army, and in Washington there is still anxiety about the "safe" position at Chattanooga. All the minor operations of the war, or reported operations, are equally repetitions. We are informed, as we have been by every other mail since the fall of Vicksburg, that "both banks of the Mississippi are infested with guerillas." A Federal triumph is reported in Arkansas, with the ominous and familiar addition that it "needs confirmation." We are informed, as we have been any time these two years, that "Confederate guerillas" are bagging a considerable number of Federal troops and a large amount of Federal stores. It is officially notified that Burnside's advanced positions have been attacked and portions of two Federal regiments captured; and of course the Washington authorities do not give any details, which is the old-fashioned way of announcing an important Confederate triumph. To complete the picture, we have the Federal Zadkiel, Mr. Seward, prophesying the speedy end of the war, and indulging in his wonted profanity, adding that "then there would be peace, and the angels in Heaven might tune their harps to the symphony of such a peace." After this, Mr. Seward's audience were prepared to swallow the declaration that "there was no State that had not been made stronger, and no citizen that had not been made richer, by the war." Well, this is refreshing. As far as we know, it is the first time that a member of the Lincoln Cabinet has formally announced that the war is good for the country and enriches the citizens. To this brief summary of Federal repetitions we ought to add that famine in the South is again reported in the North.

Our Richmond correspondent, whose letter of a very recent date appears on another page, reflects, no doubt, with faithful accuracy, the hopes which arise among the people of the Confederacy, from the striking contrast between the diplomacy of France and that of England in relation to American affairs. The Government, however, takes a less sanguine view, and makes every effort to teach the nation to rely solely upon its own continued exertions, and in this the Government is wise. Nevertheless, there is a reasonable prospect of our correspondent's programme being carried out, at least in its main feature. To one part of that programme only we desire to offer an amendment. In the mutual recognition interchanged between Mexico and the Confederacy, the latter must take the initiative. The Mexican Empire is a younger and less settled government than that of the Confederate States; and nations, especially when in distress, cannot safely dispense with points of etiquette which affect their dignity.

Elsewhere we publish a letter from J. W. Cowell, Esq., whose practical acquaintance with American affairs, acquired in a position of great responsibility and under circumstances peculiarly favourable for observation, entitle his views to respectful consideration on both sides of the Atlantic. He recommends those States of the Confederacy, which were solemnly recognised by name "as sovereign and independent," in the treaty of 1781, to throw themselves upon the rights acquired by that treaty, and to accuse the British Government of the violation of its obligation. One advantage, certainly, such a step would have: even if it failed to influence the action of the Ministry, it would awaken the British public more fully than it has yet been to the true character of the struggle. It might be added, supplementary to Mr. Cowell's argument, that Texas has similar treaty rights with those of the States the names; and perhaps her case is even stronger, since she was recognised before she had assumed any federal ties whatever. Alabama and Mississippi might also claim to be placed on an equal footing with Georgia, as integral portions of that commonwealth at the time of her recognition by England, and formed into independent communities with the consent and by the act of the parent State. The same relation also obtains between Tennessee and Kentucky and North Carolina and Virginia respectively. Mr. Cowell, without carrying his argument so far, makes his points forcibly and with incontrovertible logic, and we cordially commend his suggestion to the attention of Southern statesmen.

The war intelligence is not staler than the reports about the domestic concerns of the United States. Money continues to be tight, and gold obstinately refuses to go down. The conscription is being resisted in Pennsylvania, where the miners have armed themselves and committed several murders. The gallant General Schenck ordered all suspected disloyalists who should appear at the polls of the late elections to be arrested, and an appeal being made to Washington, Mr. Lincoln modified the order, "but said it was right in principle"—that is, that it was right in principle to take care that under any circumstance the Administration is not out-voted. In Ohio a fresh "conspiracy" has been discovered. The Republican majority in the late elections in New York State is estimated at from 20,000 to 30,000; and the New Jersey elections have been carried by the Democrats.

General Butler's services in New Orleans, though pretty well compensated by the fortune he amassed by means of plundering the inhabitants, have been further rewarded by the Federal Government. Butler has superseded General Foster. His command will, it is said, include Fort Monroe, Norfolk, and North Carolina. Foster, it is rumoured, will succeed Schenck—that illustrious warrior, who has gained so many triumphs over the defenceless men and women of Baltimore, desiring to be present in the ensuing session of the Federal Congress.

Governor Seymour has made a speech at Utica, which contains a great deal that is true. He deplored the loss of life, saying that there were half a million of new-made graves in the country, and that if the 600,000 recruits now called for were furnished, half of them would in a year be wasted away, and no longer be found in the ranks of the army. Governor Seymour said he doubted if at the present time there were 300,000 men in the Federal armies fit to take the field. He observed that in every quarter the North was on the defensive. He said, "We tremble for the fate of the Army of the Cumberland. The Army of the Potomac to-day advances and to-morrow retreats, and we look to its movements with the most painful solicitude. Look along the whole margin of the war, along the line that divides the North and South, along the whole course of the Mississippi, and we are merely holding our own ground or attempting to regain that which we have once held, except in the single instance of the siege of Charleston, where we are attempting by our navy to batter down a place particularly offensive to the public mind, but where there is no attempt made to take permanent military possession, and where the armies of our generals would not dare to land, be cause of the fear of being overwhelmed by superior force." In this emergency, Mr. Lincoln has asked for 300,000 more men. Upon this Governor Seymour remarks, "No man can fail to see, however blinded by prejudice or infatuated by passion, that this cannot go on indefinitely without ruining us as a nation, and carrying misery and desolation and death to our homes. Every day brings us nearer to this result, and nearer to the condition when all men agree that we must be plunged in bankruptcy, if we reach it. All men agree that straight in our pathway are these two great calamities, to which we are moving steadily and swiftly." And what is the practical conclusion of Governor Seymour's speech? Just this: that the ruin of the country must be consummated, since ruin cannot be averted by words, and the Democrats fear to take action. Do the Democrats expect to make their record clear for the future by these declarations? If so, it is a mistake. They will be reproached with foreshadowing the disaster, and yet refusing to put forth their strength to avert it. Or do the Democrats hope to gain power by flattering the madness of the hour, and having gained power, to use it patriotically? Here again they will be disappointed. So long as they support the war policy they are playing into the hands of the Republicans and weakening themselves. Adding fresh fuel to fire is not the way to extinguish it.

The Russian Admiral Sisvoski has made a complimentary return for the flattering attentions he has received from the North. He told the New Jersey municipality that "he was sure that the Emperor of Russia sympathised with the North in the present unjust rebellion, and hoped and believed, as he himself did, that the North would be successful."

We elsewhere publish an interesting diplomatic correspondence respecting the dismissal of the British Consuls from the Confederate States. The documents consist of a despatch from Mr. Benjamin, the Confederate Secretary of State, to Mr. Slidell, and enclosures, amongst which is a letter from Earl Russell to Mr. Mason. We have commented on this correspondence in our leader columns.

ENGLAND.

His Excellency Baron Gros has relinquished his post as Ambassador of France at the Court of St. James's. The Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, the late French Ambassador at Rome, who has been appointed by the Emperor to succeed Baron Gros, is expected in London this week to enter on the duties of Ambassador.

There is a prospect of a memorial being erected to the late Field-Marshal Lord Clyde, of a character consistent with the virtues and achievements of that General. A meeting has been held at Willis's Rooms, St. James's, for that purpose; and if the names of promoters are a guarantee of success, it is possible that the undertaking may be brought to a fortunate issue. The chair was taken by His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and the Dukes of Wellington and Argyll, Earls de Grey and Ripon, Ellenborough, Cardigan, and Malmesbury, with Sir Charles Wood, Lord Hartington, Lord Stanley, and many officers, companions in arms of the deceased warrior, were present. The Duke of Cambridge opened the proceedings in a speech setting forth the campaigns in which Lord Clyde had served, and traced the career of the Marshal through the battles and sieges of the Peninsular war, the Chinese expedition, the furious contests at Chillianwallah and Goojerat in the Sikh war, the battles of the Alma and Balaclava, and the final struggles and glories in the relief of Lucknow and the suppression of the Indian rebellion. Then Earl de Grey and Ripon, as the Secretary of State for War, proposed in an able speech the first resolution, which was seconded by the Duke of Wellington, and, which declared, "That in order to commemorate the signal services rendered to the country by Field-Marshal Lord Clyde, this meeting is of opinion that a statue be erected to his honour in the metropolis." This resolution was duly put from the chair and agreed to unanimously. Thereupon the Duke of Argyll moved, and the Earl of Lucan seconded, a resolution, "That a public subscription be opened, to which all classes of Her Majesty's subjects be invited to contribute, and that a committee of noblemen and gentlemen be formed for the purpose of carrying out the foregoing objects." After this resolution had been agreed to, Sir Charles Wood, as Secretary for India, proposed, and the Earl of Ellenborough supported, a motion, "That with reference to the more recent services of Lord Clyde in India, the communities of the three Presidencies be invited to contribute." The business of the meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Lord Stanley.

A plan eminently practical, admirably conceived, and most complete and excellent in detail, is at once to be put in execution in behalf of a true and legitimate interpretation of the Scripture. The original idea is attributed to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the organisation of the scheme is the work of the Archbishop of York. It is proposed to put forth a commentary on the whole Bible which shall place the reader in full possession of whatever information may be requisite to enable him to understand the Word of God, and supply him with satisfactory answers to objections resting upon a misrepresentation of its contents. The general supervision of the work will be entrusted to a superior committee consisting of the Archbishop of York, the Bishops of London, Lichfield, Llandaff, and Gloucester and Bristol, with Lord Lyttelton, the Speaker, the Right Honourable S. H. Walpole, and Drs. Jacobson and Jeremie. The general editorship is given to the Reverend F. C. Cook, preacher to the Honourable Society of Lincoln's-inn. The work will be divided into eight sections—namely, the Pentateuch, the Historical Books, the Poetical Books, the Four Great Prophets, the Twelve Minor Prophets, the Four Gospels and Acts, the Epistles of St. Paul, and the remainder of the sacred canon. Each section will be entrusted to an editor assisted by contributors, and the number of editors and contributors in all will be thirty. Among the more eminent names may be mentioned Professor Harold Brown, the Rev. S. Rawlinson, the Bishop of St. David's (Dr. Thirlwall), Professor Mansel, the Dean of Canterbury (Dr. Alford), Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol (Dr. Eliott), Professor Lightfoot and the Archbishop of Dublin (Dr. Trench). The list comprises names calculated to ensure orthodoxy, while at the same time there is every guarantee that no exclusive school or section of the Church will find its peculiar views set forth.

The Galway Mail Company seems destined to go to ruin. Disasters small and great have befallen their vessels from the time at which the Government granted the subsidy of £70,000 to appease the jealous demands of Ireland, and to try the unsuccessful experiment of a more speedy conveyance of the American mails. The latest mishap has occurred to the Anglia, which struck on the Black Rock in Galway Bay, on her way from Liverpool to Boston, and though got off at high water was unable to proceed on her voyage. Inasmuch as the news brought by vessels on this line has been generally anticipated, and further, inasmuch as the principal value of the line seems to be the facilities offered by it for the emigration of the Connaught peasantry to the Federal States, to fill up the gaps in the army of the Potomac, it is possible that our readers will not regret the probable failure of the concern, and the withdrawal of the subsidy.

Four days of extraordinary sport and slaughter deserve to be recorded as an example of the extent to which the preservation of game is carried, even in the most highly cultivated parts of England. On the estates of the Duke of Rutland, lying near Newmarket, a party of five noblemen and gentlemen shot, on the first day 332 pheasants, 256 hares and rabbits, and 40 partridges; and on the second day, in the short space of three hours, 190 pheasants, 60 hares, and 23 rabbits. On the estates of General Hall, lying on the borders of Suffolk and Cambridgeshire, seven sportsmen shot in two days 1,260 pheasants, 324 hares, 101 rabbits, and 10 partridges. The Dukes of Cambridge and Beaufort and Lords Salisbury and Stamford were of the party. It is calculated that the cost of rearing pheasants exceeds considerably £1 per head.

M. Nadar's balloon has arrived in England, and is in course of exhibition at the Crystal Palace, at Sydenham. Every one knows the excitement into which Paris was thrown by the ascent from the Champ de Mars of the bold adventurer and his party; by the fears and the anxious interest that clung round the fate of voyagers known to have crossed the Belgian frontier at the rate of sixty miles an hour; and by the final relief at learning that injuries, and not death, had been the result of a hazardous descent at Nieuburg. M. Nadar will not yet be able again to venture on the realisation of his projects; meanwhile, as he has delighted and astounded the Parisians, so he aspires to amaze the people of London by the display of the means and machinery employed in his ascent; and now in the wondrous centre transept of the most lofty and magnificent of modern edifices there floats the leviathan of the air, fully inflated with atmosphere, and seemingly eager for a fresh start. It is enormous, and it is graceful. Its height, with "compensator" and car, is 200 feet; it is capable of containing 215,363 cubic feet of gas; it has two skins of white silk of the finest quality, and in quantity exceeding 20,000 yards. On the gores, which are sewn by hand, 300 men and women worked for more than a month. The towers of Notre Dame would but overtop it by 45 feet. It lifts 4½ tons, and abundantly justifies the title of the Géant. The car is above all things curious. About 15 feet long by 12 feet wide, it has all the partitions and the luxuries of saloon-cabins or gipsies' caravans. In it are contained a captain's cabin, with sleeping berth, four small cabins with berths, washing room, rooms for printing and photography. The roof is fenced with a bulwark, and forms an airy terrace. It is a marvellous dwelling-house for nine persons. It is built of ash rattans and osiers, with stays of inflated india-rubber. In the balloon itself is seen the rent of the axe of Godard, who, after the terrible rush of twenty miles through trees, against hillocks and telegraph wires, checked by his bold effort the career of the monster. English people love above all things enterprise and courage; so the balloon of M. Nadar, and M. Nadar himself, will be much admired and much applauded. The engineer of the air M. Nadar aspires to be, and the balloon is to him a mere effort of the infancy of aerial science. He has faith in the solution of the mastery over the air for man, as his power exists over sea and land. It is not yet known how soon recovered health and fresh daring will display his valour to English eyes; meanwhile the appliances of the hero's enterprise are within our reach and demand our applause.

Some few years ago the regiment of the 6th Enniskillen Dragoons left this country for India, bearing with it the highest praise of the Commander-in-Chief, as far as related to esprit de corps, and good feeling among the officers and efficiency among the men. In 1861 Lieutenant-Colonel Crawley, who had been an officer for thirty years, was appointed to the command of this regiment, which was then stationed at Ahmednuggur, in the Deccan. What his acts or his words were remains to be proved; the result of his command was visible in violent feuds, rendering the regiment into hostile cliques. One Paymaster Smales, who had not the gift of reticence, was brought successively before a court of inquiry and a general court-martial, the notoriety of which last has gained it the title of the Mhow Court-martial. The finding of that court, consequent on a trial remarkable for spite and hard swearing, was approved by the military authorities in India, and quashed by the advice of the law officers in England. It is stated, but the statement is a charge not proved, and is as stoutly denied as it is affirmed, that three persons, whose evidence before the Mhow Court-martial would have been of great moment, were arrested by order of Colonel Crawley, and illegally kept in close confinement for forty days, in the midst of an Indian summer. At the close of the forty days one of these persons, all of whom were non-commissioned officers, was dead, one was a lunatic, and the third was released. One of them, Sergeant-major Lilley, was, together with his wife, who was said to be in a deep decline, lodged in a room fifteen feet square, with a bomb-proof roof, and, therefore, resembling an oven rather than a human habitation. The sentry, on the discovery of communications between the prisoner and the outer world, was stationed in the inside of the room, that he might keep watch over the acts of his prisoners. The wife of Sergeant-major Lilley was suffering under chronic diarrhoea, and required powerful stimulants. On the death of the sergeant-major these stimulants were found in the room, and the report was spread, and endorsed by the Commander-in-Chief in India, Sir Hugh Rose, that Lilley had died from the effects of drunkenness. Such was the frightful, and, perhaps, incredible story that found its way to England, and roused the nation to fury and the House of Commons to indignation. A strict inquiry was loudly demanded, and it was insisted that the court-martial on Colonel Crawley should be held in England, and not in India. Accordingly, about 150 witnesses have been brought home from the East to give evidence for or against the colonel, and the enquiry threatens to be at once the most expensive and the most extraordinary on record. The Judge-Advocate has preferred only two charges, restricting the issues to the circumstances immediately connected with the death of Sergeant-major Lilley. The first charge alleges that the colonel caused the orders, under which Lilley was confined, to be carried into effect with unnecessary and undue severity; the second alleges that the colonel, at a court-martial, had publicly declared that the acts in question were the acts of the adjutant, whereas they were in fact the result of the express orders of the colonel. The court-martial was opened at Aldershot Camp on Tuesday, under the Presidency of Lieutenant-General, Sir George Augustus Wetherall, K.C.B. Among the other members of the court are four major-generals, four colonels, and six lieutenant-colonels. The officiating Judge-Advocate is Colonel James Kennard Piper, and the prosecutor is Colonel Sir Alfred Horsford, K.C.B. The prisoner is assisted in his defence by Mr. Vernon Harcourt. It will be quite impossible for us to give a complete or even a concise summary of the vast mass of evidence that will be offered. The true story, as proved by the witnesses, and the finding of the court, will, however, be matter of considerable interest, and will be duly recorded.

THE CONTINENT.

PUBLIC attention is everywhere preoccupied by the proposed Congress. Italy, Spain, and some of the smaller States have already, it is said, signified their unqualified acceptance of the Emperor's invitation. Austria, Prussia, and England seem disposed to make their acceptance conditional upon an agreement as to the programme which is to be submitted to the Congress.

Frederick VII., King of Denmark, died at Glucksburg, or Lyksborg, as it is called by the Danes, in Schleswig, on Sunday. Erysipelas, with fever supervening, was the cause of his death. He was born on the 6th of October, 1808, and was consequently in the fifty-sixth year of his age. He was thrice married. First in 1828, to the Princess Wilhelmine, daughter of Frederick VI., then reigning King of Denmark. From this lady he was divorced in 1837, and in the following year she became the wife of Carl, Duke of Sleswig Holstein Sonderburg Glucksburg, the eldest brother of Prince Christian, now Christian IX. In 1841 King Frederick married Princess Caroline, of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, from whom he was divorced in 1846. He married lastly and morganatically the Countess Dauner, a lady with whose reputation gossip has been very busy, and who, having been originally a milliner or a dancer, or both, succeeded in captivating the King, who had formed a very intimate connexion with her long before this morganatic marriage took place. The King's domestic life necessarily made him somewhat unpopular. He shocked somewhat too openly the conventional code of morals; his pleasures were somewhat too gross to be allowed to pass unnoticed and uncensured. But whatever his faults as a man, he displayed great virtues as a king. He was the first, the best patriot in Denmark. He always trusted his people; he never recoiled from any sacrifice which would serve the interests of Denmark. At the time of his death he was extremely popular with his people, and his memory will long be cherished by them as an honest king and a true friend of liberty.

By the recent death of the late King's uncle, Prince Frederick Ferdinand, Prince Christian, upon whom the succession was conferred by the Treaty of London, of May 8th, 1852, and by an Act passed by the Danish Parliament and ratified by the King, ascends the throne of Denmark.

This is a diversion from the legitimate order of succession. By the Lex Regia, promulgated by Frederick III., in 1665, after the extinction of all the male descendants of that King, the throne should pass to the female descendants in a prescribed order. The heiress by that law is the Landgravine of Hesse Cassel, the aunt of the late king. But in consequence of the pretensions raised by the Duke of Augustenburg, that Holstein did not follow the rule of the Lex Regia—pretensions for a further examination of which the space at our disposal does not suffice—it was agreed between the great Powers and the Danish Government to abolish the Lex Regia, and to designate a successor who should unite the aquatic and cognatic claims. This successor was found in Prince Christian, the only prince of the Houses of Augustenburg and Glücksburg who, in the Schleswig-Holstein insurrection, was faithful to the Danish king. The succession was conferred upon him and his male lineage; the Emperor of Russia, as a Prince of Holstein Gottorp, renouncing his claims in his favour, and the Landgravine of Hesse, her son and her eldest daughter renouncing their rights in favour of the Princess Luise, their daughter and sister, the wife of Prince Christian, who renounced her rights in favour of her husband and his children. The Holsteiners do not acknowledge the legitimacy of this arrangement, but they will have to submit to it. Prince Christian has been proclaimed king. The renunciation of his rights to the throne of Denmark by the King of the Hellenes, concentrates the hopes of Denmark upon two princes, Frederick and Waldemar, aged forty and five respectively.

The Duke of Saxe-Coburg Gotha has indeed already recognised the hereditary Prince of Augustenburg as Duke of Schleswig-Holstein, but no great importance is to be attributed to this proceeding on the part of a petty prince, whose court is the centre of the Schleswig Holstein agitation.

The exposé of the situation of the Empire has been laid before the French Chambers. The portion which relates to home affairs commences by announcing a sensible amelioration in the condition of the departments, which still suffer from the reaction of the intestine struggles of America. It proceeds to take stock, as it were, of the political, social and intellectual state of the country, giving many very interesting particulars relative to crime, literature, friendly societies, telegraphs and public works: to which it is impossible for us to refer, even in the most summary manner.

The exposé of foreign affairs has a more general interest. Dealing with the Polish question, it speaks of the recruitment as a "measure of proscription," and observes that the convention between Russia and Prussia first gave the struggle an international character, and induced remonstrances which obtained from Prussia satisfactory explanations. It proceeds to detail the history of the negotiations. It results from this account that the proposition of an armistice emanated from England, and that the French Government proposed to England and Austria to consolidate the understanding between them, by making, under the form of a convention or a protocol, the engagement to pursue in concert the regulation of the affairs of Poland by diplomatic means, or otherwise if it should be necessary. "We were persuaded," it says, "that the surest means of preventing complications is to show oneself disposed to face them with all the firmness which they require, and that conflicts between governments rise less frequently from bold resolutions than from expedients and hesitations, which allow difficulties to be aggravated." This proposition, which practically meant war, in case of a refusal by Russia to accept the six points—although M. Drouyn de Lhuys in the despatch which he addressed on the 20th of June to the French Ambassadors at London and Vienna, instructing them to urge upon the governments to which they were accredited the desirability of coming to such an understanding, and embodying it in a convention or protocol, declares that such an agreement would contain new guarantees of peace for Europe—was not accepted. The exposé, after announcing its non-acceptance, proceeds to state that the Government will maintain its understanding with England and Austria. It refuses to believe that this union can remain sterile. "We do not pretend, however, to impose our solutions upon the Powers which are as interested as, or even more directly, than ourselves, in the regulation of the pending difficulties. In a question essentially European it is not conformable either to our obligations or our rights to alone undertake a responsibility which it belongs to all to share." A despatch of M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the Duke de Cadore, in London, dated 22nd September, develops the same idea. It expresses the profound regret of the French Government at seeing all hopes at an end of bringing Russia to an understanding with the Powers whom she had herself invited to point out the best means of pacifying Poland and reassuring Europe. It regrets the refusal of the Cabinets of London and Vienna to enter upon a previous understanding as to the course to be pursued in the contingency of the Russian refusal, and concludes, "Henceforth we can only await the communications our allies may think it useful to address us. We deplore that three Powers, such as England, Austria, and France, should not have succeeded in giving the step they had undertaken all the desirable efficiency, and it has been no fault of ours that their opinions have not secured the irresistible authority of a collective resolution."

After dealing with other foreign questions the exposé comes to the American. It says: "The gloomy previsions with which the stubborn animosity of the struggle raging for three years in the United States inspired us have been but too well realised. Blood has continued to flow, but the respective positions of the belligerents does not allow us to foresee the end of this fearful crisis. In presence of so many ruins accumulated and so many existences sacrificed in a struggle hitherto barren, we have necessarily regretted deeply that the proposition which was made to London and Petersburg to bring about in concert an armistice was not accepted. Constrained by a double refusal to abandon this design, we have, however, declared that our desire to contribute in some way or other to the reestablishment of peace was not less lively or sincere. We have proved it in suggesting the idea of substituting for the project of a friendly intervention of the maritime Powers the expedient of direct conferences between the Government of the United States and the Confederates of the South. This new attempt has not been more fortunate than the former. Since then we have only had to follow the line of conduct adopted from the commencement of this war by the Government of the Empire. We have remained neutral and friendly, although it has often been difficult for us to conciliate that rôle with our duties towards our countrymen. Independently of the sufferings which, in our departments, are the consequence of the American crisis, the hostilities have, even upon the territory of the Union, caused considerable losses and damages for French residents. They have often had occasion to prefer just complaints against the illegal proceedings of the civil and military authorities. Our countrymen should comprehend that their interests, like those of other foreigners, cannot pretend, in the midst of the tumult of arms, to an exceptional security; and that all ordinary guarantees lose forcibly in such a case something of their efficacy. The state of war imposes, moreover, inevitable shackles on the commerce of neutrals. If the progress of liberal ideas tends to relax them, it cannot suppress them entirely. Thus the Cabinet of Washington has been able to convince itself that in our reclamations we have held great account of its difficulties. But the Government of the Emperor cannot dissimulate how painful it is for it to see so many injured interests worthy of its solicitude appeal vainly to its protection."

With regard to Mexico the exposé says:—"The Imperial Government touches the object which it had proposed in carrying the flag of France to the shores of Mexico." The Imperial Government quite agrees with the Archduke Maximilian that the resolution of the Assembly of Notables should receive from the people a more explicit consecration. "An evident and imperious French interest could alone determine the Government of the Emperor to engage in an enterprise of which it had weighed before the sacrifices and difficulties. We expect from the new Government the guarantees for our interests which have been wanting under all the preceding régimes."

The Corps Legislatif has been engaged in discussing the validity of the elections. Some interest has been given to the debates by the participation of M. Thiers in them. In the course of his speech this eminent orator caused some amusement by speaking of the procureur du roi. He recovered himself, however, very soon. "I beg pardon," he said, "but I shall soon contract the habit of using fitting designations." It is noticeable in these debates, in which, strange to say, one of the Ministers charged the Opposition with gaining elections by intimidation, that the majority have shown themselves far more Napoleonic than the Emperor's most trusted friends. They have attempted to stifle discussion, and when the Duke de Morny, who has been acting with an impartiality and liberality worthy of all praise, has vindicated for the Opposition its rights, they have turned upon him and shouted that the Chamber is not at the orders of the Opposition. The election of M. Pelletan for Paris has been annulled with his own consent for an informality.

A letter, dated 13th October, old style, addressed by the Emperor of Russia to the Grand Duke Constantine, relieving him of the functions of Lieutenant and Commander-in-Chief of Poland, has been published. The Emperor says, that in summoning the Grand Duke to govern the kingdom of Poland as his lieutenant, he wished to testify his firm desire to give progressive development to the new institutions which he had granted that kingdom, that the choice of a beloved brother was a pledge of his desire to introduce a favourable state of things, in harmony with the wants and interests of the country. He observes, that the Prince completely appreciated and shared those friendly intentions towards the Polish people—intentions, which, the Czar says, he had a right to expect that his subjects of the kingdom of Poland would appreciate. These hopes have not been realised. The Grand Duke was received on the threshold by treason and an attempt upon his life. "Your arrival," says the Czar, "should have inaugurated a new era of internal prosperity and development, under the indispensable auspices of confidence in and respect for the law. . . . But a constantly growing rebellion, intrigues more and more traitorous and criminal, have convinced your Imperial Highness of the incompatibility existing between the actual state of the country, and the thought of benevolence and alleviation which induced me to charge you to put into execution the institutions so generously granted to my Polish kingdom." The Emperor, therefore, in accordance with the Grand Duke's wish, consents to relieve him of his functions, in the assurance that "when the revolt shall be subdued and circumstances shall render possible the application of institutions, the practical working of which is one of my strongest and sincerest desires, the Grand Duke will again consecrate himself to the welfare of the country." Surely the Emperor might be contented with maltreating the gallant and unhappy Poles, without insulting them by such a piece of cruel mockery as this letter.

There is, again, a list of insurgent victories. They seem, however, to have no foundation, save in the ingenuity of the Poles, whose hopes the proposal of a Congress have revived, and who would fain have Europe believe that the insurrection yet holds its own.

There is a story, coming from Lemberg, to the effect that Prince Czartoryski and General Mieroslawski have both been dismissed by the National Government. It is not worthy of credence. The dismissal of one would be the triumph of the other. If Czartoryski is gone, Mieroslawski stays, and vice versa.

The Poles who have any property are in a sorry plight. The National Government has proclaimed a loan of forty millions of florins or sixpences—whether a renewed notification of an old loan, or a new one, is not quite clear; and the Russian Government has imposed a tax upon Poland to reimburse twenty-seven millions of florins abstracted from the treasury by the agents of the National Government.

The Prussian Houses have constituted themselves. The Herrenhaus has elected Count Eberhard zu Stolberg Wernigerode as the President, and has resolved to present an address to the King. The Lower House confided to President Grabow the honourable office which he had filled in the two previous Houses, and elected as Vice-President Herr Von Unruh, who was president of the Constituent Assembly of 1848, in the place of Herr Behrends, the failure of whose firm led him to retire from parliament, and Herr Von Bockum Doltis, under whose presidency the famous scene with Herr Von Roon took place. In acknowledging his election, Grabow observed that the solution of pending differences which the royal speech professed to desire, would be obtained if the Constitution were acted upon according to its obvious spirit. The Government has already laid before the House the statement of accounts for the last two years promised in the speech. It has also presented the press ordinance for approval, and a new law upon the press. The latter, practically, would give the Government the power legally to stop that free expression of opinion which it has been illegally limiting. Amongst other noteworthy dispositions, it repeals the clause in the existing press law which authorises the publication of correct reports of proceedings in the two Houses of the Landtag. In the Lower House the verification of the elections gave rise to a sharp debate. Count Schwerin, the former Minister, and Herr Von Vincke, brother of the Von Vincke, and a personal friend of the King, censured the conduct of the provincial authorities in very strong language; and Count Eulenberg, the Minister of the Interior, was constrained to admit that the Government could not defend, but must censure, some of the proceedings complained of. It is noteworthy, that Herr Von der Heydt, to whom public rumour attributes the design to play the part of a mediator, for which circumstances well qualify him, assumed that rôle in this first debate. The majority has resolved not to reply to the speech by an address. It has been felt that a repetition of the popular demands in fitting language would only aggravate the controversy, and might lead to an immediate prorogation of the House.

The King of the Greeks has formed a Ministry, of which Bulgaris, the leading member of the late Provisional Government, is President. We do not profess to be able to appreciate the qualifications of the new Ministry; but we can at least congratulate the Greeks upon the retirement or removal from office of Caligas, the Foreign Minister, whose audacious declaration that Greece intended to repudiate her debts, was employed to such an advantage by a number of his countrymen, who, whilst professing vehement patriotism, were glad enough to make a good speculation on the Stock Exchange, by representing their country as thoroughly dishonest.

The King has also reviewed the army and national guard; and whilst congratulating them upon their efficiency, intimated that discipline will be strictly maintained. This is a good beginning.

It is announced that a protocol ratifying the cession by Great Britain of the Ionian Islands was signed by the representatives of the Great Powers on Saturday. The fortifications of Corfu are to be demolished. The Islands, according to the exposé of the French Government, are placed under the same safe-guard of the Great Powers as the kingdom of Greece.

According to Mr. Reuter, the Porte has addressed a note to the Cabinet of St. Petersburg, protesting against the armaments on the frontiers and the building of gunboats in the Black Sea, in violation of the Treaty of Paris. It is very likely that Russia is violating the Treaty of Paris by building vessels of war in her ports on the Black Sea, but unfortunately this is hardly the time for the Porte to protest.

Prince Couza, the Hospodar of Moldavia and Wallachia, or Roumania, as these provinces are sometimes called, has opened the National Assembly of those provinces by a speech in which he promises liberal measures. The Prince, who lately changed his Ministry, is at daggers drawn with the Assembly, and is strongly suspected of meditating something in the shape of a coup d'état.

The Italian Chambers met on Monday. No business of any importance was transacted. A telegraphic summary of the budget, showing, as usual, a large deficiency, has been published. We wait for the full accounts before noticing it.

We are very glad to learn that an amnesty has been issued to political criminals, including Count Christler and Mr. Bishop. An act of mercy, and indeed of justice, like this, will do more to restore peace to the Two Sicilies than all the fusillades and arrests of General La Marmora.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, October 17.

Mr letter of the 10th instant had not left the shore of the American continent before the measure it foreshadowed of the dismissal of the British consuls from the limits of the Confederacy was announced officially, in the columns of the Sentinel, as having been taken by the President; and I make no doubt that the long despatch of Mr. Benjamin to Mr. Shidell, which bears date the 8th October, acquainting him fully with the reasons that led to the dismissal, went across the water to you in the same steamer with my letter. At the time of writing, I know nothing whatever of the purpose of the Government in this regard, nor was it known to anyone here not in the immediate confidence of the Administration, but I hazarded nothing in declaring that no more popular step could be resolved on, as is abundantly shown in the universal commendation it has called forth from the press. Some journals have declared that the grounds upon which Mr. Benjamin rests the justice and propriety of the Government's action were unimportant, and that it had been better to make the unfriendliness of the English Ministry pur et simple the basis of the dismissal; but all approve it, and the voice of the press finds an echo in the sentiments of the people. Feeling that this action is right in itself, they care but little for the nice distinctions of diplomacy, perhaps less still for what may be the consequence in respect of the future conduct of England towards the Confederate States.

From the very inception of the Secession movement, the Southern people have sought only to pursue the right course without regard to after results. With a serene confidence in the justice of their cause, and a perfect knowledge of the "rectitude of their intentions," they have followed the plain line of duty, leaving the rest to Him who rules in the councils of nations and over the habitations of the earth. Whatever may be the course of England hereafter, they are conscious of having acted towards her as became their own self-respect and consistently with their rights as an independent nation, and they know and feel that history will amply vindicate their motives, for their — faith is large, in Time

And that which shapes it to a perfect end.

While all relations have thus been terminated with Great Britain, the talk of speedy recognition by the Emperor of the French begins to assume a more definite shape, and to gain a wider degree of attention. If the arrangements have been perfected for the acknowledgment of our independence by Louis Napoleon, you are doubtless fully acquainted with them, and will be amused at our speculations thereon. If, on the other hand, there be no foundation for the magnificent chateau d'Espagne which we have constructed here, in great part out of Spanish building materials, you will smile at the airy nothings of our architecture, and the ease with which we are deluded into regarding them as substantial things. This is the form of the latest accepted scheme of foreign intervention. Maximilian, as soon as he has settled himself in the "Halls of the Montezumas," is to recognise; the Man of Destiny will immediately do the same; Spain, ditto, ditto. Then a Tripartite Convention will be held between these three Powers in re the Monroe doctrine; the Mexican, Spanish, and French ports, Vera Cruz, Havanna, Cadiz, Bordeaux, &c., will be opened to our cruisers with their prizes taken on the high seas; our "infant navy"—as well those steamers which are strong enough to walk the waters as those we have at the Brest—will be coddled and helped along by our new friends. England, for the time, maintaining her "rigorous neutrality," will ere long be compelled to unite with the other Western Powers; and thus the war will be brought to an end by the 22nd of February, 1864—the second anniversary of the inauguration of Jefferson Davis as President of the new republic.

Such is the programme, and a certain amount of belief in it has been inspired by the statements of the press with regard to the course of France in other particulars. The Vicomte de Saint Romain has been brought up again in connection with the purposes of his Government a few days ago. The Richmond Examiner, a paper uniformly careful in its positive assertions, set forth the fact on its own authority that a part of the Vicomte's business in Richmond was to arrange with the Confederate authorities for the immediate exportation of the tobacco belonging to France, now stored in the Richmond warehouses; that our Government had consented to the exportation, provided the Emperor would send his own vessels for the tobacco; that the Vicomte had given an assurance that the vessels would be sent, accompanied by armed convoys; and that to all this Seward and Co. objected very strongly. This statement has neither been affirmed nor denied by the organ of the Administration, but it is generally credited upon the character of the Examiner, as a trustworthy journal, unaccustomed to tamper with the public credulity. The Examiner added that the Vicomte was on his way to New York to make known the result of his mission to the Emperor, through the French consul at that port, and that the French frigates in New York harbour were there on this tobacco errand. Which Mr. Seward may put in his pipe and smoke it, he may.

As the only conversation I had the honour to hold with the French count had reference to the social disadvantages of the Confederate capital pendant la guerre, and the absolute unendurability of life without music or mushrooms, I cannot speak upon this matter of the tobacco negotiations, but you will perhaps allow me to relieve the dullness of my letter by giving you, in brackets, a little anecdote which is related of him while here, and which has caused us some amusement. The count, having borne with the wretched cuisine of the Ballard House until menaced by starvation, went out, like a pelican of the wilderness, into the town in search of a dinner. Happily he found one, at the Restaurant au Rendezvous (formerly Zetelle's), so much to his liking and so touchingly suggestive of Paris, that he begged the cook might be sent up into the salle-à-manger, as he desired to make his grateful acknowledgments to an artist and a compatriot—not doubting for an instant that the dishes before him were the work of a Frenchman. The count's amazement may be imagined when the door opened some minutes afterwards, and there entered a very stout, greasy old negro woman, as black as the ace of spades, who announced herself as the presiding divinity of the kitchen. "I se de cook, marsa," said the old "auntie," curtseying; which being translated to the count, he expressed his surprise at the boundless resources of the Confederacy, and declared that if such cooking were possible under slavery, the "peculiar institution" had been much belied and was worth fighting for, indeed.

Our advices from the Army of Northern Virginia have been somewhat vague and indefinite. General Lee has exercised a very proper caution in refusing to allow information of his movements to be communicated to the daily papers. We only know that Meade has been steadily retreating in the direction of Alexandria, and that our generals have been pursuing him. Cavalry fights have taken place at various points to our advantage—at Robertson's River on the 10th instant, at Warrenton on the 12th, at Catlett's Station on the 14th; in all of which we carried the day, capturing 2,500 prisoners and several thousand horses and mules. On the evening of Wednesday, the 14th, a fight took place near Bristow Station, in which the brigade of (the Confederate) General Cooke suffered a considerable loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners—perhaps 350—the general himself having been wounded very early in the action, whereby the brigade was thrown into some confusion. In this combat we also lost five pieces of artillery. There has been a rumour industriously circulated to-day of a third battle of Manassas, in which the Yankees were thoroughly overcome, losing 9,000 prisoners and 600 wagons. This general engagement is said to have occurred yesterday, and it is added that the enemy had retreated behind the fortifications of Alexandria, disencumbering themselves in their flight of everything—guns, haversacks, overcoats, &c., &c., with which the roads were strewn. Such an event is likely enough to have happened, and all the signs of the campaign seem to have pointed to another great shock of arms on the blood-stained fields of Manassas, where an annual Olympic Game of death and carnage has, so far, since the commencement of the war, been celebrated; but the victory is not credited here, and we wait for the War Department to announce the fact before we think of Te Deums. It may be that the report of the battle, like the mysterious φνην of the Greeks, has been borne to us on the air in advance of the official despatch. If it be true, you will know it through the bulletins of the New York press, and the extent of the disaster will be truthfully indicated in the rise of gold on Wall Street. The barometer of the Stock Exchange rarely fails to mark the fluctuations of the military atmosphere.

In the fight at Robertson's River fell Captain William B. Newton of the Hanover Dragoons: a young man of such rare qualities of mental endowment and personal character that his death is everywhere lamented in Virginia, by the army and the people, as a grave public loss. Captain Newton had served in the House of Delegates of the State, before the breaking out of the war, and given there high promise of future distinction; and his contributions to the periodical literature, though always anonymous, had evinced a maturity of intellect far beyond his years. So exalted a sense had Governor Letcher of the worth of this lamented officer, that he communicated the fact of his death in a special message to the Virginia Legislature.

The doom of Charleston has not yet fallen. The preparations of the Yankees are going forward on the most gigantic scale. Parrott, the inventor of the formidable piece of ordnance which bears his name, has been on the spot, directing the position of the guns. Meanwhile our batteries maintain a constant fire upon their works on Morris Island, and on the fleet, whenever a monitor comes within range. The attack by the torpedo steamer David on the Ironsides was one of the most gallant adventures in the whole history of naval warfare, and has elicited the admiration even of the Yankees. Lieut. Glassell, who commanded the expedition, and fireman Sullivan, are prisoners on board the flag-ship. The Ironsides sustained serious injury, which will probably place her hors du combat for the residue of the siege, which has now reached its ninety-ninth day, with little better prospect of success than before Sumter was battered down or Wagner occupied by the free negroes of Massachusetts.

The President has not yet returned from his visit to the army before Chattanooga, and it is expected that he will come back by way of Mobile and Charleston. On the 11th instant, he reviewed the entire body of troops under General Bragg. The day was fine, the wooded heights on either hand flamed with the rich autumnal glories of the American forest, and as the commander-in-chief rode along the extended lines, stretched in a crescent from Missionary Ridge to Lookout Mountain, the spectacle is said to have been magnificent. It was in full view of the enemy, and as the cheering rolled along the front, the Yankees, catching the sound and divining the cause, rushed to the nearest points of approach to get a distant glimpse of the "Leader of the Rebellion."

A voluminous correspondence is published between Commissioners Ould and Meredith, with reference to the cartel for exchange of prisoners, from which it appears that a little difference of seventeen thousand exists in their respective computations of the account kept inter the United and Confederate States. The number of Yankee prisoners now in Richmond is nearly eleven thousand, and the maintenance of so large a body of men in our present straitened commissariat, during the coming winter, is a serious consideration; but the conviction is so strong on the part of the Government that the exchange is indefinitely interrupted, that they are preparing to construct large winter prisons on Belle Isle, where the prisoners are now encamped under guard.

The Legislature of Virginia has passed a very stringent law for the suppression of gambling. The faro-dealer, when convicted, is to be whipped at the public whipping-post. All buildings rented to keepers of gaming-tables will be subject to confiscation. The police may enter by force any house where reasonable suspicion exists as to its character. The effect of this legislation must be highly salutary to the morals of the capital. Already there is a Hegira of the fraternity, from the elegant, easy, quiet, decorous flaneur, who lounges at noon about the Spotswood House, to the swaggering, bejeweled, over-dressed blackguard, with a revolver concealed in his ruffles, or a bowie-knife in the back of his coat, who infests the corners of the more crowded thoroughfares. Let us hope that the law will be inexorably enforced.

John M. Botts, the "illustrious Union martyr," as he is styled by the Yankee press, has been once more arrested; this time by Jeb. Stuart, at his home in the county of Culpepper, and paroled to appear in Richmond. Mr. Botts was under arrest more than a year ago, and was discharged, as was generally understood at the time, upon giving his word that he would hold no communication with the enemy. Recently, he has given dinner parties to the Yankee General Meade and staff, and was a guest, week before last, at the festivities incident to the presentation of a sword to General D. K. Warren, of one of the New England States. If such conduct on the part of Mr. Botts does not amount to the Punica fides, it is difficult to say what would constitute a breach of parole.

The Rev. Dr. M. D. Hoge safely arrived at his home a few days ago, having run the blockade in the steamer Vance from Bermuda into Wilmington, N.C. The steamer was pursued and fired into, but escaped without injury. Dr. Hoge has been cordially greeted by his numerous friends and admirers.

The gallant Prussian, Major Von Barcke, chief of General Stuart's staff, of whose daring exploits the English press has frequently heard through the Times' Southern correspondent and others, is now in Richmond, and I regret to say, still very little better of his fearful wound in the neck, from which at times he suffers agonies. His gigantic frame has wasted away to that of a thin, weak man. You would not recognise the dashing rider, who with his own hand killed or captured five Yankee cavaliers in a single charge.

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, November 17.

THE political interest of the present moment is divided between the Congress and the Legislative Assembly, which has occupied its sittings with the election reports. The contested returns have not yet been called up, but the debates have displayed some animation, and have laid bare a series of violent acts of petty despotism emanating from subordinate functionaries, for whose abuses of power no Government can be held responsible. It is proposed to invalidate the election of M. Pelletau, the witty and very anti-dynastical writer, not for any act or omission on his part, but because the Prefect of the Seine considered certain votes as null, and not to be counted in the sum of votes given, of which more than one half is necessary for a valid election; while the committee of the Assembly by counting these votes makes M. Pelletau's majority insufficient. By law all votes are null which are given for persons who have not performed certain prescribed ceremonies to legalise their candidature; the doubt raised is, whether the candidates who present themselves in one electoral district, are qualified to receive votes in all those of the department. The committee says yes, and the prefect no.—M. Thiers has reappeared in public life to call attention to one of the abuses of authority I have referred to, nothing less than a refusal of justice by the procureur impérial who forbade the serving of a writ till after the election. The committee had approved and the Chamber had confirmed the election, on the ground that it was only a mayor of a small locality to whom the writ was addressed, and that the election being decided by a large majority it could not have been affected one way or other by this. M. Thiers was not listened to with the attention which as an old Minister he perhaps expected. He made one happy hit. Speaking of the official whose conduct he was blaming, he called him the procureur du roi, at which there was a burst of laughter, jeering rather than cheering. The orator stopped and then went on—"In time, gentlemen, I shall learn the proper nomenclature." Every one will agree that the unceremonious reception given to such a man as M. Thiers is not of favourable augury for the Assembly. The majority here, as in America, seem to think that when they open their mouths no dog may bark, and they are said to whisper complaints at M. de Morny, as president, is too favourable to the very small minority, and gives it more than fair play. He shows great tact not only in his dealings with the members but in all his acts, and is deservedly the most popular public man in France. Apropos of some of the strictures which the press has indulged in on the proceedings of the Chamber, he announced on Saturday that he had saved the Débats from an official warning, but reminded the press that the Assembly still has, and if necessary will exercise, the right to call offending editors and writers to its bar.

It is announced that M. de Girardin is invited to Compiègne this week; and as such invitations are thought here to have some political significance, it is remarked that in commenting on a story in the Czas about the flogging of a lady, M. de G. says that if Russia do not contradict it, or punish the agent who was guilty of such cruelty, all Europe will rise against her, and the cry will no longer be, Free Poland in a free Russia, but, Free Poland in free Europe! Your readers are aware that he has up to the present time been a systematic defender of Russia.

The French Yellow Book containing the diplomatic correspondence for the last year, prefaced by the Emperor's letter to the Sovereigns, proposing a Congress, has been distributed. Three-fifths of the whole are devoted to Poland, a part of which has already been published, and the daily papers will, no doubt, reproduce the rest.

There are twelve despatches relating to the United States. The first, of the 9th of January, recommending negotiations between the North and South, without the intervention of a foreign mediator, is followed on the 26th of the next month by a comment on the refusal given by the Cabinet of Washington to this proposal. It is a rapid analysis of Mr. Seward's well-known despatch, with the remark that although it is a refusal, it is drawn up in the politest terms. M. Mercier writes on the 3rd of April, to convey Mr. Seward's assurances that his policy in regard to Mexico has always been frank and straightforward, and that he has given no encouragement to projects which would impede the progress of the French arms in that country. On the 23rd of the same month M. Drouyn writes to complain of Mr. Adams's giving licenses to carry contraband of war to Mexico, "a singular document," to which his attention has been the more drawn, as it contrasts with Mr. Seward's recent declarations. This despatch is accompanied by a "verbal note." After stating the facts and alluding to Mr. Adams's diplomatic position, the note says: "The Cabinet of Washington will not be surprised that the Government of the Emperor should see in Mr. Adams's proceedings an act of gratuitous malevolence towards France, and by which it may well feel itself wounded. It would be vain to seek an excuse for the conduct of the American Minister. He was in no way obliged to furnish the Mexican agents with a document which is equivalent to a safe conduct, which, even if contraband of war had not been in question, would have been a contrast to the suspicious and excessive surveillance exercised over all expeditions leaving England for the same destination, but which, in the form and under the conditions in which it was given, became a mark of sympathy and a voluntary encouragement given to unlawful manoeuvres which were hurtful to a friendly Power. The Government of the Emperor cannot therefore be silent on the unpleasant feeling this has produced. It has a right to suppose that the Federal Government has already perceived this, and, confiding in the assurances of a totally opposite nature which it has frequently received, it believes itself entitled to expect an explicit disavowal of the attitude and language of the American Minister in London." Whilst M. Drouyn de Lhuys was penning this very sharp remonstrance, M. Mercier was writing a despatch to announce that Mr. Seward had informed Lord Lyons of the intention of the Washington Cabinet to violate their engagement in regard to the exportation of cotton and the respect for neutral property by the Federal troops. He writes again on the 5th of May to say that Mr. Seward seems inclined to give in on this point, and has, at all events, promised every sort of protection to French commerce, "which has always observed the laws of neutrality with such perfect good faith." Answer by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, in which he politely shows that Mr. Seward has been very liberal of promises, and fallen very short in their fulfilment, and if he, M. D., gave little credit to their sincerity the event has proved him to be right. "The truth, it must be acknowledged, is, that the Federal Government still seeks to prevent transactions of which it would have neither the control nor the benefit, and which, while they would be profitable to neutrals, would be so also to the Southern States. I know not, and I need not inquire, whether the loan contracted on account of the Secessionist States, without any intervention on our part, will realise what seems to be expected from it; but as the Secretary of State took this text to express himself as he has done, I make a point of informing you of the judgment to which we have at last come as to the dispositions with which the Federal Government shows itself animated in this circumstance." On the 8th of May, M. Mercier writes that Mr. Seward entirely disavows the proceedings of Mr. Adams, and in a subsequent letter M. Drouyn states the form in which Mr. Dayton apologised for Mr. Adams's "thoughtlessness."

Mr. Adams addressed a communication to Lord Russell on the Confederate loan, but Mr. Dayton had not taken such a step in Paris. In announcing this to M. Mercier, M. Drouyn returns to the question of neutral commerce with both belligerents. Lord Cowley has assured him that the British Minister at Washington has orders to support any proposals that may be made to re-open the cotton market to Foreign commerce. The last despatch published, is dated the 13th September. Mr. Dayton had come to expostulate on certain rumours regarding a treaty concluded between France and the Confederate States, stipulating the cession of Texas and a part of Louisiana. He answered, by saying that he also had heard rumours. They were of a Federal protest against the expedition to Mexico and its consequences, an offensive and defensive alliance between the United States and Russia, and the appearance of a Federal fleet off Vera Cruz. All these things Mr. Dayton denied, to which the French Minister replied, that he had never attached any importance to such rumours, and that the other would do well to follow his example.

It must be gall and wormwood to Mr. Seward to see that his unquestioned ability has only resulted in bringing upon his Government a series of such remonstrances, conveyed in such language, by the Minister of a country which in former times was its undeviating friend. Diplomatic language could not more strongly express the scathing contempt of which he is the object.

But if the first eleven despatches just published are remarkable for the severe treatment of the Federal Government by the French Foreign Minister, the twelfth and concluding one, that of the 13th of September, though still with a strong point of irony in its expression, seems to show a very different state of things. To the cursory reader it may appear only to convey a well-turned compliment to Mr. Dayton's person, of which no man speaks evil; but he who thinks to read between lines, as the French say, will find the it contains more serious matter. Whilst the success of the Mexican expedition could be doubted we see the two Governments jealously watching each other, but at the date of the last despatch the possession of Mexico was secured, the arrangements for filling the throne had been made, and it became, therefore, of great importance to France to prevent the Federal Government, rich in uncounted greenbacks, from giving any material assistance to the malcontents who have followed Juarez in his retreat. Despatch No. 12 (No. 57 in the Yellow Book), may be regarded as the official jotting of the Convention concluded in this view. The Northern States will not interfere with France or French protégés in Mexico, reserving themselves, no doubt, for better times; and France will allow the questions of mediation and freedom of neutral trade to drop. On this theory it is a Roland for an Oliver, each party sacrificing a friend for his own convenience.

The Emperor's silence on the subject of America in his speech to the Chambers, lends some colour to this reading of the final despatch. Such, at all events, is the opinion of a few friends of the South as to this apparent fluctuation in the Imperial policy.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, November 18.

THE Poor Law Board has recently appointed a new inspector (Mr. U. Corbett) for this district. It will probably not be this gentleman's fault if the Right Hon. C. P. Villiers does not soon find himself in a position to communicate to the Cabinet the impression produced on the mind of an intelligent and zealous official, after a month's observation, of the condition to which our unemployed operatives are in danger of being reduced. "In Manchester," said Mr. Corbett, at the last meeting of one of our local Boards of Guardians, "imposition is so organised that when the relieving-officer is seen in certain streets the fact is 'telegraphed' from house to house, looms are covered up, men jump into bed to simulate illness, and are found under the bed-clothes with their clogs on: in fact, to such an extent has this been practised that it has been found necessary to employ policemen in plain clothes for the detection of such cases." Such a piece of trenchant truth-telling upon a most painful subject carries its best commentary in its own incisiveness. But it may be added that Mr. Corbett can hardly expect to be very popular with the Union and Emancipation Society if he seriously intends to present to the head of his department such reports as these, in testimony of the kind of patience with which Lancashire is waiting for the end of the war.

Happily, however, the Union and Emancipation people are beginning to pay the penalty of their disregard of every principle of patriotism, and perhaps the only comfortable reflection they will have to console themselves with in their hour of discomfiture will be this: that, for the time being, they were not quite powerless for mischief. They certainly did their best and worst to strengthen the hands of a foreign and unfriendly Government, at the cost—for all they cared to the contrary—of plunging a large portion of the people of our own country into material and moral ruin. They succeeded, we cannot believe in cheating Earl Russell (for his Lordship most certainly knew his men too well for that) but in flourishing in the Foreign Minister's face a series of misrepresentations, and the mere refutation of which would needs involve the attainment of the very object they had in view, viz., delay, or, in other words, time and leave for more slaughter. It was for this end, then, as some of the leaders in their "unofficial" utterances no longer scruple to confess, that our single-minded philanthropists of last year could scarcely contain themselves for sympathy with the negro. But now it is no longer to restore the Union—which they honestly own to be an impossibility—nor yet to emancipate the slave, for whom in their hearts they care not a straw; but it is to eke out the period of European inaction, that Lancashire is said to be "patient;" to ensure a horrible leisure for exterminating a martial and heroic race, that our own industrial population has been reduced to pawn its manhood. When these points are thrust home to them, the Manchester Unionists—at least those of them who confess that the anti-slavery cry was a politic sham—have nothing of counter with except that, technically and morally the South are "rebels," and as such deserve the sharpest kind of justice. As well as to the technical right or wrong of the "rebellion," and the moral right or wrong of it too, it is more than an answer to the Northern partisan to refer him upon those matters to the commander-in-chief of the naval and land forces of the Confederate States. And as to the "justice" which ought to be meted out, if the sword only of justice had been used, it had broken long ago, and Lancashire had not now been starving. But is it "justice" to the South that we ourselves should in effect be waging war against her with our own men and our own matériel—any more than it is justice to ourselves that we should permit one portion of the United Kingdom to be drained of its fighting population for a foreign service, at the expense of keeping another portion of our fellow-countrymen surrounded with the debasing influences of pauperism? It is hardly fair, however, to argue with a Northerner off the platform. Unless upon the "stump" he has not a leg to stand on; and even from that familiar foothold he has ceased to command an audience in Lancashire now that President Davis's mythical ex-coachman (who was really worth seeing and listening to) is no longer available for diversifying the humdrum of an anti-slavery speech with a racy natural joke worth all the money. By-the-by, it is said our fugitive friend has gone to New York. He has certainly left behind him many whom he has amused, who would learn with regret that he had ended his days on a lamp-post.

The position of affairs at Chattanooga is eagerly discussed on all sides. It is felt that the issue of the engagement there can hardly fail to influence considerably the course of events, preparatory, possibly, to the termination of the war. Livy, let us remember, in describing one of the most critical days that shaped the world's empire—the day of battle between Scipio and Hannibal—throws his wonted dignity upon the following trifle (and admit omen!) "It is small to speak of," he says, "yet of much moment in the matter itself, that when the armies joined, the shouting of the Romans was far more great and terrible, as being all of one voice from the same nation; whilst the voices of Hannibal's soldiers were different and disagreeing, as consisting of several languages."

The members of the Right Honourable T. Milner Gibson's constituency of Ashton, in public meeting assembled, have followed the example set them by other towns in the cotton districts, by declaring in favour of joint action by European Powers to bring about peace. The meeting was held on Friday evening in the Town Hall, and was presided over by the Mayor of the Manor (S. D. Lees, Esq., M.D.) in compliance with a public requisition, signed by nearly all the local magistrates and members of the corporation, by all the considerable employers of labour, and by about 700 of the trading and operative classes in the town. About 3,000 people were crowded in the body of the hall, and many hundreds who could not find room besieged the doors during the whole of the evening. The Southern element predominated in the meeting, as in the town, by a majority of, perhaps, five to one.

The Mayor of the Manor, in opening the business of the meeting, said he had no hesitation in acceding to the request of his fellow-townsmen in calling a public meeting of the inhabitants of Ashton to express their opinions on the present crisis. He need not say that the distress prevailing, now for two years, throughout the cotton districts was entirely to be attributed to the American war, and that the duration of their miseries would co-extend with that of the war. It might be remarked that there was a supply of cotton reaching England from other sources than the Southern States of America, but cotton of that inferior quality was useless to the manufacturers in the districts about Ashton, who were almost exclusively engaged in that particular branch of manufacture for which the finest staple was required. But he also looked upon the question as affecting the great body of tax-payers. The rate was heavy enough last year, but he regretted to state that next month an additional one of 2s. 6d. in the pound would have to be levied. It therefore became the employers and employed to inquire why it was that so calamitous a state of affairs should continue. If anything had ever been demonstrated at any time it was this—that the Northern States were unable to subjugate the South. (Cheers.) They had tried to do so, but to try was to fail, and the means whereby they had since aimed at the conquest were such as reflected little credit upon humanity or civilisation. They had incurred an enormous debt, had debased their currency, were without patriotism, and fought their battles by the aid of Irish soldiers and other mercenaries. By their agents, or whatever was the machinery employed, they induced the fighting population of the sister country to emigrate to New York, and the unfortunate fellows found themselves on the battle-field before they well knew where they were. Was that the way to subjugate a brave people? He hoped the British Government would be induced to use its influence conjointly with other Powers to produce a cessation of hostilities, with a view to obtain a peaceful separation of the States. (Applause.)

Mr. William Aitken, honorary secretary of the Ashton branch of the Southern Independence Association, moved the following resolution:—

"That in the opinion of this meeting the war waged by the Northern against the Southern States of the old American Union is at once unjustifiable in its nature and injurious to the world, and that the present aspects of the conflict afford no hope of its early termination, unless by means of the moral influence of Europe being brought to bear upon it. We therefore deem it the duty of the Government of this country to enter into communication with France and other European Powers to concert with them as to the best means of bringing about peace."

In advocating that motion, the speaker entered at some length and with much care into the arguments in favour of the right of secession. Referring to the subject of slavery, he contended that if the South to-day would agree to throw down their arms and return to the hated Union, President Lincoln would be only too glad to guarantee them their peculiar institution for ever. (Cheers and "No, no.") He said "yes, yes." If an escaped slave sought refuge from Kentucky by fleeing to Ohio, the laws of that State compelled him to be returned back to bondage. Slavery would never have existed so long as it had done but for the protecting and fostering influences of the Union which perpetuated it. To support the Union was another phrase for supporting slavery. The dissolution of the Union would ultimately ensure the liberty of the bondman. He had been taunted with a desire to break up the freest and most perfect form of government the world had yet seen. If the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act constituted the best form of government, he was glad he was no citizen of the Republic; and if General Butler was an ornament to the land, he thanked God he had not got such a man for his fellow-countryman.

Mr. Thomas Heginbottom, in seconding the motion, hoped that when the war was over they would not find the capital of Lancashire had so dwindled as not to be sufficient to command the labour of the operatives. He believed in the principle of non-intervention as a matter of general policy, but cases might arise like the present, wherein, if pushed too far, non-intervention ceased to be a principle, and became a mere crochot.

The Mayor of the Manor was proceeding to put the motion to the meeting, when a scene of tumultuous uproar arose, in consequence of some person rising to move an amendment.

Mr. John Johnston, amid continued interruptions and general expressions of disapprobation, moved the following amendment, which was seconded by Mr. James Broadbent:—

"That this meeting strongly condemns the unjust and un-called-for war in America. Nevertheless they declare that any system of government which deprives labour of its just reward, and the labouring classes of their political, social, and moral rights, is unworthy of the acceptance of Englishmen. And, although this war has unjustly inflicted great sufferings and privations on various classes of the community, this meeting believes that it would be impolitic to depart from that system of neutrality which has been wisely adopted by the British Government."

The Mayor of the Manor, upon putting the amendment and motion the vote, declared the motion carried by a large majority.

Dr. Vernon (of the Town Council) proposed the second resolution, which was as follows:—

"That this meeting deeply sympathises with the gallant and self-denying struggle of the Confederates in their efforts to resist invasion and plunder, and to maintain their independence against the immense armies sent forth by the Washington Cabinet, with the now avowed object of their subjugation and extermination."

After paying a high tribute to the gallant bearing of the soldiers and statesmen of the South; the speaker, warning with his subject, scouted the idea that the war was waged against slavery. They had been told that the basis of the Confederate Government was slavery, while that of the Federals was liberty, equality, and fraternity. Liberty, he supposed, meant Fort Lafayette; equality, that the free negro should not be allowed to vote; and fraternity, that he should pollute only certain railway cars with his presence. For his part, and he said it with pride, he sympathised with the South. He considered them a nation of heroes. He was no advocate of slavery, but at the same time no abhorrence of slavery could induce him to withhold his sympathy from such a noble people. This was a war in which white men were gallantly struggling to free themselves from the oppression of other white men. If slavery must needs be dragged into the question, all he could say was, never could he sympathise with a nation that sacrificed the lives of a million of whites to set free any number of blacks.

The Rev. T. Radley, in seconding the motion, said it was useless talking about secession. The seceding had been accomplished, but the bringing back had not. (Cheers.) If President Lincoln was sincere in the abolition of slavery, why not abolish it in the Northern States, and pay the slaveowners in greenbacks? There was at least one means—if the English Government could resort to it—of stopping the war, namely, by stopping the emigration from Ireland. When there were no more Irish emigrants there would be no more fighting between North and South.

The uproar was again renewed upon an attempt to move the following amendment:—

"That this meeting abhors the rebellion now carried on by the Southern States of America, and hopes the Government of the United States of America will prosecute the war with vigour and restore the Union."

The motion was carried even by a larger majority than in the former instance.

The only remaining business was to adopt a memorial to Lord Palmerston, embodying the opinions of the meeting, and urging upon his lordship, as the head of the Government, to use his best influence to bring about the restoration of peace.

The meeting terminated with a vote of thanks to the Mayor of the Manor, and cheering for the "South."

A SUGGESTION.

LETTER FROM J. W. COWELL, ESQ.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—THE British Government was under no obligation to recognise that Confederacy of States of which the four sovereignties of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, and North Carolina had, in 1861, constituted themselves members. It was, nevertheless, under the absolute obligation to those States to refuse admitting as valid, and to deny the legality of any public act whatever, which the Political Agency seated at Washington might claim, or might assume, to perform in the capacity of their agent or representative. For those States had notified to the world that they had cancelled and withdrawn from that Agency the authority which they had, each for itself and separately, delegated to it on the 2nd of January, the 23rd of May, the 26th of June, and the 1st of August, in the year 1788, respectively; and Great Britain had previously bound herself always to treat with them as "free, sovereign, and independent States." This binding engagement clearly prohibits her from treating in what concerns them, with any Agent whom they may chose to repudiate. This absolute obligation Great Britain has shamefully disregarded, and it consequently now falls on those States, as a duty they owe to mankind, interested in the observance of treaties and in the maintenance of political good faith, to assert their own rights by some public act, and to brand the perfidy and bad faith of the British Government with the stigma it deserves. It is the object of this letter to appeal to them to perform this sacred duty.

The case on which they can, and I hope will, in legal phrase, go to the tribunal of the world, lies in a very narrow compass, and they can need no assistance from any one on this side of the Atlantic in setting it forth. It is not therefore my intention to discuss the case itself; I desire merely to point out that the present is the proper time for their taking the needful action, and to suggest it.

These four States have constituted themselves members of a new political Confederacy, in alliance with certain other States, with whom they have concurred in instituting a joint political Agency. The Executive Chief of this despatched a Commissioner to the British Government, empowered to make treaties with it, and this functionary the British Government not only refused to recognise—as it was entitled to do—but it treated him with such singular incivility that the President, under a proper sense of dignity, withdrew him. Up to the period of Mr. Mason's retirement, the four States to which I have referred may have judged it expedient to refrain from putting forward their own treaty rights on the British Government. But the President's simultaneous withdrawal of Mr. Mason and his proper expulsion of the English Consuls from the Southern Territory, place these four States in a peculiar relation towards the British Government, of which they are not only entitled to avail themselves for their own advantage, and that of their allies, but they are peremptorily called upon so to do in the interests of mankind at large. But in discharging this important duty they must be on their guard not to afford any opening to their antagonist for equivocation and evasion; they must be careful not to confound their own peculiar right of complaint against the British Government with that which they share with their present political colleagues. These last, being without those particular treaty rights which they possess, have not the same rights of complaint with them. Hence they, on this occasion, must stand apart from their allies, and act separately, and by themselves. The course which the British Government has pursued towards the South has been of a character which can leave no doubt on the mind of any Southern statesman that the British Government will resort to any sophistry, subterfuge, or artifice, which may seem calculated to divert the attention of the world from its perfidy in this peculiar case. The four States must therefore confine themselves strictly to the ground on which they have an undeniable right to stand. "Here," they must say in effect, "Here is the treaty of 1783; here are our several Acts of 1788, granting certain powers to a certain political Agency, by which—and by which alone—you became authorised to deal with that Agency in our affairs. Here, again, are our Acts of 1861, annulling the powers so granted in 1788, by which you became absolutely interdicted from dealing with that Agency in our affairs; and here is your Act admitting the legality of the blockade of our shores, which that Agency claimed to institute in the character of continuing to be our agent. How is such a proceeding consistent with your obligation by the treaty of 1783, to treat with us always as free, sovereign, and independent States?" If the four sovereign States, in performing the grand duty which they owe to humanity, will confine themselves strictly within the limits which I have just defined, and will hold the British Government to the point of the treaty of 1783, as it regards them, and them only, they will gain a verdict from the honest sentiment of mankind which will cover them with honour, and the British Government with shame.

It seems to me that they should take some such course as the following:—

Suppose that Georgia (whose style in her public Acts is "The State of Georgia, by the grace of God, free, sovereign and independent," were) to set forth the treaty of 1783—to denounce the infraction of it by the British Government towards herself in 1861—to protest against that infraction—to declare that all acts performed by the British Government involving that infraction, and derogating from that independence and sovereignty which it had covenanted always to respect in her, are null and of no legitimate effect—and to conclude by an appeal to the world and to posterity against the bad faith of the British Government. And suppose the three other States, whose independence and sovereignty have been similarly outraged by the British Government, were to protest, by formal Acts of their respective Legislatures in a similar manner.

For brevity's sake I will now refer to Georgia only. Supposing that Georgia should make a protest of this solemn character, the point next to be considered is the action she should take thereupon. The natural and obvious one would be to despatch a commissioner to call the attention of the British Government to the fact that it is violating the treaty of 1783. But such a course with an antagonist of such a character as now unfortunately attaches to the British Government would be unadvisable. The State of Georgia is weak—at the greatest disadvantage in every way—her territory ravaged by a brutal enemy, seeking to exterminate her entire population,—and to this enemy the British Government is lending indirect, but very positive, assistance. It is sad to feel assured that the British Government would meet any application from Georgia, in her defenceless condition, with every device for delay and evasion which the circumstances might permit; and Georgia should therefore abstain from any course, however advisable otherwise, which would expose her to this danger. She should, therefore, carefully avoid any application to the British Government whatever. This State is a sovereignty as completely as is the State of Great Britain. There is no assumption of superiority of sovereign rank or rights on the part of Great Britain in the Treaty of 1783—and Georgia is as fully entitled and empowered to judge of, and to interpret the treaty as is Great Britain herself—the other party to it. The object of Georgia is now to bring to the cognisance of mankind, in an authentic form and manner, the fact that Great Britain has grievously violated that treaty.

Her first step should be to pass the Act of Protest—her second to give the British Government formal notice of the fact of her having so done—her third to notify these facts to every civilised nation in the world.

Now, there exists an established organ by means of which she may take the second of these steps in a thoroughly effectual manner. There is a public functionary occupying immemorially, a well-defined and highly important position in all legal matters (though his employment is less general in England than on the Continent), whose special vocation it is to establish protests—the Notary Public.

The Act of Protest of the State of Georgia will be effectively registered among the general Acts of Nations by her directing a Notary Public to deliver a copy of it, with all that formality and ceremony which appertains to his ministration, at the British Foreign office. Georgia should then forward an authenticated copy of her Protest to every civilised Government, and by this process Great Britain will be effectively cited before the tribunal of the world and of posterity.

Such a course of proceeding would place the British Government, and, through it, the British nation, in a position of moral disadvantage before mankind, such as no respectable people could long endure to hold.

And—what I confess is a strong motive with me in urging this course—such a proceeding would tend to restore to our starving operatives and pillaged merchants some hope that their welfare and prosperity might begin to revive. The Nation is very slowly awakening to a glimmering perception of what is the right and the wrong in this American contest. Thus far, owing to a general ignorance of its real character, and the attendant misconception of the nature of our consequent duty, we have nobly consented to suffer impatience. The Nation has been told that non-interference and neutrality were its duties. And so they were, undoubtedly. But in lieu of performing these sacred duties our Government has violated them in the most extraordinary manner. What interference can possibly be stronger, or what violation of neutrality greater, than the act of the British Government which, implies on its part an admission of a claim of the Washington Government to establish—as Agent, inter alias, for the States of Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, and North Carolina, a blockade of those very States? The Northern savages might possibly have instituted a blockade of those States by a title such as would have warranted them in calling upon Great Britain to observe it; but when their political organ at Washington elected to institute it in the usurped character of continuing to hold political authority from those sovereignties which we knew had cancelled and entirely withdrawn the very limited authority they had ever conveyed to it, we were forbidden by the treaty of 1783 to admit the legality of the blockade, and we are not only now entitled, but are bound, to cease our shameful interference against the South by revoking our wrongful admission of it.

Such a protest, moreover, would call the attention of the British public to a right view of its duties in this important matter. It requires some stimulus of this sort to awaken its perceptions of what justice prescribes in this case. Ordinarily, the British public pays little attention to foreign politics, hence it can be easily misled regarding them, and its sentiments, which are always true to the cause of honour and justice, are exposed to the risk of being engaged on the wrong side whenever the joint interest of fanatics, demagogues, and trading politicians prompts them to deceive it. Such has been the case in this instance. But the same simple, straightforward love of right and of fair play which has rendered it the dupe of hypocrites who bewilder it with specious effusions about "neutrality" and "non-intervention," while they are perpetrating the grossest breaches of neutrality, and straining the law beyond all precedent in favour of the most sanguinary and brutal savages that the civilised world has yet seen, will impel it to insist that right shall be done and wrong be righted the instant it shall clearly see on which side right lies. Already all the sympathies of the nation are on the side of its noble and heroic relatives in the South. It is proud of the goodness and the glory of Stonewall Jackson, and places him in its heart by the side of the lamented Havelock. If the four States should but once give it a knowledge of the truth by some such authoritative and solemn act as I suggest, the painful conflict which now exists between its real sentiments and its supposed duty will cease, and it will insist upon such political redress being afforded to the States with whom its Government has broken faith, as its own honour requires.

A SLIGHT DIFFERENCE.—According to the census of 1850, the agricultural productions of all the States amounted in value to $1,164,457,783. Of this sum the North produced, in round numbers, six hundred and four millions, and the South five hundred and sixty millions. Now, the debt of the North alone is equal to two thousand millions. This is the way a country gets rich by war.—United States Paper.

ANTHROPOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.

On Tuesday there was a full gathering of the members of this society for the purpose of hearing a paper read by the President, Dr. James Hunt, "On the Negro; his Place in Nature." As we intend next week to commence the publication of Dr. Hunt's valuable essay, we shall now give only a brief notice of it, and we may add that the paper was so composed, and all extraneous questions were so carefully avoided, that it is impossible to give a full and fair abstract of it.

After some introductory remarks, and the observation that it was the first time the subject had been brought before a scientific audience in London, Dr. Hunt said he hoped to bring forward facts which would dispel some of the delusions which now existed respecting the character of the negro race. A comparison was drawn between the anatomical differences existing between the typical negro and the ape on the one hand, and the European and the negro on the other. It was stated that the negro was generally of shorter stature than the European, but that the difference was greater in proportion than in form; that the bones were thicker and heavier; the trunk short, and the arm long in proportion, reaching below the middle of the femur, thus enabling the negro to scratch himself on the region of the knee without stooping. The hips were represented as narrow, the thigh laterally compressed, the fingers of the hand long and flat, and the thumb long and very weak; the foot flat, the heel both flat and long; the pelvis narrow, especially in the male, and in the female exactly resembling the shape of the cranium; the teeth hard and very large, five tubercles in the last molar of the lower jaw. On all these points there appeared a nearer approach to the ape than was seen in the European. The brain of the negro had been proved to be smaller than in the European, Finn, Syro-Egyptian, Mongol, Malay, Sematic, American-Indian, and Esquimaux. The facial angle was generally between 70 and 75 degrees, and sometimes as low as 65 degrees; the frontal sutures closed much earlier with the negro than with the European. The brain, both of the negro and ape, more resembled that of the European when in an infant state than when older; at puberty all development in the brain of the negro ceased, and the form of the skull became more ape-like as he increased in years, while the ape became more brutish as he got old—a circumstance which entirely accorded with the psychological fact, that all increase of intelligence was impossible after the age of puberty. The hair of the negro was represented as distinct in structure from that of some other races of man. The structure of the larynx and palate was also different to that of the European. It had yet to be established whether the offspring of the European and negro were indefinitely prolific; many facts, together with the researches of Broca and Nott, leading to the conclusion that these mixtures were only temporarily prolific, and died out after the lapse of a few generations. The negro race had had the benefit of all the ancient civilisation; but there was not a single instance of any pure negro being eminent in science, literature, or art; nearly all those who had become reputed for their talents could be proved to have European blood in their veins. The negroes in Africa were subjected to the cruellest forms of superstition, and were the victims of the most frightful cruelty and torture. Domestic slaves were not generally sold except for some crime, and a large portion of the exported slaves were criminals. Numerous opinions were quoted to show the low mental character of the negro, and the following general deductions were made:—1. That there is as good reason for classifying the negro as a distinct species from the European as there is for making the ass a distinct species from the zebra; and if we take intelligence into consideration in classification, there is a far greater difference between the negro and Anglo-Saxon than between the gorilla and chimpanzee. 2. That the analogies are far more numerous between the negro and apes than between the European and apes. 3. That the negro is inferior intellectually to the European. 4. That the negro is more humanised when in his natural subordination to Europeans than under any other circumstances. 5. That the negro can only be humanised and civilised by the European. 6. That European civilisation is not suitable to the requirements of the negro.

A discussion ensued, in which Drs. Seeman and Morice, and Messrs. Bouvier, Pusey, Winwood Reade, Reddie, and Fraser joined; all the remarks tending to confirm Dr. Hunt's statements.

The debate was ultimately adjourned until the next meeting.

THE INDIAN NATION.—Henceforth, we learn by the last mail, the native press of Bengal is to be placed under, not exactly a censorship, but what we may call a reportership. That is to say, there is no officer appointed to watch it, catch it tripping, and punish its transgressions, but one simply—the Government translator, to whom the additional duty is assigned—who is directed to subscribe to all the native journals published in the province, and draw up a periodical report of the nature of their contents for the perusal of the local government. The measure is a very judicious one, for it is impossible for the authorities themselves to read all that may be written against them, and the work could only be accomplished by a person appointed for the purpose.—Morning Herald.

MR. MASON.—This esteemed gentleman is probably on his way to his Virginian home. In a situation of very peculiar delicacy and difficulty at the English capital, where he had long felt himself in a false position, he has borne himself with the unvarying dignity of a gentleman and the ability of an accomplished statesman. That he has been subjected to the cutting insolence of Earl Russell (his inferior in every respect) and that he is now lain in wait for by Yankee ships of war, with malignant animosity, in order that our enemies may wreak a dastardly vengeance on one whom they term the "arch-traitor," all this will but heighten the regard and esteem with which his countrymen regard him. His claims upon the Confederate Government and people are now very high. To his experience of affairs, acquired in a long and spotless public life is now added a thorough acquaintance with the springs and movement of European politics. There is no man at present in the Confederacy to whom the honour and interests of the country could be so fitly and safely confided in the negotiations which must soon take place on the acknowledgment of our independent sovereignty, and when treaties must be concluded with other nations of the earth. There is no office in the gift of the President or of the people too high for his merits; and although he is a Virginian, that circumstance can scarcely operate against his claims in the mind of citizens of other States, seeing that his services (we may almost say his martyrdom) and his exalted character are so generally acknowledged throughout the land.—Richmond Inquirer.

THE UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

On the 29th October, Senor Romero was presented to President Lincoln by Mr. Seward, as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Juarez. On delivering his credentials, he made the remarks of which the following is a translation:—

"I have the honour to place in your Excellency's hands the letters of the constitutional President of the United Mexican States, which accredit me as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Mexico near your Excellency's Government. Two neighbouring and friendly governments, which divide between them the richest portion of this continent and which are ruled by identical institutions, can no less have identical interests, which will be augmented and strengthened in a great degree by drawing more closely together the friendly relations which happily exist between them, and by developing their commercial interests, through which both, in the result, will be mutually benefited. The Government and people of Mexico profess the greatest friendship and consideration for the Government and people of the United States of America, and fervently desire the prosperity, aggrandisement and welfare of this country. On me has fallen the honour to come here to express these sentiments of good will, and in the discharge of my official duties my greatest efforts will be devoted to the accomplishment of the desires of my Government, which are also mine, to maintain and strengthen the bonds of friendship which connect Mexico with the United States, and to promote the development of the commercial interests which will more closely draw together the ties by which the two nations are already united.

"I do not doubt, in the discharge of the mission which has been confided to me, I shall meet with the co-operation of the Government of your Excellency, and it will be to my extreme pleasure if I succeed in deserving your approbation."

To which the President replied:—

"Mr. Romero,—You have hitherto resided with us, and for a considerable period have been the chief diplomatic representative of your country at this capital, and know how sincerely and how profoundly, during that residence, the United States desired that Mexico might always enjoy the blessings of domestic and foreign peace, with perfect security, prosperity, independence and freedom. You know, also, that during the previous residence to which I have referred, you enjoyed the respect and esteem of this Government and the good will of the people of the United States. I have the pleasure of assuring you that in all things, as well affecting your country as yourself personally, these feelings remain unchanged.

"Thanking you for the liberal sentiments you have expressed for the United States, and congratulating you upon the renewed confidence which your Government has reposed in you, it is with unaffected pleasure that I bid you welcome to Washington."

HINDOO KNIGHTS.—We have not as yet heard that the banners in St. George's Chapel have been seen to flutter, or that the marble Crusaders who lie cross-legged in our cathedrals stirred uneasily, last Friday. Had they done so, we could have understood the portent, for two new Pagan knights were on that day added to the rolls of English chivalry. Two Hindoo princes, who believe in Mahound and Vishnu as devotedly as their brother-knights in Christianity, were declared of the Order of the Star of India in the London Gazette of that day. It is true that this new badge of knighthood does not carry with it the obligations of the ancient orders. The swarth "caballeros" are not bound to keep an oath of chastity and religion, to defend the fatherless, widows, and wronged maidens, nor to assert their lady-love's beauty and paramount virtue in the lists at point of lance. The "Star of India" is a modern decoration, with thoroughly modern ideas attaching to it; and nothing can be more proper than that faithful native princes should be honoured with its glittering jewel. Nor is there anything to object to, in the present instance, as to title or descent. But, for all their Oriental splendour of birth and purity of blood, and in spite of the easy and cosmopolitan obligations of this modern order of chivalry, there is something bizarre in the idea of a "belted knight" who turns his face towards the "Black Stone" at Mecca when he prays, or paints his forehead with the white lines of Siva's worshippers. They are the last nominations to a motley group, for if all the chapter of the "Star of India" could be assembled we should see a decidedly curious brotherhood. Her Majesty, the Grand Mistress of the Order, would find herself with gallant subjects and soldiers of her own country on one side, and swart Hindoos or sallow Moslems on the other. Nay, some of the knights wear, if not petticoats, at least the Oriental equivalent or those garments—for there are "Begums" and "Ranees" among the chivalrous number, with the ribbon and the star upon their silken "saris." It is curious to contrast the old formal ritual of installation to the noble Order of the Bath with the accoladed prince who shot his enemy in full court, who played at fast and loose with us in the Rebellion, and is more than suspected of giving shelter to Nana Sahib. The knights of whom Jung Bahadur is now one "were sworn upon the Gospels, after bathing;" and while they stood in the chapel, "offering their swords upon the altar," this was the form of admonition administered:—"By the oath which you have taken this day, I exhort and admonish you to use these swords to the glory of God and defence of the Gospel, to the maintenance of your sovereign's right and honour, and to the upholding of justice and equity, to your power. So help you God." How would His Highness Jung Bahadur have stomach such a pledge, or that necessary ceremony which followed, when the King's principal cook, with a chopping-knife in hand, addressed the new-made knights?—"Gentlemen, you know what a great oath you have taken, which is, to defend the Gospel, succour the widows and fatherless, right the wronged, &c., which, if you perform and keep it, will be to your great honour; but if you break it, I must hack off your spurs from your heels, as unworthy of this dignity, which will be a great dishonour to you—which God forbid."—Daily Telegraph.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

There has been but slight animation exhibited in the English Stock Market during the week, the brokers operating with extreme caution during the unsettled position of the Money Market. But, notwithstanding this adverse state of affairs prices do not show any falling off. Consols closed this evening at 92½ to 3 for money, and 91½ to 1 ex. div. for the account, which is precisely the same as on this day week. Exchequer Bills show a slight improvement, being at present 8s. to 3s. discount. There has not been so much doing in Foreign Securities, and very little indeed of a speculative character.

The chief bargains have been in those of the favourite Securities, including Greek, Mexican, and Turkish, but prices do not contrast favourably with last week's quotations. Greek leave off at 29½ to 30½; Mexican 37½ to 37½; Spanish Passives 34 to 34½; Ditto Certificates 13 to 13½; Turkish (1854) 90 to 91; Ditto (1862) 69½ to 70½.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Although the dealings in English Railway Shares have been to a fair average extent, the market has shown anything but briskness, and the operations appear undecided as to their course of dealings, whilst the Money Market remains in such a very ticklish position, it being uncertain from day to day whether the rate may not be further advanced. Under these circumstances prices have further declined nearly all round. In Glasgow and South-Western there has been a fall of one per cent., and the same in Great Western, North British, and North Staffordshire. Of ½ per cent. in Great Eastern, Great Northern, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Chatham and Dover, and London and North-Western, and of ¼ per cent. in Midland, North-Eastern (Berwick) and South-Eastern. In Foreign Railway Shares, the general character of business has been that of steadiness, but with comparatively little doing and no material alteration in prices. In shares connected with the British Possessions, there has been far less doing than for a long time past, and quotations generally are lower.

BANK MEETING.

At an extraordinary meeting of the proprietors of the National Bank of Liverpool, it was resolved to increase the capital of the bank from £1,000,000 to £2,000,000 by the issues of 10,000 new shares of £100 each at £5 premium, thus forming a reserve fund of £50,000.

THE TRUST AND LOAN COMPANY OF UPPER CANADA.

This Company has just issued the following report and statement of accounts for the six months ending the 30th September:—

"The net profits during this period amount to £14,804 2s. 5d., which, added to the sum brought forward from March, gives a balance at credit of revenue of £14,874 9s. 8d. The Directors recommend that out of this balance a dividend at the rate of 8½ per cent. per annum, less income tax, be declared on the paid-up capital stock of the company; that one-half of the surplus profits over 6 per cent. per annum, and the usual charge for interest, amounting together to £4,034 8s. 8d., be carried to the reserve fund, in accordance with the provisions of the Royal Charter of Incorporation; and that £250 be applied to the redemption of preliminary expenses. There will then remain the sum of £227 11s. to the credit of the next half-year's accounts. During the period embraced by these accounts the reserve fund has been charged with the sum of £613 12s. 6d. for losses on realisation of securities in default, and the amount standing to the credit of this fund, after adding the £4,034 8s. 8d. above referred to, will be £51,743 15s. 1d. The commissioners in Canada report that the agricultural classes are gradually recovering from the depression caused amongst them by the scanty yield of last year's crops; the present harvest is a good one, and the demand for loans on excellent securities continues active."

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The advance in the value of money has for a time almost entirely put a stop to the introduction of new joint-stock undertakings, several of which it is understood, were ready to be launched, but were kept back, when the advance was made in the rate of discount. The only introduction this week is one of minor importance; it is called the Ilfracombe Hotel Company, the capital sought to be raised, being the moderate sum of £20,000 divided into 2000 shares of £10 each. The object of the undertaking is to build a commodious hotel, at this healthy and beautifully situated watering place, and for which a central site has been fixed upon. Already a railway runs within a few miles of the town, and the South-Western Company intended presenting a bill during the ensuing session, for an extension direct to the town.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—
At Liverpool, to WM. KNOX, Southern Club, 55, Brown's-buildings,
At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq., Manchester Southern Club
Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

The Neutrality of Non-Intercourse.

"PUNCH," in one of its latest and cleverest cartoons, represents John Bull in dressing-gown and slippers, placidly sitting in his easy-chair, reading his newspaper and smoking his pipe, while two infuriated hags—one in "striped" and the other in "barred" petticoats—are scolding as him with clenched fists, from either side. "How about the Alabama, you wicked old man?" shrieks Mrs. North; while Mrs. South, in a voice almost choked with rage, gasps, "Where's my rams? Take back your precious consuls—there!!!" The thing is well "found,"—pity it is not true. To be in accordance with facts, it might probably not have been so much in accordance with wit and mirth, for it would then have represented the gallant old gentleman wooing with lover-like submissiveness a bespangled and bedraggled termagant, while a noble young damsel, in blood-stained bridal garments, turned aside in mingled disappointment and disdain.

Better would it have been for the dignity of this nation, more consistent with its love of fair play, and better for the interests of humanity and civilisation, had it listened to both sides with that equanimity of temper which our humorous contemporary depicts in its amusing sketch. But the time-honoured maxim, audi et alteram partem, was too hackneyed a truism to be admitted into that new system of diplomacy of which Earl Russell is the infallible high-priest and "Historicus" the apostle. A mind untutored in the subtleties of this latter-day revelation of international morals, might have innocently supposed that in a struggle of such vast proportions as that raging on the American continent, it was the first duty of a nation so nearly interested as Great Britain to keep itself accurately informed, by all honourable and legitimate means, of the character, the objects, and the relative prospects, of the antagonistic parties. Such was the practice of old-fashioned statesmanship; and only a few years ago the Foreign Secretary had not yet so utterly discarded that obsolete practice, as not to think it worth his while to send a confidential agent to report on the comparatively unimportant local questions of Schleswig-Holstein. There were, moreover, in this American war, where the combatants marshal their hosts by hundreds of thousands, peculiar circumstances which, to the ignorance of the same untutored mind, might have appeared to demand peculiar care in the collation of information. One of the parties to the war was blockaded by land and sea, and to a great extent excluded from intercourse with the neutral world. Furthermore, it suffered, from the first, by a moral blockade—far more effective and formidable than the other—which excluded it from the sympathies of civilised mankind.

Institutions growing out of the accident of an abnormal position, had reared a Chinese wall, of which enemies were not slow to avail themselves, between the people of western Europe and a correct understanding of the nature of the struggle. On the other hand, the party enjoying all the advantages of superiority in numbers, wealth, and resources, had not only forestalled public opinion, but possessed in unimpaired completeness the machinery as well for formal diplomatic intercourse as for controlling the various channels by which the ear of a universal public is reached. This same party was under more than usual temptations both to suppress the truth and to suggest falsehood. The unblushing mendacity of its organs, official and unofficial, soon acquired a proverbial notoriety. All these familiar facts would have entered into the consideration of a statesman of the old school, and inclined him to be suspicious of the glut of intelligence pouring in from one quarter, and mindful of the scanty dribbles that could be elicited from the other. While one of his ears was deafened by the clamorous din of Federal harangues and despatches, the other would have been sharpened to more than ordinary acuteness for the less obtrusive Confederate voice. How, otherwise, was it possible to hold an even balance between the two, and to preserve impartial neutrality amid the ever-changing exigencies of the vicissitudes of the conflict? Any foreign Minister, therefore, depending less on intuition and more on facts than Earl Russell appears to do, would have utilised every opportunity for restoring the equilibrium of contradictory opinions and statements. It might have been deemed inexpedient to hold the same formal relations with the Confederates as with their adversaries; but, short of this, there were many courses open which could in no sense compromise the policy of the country. A Confederate envoy might have no ambassadorial dignity except in the eyes of his own countrymen; but the simple fact that his Government had, so far as it could, invested him with that dignity, would make whatever he had to say interesting to a foreign Minister who did not already feel himself in possession of all possible information on so complex a subject. A single word from the Confederate might assist him to detect a plausible fallacy or a dexterous perversion of facts in the plea of the rival diplomatist; or, if he saw no cause for wholly trusting either, he might at least strike a safe average. Meanwhile, his own agents within the blockaded and diplomatically-silenced country would be instructed to report accurately and minutely upon everything under their observation. To do this the more effectually, advantage would be taken of the conciliatory disposition of the unrecognised Government, and that disposition would be fostered and encouraged by a policy of studied courtesy and forbearance, which could do no harm and might in the future produce much good.

The reverse of all this is what Earl Russell has seen proper to do. Fearful, apparently, that Mr. Mason might exercise an undue influence upon his impressible mind, or that he might be unable to resist what Lord Palmerston facetiously terms "the blandishments" of the haughty Virginia senator, he not merely declined any personal intercourse, but broadly intimated that no other form of communication was either welcome or desirable. At that time the Foreign-office had consular officers in Richmond, Mobile, Charleston, and Savannah, the chief points in the Confederacy. These officers were accredited, it is true, to a Government with which the Confederacy was at war, but as President Davis was willing to waive this point, it was necessary only to use common tact and discretion in avoiding collisions, to make them available both for the protection of British subjects and property, and for the purposes of informal intercourse. That the Foreign-office was not above employing them for this last purpose is shown by the negotiations entrusted to Mr. Bunch, and which ended in engaging the Confederate Government to the observance of the Paris Convention, immediately afterwards repudiated in its most essential feature by Earl Russell himself. One after another, on frivolous pre-texts, these consular officers were withdrawn—one summarily dismissed for the most extraordinary reason ever assigned: that of sending, with the consent of the Federal officer in command of the blockading squadron, British property to its lawful owners out of a blockaded port—and their places filled with subordinates and substitutes. The Confederate Government was surprised, but patient. To force it into the measure which should consummate Earl Russell's object, it was necessary to make these functionaries the channels for transmitting insults and threats. This last device succeeded, and to-day our columns contain the correspondence which announces the interruption of all relations, however indirect and unofficial, between Great Britain and the Confederate States. No impartial judge can fail to lay the blame where it belongs. Curiously enough, Earl Russell condemns himself. In a despatches which forms a part of this correspondence, and which we believe is the last Mr. Mason received as Confederate Representative, the Foreign Secretary intimates the desirability of some arrangement by which unofficial relations might be maintained between the agents of the British Government in the Confederacy and the local authorities; but to Mr. Mason's cordial reception of the intimation he makes no further response.

What the motives for the strange conduct of the British Foreign-office may be, we cannot pretend to divine. There may be in all this some reason of state-craft too deep and secret for profane eyes. It may be, also, that Earl Russell, judging the Confederates by the principles of his own policy, believed they would tamely submit to whatever indignities he might heap upon them with a view of keeping on comfortable terms with the irascible Federals. It would be quite consistent with what we know of his character, to mistake the calm self-restraint of the Confederate leaders under mortifying disappointment for a lack of spirit to resent insults actually offered. He may have thought that misfortune should be humble, and he may not know that a high-minded nation is more jealous of its honour in the hour of adversity than amid prosperous fortunes. He has been in such close communion with the Yankees, and has so scrupulously avoided contact with the Southerners; he has himself been recently so much in the habit of bullying small Powers like Brazil and Denmark, and truckling to great ones like Russia and the United States, that we have, perhaps, not much right to be surprised at his error. But from whatever cause it may have arisen, the fact remains that England's neutrality consists henceforward in absolute non-intercourse with one of the belligerents. It is not non-recognition: it is the most complete and unqualified admission of the fiction that the States confederated together since three years, and waging during that period the most gigantic war on record, are still members of the American Union, are as such represented by Mr. Adams in London, and in diplomatic intercourse with this country through Lord Lyons at Washington. It is the admission of this fiction at the very time when it appears as too absurd even to Mr. Seward, who has just confessed in a public speech what everybody except Earl Russell knew, that Mr. Lincoln has never been de facto President of the "whole" Union. It is practically the withdrawal of the last remaining privilege of recognised belligerents, for it is a declaration that even as belligerents Great Britain has no business, and desires to have no business, with the Confederate States. So far as Earl Russell is concerned, those States are a mere myth, and he believes no more in their existence than the author of "Historical Doubts." The "civil war" he cannot thus conveniently ignore, for that cripples the world's commerce and is ruining Lancashire; but in that he remains neutral; that is to say, he will see it only through the spectacles of Mr. Adams and Mr. Seward; he will hear of the events of it only through their ears; and if his neutrality, thanks to a constant pressure applied by one side only, assumes gradually more and more the inevitable direction, and daily waxes more and more "warm" towards the Federals, tant pis for the Confederates. His is the neutrality of non-intercourse.

The New Campaigns.

THE fighting on either side has recommenced in Virginia and Tennessee, and there is every prospect of a short and sharp campaign in both States before the winter sets in. It is now very evident that Lee's object in his latest advance was to push the Federals as far back upon Washington as they would go, and destroy their line of railroad in order to gain time for the despatch of troops to Tennessee. The movement was well planned and executed, but had only partially the desired effect. The Orange and Alexandria railroad has been repaired with remarkable rapidity, and General Meade, after carefully feeling the enemy's strength along the line of the Rappahannock, has pushed forward his whole army southwards. A collision between his advance and the Confederate outposts has occurred at Rappahannock Station, on the north bank of the river, which terminated disadvantageously to the latter, though not without very serious loss to the assailants. Still, if they have really captured 1,800 prisoners and seven guns, the affair is a disastrous one for the South, and betrays some extraordinary carelessness somewhere. To fight, where there is no chance of success, against overwhelming numbers, is plainly bad generalship; and although a day's delay may be of importance to the Confederates, it must be dearly purchased by a defeat and the loss of nearly 2,000 prisoners. We suspect, however, that the success has been greatly exaggerated, and that it will turn out to be much less important than it has been represented. Whatever was the actual result, the Federals continued their advance across the river, the Confederates retiring upon Culpeper. It was reported, also, that Kilpatrick's cavalry division had occupied the heights at Fredericksburg, so that the advance was taking place along the whole Federal line. The question is, what has become of Lee's army? Has he weakened it to such an extent, by the despatch of troops southward, as to be compelled to avoid for the present an engagement in the open field? Is he falling back slowly upon Richmond with a view of enticing Meade forward to the very lines of the Southern capital, where, like Massena before the heights of Torres Vedras, he may see his great army reduced to hopeless inaction and inglorious retreat? Or is he merely drawing the enemy away from his base of operations, and prepared at the right moment to give him battle, when his unwieldy masses of troops will be an encumbrance, and when retreat will expose his shattered battalions to be terribly cut up by the Confederate cavalry? General Lee is too circumspect a soldier to have run any great risk. The probability is that his forces are within call, and that if Meade seriously presses his advance, he will find he has underrated his adversary's means of resistance. But, considering the season, the transport required by so large an army as Meade's, the barrenness of the country which has to be traversed, the strong positions an army acting on the defensive can successively take up, we are not inclined to believe the Federal General will hazard a movement upon Richmond. If he can hold the heights of Fredericksburg through the winter, he will, at any rate, have gone by his predecessors, Burnside and Hooker, and he will be ready to start for Richmond in the spring.

Simultaneously with Meade's advance is reported the march of the Confederates upon Burnside's army in East Tennessee. General Grant telegraphs that Burnside's outposts have been attacked and driven in, and that portions of two of his regiments have been captured. By a previous mail we learnt that 750 of his troops had been captured at Philadelphia, Tennessee, and that he was concentrating his army in expectation of an attack. This attack will not be long delayed. Troops were on their way from Virginia and from Bragg's army. They would compel Burnside to fight or retreat, and a retreat from Knoxville, East Tennessee, upon Danville, Kentucky, before a superior force, would be little less disastrous than a defeat. We can readily understand the anxiety that prevails at Washington. Since the war began the North has never had two armies exposed to such grave perils as now threaten the forces under Generals Burnside and Thomas. The movement upon East Tennessee was undoubtedly planned and carried out in the belief that the Confederates could offer no effectual opposition in that quarter, and that there was good foundation for the reports of the demoralisation of Bragg's army. It was never feared that Rosecrans and Burnside would be isolated, and exposed to attack separately. It was never imagined that the Confederate Commander-in-Chief could avail himself of his interior lines of communication to strengthen a weak front without imperilling his own position. But, as it has happened, Rosecrans has been attacked and beaten; and now the two armies of invasion, cut off from intercommunication, can neither help one another nor retreat without risking each other's destruction. Every day they stay where they are their difficulties increase; but there they must remain until the North can send into Tennessee another 100,000 men to keep open their communications and enable them to break through the meshes of the net in which the Confederates are practically enfolded them. As we have said before, the difficulty of the Federals is, not the fighting they have to do, but the mouths they have to feed. The dispositions of the Confederates are plainly made with a view to cut off their communications, and prevent either the arrival of large reinforcements in Tennessee or the transport of supplies. Thus their cavalry is at work in the Squatchir valley, and all along the frontier line of Mississippi and Alabama Confederate troops are posted to resist the progress of Grant's army from the Mississippi and cut off his trains: whilst, Burnside once disposed of, the victorious army will be enabled to get on the left flank of the enemy at Chattanooga and make a dash upon McMinnville and Nashville, leaving Chattanooga watched by the force holding Lookout Mountain. The Federals boast that they can hold Chattanooga and make it the base of a new invasion in the spring. We shall see. At present it looks much more as if, in President Davis's words, Rosecrans' unwieldy legions would be destroyed or driven across the Ohio.

It is, perhaps, only a man of Mr. Seward's moral calibre, who at this grave crisis, and with his perfect knowledge of the utter break-down of his schemes of conquest, could talk about seraphic hosts and their hymns of peace when Mr. Lincoln is President of North and South. Mr. Seward knows only too well that, whilst at this hour East Tennessee threatens to swallow up the finest army of the Federals, in six months time the North will hardly have an army to march into the field. Governor Seymour lately announced that the losses of the Federal army are one-half of its effective strength annually. Supposing it to consist of 500,000 men, it requires recruits at the rate of 250,000 per annum at the ordinary rate of consumption. But next spring the term of service of the three years men expires. How is their loss to be supplied? The draft is a failure, volunteering is a failure; an Act of Congress may give Mr. Lincoln fresh powers, but they too will fail before the settled resistance of the citizens to the conscription. The miners of Pennsylvania are already giving the North a lesson. They are not so easily dealt with as the well-to-do burghers of New York; they are arming and drilling to resist the draft by force. With armed rebels in Pennsylvania, with disaffection only half kept down in New York and Baltimore, with treason leavening the North-western States, with failing recruits and weakened armies, Mr. Seward reminds us, in his blaspheming jocularly, of the Emperor who fiddled whilst the City of the Seven Hills was burning. But Nero, at least in his later days, was not a hypocrite.

The Letter of Invitation.

AMONG the most remarkable documents of modern history is certainly to be ranked the letter of invitation addressed by the Emperor of the French to the Sovereign Princes and Free Towns composing the German Confederation. It is not a common thing for one of the great potentates of the world to speak so frankly. The First Napoleon, indeed, talked with affected modesty before the assembled sovereigns of Germany about his adventures—"when I was a lieutenant of artillery;" but he was incapable of the quiet good sense with which his nephew refers to the time when as yet he was one of the most unlucky and most ridiculed of political pretenders, and equally incapable of profiting, as his nephew has done, by the lessons of adversity. It is still more worthy of note that the Emperor meets, with a frankness which is the highest and soundest policy, the charges against him which, though seldom spoken, are still more rarely absent from the mind of any of the princes or peoples invited to the new Congress of Paris. "I am the sovereign to whom ambitious projects are most attributed." This is certainly a striking innovation in diplomatic forms, worthy of the wholly unprecedented measure which the letter recommends to the acceptance of Europe. There is no doubt that both France and her present sovereign are regarded with rooted, and perhaps exaggerated, suspicion by nearly all the other Powers of Europe. There is no doubt that the first effect of the mention of a Congress was not to allay but to inflame that suspicion, and there could be no step better calculated to reassure the Governments invited than this frank avowal that the Emperor understands and regrets the general distrust which he has inspired, and is anxious to put an end to it by removing, through the agency of an European conference, those causes of agitation and alarm which render mutual confidence impossible.

Since the days of Henri IV., no European statesman has ever dreamt of the possibility of effecting, by purely pacific means, a secure settlement of international relations, which should remove at once all the existing grounds of mutual dislike and jealousy, should heal the sores which threaten, from time to time, to break out with fatal virulence, and establish a concord which shall not contain itself the fertile seeds of future quarrels. The dream is a magnificent one, no doubt; but statesmen are not given to dreaming. The ablest of them are satisfied to secure their own country against the dangers which they distinctly discern, to deal with foreign complications only when they arise, and to be satisfied with the easiest solution of perplexing problems, if only it promise to last their time. Nay, more, experience has taught them a profound distrust of all far-sighted speculation, and a dread of all who, having the power to disturb the existing order of things, do not look upon disturbance as the one evil to be avoided at any price and at any sacrifice. Napoleon III. is a man of a different stamp. Since he came to the throne, he has given ample proofs of the highest practical sagacity; he has done more for France than any other ruler she ever had, and the influence which he has exercised on other nations has been, on the whole, fruitful of good to the world at large. He has proved himself a thorough master of economical and financial science, and an administrator of rare ability. But for many years, he had been of necessity and by temperament what statesmen call a dreamer; he had believed in and laid plans for a far distant future; he had acquired a habit of looking forward forty years when others are content if they can form an idea of what will happen within as many months; and he had imbibed a firm faith in that idea of "nationality" which by slow degrees is becoming a part of the political creed of the rising generation. His elevation has not changed him in this respect. He still believes in powers and influences unrecognised by the ordinary philosophy of European diplomatists; he still believes it better to prevent disasters, even by timely sacrifices, than tamely to await their arrival, in a blind hope that, after all, "something may turn up" to avert them; and it would seem that he relies either on his own knowledge, or on the experience of late years, to compel others to take the same view—to anticipate imminent dangers by actual sacrifices, and provide for a probable future at the expense of the certain present. It is on this last point that we conceive him to be mistaken. We do not believe that the immemorial practice of sovereigns and statesmen is likely to be reversed by the experiences of 1848, and the alarms which have been more or less frequent ever since. "Time, whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," governments have been more prone to discount the resources of the future for present needs, than to provide in time for events which always seem to them more distant than they are; and it has never been the wont of princes to give up a province in order to avert a war, or to abdicate a disputed prerogative, lest ten years hence it should be the cause of a rebellion.

We see no reason to question the loyalty of the intentions of the Emperor in a measure which accords altogether with his known predilections, and with the obvious interests of his dynasty. He wishes well to "the nationalities," and he desires to convince the Powers of Europe that so long as reluctant nations are held in subjection by mere military force, peace can never be more than a hollow and precarious truce. He does not wish for war. He has witnessed it; and its horrors have made a deep impression on his mind. The unprecedented carnage of his brief Italian campaign has shown him that a general European conflict would, if it lasted but two years, leave behind it an amount of misery and desolation for which he does not care to make himself responsible. At the same time, he does not pretend that he can guarantee the peace of Europe, even from year to year, under the settlement effected at Vienna. Already a portion of that settlement has been annulled, and it is becoming daily more evident that the rest is untenable. Both he and his enemies are equally aware that there are several contingencies, which may happen any day, and must, if not forestalled by pacific arrangements, happen before very long, in which it will be impossible for him to keep the peace. If the Polish insurrection last another year—if war break out between Denmark and Prussia—if there should arise a favourable opportunity, encouraging the Venetians to shake off the yoke of Austria—if the long chronic sufferings of "the sick man" should suddenly assume a mortal character—if internal conflicts should arise in the German Confederation—it will be difficult for a prince who reigns by the grace of the French people, to remain neutral. At the same time, he has nothing to gain and much to lose by war, in any of these instances. He is probably much less greedy of territorial aggrandisement than his subjects; and he is much better aware than they are that no territorial aggrandisement is possible. Defeat would endanger his throne: victory would not do so much to strengthen it as would the spectacle of a Congress called by him sitting in Paris, to revise at his suggestion the treaties of 1815. It is easy to believe, therefore, that "his sole object is to arrive without a shock at the pacification of Europe;" and if such an object were within the reach of any human power, there is no doubt that he who achieved it would deserve a high rank in history among the benefactors of mankind.

It is the interest, probably, of all the Powers invited to accept the proposals of France. England, in the first place, has nothing to fear. She has already set the example of sacrifice, with wonderfully little reason, by releasing the Ionian Islands from her ill-requited protection; and, though Spain would like to acquire Gibraltar, and France would willingly see Malta abandoned, there is no sort of pretext for either demand, and the majority of European Powers would be very sorry to see us comply with either. Prussia has everything to fear if the Congress should fail, and war should follow the failure. She would inevitably be crushed between France and Russia; she would run great risk of losing Posen, and if she preserved her Rhenish provinces she would owe them only to the determination of England that France shall not extend her frontiers in that direction. On the other hand, it is not likely that the Congress would ask her to give up anything which she could keep in the event of war. Austria would inevitably be asked to surrender Venetia, in return for which she would be entitled to require the abandonment of Rome by the French; and thus, to her great advantage, Italy would become a sixth great Power, and, as such, a check on any future disturbers of the public peace. By abandoning Venetia and conciliating Hungary, Austria would secure herself for the future against all dangers from within and from without; while she holds the one by military force, and remains in a state of feud with the other, her position must always be one of peril at home and powerlessness abroad. Russia has a far better chance of obtaining a satisfactory settlement of the Polish question in Congress than she will have if it become the subject of an European war, and it is for her to judge what likelihood there is that she can continue her present course in Poland without compelling France to interfere. All these difficulties have to be solved; it is for the Powers concerned in each case to declare whether they shall now be solved by the arbitration of Europe, or hereafter determined by the sword.

Unhappily, there can be little doubt what the decision will be. National pride and international jealousy are far too strong to allow us any hope that the benevolent schemes of the Emperor can be carried into effect. The age is not ripe for the realisation of the poetical idea of an Universal Parliament, deciding on the affairs of the world according to the dictates of pure wisdom and simple equity. In the first place, nations are not yet ready to submit to the decrees of such a tribunal; in the second, those who would compose it are far from commanding, by the justice and moderation of their own conduct, the confidence which alone could give moral authority to their judgments. We must admit that, whatever weight we should attach to the counsels of a Cavour or the impartial arbitrament of a Leopold, we should ourselves demur to the jurisdiction of Alexander II. or William III., and demand the right of challenge against a panel containing the names of Gortschakoff and Bismarck-Schonhausen. It is precisely this sort of distrust that is exhibited in the reply which the English Government is said to have returned to the Imperial invitation—a request to know what subjects the Congress is to be asked to discuss. It is not so much that every one feels some suspicion of France, as that all are jealous of one another; each willing to arbitrate in his neighbours' quarrel, but none willing to accept their arbitration in his own. The prevalence of this feeling is so obvious that, as we suspect, the Emperor must by this time entertain a misgiving that his proposal is premature—by a couple of centuries at least.

THE CASE OF THE ALEXANDRA.

It will be remembered that the Attorney-General had obtained a rule of the Court, calling upon the defendants in the case, the claimants of the ship, to show cause why the verdict given by the jury at the trial should not be set aside and entered for the Crown, or a new trial granted. The rule was based on several grounds, the principal of which were "that the verdict was against the evidence, and that the learned Judge had misdirected the jury." On Tuesday, then, before the Court of Exchequer, the four Judges present being the Lord Chief Baron Pollock and Barons Bramwell, Channell, and Pigott, Sir Hugh Cairns, assisted by Mr. Karslake, Q.C., Mr. Mellish, Q.C., and Mr. Kemplay, appeared to show cause against the rule; while the Attorney-General (Sir Roundell Palmer), the Solicitor-General (Sir W. Collier), the Queen's Advocate (Sir H. Phillimore), Mr. Locke, Q.C., and Mr. T. Jones, appeared in support of the rule. Sir Hugh Cairns occupied the whole day in a speech of remarkable eloquence and power, and addressed to the Court a series of arguments worthy of the closest attention, as coming not merely from a lawyer of unrivalled ability, but from one who, in the event of the accession to power of a Conservative Administration, will be the adviser of the Crown on all points of law touching upon international questions. The learned counsel divided his address into three parts. He proposed to dwell, first, on the Act and the construction of it; next, upon the evidence adduced at the trial; and lastly, upon the mode in which the Judge directed the jury. Taking, then, the first head, he showed the careless manner in which the Act was worded; next, the purposes for which the Act was framed: these being, the maintenance of neutrality and the avoidance of affording to a belligerent a casus belli against the neutral power through the acts of the subjects of the neutral power. Next, the duties and privileges of such subjects, as defined by international law, were stated. Subjects of a neutral Power might supply contraband of war to a belligerent. The territory, however, of a neutral Power must be kept free from any act of war done either by a belligerent or by the subjects of a neutral State, acting at the instigation of a belligerent. Supposing a ship coming from any port other than a port of the neutral State, to be anchored without the line of protection of the neutral state, guns and any other munitions of war might be brought from a port in the neutral State and placed on board such ship. An unarmed ship might go out, in order to be armed, beyond the line of protection. Such being the rules of international law, attention was directed to the historical circumstances which preceded and caused the enactment by Congress of the American Enlistment Act. With this object, Sir H. Cairns read a part of the correspondence on the subject between Jefferson, the Secretary of State, and M. Genet, the French Envoy; and also a part of the correspondence between Washington and Hamilton, the Secretary of the Treasury. Next, a circular letter drawn up by Washington, and containing rules for the guidance of the customs' officers in the United States, was read and commented on by the learned counsel. These rules were drawn up in A.D. 1793, before the Act of Congress was passed; and in point of fact the Act was passed to justify the rules. The object was to prevent the arming of vessels to assist the French against other belligerents. What, then, did these rules declare? The officers were ordered to seize where vessels were armed for war, but where the equipment was ambiguous, so that the vessels could be used either for commerce or for war, there the equipment was lawful. With these rules the Act of Congress agreed, and was intended to forbid the arming of a ship of war to commit hostilities; that is, to forbid an equipment with the distinctive character of a warlike equipment; whereas any equipment not solely applicable for the purposes of war was lawful. Now, these very rules and the Act of Congress were declared by Kent to be in strict accordance with the rules of international law. The learned counsel then referred to two American cases, proving, first, that the equipment must be solely applicable to war; second, that the ship must be equipped within the jurisdiction. As to the case of the United States v. Quincy, there the equipment was undeniably warlike, and therefore the meaning of the word "equip" was not raised. Sir H. Cairns then came to the consideration of the English Act, and dwelt on the enlistments of men and arming of ships on behalf of the revolted Spanish Colonies being carried on so openly and to such an extent as to loudly call for interference. The speech of Mr. Canning was referred to, and also that of the Attorney-General of the day, who, on introducing the Bill in the House of Commons, declared the object to be to prevent the fitting out of armed vessels or fitting out vessels of war with stores strictly warlike. Now, setting aside the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th sections of the Act, which only raised a question of allegiance and had no relation to the principles of international law, the learned counsel contended that the 7th and subsequent sections were to be interpreted according to the rules of the law of nations; in fact, they were framed to enable the Government to restrain its subjects from acts which, if committed, justified a belligerent in remonstrances against the neutral power in accordance with the maxims of international law, but these sections of the Act were not intended to go further. There was no prohibition against building a hull. In fact, the existence of the hull was presupposed. If building a hull was the act struck at, the law would have said so. So then, suppose France was at war with Russia, a hull might be built at Portsmouth and sent to Brest, and also munitions of war might be sent by another ship to Brest, without infringement of the Act. Now the words, "equipping," "fitting out," "furnishing," were not words ejusdem generis with "building;" they must be carefully distinguished. Next, the offence contemplated by the Act must be committed within the dominions of the neutral Power; the equipment, also, must be of a distinctively warlike character, and the intent must be that the ship shall cruise and commit hostilities. Thus, then, our Act tallied with the Act of Congress, with the rules laid down by Washington, and with the rules of international law. Next, as to the 8th section, which presupposed a ship of a warlike character, and forbade the adding to such a ship of an equipment of a distinctively warlike character, but did not forbid the adding of any other equipment. This interpretation made the 7th and 8th sections harmonious; otherwise they would be contradictory. Then, as to the words in the Act which prohibited the "attempting," or "endeavouring," or "being concerned in" the "equipping, fitting out, and arming;" that was a prohibition of an attempt to do that which, if consummated, would be an infringement of the Act; there was no new offence raised. So with the words "procuring," &c.; that was a mere enunciation of the principle of qui facit per alium. The words are aimed at participation in an act which, when complete, would constitute the act defined in the 7th section, and which was, the equipment of a ship of a distinctively warlike character within the jurisdiction, with the intent of cruising and committing hostilities against a belligerent.

In the famous Terceira case, not reported, but the only instance in which cognisance has been taken of an infringement of the English Act, there Mr. Huskisson, speaking of the attack on the ship in question in the waters of Terceira, by an English man-of-war, quoted the words of Mr. Canning, where the latter said that "he saw no ground for interference in any of the cases arising in the Cochrane expeditions, except where the ship and armament were put together in this country; if that combination were not consummated till after the ship had left this country, there was no breach of the law." Now as to the Oreto, the only reason given for bringing the case to trial was, that the vessel was armed at Nassau; it never was supposed that her equipment at Liverpool, which was not of a warlike character, formed any ground for proceedings. So the Attorney-General in Parliament had said in reference to the Alabama, that the Federals had no ground of remonstrance against our Government, because the Alabama left Liverpool unarmed. Similarly, Lord Palmerston declared that the condition of the Alabama at the time she left England was not such as to justify a seizure. The learned counsel then proceeded to consider the condition of the Alexandra at the time of seizure, as disclosed by the evidence of Morgan and Captain Inglefield. He need not argue whether the structure was warlike or not; that was wholly irrelevant. He contended that the equipment was not of a warlike character. There was no pretence for such a theory, except as to the stanchions for the hammocks, which were equally adapted for yachts. The Crown had abandoned that part of the case which connected certain guns in Messrs. Fawcett's foundry with the ship; for indeed, it was only proved that sixteen guns had been sent to the railway station, directed to Captain Blakeley, Camden, London. Next came the question of "intent." It was not enough for the ship to be "equipped," it must have been so "with intent to cruise and commit hostilities on behalf of one belligerent against another." That intent must be a practical one, that is, it must be conceived by some one who has sufficient control over the ship to put the intent into effect; it must be unconditional and immediate—it must be conceived within the jurisdiction. Now what was to be said of the witnesses as to the "intent?" Five were discharged workmen from Messrs. Fawcett, two were spies and informers, and one was utterly unworthy of belief. The first five proved no connection between Messrs. Miller or Messrs. Fawcett and the Confederate authorities. Even Chapman, who wormed himself into the confidence of Messrs. Fraser, on the plea of being a "Secessionist," could not prove any connection whatever between either Fraser, Bullock, or Hamilton, and the "Alexandra." No man would believe the "deserter," Clarence Randolph Yonge, who, though he had access to documents passing between Captain Bullock and the Confederate Government, disclosed no connection whatever between the latter and the ship. Yonge was a deserter from his allegiance and from his wife. His public and private character were detestable. Then as to De Costa, who appeared as a shipowner and a ship-agent, and who turned out to be a "crimp" and the owner of a small share in a small steam-tug. What was to be said of his evidence? Messrs. Miller had built that steam-tug and had gone to law with De Costa about it. Was it credible that such a man as this Miller would have said several times, "We, conjointly with Fawcett, are building a gunboat for Fraser; Fraser is agent for the Confederates, and the name of the gunboat is the Alexandra." This De Costa was a too willing witness for the Crown, a recusant witness in all other respects. Lastly, the learned counsel came to the charge of the Lord Chief Baron to the jury at the trial. That charge, if examined, disclosed four questions or propositions to the jury. First, the Chief Baron laid it down that to build a ship, apart from all question as to "equipment," was lawful, even although such ship was easily convertible into a man-of-war. Second, that being so, was the Alexandra "equipped," "fitted out," or "furnished" within Her Majesty's dominions? Thirdly, "the equipment" must be of a warlike character. Then, was it so? Fourthly, was there any "intent" to employ the ship to cruise or commit hostilities? The learned counsel, in conclusion, contended that the evidence altogether failed to support the information; that the verdict was warranted and justified by the evidence. The address of Sir Hugh Cairns occupied nine hours and thirty minutes in delivery, and was a model of reasoning and eloquence. More counsel will be heard on the same side, and on the Crown side there will, no doubt, be three or four speeches. The trial is likely to last for many days.

THE TRADE TO MATAMORAS.—IMPORTANT TO SHIPPERS.

—We are able to deny authoritatively the recent reports of the alleged blockade of Matamoras by the French. The blockade of the Mexican coast commences twelve leagues from the southern bank of the mouth of the Rio Grande; and no cargoes of any kind, unless there should exist reasonable suspicions of their being destined for armed adherents of the Juarez faction, will be interfered with by the French cruisers on their way to Matamoras. This is important information to many shippers who have suspended shipments of specie and merchandise, under the apprehension excited by an unfounded rumour. Common prudence, however, will suggest to them the precaution of avoiding, in their trade with that port, any cause for being suspected of intentions hostile to the French occupation of the country.

PRESIDENT-MAKING IN THE UNITED STATES.*

THE American Union, inaugurated by Washington and dissolved by the election of Mr. Lincoln, was but a phase in the national life of the peoples that formed it. An intelligible history of the "Model Republic" must date from an era long anterior to the Declaration of Independence. To comprehend the institutions and the progress of the nations, now or lately represented abroad by the United States' Government, we must get rid of the popular idea that the revolt of the Thirteen Colonies was a revolution, in the ordinary acceptance of the term. Except in one particular, the action of the colonists was eminently conservative. They took up arms to defend, not to trample on their laws. They threw off their allegiance to England, not because they were dissatisfied with their forms of Government, but because they esteemed them so highly that they determined to preserve them at any sacrifice. They did not fight for rights and liberty previously withheld from them, but they did battle for that liberty and for those rights that were theirs by inheritance, and that they had always enjoyed. The severance of the political tie with the mother country involved no anarchy or change. The same laws and the same Administrations, existed before and after the Declaration of Independence; and the ordinary functions of Government were not suspended for a moment. In all essential particulars the same order of things prevailed in the Colonies that unto this day prevails in the States. The colonists had no isms to gratify. They had to choose between their allegiance to their king or to their constitution. They did as their English forefathers had done on like occasions. They broke with the Crown, and for their mutual protection established a Federal Government. When we consider what incongruous elements were thus banded together, we may well be surprised that the Union so long survived its use—that it continued to exist for half a century after all fear, of foreign aggression was at an end. Mr. Williams thinks, however, the Union would have lasted for generations to come but for one circumstance. The elaborate machinery, in his opinion was perfect, but there was from the first a single wheel out of gear. He contends that the break-up of the Union was brought about mainly by the Presidential elections. Alas, then, for the frailty of human wisdom, for all that could be done was done to protect the Presidential elections from corrupt influences.

Three principle suggestions were made to the convention as to the election of the President. First, that he should be chosen by the Executives of the States; second, that the choice should be left to the Legislatures of the States, and thirdly, that he should be elected by the suffrages of the united peoples. All these were rejected, and in lieu of them a plan was adopted which in theory combined many advantages and was altogether one of the most ingenious political inventions ever contrived. Each State was to appoint, in such manner as the Legislature thereof directed, a number of electors equal to the number of senators and representatives to which the State was entitled in Congress. The electors, not convened in a united electoral college, but each State voting severally, were to transmit to the President of the Senate the result of their votes. Thus the Legislature, the representative of the people, had to take the first step in the election, but only the first step. If the people desired it, as they did in every instance except that of South Carolina, the Legislature was bound to refer the choice of the electors to the popular vote. Still the people were not to decide the election, but could only appoint electors. Surely a more elaborate system of checks was never devised. And it is worthy of remark how carefully the sovereign rights of the States were protected. There was no fusion of the States attempted, and if a majority of the electors did not vote for one person, then the choice was left to the House of Representatives, who had to ballot for President from the persons, not exceeding three, having the highest number of electors' votes; but then the votes were taken by States, the representatives of each State having one vote.

Mr. Williams lucidly explains how the intentions of the framers of the Constitution were frustrated. The people practically set aside the electors. They did what some large constituencies in England have done—they chose delegates instead of representatives. The electors were not permitted to discuss the merits of the various candidates, but they were pledged to vote for the candidate already accepted by their constituents. All they had to do was to register the votes of the people; and, therefore, so soon as the electors were chosen, the presidential election was virtually decided. The people did not long enjoy the fruits of their victory over the Constitution; but they in turn were cheated out of their rights, by the agency of "conventions." These conventions are not recognised by the Constitution, and are the means by which the leaders of parties or of factions monopolised the election of President. The convention business is thus conducted: about six months before the stated period of election a self-constituted body, called the Central Committee, announces that upon a certain day there will be a meeting of a State Convention for the purpose of nominating candidates to a National Convention. It should be understood that for at least a year before this movement a secret agitation is carried on, and in every electoral district persons are selected by the Central Committee, who appoint meetings, which are but thinly attended, and at which delegates to the State Convention are chosen. Mr. Williams thus described the proceedings.

"A few of the interested leaders, together with a smaller number of really earnest patriots, interspersed with stragglers, attracted by curiosity, assemble in the public hall. The number present is quite small. The people are not sufficiently excited at this early period to quit their avocations in order to join in this seemingly unimportant service. Those who are present, however, organise the meeting by the appointment of a president, a vice-president, and a secretary. After a short pause, some gentleman rises, and having addressed a few eloquent and appropriate remarks," proposes that Messrs. A. B. C. D., and others be appointed to represent the people of that district in the State Convention. This proposition is seconded, and carried nem. con., and the meeting is adjourned sine die. This ends the 'primary convention,' and here closes the agency of the people in the selection of a candidate for the presidency."

Anyone familiar with the way in which public meetings are got up in this country, will be able to thoroughly appreciate the above passage, and will fully comprehend how little the people have to do with the election. In the State convention, and in the National Convention hard battles are fought, for the people, having been put aside, the wire pullers and the professional politicians quarrel among themselves about the booty. At length, by a series of compromises, the affair is arranged, and each National Convention, for of course there is a National Convention of each party, announces its candidate. The "sovereign people" is called upon to register the act of the self-appointed convention, by voting for one or the other of the candidates, just in the way the electors have to register the popular vote. How entirely the elections had passed out of the hands of the people, we may see from the fact of Mr. Lincoln being President, although he was in a minority of 1,000,050.

Mr. Williams having explained the system, gives a graphic resumé of Presidential contests from Washington to Mr. Lincoln. For thirty-six years there has been no chance for an eminent statesman to become President. The office-seekers, who are the de facto electors, have for two reasons, selected as candidates those whose chief recommendations were their obscurity and inferiority. Men like Calhoun, Clay, and Webster were objectionable because they would not have been pliant tools in the hands of their partisans; and also because it was an advantage for a party to have a candidate who had no antecedents, for then slander was, to a great extent disarmed. But whilst the Presidents were merely puppets, the North was unceasingly seeking to gain the mastery over the South. The cry of "bargain, intrigue, and corruption," in reference to Mr. Clay; the cry of "a good log cabin and a barrel of hard cider," in reference to General Harrison; General Taylor and his war horse, "Old Whitey," and a number of other cries, were got up to amuse the populace, and all the uncouth party names that were circulated, were only to conceal the real issue—which was, whether the South should become a mere appendage to the North.

The question of tariffs has always occupied a prominent position. It was the interest of the Northerners to impose protective duties, because by that means Southern wealth would find its way into their pockets. How much the South sacrificed for the sake of the Union, and how much the North gained by protection, may be seen from the following table:—

1760—Imports into South Carolina and Virginia	£14,05,000
1760—Imports into New York, Pennsylvania, and all New England	£735,100
1832—Imports into South Carolina and Virginia	$1,750,000
1832—Imports into New York alone	$57,000,000
1852—Imports into Northern States	$306,000,000
1852—Imports into Southern States	$34,000,000

When the West grew into importance, the North found itself confronted with a new difficulty, for the West, like the South, was naturally for free trade. It was in this emergency that the Abolition agitation was started, but the emancipation of the negro was only an excuse for riveting the fetters of protection on the South. When Mr. Lincoln was elected, and when the Southern representatives were no longer present in Congress, what was the first use made by the Republicans of their power? Was it to free the negro? No; but to pass the Morrill Tariff Bill. As long as New England could make money out of the slave trade, she was opposed to its abolition. As long as slaves were profitable to her, she kept slaves, and when they ceased to be profitable, did not emancipate them, but sold them into the South. So long as the profits of Southern slavery enriched her, the emancipation of the negro was not thought of, but when there was a chance of the South and the West unitedly claiming the right to unfettered trade, then Abolitionism became a political instrument. Europe has wondered at the inconsistency of the North, hating the negro yet making him an idol; but the wonder ceases when we reflect that negro-worship is only a blind for the fanatic and heartfelt worship of the dollar.

We have an apt illustration of the insincerity of the North in the "Missouri Compromise." It has been said over and over again that the South had broken her engagement entered into in 1820; viz., "that no State with a slavery constitution should enter the Union north of the parallel of 36 30." In consenting to this, the South gave up a large portion of valuable territory, for the sake of peace; but the North did not want peace, and steadily refused to act upon the Missouri Compromise. Even Missouri was not received under the so-called compromise. In 1836, on the admission of Arkansas the North repudiated it. In 1847, when fresh territory had been acquired by purchase from Mexico, the Northern representatives "voted almost unanimously that citizens of the Southern States should not be permitted to enter with their property upon any part of the territory upon either side of the Missouri Compromise Line." "The same policy was pursued in 1846 upon the Bill for the establishment of a Territorial government for Oregon. In 1850, on the application of California for admission, the North again refused to abide by the Missouri Compromise. It was not the South but the North which refused to observe the compact of 1820, though it was a compact which, under the constitution, the North had no right to seek. With rare hypocrisy the Republicans denounced the repeal of the compromise as a violation of good faith on the part of the South. Yet the Northern States, says Mr. Williams, "always strenuously denied that they had been in any way whatever committed to this compromise. On the contrary, they derided and repudiated it in every manner possible, whenever an occasion offered itself. They wept over the repeal as a parent might weep over the demise of his lost child, and yet during its entire life it was spurned and disowned."

Another alleged grievance against the South was the Fugitive Slave Law. It is curious that such a charge should have been preferred, for, assuming the facts as stated by the North to be true, and that the Fugitive Slave Law was a late Southern device introduced to the Senate by Mr. Mason, it was manifestly a just and necessary measure. So long as the Union recognised slaves as property, and they were regarded and taxed as property, it was indispensable to protect that property in all the States of the Union; for the business of the general Government was to enforce amongst the States equal dealing and respect for treaties. But it happens that the Fugitive Slave Law is as old as the Union, and that its authors were "George Washington, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, Benjamin Franklin, and their associates in the Constitutional Convention, all of whom either voted for its enactment, or suffered it to be passed without one word of opposition." The following is an extract from the debates in the Convention (1787) as reported by Mr. Madison:—

August 29.—Mr. Pierce Butler, of South Carolina, moved to insert after Article 15: 'If any person bound to service or labour in any of the United States shall escape into another State, he or she shall not be discharged from such service or labour in consequence of any regulations subsisting in the State to which they escape, but shall be delivered up to the person justly claiming their service or labour.'—which was agreed to nem. con.

Mr. Williams thinks that the North would have failed in its aggression on the South, had it not been for the Presidential elections, which demoralised the people and opened the door for every species of corruption. He suggests a plan by which he conceives the evil may be avoided. He proposes that there shall be Presidents, but no elections; that the term of office shall be extended from six years, as it is now in the Confederate States, to eight to ten years, and that the oldest senator—that is, the member who has been longest in the senate—shall become President upon the expiration of each presidential term. Probably few persons will agree with Mr. Williams's conclusion, that the dissolution of the Union is almost entirely the evil work of presidential elections, for they may point to the South and bid us remember that the system prevailed there, and yet the South is now manifesting precisely the same qualities that distinguished the fathers of Independence and the Union. It is also undoubtedly true that if a people be virtuous—we mean virtuous in a political and patriotic sense—no imperfection in the constitution will corrupt them; and on the other hand, if they are prone to be vicious no constitutional checks will keep them in the right path. But it must be conceded by any unprejudiced reader of Mr. Williams's book that the constantly recurring elections to an office which involves a larger amount of patronage than any other Government on earth is entrusted with, is a gigantic evil; and further, that the presidency ought not to be at the disposal of a clique of office seekers, and that the election, if there is to be an election, should be bona fide, whether entrusted to the people or the Legislatures.

We have glanced at the constitutional questions discussed in "The Rise and Fall of the Model Republic;" but the work is by no means the dry constitutional essay that might be inferred from our notice. Although Mr. Williams quotes freely from the debates in the Constitutional Convention, and in Congress, his book is not a mere compilation; and, although he treats important matters with becoming gravity; he is never dull or heavy. Mr. Williams gives us not so much the deductions of a student as the life-like sketches of an intelligent and interested observer. He draws, for instance, a picture of a Northern Convention. The New England Puritan, who clamours for an anti-slavery Bible; the German atheist, who will have no Bible at all; the Socialist who dreams of perfect equality; the advocate of "Free-loveism;" and the delegate of the "strong-minded women," are banded together to form the Republican party; and each of these Mr. Williams portrays with admirable fidelity. Here and there our author introduces an anecdote that throws a flood of light on the manners and customs of Northern politicians. He tells us, for example, that when General Taylor was elected President, his war-horse, called "Old Whitey," was the object of much attention, because it was thought that through the horse the favour of the General might be gained. Mr. Seward, now Federal Secretary of State, was the head of a committee that waited on General Taylor to present him with a silver carry-comb for the special use of "Old Whitey." This incident, though trifling in itself, is significant of Mr. Seward's character; just as it is significant of Caligula's character that he raised his horse to the dignity of consul. The differ-between a corrupt sovereign and a corrupt demagogue is only a difference of circumstance, not of disposition. Another spirited sketch is the story of the Harrison campaign, when "Yankee Doodle" and "Hail Columbia," were forgotten, and the burden of the popular song was—

"Hurrah, hurrah! for Harri-on and Tyler;
A good log-cabin and a barrel of hard cider."

In short, those who take up Mr. Williams's book for instruction, will find it also amusing; and those who read it for amusement cannot fail to be instructed.

LITERARY NOTES.

UNDER pretence of "tracing the footsteps of error through a period of twenty-five years," the Very Rev. Francis Close* publishes a series of venomous and vindictive libels on every one who stands outside the pale of his narrow and intolerant school, and on every form of religious thought and feeling which is beyond his own very limited comprehension. Many of Lord Palmerston's ecclesiastical appointments have been extremely objectionable, both to sincere Churchmen and to practical men of the world; but most of them are explicable. His nominees have been of distinguished Whig families, or notorious for Liberal politics, or favourites with fashionable society; but the Dean of Carlisle had no title of any kind to promotion. Deaneries are usually reserved for quiet, well-bred, scholarly, thoughtful divines, likely to do good service to the Church by literary labours or personal influence. Dr. Close is a noisy, pushing, ignorant orator of the Beecher and Spurgeon type; a favourite preacher at a second-rate watering-place; a lecturer against wine, spirits, beer, and tobacco; not more honest in his churchmanship than Bishop Colenso, or more temperate in his language than the worst school of Irish parish priests. We remember to have heard him denounce from the pulpit all who disapproved of the Crimean war as "traitors to their God, their sovereign, and their country;" and we also remember to have heard him declare that he would never use the form of absolution prescribed in the Service for the Visitation of the Sick—a declaration which ought, of course, to have been followed by his instant resignation of his benefice. Those who know anything of the man need not be told that this book is full of vulgar and virulent abuse of Roman Catholics—whom the author, after the ungentlemanly fashion of his party, always styles "Papists"—of the High Church, the so-called Broad Church, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, and everybody who drinks wine or otherwise differs from Dr. Close. We give one sentence, which sufficiently stamps the character of the book and the writer: "Fraud is sanctioned, consecrated, canonised in the Church of Rome." A man who could deliberately pen such a slander ought never to have received favour, honour, or promotion in any Christian Church. It is by clergymen of this character that young men are tempted into Romanism or driven into infidelity. The revolt and reaction produced by their frantic rihaldry does more harm than Dr. Newman or Bishop Colenso could accomplish by fifty years of argument or oratory.

"Letters from the Crimea"† were, no doubt, acceptable enough to the parents and friends of the well-meaning young soldier who wrote them; but they have no sort of value or interest for the public; they tell us nothing new, and give us no clearer idea of the things we knew already.

"The History of Newfoundland"‡ can never be made readable. It is, first, the history of a valuable cod-fishery, and then that of a valueless and most unfortunate colony, in which nothing but disaster ever happens, and which is never likely to enjoy even a moderate share of prosperity. Its normal condition is one of religious feud and political faction, diversified only by frequent famines and not unfrequent fires. The chief city has been burnt down several times, and the people live always on the verge of starvation. In short, one-half the population consists of Irish Roman Catholics, and one-third of the revenue is annually expended on the relief of the poor.

"Annie Warleigh's Fortunes,"§ is good—all Holme Lee's novels are; but we are not inclined to rank it among her best. In the first place, we do not care to read a prologue, stretching over half a volume, concerning the history of the heroine's father and grandfather before her birth; and it is unsatisfactory to find, when we have reached the middle of the second volume, that the young lady whose "fortunes" are the subject of the story has only completed her fifteenth year. The plot, moreover, is less natural and probable than is usually the case with this author's productions. Nevertheless, the book is very pleasant reading; the principal personages being very human, and most of them very lovable, and all the various shades of their different characters being drawn with great nicety and without any exaggeration. We don't think it quite fair to the readers of such a book to tell the story beforehand; and those who will not read it are too few to be entitled to consideration.

Goslingford || was a very insignificant country town; so insignificant, that its principal families were those of two respectable attorneys, Mr. Brown and Mr. Smith. Between the parties of these two families the townfolk were divided; the more Conservative and old-fashioned adhering to Mr. Brown; the Churchman; and those with whom modern ways were in favour extolling the hospitality of the dissenting Mrs. Smith and the accomplishments of her daughters. Mr. Smith's only son fell in love with Mr. Brown's daughter, an only child; and, after running, by no means smoothly, for a year or two, the course of true love conducted them safely to a happy marriage, and the death of Mr. Brown terminated the schism of Goslingford. Out of these materials the author of "Anne Dysart" ¶ has constructed a most readable, sensible, and commendable novel in two volumes—making Goslingford life considerably more interesting to her readers than it can have been to those who actually bore a part in it.

"Opposite Neighbours," is a story which will not bear reading twice, and one perusal is not sufficient to enable us to understand it. There is in it a tolerably good sketch of an honest tradesman's home, made miserable by a wife with whom he was fool enough to elope, and who despises the shop, her husband, his friends and her own, and who is finally converted only by being well-nigh burnt to death—a victim of cinoline. For the rest, we find ourselves entangled in a labyrinth of unconnected mysteries: and the story, after puzzling us therewith for some 600 pages, leaves us utterly uncertain what happens to whom, who turns out to be whose brother, son, or nephew, who marries whom, why anything happens, and what has become of everybody; and, as aforesaid, it is not worth while to read the story through again in order to find out. We hope to repair the omission when the author shall write another novel, with fewer characters and a simpler scheme.

Nothing can be pleasanter to read than the exquisite novels of German life which have made the reputation of the Baroness Fautphucos. "The Initials" has just been published in a cheap form, and we have read it through for the third or fourth time. "At Odds" is a tale of the Napoleonic wars, of which the scene is laid in Bavaria and the Tyrol; and, though dealing with an entirely new kind of life, of which the authoress can have no personal knowledge, it is as natural, life-like, and interesting as any of its predecessors.

OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATE DEPARTMENT RELATIVE TO THE DISMISSAL OF THE BRITISH CONSULS.

MR. BENJAMIN TO MR. SLIDELL.

Confederate States of America, Department of State, Richmond, 8th October, 1863.

SIR—The conduct of the British consular agents in the Confederacy has compelled the President to take the decisive step of expelling them from our country, and it is deemed proper to put you in possession of the causes which have produced this result, that you may have it in your power to correct any misrepresentations on the subject. To this end, it is necessary to review the whole course of the British Government, and that of the Confederacy, in relation to these officials.

When the Confederacy was first formed, there were in our ports a number of British consuls and consular agents, who had been recognised as such, not only by the Government of the United States, which was then the authorised agent of the several States for that purpose, but by the State authorities themselves. Under the law of nations, these officials are not entitled to exercise political or diplomatic functions, nor are they ever accredited to the sovereigns within whose dominions they reside. Their only warrant of authority is the commission of their own Government; but usage requires that those who have the full grade of consul should not exercise their functions within the territory of any sovereign before receiving his permission in the form of an exequatur; while consular agents of inferior grade simply notify the local authorities of their intention to act in that capacity. It has not been customary, upon any change of Government, to interfere with these commercial officials, already established in the discharge of their duties, and it is their recognised obligation to treat all Governments which may be established, de facto, over the ports where they reside, as governments de jure. The British consular officials gave no cause of complaint on this score, and the President interposed no objection to the continued exercise of their functions. On other grounds, however, various causes of complaint subsequently arose, and in the case of Consul Moore it was found necessary to revoke his exequatur, for his disregard of the legitimate request of this Department that he should abstain from further action as consul until he had submitted his commission for inspection, and because of his offensive remarks touching the conduct of the Confederate authorities in relation to two enlisted soldiers, as fully explained in a published despatch of this Government. Attention was also called in that despatch (which was communicated to the British Cabinet), to the objectionable conduct of British functionaries in the enemy's country, who assumed authority within the limits of the Confederacy, thereby implying that these States were still members of the Union to which those functionaries were accredited, and ignoring the existence of this Government within the territory over which it was exercising unquestioned sway. Notwithstanding the grave character of this complaint, the President confined himself to reprehending this conduct, and to informing the British Government that he had forbidden, for the future, any direct communication between British consuls here and British officials in the United States. And here it may not be improper to observe, that although this despatch was published at the time of its date, and was communicated to the Foreign-office in London, Her Majesty's Ministers made the strange mistake of asserting in the House of Commons that Mr. Moore's dismissal was connected, in some way, with alleged cruelties committed on one Belshaw, of whose existence the Department was ignorant till the publication of the debate, and concerning whom no representation exists on its files.

Soon after that despatch was forwarded, the President was apprised by the Governor of Alabama that Her Majesty's Government had visited with severe displeasure, and had removed from office, the British consular agent at Mobile, because he had received and forwarded from Mobile, on an English man-of-war, money due by the State of Alabama to British subjects for interest on the public debt of the State; and that the British minister at Washington, after failing in active efforts to prevent the remittance of this money, had assumed the power of appointing a consular agent within the Confederacy to replace the officer at Mobile, who had incurred censure and punishment for the discharge of a plain duty to British subjects, which happened to be distasteful to the United States. A copy of the despatch on this subject communicated to the British Government is enclosed, and you will perceive that the action of the President was marked by extreme forbearance, and that he confined himself to refusing permission that Mr. Cridland should act under Lord Lyons's instructions, and to expressing the confident hope that Her Majesty's Government would in the future choose some other mode of transmitting its orders and exercising its authority over its agents within the Confederacy, than by delegating to functionaries who reside among our enemies the power to give orders or instructions to those who reside among us.

In his answer to this despatch, (of which a copy is also enclosed), Earl Russell, while acknowledging the justice of our remonstrance against the assumption of authority by Lord Lyons, defends the action of the British Government in the matter of the Mobile consulate by maintaining that the transmission of the specie by Consul Magee, under the circumstances above explained, "had the character, in the eyes of Her Majesty's Government, of aiding one of the belligerents against the other." This statement clearly assumes that the transmission of specie from one of these States to Great Britain in payment of a public debt to British subjects is an act of hostility against the United States, which British officials cannot promote with due regard to neutral obligations, because it "aids one of the belligerents against the other." No reason is given for this conclusion, which appears to us at variance with all received notions of international law. The States of the Confederacy have, under the most adverse circumstances, made great efforts and sacrifices to effect punctual payment of their debt to neutrals, and these efforts do not seem to us to be properly characterised as being belligerent acts against our enemies. We can but regret that Her Majesty's Government have determined so to regard them, and to discourage the discharge of a duty in which British subjects are so deeply interested.

Within the last few days the President has been informed by communications addressed to the State and Confederate authorities by two out of the three British Consular agents remaining here, that they had received instructions from their Government to pursue a course of conduct in regard to persons of British origin now resident within the Confederacy, which it has been impossible to tolerate. It seems scarcely probable that the instructions of Earl Russell have been properly understood by his agents, but we have no means of communicating with the British Government for the correction of misunderstandings. You are aware that Great Britain has no diplomatic agents accredited to us, and that Earl Russell having declined a personal interview with Mr. Mason, the latter, after some time spent in an unsatisfactory interchange of written communications, has been relieved of a mission which had been rendered painful to himself, and was productive of no benefit to his country. The President was, therefore, compelled to take the remedy into his own hands.

A brief statement will suffice for your full comprehension of the matter. In April, 1862, Congress passed a law directing a draft for the army of "all white men who are residents of the Confederate States, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, and not legally exempted from military service."—The draft was made, as stated in the law, in view of the absolute necessity "of placing in the field a large additional force to meet the advancing columns of the enemy now invading our soil," in other words, all residents capable of bearing arms were called on to protect their own homes from invasion, their own property from plunder, their own families from cruel outrage. You will observe, that the call was not made until after a year of war, during which it had been entirely within the power of all foreigners to depart from a country threatened with invasion, if they preferred not to share the common lot of its inhabitants.

Upon the promulgation of this law objection was made by several foreign consuls to its application to the subjects of their sovereigns, and the President directed that its provisions should not be so construed as to impose forced military service on mere sojourners or temporary residents, but only on such as had become citizens of the Confederacy de jure, or had rendered themselves liable, under the law of nations, to be considered as citizens de facto by having established themselves as permanent residents within the Confederacy, without the intention of returning to their native country.

To this very liberal interpretation of the law in favour of foreign residents, it was not supposed that objection could be taken, but on the 12th November, 1862, Consul Bunch, at Charleston, wrote to the Department as follows:—

"I have now received instructions of Earl Russell to signify to you the views of Her Majesty's Government on this subject.

"I am desired to lose no time in remonstrating against the forcible enlistment of British subjects, and to say that such subjects domiciled only by residence in the so-called Confederate States cannot be forcibly enlisted in the military service of those States by virtue of an ex post facto law, when no municipal law existed at the time of their domicile rendering them liable to such service.

"It may be competent for a State in which a domiciled foreigner may reside to pass such an ex post facto law, if at the same time an option is offered to foreigners affected by it to quit, after a reasonable period, the territory, if they object to serve in the armies of the States; but without this option such a law would violate the principles of international law, and even with such an option, the comity heretofore observed between independent States would not be very scrupulously observed.

"The plainest notions of reason and justice forbid that a foreigner admitted to reside for peaceful and commercial purposes in a State forming a part of the Federal Union should be suddenly and without warning compelled by the State to take an active part in hostilities against other States, which when he became domiciled, were members of one and the same Confederacy; which States, moreover, have threatened to treat as rebels, and not as prisoners of war, all who may fall into their hands.

"To these considerations may be added the fact that the persons who have been the victims of this forced enlistment are forbidden under severe penalties, by the Queen's proclamation, to take any part in the civil war now raging in America, and that thus they are made not only to enter a military service contrary to their own wishes and in violation of the tacit compact under which they took up their original domicile, but also to disobey the order of their legitimate sovereign.

"I am directed by Earl Russell to urge these several considerations upon you, and to add that Her Majesty's Government confidently hope and expect that no further occasion for remonstrance will arise on this point."

No reply was deemed necessary to this despatch (nor to a similar one from Consul Moore, dated on the 14th November,) notwithstanding the very questionable assumptions, both of law and fact, contained in it, because there seemed to be no substantial point at issue between the two Governments, and discussion could, therefore, serve no useful purpose. Earl Russell was not understood to insist on anything more than that British subjects resident within the Confederacy should be allowed a reasonable time to exercise the option of departing from the country, if unwilling to be enrolled in its service; and, in point of fact, this option had never been refused them, and many had availed themselves of it. Nor was it believed that Her Majesty's Government expected a very favourable response to their appeal to this Government for the exercise of the comity between "independent" States supposed to be involved in this subject, whilst Great Britain was persistently refusing to recognise the independence which alone could justify the appeal.

Since the date of these two letters numerous requests have been made by British consular officials for the interposition of this Government in behalf of persons, alleged to be British subjects, wrongfully subjected to draft. Relief has always been afforded when warranted by the facts, but it soon became known that these gentlemen regarded their own certificates as conclusive evidence that the persons named in them were exempt from military service, and that these certificates were freely issued on the simple affidavit of the interested parties. Thus Consul Moore was deceived into claiming exemption for two men who were proven to be citizens of the Confederacy, and to have been landowners and voters for a series of years prior to the war.

Much inconvenience was occasioned before these abuses could be corrected, but they afterwards assumed a shape which forbade further tolerance. The correspondence of the acting British consuls at Savannah and Charleston, already referred to, asserts the existence of instructions from their Government, under which, instead of advising British subjects to resort to the courts of justice, always open for the redress of grievances, or to apply to this Government for protection against any harsh or unjust treatment by its subordinates, they deem it a duty to counsel our enlisted soldiers to judge for themselves of their right to exemption, to refuse obedience to Confederate laws and authority, and even exhort them to open mutiny in face of the enemy.

This unwarrantable assumption by foreign officials of jurisdiction within our territory, this offensive encroachment on the sovereignty of the Confederate States, has been repressed by the President's order for the immediate departure of all British consular agents from our country, as you will perceive by a perusal of the enclosed copy of the notice addressed to one of them, Acting-Consul Fullarton.

But a few months have elapsed since the utmost indignation was expressed by the British Government against the United States Minister at London, for issuing a safe conduct to be used on the high seas by a merchant vessel; and the ground of this denunciation was his exercise of direct authority over subject matter within the exclusive territorial jurisdiction of the Queen. It is difficult, therefore, to conceive on what basis Her Majesty's Government have deemed themselves justified in the much graver encroachment on the sovereignty of these States, which has been attempted under instructions alleged to have emanated from them.

It is not my purpose here to discuss the nature and extent of the claims of the Confederacy on the allegiance of persons of foreign origin residing permanently within its limits (easy as would be the task of demonstrating the obligation of such residents, under the law of nations, to aid in the defence of their own homes and property against invasion), because, as already observed, the liberal construction of the law in their favour which has been sanctioned by the President, and the indulgence of the Government in permitting them, for many months, to exercise the option of avoiding service by departing from the country, deprive the discussion of any practical interest. I have been induced to place the whole subject fully in your possession, by reason of a statement made by Consul Fullarton to the Governor of Georgia, that in the event of the failure of his remonstrances to procure the exemption of all British subjects from service, he is instructed to state "that the Governments in Europe interested in this question will unite in making such representations as will secure to aliens this desired exemption."

The menace here implied would require no answer if it were not made professedly under instructions. It is scarcely necessary to say to you that the action of the President in repelling with decision any attempt by foreign officials to arrogate sovereign rights within our limits, or to interfere of their own authority with the execution of our laws, would not be affected in the slightest degree by representations from any source, however exalted. This is the only point on which the President has had occasion to act, and on this point there is no room for discussion.

The exercise of the droit de renvoi is too harsh, however, to be resorted to without justifiable cause, and it is proper that you should have it in your power to explain the grounds on which the President has been compelled to enforce it. Lest, also, the Government of His Imperial Majesty should be misled into the error of supposing that the rights of French citizens are in any manner involved in the action of the President which has been rendered necessary by the reprehensible conduct of the British consular agents, you are requested to take an early decision for giving such explanation to M. Drouyn de L'Hays as will obviate all risk of misapprehension.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. P. BENJAMIN,

Secretary of State.

Hon. JOHN SLIDELL, Commissioner, &c.,
Paris, France.

(Enclosures.)

MR. BENJAMIN TO MR. FULLARTON.

Department of State, Richmond, Oct. 8th.

Sir,—Your letters of the 1st and 3rd inst. have been received. You inform this Government that, "under your instructions you have felt it to be your duty to advise British subjects, that whilst they ought to acquiesce in the service required, so long as it is restricted to the maintenance of internal peace and order, whenever they shall be brought into actual conflict with the forces of the United States, whether under the State or Confederate Government, the service so required is such as they cannot be expected to perform."

Your correspondence with the Governor of Georgia leaves no doubt of the meaning intended to be conveyed by this language. In that correspondence you state that "under instructions, you have felt yourself compelled to advise those drafted to acquiesce until called from their homes or to meet the United States forces in actual conflict; but in that event to throw down their arms and refuse to render a service directly in the teeth of Her Majesty's proclamation, and which would incur the severe penalties denounced in the Neutrality Act."

In a communication from the acting British consul in Charleston to the military authorities, he also has informed them that "he has advised the British subjects generally to acquiesce in the State militia organizations, but at the same time he informed them that in the event the militia should be brought into conflict with the forces of the United States, either before or after being turned over to the Confederate Government, the services required of them would be such as British subjects could not be expected to perform."

It thus appears that the consular agents of the British Government have been instructed not to confine themselves to an appeal for redress, either to courts of justice or to this Government, whenever they may conceive that grounds exist for complaint against the Confederate authorities in their treatment of British subjects (an appeal which has in no case been made without receiving just consideration) but that they assume the power of determining for themselves whether enlisted soldiers of the Confederacy are properly bound to its service; that they even arrogate the right to interfere directly with the execution of the Confederate laws, and to advise soldiers of the Confederate armies to throw down their arms in the face of the enemy.

This assumption of jurisdiction by foreign officials within the territory of the Confederacy, and this encroachment on its sovereignty cannot be tolerated for a moment, and the President has had no hesitation in directing that all consuls and consular agents of the British Government be notified that they can no longer be permitted to exercise their functions or even to reside within the limits of the Confederacy.

I am directed, therefore, by the President to communicate to you this order; that you promptly depart from the Confederacy, and that in the meantime you cease to exercise any consular functions within its limits.

I am, sir, respectfully,

J. P. BENJAMIN, Secretary of State.

A. FULLARTON, Esq., &c., Savannah, Ga.

MR. BENJAMIN TO MR. MASON.

Confederate States of America, Department of State.

Richmond, 11th June, 1863.

Sir—Since my No. 24, of 6th inst., further information has reached the Department, illustrating most forcibly the necessity for the action taken by the President on the subject of Her Britannic Majesty's consuls resident within the Confederacy, as explained in that despatch.

On the 18th May, Mr. Cridland, who had occasionally acted as consul in Richmond during temporary absences of Consul Moore, sought an interview at the Department, and on being admitted, called my attention to an article in the Richmond Whig of that date, which announced that Mr. Cridland was about to depart for Mobile with the commission of consul, and that he was accredited to Mr. Lincoln, not to this Government. Mr. Cridland assured me that the statement was erroneous, that he was going to Mobile as a private individual, unofficially, to look after certain interests of the British Government that had been left unprotected by the withdrawal of Consul Magee. He further stated that as he was going there unofficially he had not conceived that there was any impropriety in doing so without communicating his intention to the Department, and hoped that such was my own view of the matter. I informed him that all neutral residents were at liberty to travel within the Confederacy and to transact their business without other restrictions than such as the military authorities found it necessary to impose for the public safety, and that this Department saw no reason to interpose any objection to his going to Mobile to transact business unofficially. He then said that he had called at the office of the Whig to make a similar explanation to the editor of that paper, with a view to the correction of the erroneous impression created by its article, and accordingly on the next day an article appeared in that journal announcing that he had received the assurance from Mr. Cridland that he was going to Mobile "to look after British interests in that quarter in an unofficial way," and that he was "without commission from the Queen or exequatur from Washington."

I was, therefore, quite surprised at receiving from the Secretary of the Navy official communication of a telegram received by him from Admiral Buchanan, informing the Secretary that Mr. Cridland had been officially introduced to him by the French consul as acting English consul at Mobile, and had shown the admiral "an official document signed by Lord Lyons, appointing him acting English consul at Mobile." I append copies of this telegram, and of the two articles above referred to, extracted from the Richmond Whig.

These, however, are not the only exceptionable features which mark this affair. Other circumstances, to which your attention is invited, have been brought to the notice of the Department by official communications from the governor of Alabama.

On the 11th November last, the Bank of Mobile, as agent for the State of Alabama, addressed a communication to Consul Magee, at Mobile, informing him that that State would owe, during the ensuing year, to British subjects, interest coupons on the State bonds to the amount of some £40,000 sterling; that this interest was payable in London at the Union Bank and at the counting-house of the Messrs. Rothschilds, and requesting to know whether the bank would be allowed to place in the hands of the consul, in coin, the sum necessary for transmission to England, at the expense of the State, for the purpose mentioned.

On the 14th November, Consul Magee replied that he had sent to Her Britannic Majesty's consul at New Orleans to ask if Her Majesty's steamship Rinaldo could not be sent to Mobile, to receive the specie and take it to Havana, to be forwarded thence by the consul-general of Great Britain to London.

The specie was not conveyed by the Rinaldo, but by Her Majesty's ship Vesuvius, and was accompanied by a certificate of the president of the Bank, stating that the remittance of the "thirty-one kegs of specie, containing each $5,000, together $155,000 . . . is for the purpose of paying dues to British subjects from the State of Alabama, and is the property, and belongs to the subjects of Her Britannic Majesty."

The shipment was accompanied by a letter addressed by the bank as agent of the State of Alabama, to W. W. Scrimgeour, Esq., Manager of the Union Bank of London, directing its appropriation to the payment of the interest due to British and other foreign holders of the State bonds, with a statement of the dates at which the several instalments of the interest would become due and of the places in London where they were to be paid.

So little doubt seems to be entertained of the propriety of this transaction by all that were engaged in it, that the commander of the Vesuvius informed the commander of the United States blockading squadron that the British consul had money to send by him, and no objection nor protest was made. Among the papers annexed you will find the account given by Commander Hitecock himself of his conversation with the Commander of the Vesuvius, written after the dismissal of Consul Magee, and therefore at a period when the commodore could certainly have no motive for giving a colouring to his narrative adverse to what was then known to be the view of his Government on the subject.

Under these circumstances, the Vesuvius received and conveyed the specie which has since been received in England, and, as stated in the public journals, paid in whole or in part to British subjects, thus establishing the bona fides of the conduct of all the parties to the transaction.

It now appears, that no sooner was the intention of making this remittance communicated to Her Britannic Majesty's Minister at Washington than he took active measures to prevent it, by sending despatches to Mobile forbidding the shipment. They, however, failed to arrive before the departure of the Vesuvius with the specie, whereupon Consul Magee was dismissed from office for receiving and forwarding it; and the vacancy thus created in the office of British consul, at Mobile, was filled by Lord Lyons by the issue of a commission to Mr. Cridland, and his departure for Mobile under the circumstances already explained.

These facts are of a character so grave as to have attracted the earnest attention of the President, and it is my duty to apprise you of the conclusions at which he has arrived, in order that you may lose no time in laying them before Her Majesty's Government, in the hope that a renewed examination of the subject, and a knowledge of the serious complications which the present anomalous relations between the two Governments may involve, will induce the British Cabinet to review its whole policy connected with those relations, and to place them on the sole footing consistent with accomplished facts, that are too notorious and too firmly established to be much longer ignored.

By the principles of the modern public code debts due by a State are not subject to the operation of the laws of war, and are considered so sacred as to be beyond the reach of confiscation. An attempt at such confiscation would be reprobated by mankind. The United States alone in modern times have courted such reprobation, and just detestation has been universally expressed of their confiscation laws passed during the pending war. The Government of Great Britain, on the contrary, has at all times manifested its abhorrence of such breaches of public faith, and in the Crimean war gave to the world a memorable example of its own high regard for public honour by paying over to its enemy money which it well knew would be immediately employed in waging hostilities against itself. The States of this Confederacy are cautious of examples of honour, and they accordingly refrained, on the breaking out of hostilities, from even the temporary sequestration of the dividends of their public debt due to their enemies. It was not until they had received notice of the confiscation law passed by the United States on the 6th of August, 1861, that they consented to the temporary sequestration of the property of their enemies; and even then the sequestration was declared to be for the sole purpose of securing a fund to indemnify the sufferers under the confiscation law of the United States.

The following clause of our law, exempting public debts from its operation, is extracted as a proof of the sacred regard for public faith manifested by these States under strong temptation to retaliate and under all the exasperation of the savage warfare then actually waged against them: "Provided further, that the provisions of this Act shall not extend to the stocks or public securities of the Confederate Government, or any of the States of this Confederacy, held or owned by any alien enemy, or to any debt, obligation, or sum due from the Confederate Government or any of the States to such alien enemy." (Sequestration Law of Confederate States, passed 30th August, 1861.)

Such being the obligations imposed on States in regard to the payment of public debts towards even their enemies, no deeper reproach can stain their name than the refusal to do justice to neutral creditors. The observance of plighted public faith concerns mankind at large; in it all nations have a common interest; and the belligerent who perverts the weapons of legitimate warfare into an instrumentality for forcing his enemy to dishonour his obligations and incur the reproach of being faithless to his engagements, wages a piratical, and not an honourable, warfare, and becomes hostis generis humani. Public honour is held sacred by international law against the attack of the most malevolent foe, and as susceptible of loss only by the renegeancy of its possessor.

What possible lawful interest could the United States have in preventing the remittance of the specie due to the creditors of the State of Alabama? Blockades are allowed by the laws of nations as a means of enforcing the submission of an enemy by the destruction of his commerce and the exhaustion of his resources, and consequent forced abandonment of the struggle. The remittance of the specie in the present case, far from retarding these legitimate objects, tended on the contrary to promote them by the diversion of the money from application to military purposes. The United States could not have desired that the specie should remain within the Confederacy, save with one of two motives: first, to dishonour the State of Alabama by giving colour to the reproach that it was regardless of public faith, and on this comment has already been made; or, secondly, in the hope that by the fortunes of war the money would come within the reach of spoliation under its confiscation law. It is scarcely necessary to observe that the desire to enrich itself by plunder, at the expense of neutral creditors, is as little consonant with respect for public law and the rights of neutrals, as the purpose forcibly to prevent the State of Alabama from redeeming its plighted faith.

Whatever may be the value to which these views may be justly entitled, it is certain that there are but two aspects in which the State of Alabama can be regarded by Her Majesty's Government. Alabama is either one of the States of the former Union engaged in armed rebellion against the legitimate authority of the United States, or is an independent State, and a member of this Confederacy, engaged in lawful warfare against the United States. An examination of the effect of either of these relations upon the facts connected with the dismissal of Consul Magee and the appointment of Mr. Cridland, will now be presented in vindication of the action which the President deems it his duty to take on this subject.

1. If the British Government think proper to assume (although the contrary is deemed by this Government to be fully established by convincing reason and victorious arms) that the State of Alabama is still one of the United States, then the Government of the United States is bound towards Great Britain, as well as to all other neutral nations, to render all legitimate aid in the collection of their just claims against that State. Although by the Constitution of the United States its Government may be without power to enforce the payment of a debt due to foreign subjects or Powers by an unwilling State, none can doubt its duty to interpose no obstruction to the payment of such debt; and no more legitimate ground of complaint could be afforded to Great Britain against the Government of the United States than an opposition made by that Government to the payment of a just debt due by Alabama to the subjects of Great Britain. In this aspect of the case, therefore, the British officials at Mobile were doing a duty which ought to have been equally acceptable both to the United States and Great Britain, when they facilitated the transmission of funds by that State for that purpose to England, where the debt was made payable, and merited applause rather than a manifestation of displeasure.

2. If, on the contrary, the State of Alabama be regarded, (as in right and fact she really is) an independent State engaged in war against the United States, as a foreign enemy, then the President cannot refrain from observing that the action of Her Britannic Majesty's Minister at Washington savoured on this occasion rather of unfriendly co-operation with an enemy than of just observance of neutral obligations. For, in this view of the case, a Minister accredited to the Government of our enemies has not only assumed the exercise of authority within this Confederacy, without the knowledge or consent of its Government, but has done so under circumstances that rather aggravate than palliate the offence of disregarding its sovereign rights. His action further conveys the implication that this Confederacy is subordinate to the United States, and that his credentials, addressed to the Government at Washington, justify his ignoring the existence of this Government and his regarding these States as an appendage of the country to which he is accredited. Nor will Her Majesty's Government fail to perceive that in no sense can it be considered consonant with the rights of this Government or with neutral obligations, that a public minister should be maintained near the cabinet of our enemies, charged both with the duty of entertaining amicable relations with them, and with the power of controlling the conduct of British officials resident with us.

Nor will the application of the foregoing remarks be at all impaired if Her Majesty's Government, declining to determine the true relation of the State of Alabama to the United States, choose to consider that question as still in abeyance and to regard that State as simply a belligerent, whose ulterior status must await the event of the war. In this hypothesis the objection to delegating authority over British officials residing with us to a minister charged with the duty of rendering himself acceptable to our enemies is still graver than would exist in the case of hostile nations equally recognised as independent by a neutral Power. For in the latter case the parties would have equal ability to vindicate their rights through the usual channels of official intercourse; whereas in the former the belligerent which enjoys exclusively this advantage is armed by the neutral with additional power to inflict injury on his enemy.

The President has, in the facts already recited, seen renewed reasons for adhering to his determination, mentioned in my preceding despatch, of prohibiting any direct communication between consuls or consular agents, residing within the Confederacy, and the functionaries of their Governments residing amongst our enemies. He further indulges the hope (which Her Majesty's Government cannot but regard as reasonable, and which he is, therefore, confident will be justified by its action), that Her Majesty's Government will choose some other mode of transmitting its orders and exercising its authority over its agents within the Confederacy, than by delegating to functionaries who reside among our enemies the power to give orders or instructions to those who reside among us.

Finally, and in order to prevent any further misunderstanding in Mr. Cridland's case, that gentleman has been informed that he cannot be permitted to exercise consular functions at Mobile, and it has been intimated to him that his choice of some other State than Alabama for his residence would be agreeable to this Government. This intimation has been given in order to avoid any difficulty which might result from the doubtful position of Mr. Cridland, who is looked on here as a private individual, and who in Alabama represents himself as "Acting English Consul."

The President is confident that Her Majesty's Government will render full justice to the motives by which these measures are prompted, and will perceive in them a manifestation of the earnest desire entertained by him to prevent the possibility of any unfortunate complications, having a tendency to impair the unity which is equally the interest and the desire of this Government to cherish with that of Great Britain.

The President wishes a copy of this despatch to be placed by you in the hands of Earl Russell.

I am, &c.,

J. P. BENJAMIN,

Secretary of State.

HON. JAMES M. MASON, &c., London.

EARL RUSSELL TO MR. MASON.

Foreign-office, August 19th, 1863.

SIR—In reply to your letters of the 24th and 29th ultimo, I have to state to you that Mr. Acting-Consul Magee failed in his duty to Her Majesty, by taking advantage of the presence of a ship of war of Her Majesty at Mobile to transmit specie to England. This transaction had the character in the eyes of Her Majesty's Government of aiding one of the belligerents against the other.

Laying aside, however, this question of the conduct of Mr. Acting-Consul Magee, of which Her Majesty is the sole judge, I am willing to acknowledge that the so-styled Confederate States are not bound to recognise an authority derived from Lord Lyons, Her Majesty's Minister at Washington.

But it is very desirable that persons authorised by Her Majesty should have the means of representing at Richmond, and elsewhere in the Confederate States, the interests of British subjects, who may be in the course of the war grievously wronged by the acts of subordinate officers. This has been done in other similar cases of States not recognised by Her Majesty, and it would be in conformity with the amity professed by the so-styled Confederate States towards Her Majesty and the British nation, if arrangements could be made for correspondence between agents appointed by Her Majesty's Government, to reside in the Confederate States, and the authorities of such States.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your most obedient, humble servant.

J. M. MASON, Esq., &c., &c. (Signed) RUSSELL.

MR. MASON TO EARL RUSSELL.

24, Upper Seymour-street, Portman-square, September 4, 1863.

MY LORD,—I have had the honour to receive your lordship's letter of the 19th August ultimo, in reply to mine of the 24th and 29th July ultimo. I shall transmit a copy of your lordship's letter to the Secretary of State at Richmond.

These despatches of Mr. Benjamin, full copies of which I have by his direction furnished to your lordship, certainly evince no disinclination to permit any persons accredited by Her Majesty's Government, as its consular or other agents, to reside within the Confederate States, and as such to be in communication with the Government there. They explain only (and certainly in terms of amity) how it has resulted that the Government of the Confederate States has felt itself constrained to prohibit, in future, any direct communication between such agents and Her Majesty's minister resident at Washington; a prohibition, which, I understand from these despatches, is equally extended to all like agents of foreign Powers and their Ministers at Washington. All communications to or from such agents are, in future, to be made through vessels arriving from or despatched to neutral ports.

That it should have become necessary to impose this restriction is, I am sure, a matter of regret to the President of the Confederate States; but the circumstances which have called it forth are under the control of foreign Governments, and not under the control of the President.

In regard to the suggestion in your lordship's letter, that it would be very desirable that persons authorised by Her Majesty should have the means of representing at Richmond and elsewhere in the Confederate States, the interests of British subjects, which, as your lordship states, "has been done in other similar cases of States not recognised by Her Majesty," under arrangements for correspondence between agents appointed by Her Majesty's Government to reside in the Confederate States and the authorities in such States, I can only say that, if it be your lordship's pleasure to make this proposition in such form as may be agreeable to Her Majesty's Government, and not at variance with the views expressed in the despatch of Mr. Benjamin, I do not doubt it would receive the favourable consideration of the Government at Richmond; and I should be happy in being the medium to communicate it.

I have the honour to be

Your Lordship's very obedient servant,

(Signed) J. M. MASON,

Special Commissioner, &c.

The Right Hon. EARL RUSSELL, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 18.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

The straitened position of the Bank of France, with the rapid and extensive exports of specie to India and Egypt to pay for cotton, are producing their natural results. The demand for capital, and the absorption of bank-notes, is gradually but surely entailing an enhancement in the rates, which, although not engendering panic, shows that great vigilance must be exercised, or the present perturbation will terminate in a break down. Trade is sound, and the only damage to be feared will come through Liverpool or Manchester; but it is hoped that this may be averted, since, while a reaction is now apparent, profits have previously been made through operations in the great staple. Still, the money markets throughout the Continent are evidently disturbed, and as the French demands for Mexico, with the internal requirements of Italy, are increasing, there is likely to be an average high rate for some time to come. The question of the moment is, will the Bank of England follow the example of the Bank of France, and go to 7 per cent.? It is generally believed that the discount will, but it is also expected that even that quotation will not arrest the drain. There are curious rumours of the Bank of France suspending specie payments, and of the Bank of England getting relief through Government interference; but there is nothing in the present aspect of financial affairs to warrant such extreme measures. That great stringency will be experienced, and that, meanwhile, everything is negotiated on the basis of the Bank-rate, are facts which cannot be gainsayed; yet, with all these gloomy forebodings, no veritable crisis is apprehended.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

Another week has passed without any gold having been sent into the Bank, but there have been withdrawals for transmission abroad to the extent of £215,000; this is a considerable decline upon the two previous weeks, last week the amount being £363,000, and the week before £391,000. The arrivals of specie have been £359,186, of which £79,587 is from New York, and the remainder from the West Indies. The silver market for the last two or three days has assumed a quieter appearance, after having been slightly excited through the receipt of a telegram from Bombay announcing a further rise in the exchange of 1 per cent. The Laban from Matamoros, has arrived with some dollars, and as the demand has not been very good, a slight decline had to be submitted to, and sales have been effected at 6s. 3d. per oz.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The market for American Government and Railway Securities appears to be getting less active from week to week, and the dealers seem to operate with the greatest caution. In some few instances prices show a slight improvement, but in the majority of cases there is a decided decline. The dealings during the week have been as follows:—Virginia State, Six per cent., 37 and 38½. Atlantic and Great Western, Pennsylvania Section, 7½. Erie, $100 shares, all paid, 66, 65½, 66 and 66½. Erie Central, Seven per cent., 74 and 73. Ditto, $100 shares, 90 paid, 19, 20½, and 20 dis. Ditto, ditto, all paid, 72, 70, and 70½. Panama Railway, first mortgage, 100. Ditto, ditto, second mortgage, 104½ and 105. Pennsylvania, Second Mortgage convertible, 87, 86½ and 89.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The general depression in the stock Exchange, coupled with the increasing tightness of the money market, has depressed this stock rather severely. A gradual decline has brought the quotation down to 57 to 59, at which the market closes to-day.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In American produce only very moderate transactions have taken place, the uncertain condition of the Money Market keeping demand in check. Nevertheless, prices do not appear to be affected to any appreciable extent except for cotton, which is again 3d. per lb. lower, with a very flat market. Our imports generally have been light, and this has helped to maintain the general firmness noticed for some time past. At late moderate rates all kinds of grain are well held, and the supplies at Mark-lane are, as regards both English and foreign, rather limited. The American provision trade progresses quietly but steadily. Prime qualities of bacon make quite late rates, and in some cases a trifle more. Best of imports American butter continue at 98s. to 100s., and cheese sells at 44s. to 58s., according to quality. Petroleum has fluctuated rather perceptibly; soon after our last report extensive speculative sales for delivery sent the price of refined down to 1s. 10d. per gallon, but a gradual recovery followed, and to-day it is again 2s. to 2s. 1d., the same as last noticed. Deliveries for immediate consumption go on largely. Several sales of American turpentine have been made at 85s. per cwt. French has improved to 69s. 6d. Resin continues very firm, but the dealings are confined to French importations. Tar maintains the recent advance, but is less active. Linseed oil, with increased supply and diminished inquiry, has further given way 1s. 6d. per cwt., closing to-day at 40s. Rape oil is firmer, at 40s. for brown, and 42s. 6d. for pale. Tallow, with large arrivals from St. Petersburg, has been depressed. Lard is still in active request, and the advance noticed in our last is well maintained, with large transactions from day to day. Manilla hemp keeps firm, but Russian, when not of first-rate quality, is perhaps a shade easier to buy. The sugar speculation has been renewed with increased vigour, and quotations are again 1s. to 1s. 6d. per cwt. higher; 39s. has been paid for good clayed Manilla. For dyestuffs generally, we may quote firm but not active markets. We hear of a fair demand in the tobacco trade, with quotations of all desirable qualities very strong. A good deal has been done in Scotch pig iron at prices fluctuating between 63s. and 61s. 6d. cash, the last quotation to-day being 62s.

BIDDINGS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 50,00,000 rupees in bills on India, took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were, to Calcutta, 26,00,000 rupees; to Bombay, 22,00,000 rupees, and to Madras, 2,00,000 rupees. The minimum price declared, was as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11½d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits, amounted to 170 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta, at 1s. 11½d., will receive about twenty per cent., on Bombay, at 2s. 3½d., about 50 per cent., on Madras, at 1s. 11½d., about 75 per cent., and above these rates in full.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Nov. 18.

Business in the Cotton Market during the last few days has been greatly restricted in consequence of the unsettled state of the money market, and the idea that money will yet be much dearer. Dealers, therefore, are holding back, and purchasers are only on a retail scale. Nevertheless, prices have been fairly maintained, but to-day there has been a decline of 3d. to 5d. per pound, on almost all descriptions. American cotton has been rather more in demand, but without producing any decided movement. The sales this week have been only 20,000 bales, of which 8,200 bales were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 2,336,450 bales, and to the same period in 1862, 2,417,390 bales. The imports this year have been 1,398,433 bales, and to the corresponding period last year, 1,051,487 bales. The exports this year, to the present time, have been 424,029 bales, and to the same period in 1862, 394,163 bales. Taken for consumption this year 1,182,100 bales, and to the same period last year, 1,020,100 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 646,870 bales, same in 1862, 964,000 bales. Present computed stocks, 181,630 bales, and at the same period last year, 285,210 bales. The chief operations this week have been in American, East Indian, Egyptian and Bahia. The latest quotations are—Middling Orleans, 28½d. to 28½d. Mobile, 28d. to 28½d. Upland, 27½d. to 28d. Estimated fair Egyptian, 28½d. to 28½d.; and Surats, 18d. to 27½d.

MANCHESTER, November 17.

The uncertainty prevailing from Tuesday to Thursday last as to whether the Bank Directors would again advance their rate of discount another 1 per cent., produced a general depression of feeling in our market, and this feeling was not much lessened even when it was known on Thursday that no alteration had taken place in the Bank-rate, it being believed that the change was only deferred for a few days.

On Friday, the market was very seriously affected by a circular on "Cotton Supply," issued by Messrs. Benjamin, Whitworth, and Brothers, of this city, these gentlemen being of opinion that we shall have a supply of cotton in 1864, sufficient to give 43,000 bales per week to the trade and 12,000 bales per week for export, leaving a stock in Liverpool and London, on the 31st December, 1864, of 305,000 bales. Whether these gentlemen are correct or not in their estimates time will show, but it is a fact that no circular on the all-absorbing question of cotton supply has appeared since the commencement of the American struggle which produced such a deep impression on the cotton trade generally.

Since the appearance of this circular our market has gradually declined in price, buyers being very reluctant to place orders if they can avoid doing so. Home-trade yarns can be obtained readily at a decline of fully 3d. per lb. on the prices of a fortnight ago, but no business is reported.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country. Strange and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been slandered, abused, and libelled beyond any civilised people on earth, insult added to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality, shielded and sanctified with the spirit of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality!" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe it,—and think, on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an inefficient blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over from this country, both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater sacrifice, her commercial interests to a fear of War with the North. The so-called "neutrality" practised against the South has been their greatest hardship, and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. How strange and inexplicable has been our conduct towards the combatants!—the Confederate States having declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South is conquered, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President Johnson Davis has stretched out his right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President Lincoln has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordialship, of which he has stretched out his friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence; nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North should blot out the South or not, whether the South ought to lose her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the freemen of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle men to be free, then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of our position among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire. There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotting blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COURTIS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

GENERAL LEE, finding that General Meade would not fight, retired southwards. After waiting to be assured of this fact, General Meade advanced. The Federals say the Confederates were surprised, and if so it is remarkable that such an oft-repeated movement should be unexpected. The accounts that were transmitted to Europe were of the usual glowing description. The Army of the Potomac had captured 1,800 prisoners, after a severe contest, but until we get a Southern version of the affair we cannot credit the story of 4,000 Confederates being left totally without support, and, after fighting for many hours, losing nearly half their number by capture. However, the report fired the Northern imagination, and the cry of "On to Richmond" was sounded, and, on the faith of a "reliable" scout, it was announced that the Confederates had decided to abandon Virginia as soon as Meade advanced. There were the usual speculations about General Lee. Some said he was in Tennessee, and others that he was conducting the retreat of his army to Richmond. The latest advices (New York, 14th) give a different complexion to the state of affairs. Instead of pressing "on to Richmond," it appears that General Meade was waiting at Brandy Station for supplies, and, instead of retreating hastily, General Lee had some of his forces north of the Rapidan.

The disaster to Burnside, which we noticed last week, has been confirmed; and the only assurance that the Federal authorities can give an anxious public is that "his position is favourable," which means that it is critical. Meanwhile he has been superseded by General Foster. At Chattanooga, the situation is reported unchanged. At Charleston, the bombardment had become "slow." The Confederates were, according to the report of General Kelly, defeated at Lewisburg, Western Virginia. The Federal Texas expedition has returned to Brashear City. It is reported that the Confederate forces were actively operating in Arkansas. The Confederates have captured and burnt a steamer on the Mississippi below Helena. Altogether, the course of events appears favourable to the Confederates. The advance of Meade is checked, the army of the Cumberland is at bay, the army of Burnside is in a position to inspire anxiety, the bombardment of Fort Sumter is "slow," the Texas expedition has retraced its steps, and the Confederates have once more shown that the Mississippi is only open to iron-clads, and can never be open to trade whilst the war lasts and they hold either bank.

The official report of General Lee of the late advance of the Confederate Army in Virginia frankly avows the object of the movement, and that the object was not attained. On the 9th October the Federal army was encamped around Culpepper Court-house, and General Lee determined, if possible, to bring on an engagement.

General Meade declined the contest, and fell back as the Confederates advanced, and as the latter had to take circuitous routes and the former moved in direct lines, the retreating army could not be intercepted. At length the Federals took up a position beyond Bull Run and fortified it. At this point General Lee could only attack at a disadvantage, and owing to the proximity of the entrenchments around Washington and Alexandria, could not have inflicted much damage on the enemy. He, therefore, retired, after destroying the railroad from Cub Run to the Rappahannock. In the course of the operations the Confederates captured 2,436 prisoners, including 41 commissioned officers. We dare say General Meade had good reasons for refusing to fight, but it is certainly curious and significant, when the invader, so far from attacking, will not stand the issue of a battle, but flees for protection to the entrenchments that surround his capital. Never in any age or country has an invader succeeded by Fabian tactics; and, indeed, the very adoption of such a policy is tantamount to a confession that the work of conquest is impossible.

President Davis has visited Charleston, and inspected the fortifications. He made a speech, in which he said that if the city was beleaguered on every side, reinforcements would be sent in proportion to the strength of the enemy. He expressed his conviction that Charleston would not be taken.

The speech delivered by Mr. Seward, at Auburn, on the eve of the late elections, is a remarkable and important document. The telegraphic summary did not do it justice, only giving us the threadbare prophecy and the sensational profanity. The criticisms of the Northern press are mainly devoted to Mr. Seward's modest imitation of Earl Russell at Blairgowrie, in telling the good people of Auburn that he was "there by accident and not by design," to his geographical blunder when he speaks of "Louisiana, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and other Gulf States," and to his attempt at poetry, of which the following is a specimen:—

"Steal not the Presidency, my honest friend,
For fear the gallows will be your end."

But the speech has a serious purpose that is well worthy of attention. From first to last Mr. Seward spoke as if he were the prime minister of a despotic ruler, and unequivocally declared the intention of his master to retain power whatever may be the result of the next presidential election. Mr. Seward began by putting forth a doctrine that is not only antagonistic to republicanism, but which would not be tolerated in any country having a constitution. He asserted that the Administration (that is, the Lincoln Cabinet) and the Government of the country are inseparable. He said, "You will succeed, because you voted for the Government in voting to sustain the Administration. Your opponents commit the fatal error of supposing that they can divide the Administration from the Government, and support the one and discard the other. . . . If you discard this administration of the Government by your votes, you bring no new or better one to its place. You then have practically an interregnum from this time to the 4th of March, 1865." This was in effect saying that the people had the option of supporting the Lincoln Cabinet, or of having no Government at all. Boldly and explicitly, Mr. Seward then proceeded, step by step, to inform them that they in fact had no option in the matter; and that the United States was, and would continue under the domination of Mr. Abraham Lincoln. Mark how artfully Mr. Seward approaches the final announcement. He strives to give the impression that the enemies of the Union and the enemies of Abraham Lincoln are in all cases identical. He says, "If you could pass the ballot-box through the camps" (of the Confederates) "every man of them would vote for the Administration of this Government by Horatio Seymour, or Vallandigham, and against the Administration of Abraham Lincoln. . . . If the ballot-boxes could be opened at Laird's ship-yard at Liverpool, or in John Slidell's house in Paris, there would be an unanimous vote for Seymour and Vallandigham, and new iron-clads would escape from under the broad arrow, in armour impregnable, in array innumerable." Then he skilfully reminds his audience that his sovereign is the master of legions. Defending the right of the soldiers to vote, he says, "Not allow the soldier to vote for the Government! You saw what came of it by refusing to allow him to vote last year. You voted the Government down in his absence, and then were obliged to call the soldiers from the front in face of the enemy, back to the State, to restore peace, order, and safety at home." Hence the riots in New York are ascribed to the crime of voting for the Democratic party, and the alliance between the Government or Administration (it will be observed that Mr. Seward uses the words as if they were synonymous,) is distinctly notified. It is assumed as a matter of course that the soldiers will vote for Mr. Lincoln and his Cabinet. Then, with singular boldness, Mr. Seward proclaimed that the military which supports Mr. Lincoln is supreme. He said: "I tell you that the soldiers of this war will vote, some thousands of them to-morrow—many more thousands every year hereafter—and they will sit in judgment upon parties in this country throughout two generations, and determine the verdict of posterity in regard to them." Could Mr. Seward have chosen any form of words that would more plainly have intimated that the Government of the United States was virtually a military despotism? In such a manner might the minister of a Roman Emperor have spoken of the Prætorian Guards. Not contented with this, Mr. Seward proceeded to deliberately and elaborately unfold the programme of Mr. Lincoln and his Administration. He states upon what pretext Mr. Lincoln will refuse to quit the office of President in 1865. Mr. Seward's words need no comment. He says: "Abraham Lincoln was elected in 1860 to be President, not of a part, but of the whole, of the United States; but he has been forcibly kept out of a part of the United States. . . . It is injustice and downright robbery of Abraham Lincoln, and the majority of the citizens who elected him, to refuse him the full enjoyment of the authority conferred upon him in that election. There can be no peace and quiet until Abraham Lincoln is President, under that election, of the whole United States. . . . What, if through battle and suffrage, the President who was elected in 1860 should, by his opponents, be kept out of the Presidency of the United States until another election? What if they should then succeed in electing a President in 1864 against the majority who elected Abraham Lincoln in 1860. Can that majority be expected to acquiesce, without voting and without bloodshed, in the election of Jefferson Davis, or John C. Breckinridge, or Horatio Seymour? Certainly not; and then you have perpetual civil war, which is nothing else than perpetual anarchy. Let us not be deceived. Abraham Lincoln must be President of South Carolina and Georgia by virtue of his election of 1860, or not only the peace of the Union, but the Union itself, is forever lost." Surely nothing can be plainer than this. Any one, whether it be a Southern Confederate, or a Northern Democrat, who should be elected to succeed Mr. Lincoln in 1865, will be treated as a traitor, and the Republicans and their army will fight for their sovereign. But we have given Mr. Seward's own words, and our readers can therefore judge for themselves whether we put an unfair construction on them. After the above announcement it is but natural that Mr. Seward should talk of the debts and taxes of the United States as "the debts and taxes of Abraham Lincoln and his Administration." Unless Mr. Seward has been rash enough to defy and threaten the people before being assured of the support of the army, a folly of which it is not likely he would be guilty, we must regard the Auburn speech as the formal proclamation of a military despotism in the United States. Yet, we doubt not that liberty will be avenged. The Lincolnites have evoked a mighty and destructive spirit; let them look to it they are not among its earliest victims. We agree with Mr. Seward that the military is supreme in the United States, but we do not believe that "Abraham Lincoln and his Administration" will very long control its destinies. No position is so insecure as that which depends upon the favour of a mercenary army. But intoxicated with present power the Lincolnites cannot see the breakers ahead.

The workmen's strike in the North is assuming threatening proportions. The masses claim to share in the prosperity so eloquently descanted on by Messrs. Chase and Seward, and to participate in the wealth of the shoddy aristocracy.

It is also stated that the condition of the "liberated" slaves along the Mississippi is deplorable, and that subscriptions are to be raised for their relief. A fortnight ago we gave some account of the way in which the Yankees treat the negroes who are unfortunate enough to pass under their power.

The New York Tribune publishes a sketch of the Peace Congress that was held in February, 1861. It is worth a passing notice, from the way in which it refutes the assertions made by Northern partisans in Europe, that the South seceded to defend slavery, and that the North went to war for the sake of emancipation. Very ample guarantees were offered by the Northern representatives at the Congress that the institution of slavery should not be touched; and as the Tribune says, so far from the Republicans refusing "all concessions, proffers, and instituting an unqualified submission to the Constitution and laws," they "proffered new assurances and proposed new guarantees to the slaveholding interest." This, be it remembered, is the testimony of the avowed organ of the Black Republicans.

We are indebted to the correspondent of the New York Herald for some account of the doings of the Abolitionists in St. Domingo. He writes, "Some amiable foreign Abolitionists of the Congo-Summer school tried to get up a war of races by furnishing arms to a mob of savage negroes on the frontier of Hayti, and teaching them how to attack an undefended hospital, and cut the throats of two or three score of Spanish soldiers. They were also told that the murder of white women and children would be very agreeable to the 'King of the United States,' whoever that potentate may be. This abominable story, coming to them in company with the fact of several hundred fine guns and pistols—all gratis, free-love offerings—wherewith to slaughter the 'white devils' so detested by the 'King of the United States,' had the effect of stimulating the border negroes to frenzy, and some revolting atrocities were committed among the straggling, half-savage towns along the frontiers of Hayti." Although the Abolitionists in America have not induced the negroes to murder white women and children in the South, their efforts have been somewhat successful in St. Domingo. This must deeply gratify the Reverends Beecher and Brownlow, as well as their reverend sympathisers in this country.

The New York Times is amused at the notion of Englishmen being gulled by Mr. Beecher. Referring to that part of Mr. Beecher's Exeter Hall speech, in which he smoothed over the unfriendly tone of the Federal press and public men, the correspondent of the New York Times says:—"There was a dose for Exeter Hall! They swallowed it, however. Gruff John Bull does not get flattered often; when he does it comes to him with all the charm of novelty." Fortunately, the old ladies and roughs that met, at the bidding of Messrs. Bright and Hall and demagogues of that stamp, do not represent public opinion in this country; and, moreover, English audiences can applaud a trickster without being deceived by his tricks.

It is announced by the last mail that Mr. Stanton "had telegraphed to the Mayor of Buffalo that Lord Lyons acquainted him he had received information of the probable existence of a Confederate plot in Canada to seize the steamers on Lake Erie, liberate the prisoners in Fort Johnson, and burn the Lake cities;" and that a Federal agent had left for Canada to investigate the affair. Until we get the details of this curious report it will be useless to speculate on it.

The price of gold in New York on the 14th inst., was 46½ premium.

ENGLAND

ABOUT 2000 persons assembled at Rochdale, on Tuesday evening, to hear an address from Mr. Cobden, M.P. for Rochdale. The chair was taken by the Mayor of the borough. Mr. Bright was present, and also addressed the meeting. Mr. Cobden said that the present Parliament was drawing to its close, and that the next Parliament would be required to be endowed with new principles by the country. The attention of the country seemed to him to be rather given to the affairs of other nations than its own. He had non-intervention on our lips, but every man wished to intervene in the affairs of some country or other. The idea that pervaded the public mind was, that affairs in America were to be settled in a peculiar way, according to the dictates of particular parties. One of the great fundamental errors in the conduct of statesmen, in the conduct of governments, and in the conduct of a large portion of the influential classes in this country had been, that they had made up their minds that there could be but one issue to this civil war in America, and that was separation between North and South. He told them, when he was there last, that he did not believe the war would issue in that way. He declared to them that, looking at what was called in cant phrase "London Society," and society was that upper ten thousand with whom members of Parliament were liable to come in contact at the clubs and elsewhere—looking at the ruling classes, if he might use the phrase, that were met with in these parlours in London, nineteen-twentieths of them had been firmly convinced, from the first, that the civil war in America could only end in separation. How far the wish was father to the thought he would not pretend to say. From his acquaintance with the statistics and geography of America, a subject of which the ruling class knew nothing whatever, he did not believe that he or any one in that vast assembly would ever live to see two separate nations within the confines of the present United States of America. If it were not for one cause, he himself should regard as hopeless and useless that attempt to subjugate the Southern States. It was the object and purpose with which the war was begun that, in his opinion, rendered success to the Secessionists impossible. It was idle to talk about a conflict between free-trade and protection. In the report of the Committee of the Thirty-Three, who sat in December, 1860, and January, 1861, to consider the grievances alleged by the South, there was not a word about tariff or taxation. It was slavery, slavery, slavery, from the first page to the last. This was a war to perpetuate and extend human slavery. It was a war, not to defend slavery as it was left by their ancestors—a thing to be retained and to be apologised for—it was a war to establish a slave empire, in which slavery should be made the corner-stone of the social system, and should be defended and justified on scriptural and ethnological grounds. God pardon the man who, in the year of grace 1863, should think that such a project as that could be crowned with success. He had, from the first, believed it impossible that the South should succeed, and he had founded that faith on moral instincts, which taught him to repudiate the idea that anything so infernal could succeed. No, it was because in this world the virtues and forces went together, and the vices and the weaknesses were inseparable. It was therefore he felt certain that this project never could succeed. For how was it? There was a community, with nearly half of its population slaves, and they were attempting to fight another community where every man was a working man. In the one case honour was given to industry, labour was held to be honourable. It had been used as a reproach by some people that Mr. Lincoln was a "rail-splitter." Why was a "rail-splitter" raised to be President of the United States? Because labour was held in honour in that country. With such a conflict going on, and with such a result as he felt no doubt would follow, he feared to speak of such a contest as that, as a struggle for empire on one side and for independence on the other. He said it was an aristocratic rebellion against a democratic government. In all history, where the aristocracy had been pitted against the people in a physical contest, the aristocracy had always gone down under the heavy blows of the democracy. The North, however, was mistaken if it thought it could carry on a civil war like this, drawing a million of men from productive industry, to be engaged merely in a process of destruction, and spending £200,000,000 or £300,000,000 sterling, without a terrible collapse sooner or later, and a great prostration in every part of the community.

Mr. Cobden then proceeded to speak of the proposed Congress at Paris. He said that the result of the Congress of 1856 was, that there were a million more men armed and drilled in Europe than before that Congress. The diminution of armaments ought to be the primary and fundamental object of the proposed Congress, otherwise that evil would only be increased. Mr. Cobden condemned the interference with Poland, which had only increased the miseries of the Poles. He next alluded to what he termed, the horrible massacre in Japan, and the destruction of Kagosima. We had practised a mere manoeuvre to induce the Japanese to fire on our fleet. It was deplorable that east of the Cape of Good Hope the English lost all sense of honour, morality, or Christianity. Our proceedings in China were as dishonourable to us as a nation, as were the proceedings of Spain in the times of Cortes and Pizarro. Now we were sympathising with the Tartar Government; our Government, indeed, was found in alliance with the most odious governments in the world; Turkey, China, Morocco, and Austria. Mr. Cobden then turned to home affairs. He dwelt on the ignorance of the masses; on the condition of the English peasantry, entirely divorced from the land. He called for a reform bill, an extension of the franchise, now, when such a measure could be passed in tranquillity. But the movement must originate out-of-doors before it could succeed in the House of Commons. In conclusion, Mr. Cobden spoke of the cotton that was to come from all parts of the world, as well as from the valley of the Mississippi, from African free labour; for he sincerely hoped that there never would be another cotton-seed planted in the ground by a slave in America.

Mr. Bright then made a long oration, upon which we have no space to dwell. He spoke of all the real and imaginary evils under which the lower classes in England suffered: overwhelming poverty and excessive taxation. He spoke of the voice of the people being the voice of God, and demanded an extension of the franchise. He said that the old corn-laws had no parallel for cruelty and wickedness, except that institution in America which was now crumbling into ruin beneath the wrathful judgments of heaven. He next abused the Tories, and then more vehemently he abused the Whigs. Then he abused the House of Lords, and said that it could be demonstrated that at least half of the present families of the House of Lords owed their political existence to the slime and corruption of the period between 1688 and 1830. He called the session of Parliament "the farce of representation annually enacted in the new Palace at Westminster." He said that he had been told that the bastard chivalry of the South was unconscious of the sufferings of the negro, though it astonished the world and cried to heaven for remedy. He desired for the English people a system of education equal to that offered to the people of the New England States. He thought events in America had proved the value of a democracy, because the Government at Washington was now the strongest in the world. The number of their men and of their ships, and the resources brought out by them, were unrivalled. Perfect order had prevailed at their elections. Their President was not chosen from some worn-out royal or noble blood, but from the people, and was one whose truthfulness and spotless honour had claimed him universal praise. Mr. Bright's concluding words were these:—"When the mortal strife is over—when peace is restored—when slavery is destroyed—when the Union is cemented afresh,—for I would say in the language of one of our own poets, addressing his country,

The grave's not dug, where traitor hands shall lay
In fearful haste thy murdered corse away,— then Europe and England may learn that an instructed democracy is the surest foundation of government, and that education and freedom are the only sources of true greatness and true happiness among any people." Who, on reading these sentiments of John Bright, can feel surprised at the admiration with which he is so universally regarded by all classes of society in England?

Rumour has been busy with changes in the English Cabinet during the past week. Many journals, both English and French, have adopted and speculated on the report that Earl Russell was about to resign the seals of the Foreign Office, and that the Earl of Clarendon was to be his successor. The Morning Post has, however, authoritatively contradicted the rumour. It probably arose from the fact that Lord Clarendon has had several interviews with the Prime Minister, and has been received by the Queen within the last fortnight; but it must be remembered that Lord Clarendon was the English representative at the Congress of Paris, and that he should have been consulted with reference to the Congress now proposed by the Emperor of the French, was, of course, to be expected.

On Tuesday last the Earl of Powis was formally installed in the office of High Steward of the University of Cambridge. After a Latin speech from the Public Orator of the University, and an address from the Vice-Chancellor, the letters patent were handed to the High Steward, who thereupon took the oath of allegiance, and made the declaration of fidelity to the interests of the University. The Earl of Powis then addressed the members present, and in speaking of his predecessor in office, the late Lord Lyndhurst, he said that "Lord Lyndhurst was the son of an humble American colonist, driven from his home at Boston by civil strife; that the colonist speedily attained a distinguished position among English artists, and that to his pencil we owe the embodiment and commemoration of one of the most striking scenes in the history of that House of Parliament, in which the son three times held the great seal and three times presided over the deliberations of the ancient Barons of England. If we looked to the land which gave birth to Lord Lyndhurst, we should wonder how, in the space of one man's life, thirteen disjointed colonies could become one of the great powers of the world. We could scarcely believe that Lord Lyndhurst could have witnessed the rise, the progress, and, humanly speaking, the disruption of the American Union. Would that Boston could produce another Copley, whose commanding intellect and calm sagacity could still the furious passions and heal the wounds of that distracted country!"

The Crown Princess of Prussia, who, with her husband, the Crown Prince, is on a visit to the Queen at Windsor, celebrated her birthday, on Saturday last, by laying the foundation-stone of a new church at Windsor. The Queen had taken great interest in the erection of the building, and had subscribed largely towards it. The church is intended chiefly for the use of the poor, and, according to the special approbation of Her Majesty, all the sittings are free. The Bishop of Oxford, the Dean of Windsor, and the Archdeacon of the diocese were present at the ceremony, as were also the members of Parliament for the borough, and the mayor and corporation. The Freemasons assembled in large numbers, having at their head the Crown Prince, a mason of high degree, and had a special platform allotted to them. The choir of the church sang the 84th Psalm, the Bishop of Oxford offered up prayer, and the Dean of Windsor handed to the Princess the silver trowel. Her Royal Highness having duly performed the ceremony of laying the stone, said:—"In the faith of Jesus Christ, we place the foundation-stone of this church, to be consecrated for ever to the service of Almighty God, in the name of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost." The ceremony concluded with an address from the Bishop of Oxford. It is not wonderful that the English people are so much attached to the person of the Sovereign, when acts like these are found to be in the eyes of the Sovereign the most proper method of celebrating the birthday of the Queen's eldest daughter.

London is threatened with numberless new railroads, both above and below the soil. First there is to be a line north of the river, commencing in Brompton at the south-west corner of the metropolis, running thence to Cannon-row, contiguous to Westminster-bridge, and thence to Cannon-street in the City. Next there is to be an outer line, commencing at Wandsworth, south of the Thames, running thence to Clapham and Battersea, and there crossing the river to Kensington. From that point the railway will run in a north-easterly direction to Paddington and Kilburn, then eastward to Hampstead, Hackney, and Stratford, and thence south to Old Kent-road and New-cross. It will effect a junction with fifteen distinct existing railways, cutting some of them at more than one point. The principal railways which will be united by this scheme are the London, Chatham, and Dover, the Great Western, the North Western, the Midland, the Great Northern, the Great Eastern, the London and Blackwall, the London, Brighton, and South Coast, and the South Eastern. It is also proposed to construct an underground railway from Park-lane, along Oxford-street, New Oxford-street, High Holborn, Greville-street, and Charles-street, to Farringdon-road, near to the station of the present Metropolitan (Underground) Railway.

We noticed, a fortnight since, that a correspondence had taken place between Earl Russell and the Glasgow Emancipation Society, with reference to the screw-steamer Pampero, recently launched from the building-yard of Messrs. Thompson. That vessel now lies at Lancefield Quay, Broomielaw; and as a large staff of men are at work on her, she will be ready for sea within ten days. Instructions have, however, been received from the Government for her detention, and Her Majesty's gunboat Bulfinch now lies moored opposite Lancefield Quay, having been moved up the river on Friday last. It seems that the Pampero differs but little, if at all, from the class of merchant ships which are built every year in such large numbers in the Clyde, and it is denied that there are any war fittings about her.

As we warned our readers last week, the court-martial at Aldershot upon Lieutenant-Colonel Crawley has lasted throughout the week, and holds out every indication of continuing for some weeks more. It would be as impossible as unprofitable to attempt to give any abstract of the evidence. At the proper time the true story, as proved by this trial and the finding of the Court, will be duly recorded. When we state that there are about 150 witnesses, that the cross-examination of one witness has lasted three entire days, and that some members of the Court, who desire to return to London every night, have purchased season tickets on the railway, we have said enough to convey some idea of the probable duration of the inquiry.

The sentence on Captain Stone, of a suspension of his certificate for six months, for running the Cunard ship Africa on a rock near Cape Race, seems to have created considerable excitement and indignation among the merchant-captains at Liverpool. On Wednesday, November 18th, a public meeting, attended by merchants, shipowners, merchant-captains, and other persons interested, was held in the Cotton Sales Room, Exchange Buildings, Liverpool, for the purpose of considering the present system of Board of Trade inquiry as affecting the interests of British mariners and engineers, and also to express sympathy with the case of Captain Stone. Captain Judkins, the senior captain in the Cunard Service, after declaring that the decision in Captain Stone's case was utterly unfair, moved "That this meeting views with indignation the principles and practice of the constitution of the courts of inquiry into wrecks and casualties to British merchant ships. It believes these tribunals, which have the power, and exercise the power, of inflicting the most severe and penal sentences, depriving men of their certificates and thus of the means of living, are opposed to the fundamental principles of the legislation of this country and to the rights of Britons." After a resolution to use every means to obtain from Parliament the abolition of the present courts of inquiry, it was moved "That every effort be now made to obtain the return of Captain Stone's certificate." Captain Judkins, in conclusion, addressed the meeting, and declared that "If the engines were to be stopped to take soundings as constantly as the assessors of the Court required, such a practice would render the commander quite unable to find out where he was. He complained that the British Government had not joined with the merchants of New York in subscribing to place at Cape Race a whistle which would be heard at a distance of twelve miles. Had such a whistle existed the Africa would not have been stranded." The real point at issue seems to be this: that either the Cunard steamers must run the risks of such an accident as befell the Africa, and by so doing maintain their reputation for unrivalled speed, or by a more cautious method escape the occasional occurrence of such accidents, and descend to the level of other vessels in point of despatch.

Three Clyde steamers were, as rumour assert, sold as blockade-runners last week. The Oledonia, which has been fitted with new boilers and feathering floats, and which formerly was known on the Stranraer station and afterwards ran between Glasgow and Rothesay; the saloon steamer Iona, the best-finished and swiftest vessel on the Clyde; and the sidon steamer Fairy. The price of the Iona was £20,000. The Fairy was used by Prince Alfred on his visit to Oban, during the tour round Scotland in the Racoon. Two new steamers are also fitted for the blockade trade, namely, the Nola, 780 tons, sister to the City of Petersburg and Lord Clyde which left the Clyde lately; and the Arvon, sister to the Presto, Darc, and Will'o the Wisp, which have sailed within the last four weeks.

At a meeting of the Royal Geographical Society, held on Monday last, a letter was read from Madame Timé the Dutch lady, who is exploring the interior of Africa to the west of the White Nile. Madame Timé had purchased an old paddle-steamer at Khartum, and had been joined by Dr. Heughlin, a German naturalist. The country in the neighbourhood of the Bahr-el-Ghazal, the western affluent of the Nile, was described as particularly beautiful and luxuriant. The party had fallen in with Consul Petherick and his wife. Sir E. Murchison read a letter from M. de Chaillu, stating that he had arrived at Accra on the West Coast of Africa, after a passage of forty-six days, and that he was provided with the requisite instruments for determining the latitude and longitude of the localities which he intended to visit. Colonel Pelly, the political resident at Beshire, read a paper "On the Geography and productions of the countries around the Persian Gulf."

A creditable piece of pedestrianism was performed a few days since by a Mr. George Thompson, of Belfast, who, though an amateur, had previously to the race in question proved himself to be one of the best runners and walkers in Ireland. The match on the present occasion was, to walk eighteen English miles under three hours. The weather was extremely wet and the road miry. Nevertheless, Mr. Thompson accomplished the feat, walking the first six miles in 58 minutes, the first nine miles in 1 hour 28 minutes, and the whole distance in 2 hours, 59 minutes, 47 seconds.

About eighteen months ago a dispute arose on various subjects between the Jockey Club and "the sporting correspondent" of the Morning Post. The result was that the "correspondent" was warned off the race-course at Newmarket, of which the Jockey Club claim to be owners. However, in spite of the warning, the person in question persisted in being present at the races. An action of trespass was thereupon brought against him, the plaintiffs being the stewards for the year of the Jockey Club—namely, the Earl of Coventry, Admiral Rous, and Mr. C. Dupré Alexander. The defendant pleaded a considerable number of pleas, to some of which the plaintiffs demurred, and the demurrer was argued on Friday last, before the Court of Queen's Bench. It was averred by the defendant's plea that "the close on which the trespass was alleged to have been committed was part or parcel of certain unenclosed lands, known by the name of Newmarket Heath, and that from time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary horse races have been, and of right ought to have been, and still of right ought to be holden on the said lands at certain reasonable times, to wit, on certain days in the months of April, July, and October in each and every year; and that from time whereof the memory of man is not to the contrary there hath been and still of right ought to be an ancient and laudable custom, that all the subjects of the realm have been used to enter, and still of right ought to enter and stay and remain for a reasonable time, for the purpose of witnessing the said horse races." The argument and the remarks on it were of an amusing character. The Chief Justice observed that it seemed as if the right to hold the races were laid in the horses, and that he could scarcely believe that racing was as ancient as the time whereof "the memory of man was not to the contrary," which, in the legal sense, would mean as ancient as the time of Richard I.; while another Judge, who must be presumed not to be a sporting character, protested strongly against being supposed to know that races were held at certain times. The counsel, however, told the Court that he had found mention of Newmarket races in the reign of Henry VIII., and that James I. kept a horse there in training. Eventually it was decided that as, on the authority of a case in the time of Blackstone, there could be no customary right in all the subjects of the realm, therefore there could be no customary right to hold the races, and no such right to be present at them. Judgment, therefore, was given for the plaintiffs.

THE CONTINENT.

Most of the Powers to which invitations to the Congress were addressed have already responded, but of the character of the answers we have no authoritative account. It would seem, however, that most of the smaller sovereigns have accepted unconditionally, whilst the larger ones have made reserves and asked for a programme. If newspapers which sometimes speak the views of the English Government are well informed, England has definitively refused to take any part in the Congress.

The Sleswig Holstein question is creating great excitement in Germany. The eldest son of the Duke of Augustenburg, a major in the Prussian army, has announced to the inhabitants of the Duchies of Sleswig Holstein and Lauenburg his assumption of their government, by a proclamation published in a Frankfort newspaper. The Dukes of Saxe-Weimar Saxe-Meiningen, Saxe-Altenburg, and other petty princes, have formally recognised his title to Sleswig and Holstein. The representative of Baden in the Diet has, with the consent of his Government, undertaken to act as the pretender's representative for Holstein, and the Diet has referred his claim to its Holstein committee. The Grand Duke of Oldenburg has protested against the accession of Prince Christian, even to the throne of Denmark. In all parts of Germany the newspapers are proclaiming that the time has come to assert German rights; and the Liberal majority of the Prussian House of Deputies have presented a motion to the effect that the honour and interests of Germany demand that all the German States should effectually support the rights of the Hereditary Prince Frederick to the Duchies of Sleswig and Holstein. On the other hand, in Holstein the members of the Estates tried to get up an irregular meeting at Kiel, to consider the situation, which was suppressed, however, by the police; and many of the officials, encouraged by the excitement in Germany, have resolved, it is said, to refuse the oath of allegiance to Christian IX. We do not believe, however, that any serious attempt will be made to dispute the rights of Christian IX. By the Treaty of London, of the 8th of May, 1852, Austria, Prussia, England, France, Sweden, and Russia engaged to acknowledge "in His Highness the Prince Christian, of Sleswig Holstein Sonderburg-Glücksburg, and his issue male, in the direct line, by his marriage with the Princess Luise, the right of succeeding to the whole of the dominions now united under the sceptre of His Majesty the King of Denmark. To this treaty nearly all the other considerable States of Europe subsequently acceded, amongst others the following members of the German Confederation:—Holland, Saxony, Wurtemberg, and Hanover. The recognition was made unreservedly, unconditionally; and it cannot be supposed that, even if the German Powers should be base enough to support the Prince of Augustenburg by arms against the King, whose title they have solemnly recognised, the other signatories of the treaty will allow them to have their own way. No doubt the public feeling of Germany calls upon them to act in this dishonourable manner, but Austria and Prussia will hardly venture upon a measure which not only would release all other States from their treaty engagements to them, and thus destroy their sole title to the larger part of their possessions, but would in all probability commit them to a war, in which they would have to deal, not with Denmark and Sweden only, but with all Western Europe.

Apart, however, from the treaty, the claims of the soi-disant Prince of Augustenburg will not bear examination. His father had some pretension to Holstein—to Sleswig, and Lauenburg he had no claims which could be supported for a moment—but all his claims, whatever they were, he renounced for himself and his whole family in 1852. Had, however, his rights been ever so good, ever so universally recognised, they would not avail his son. The Duke of Augustenburg married a Countess Daneskind—a lady of very good family, but not of the princely birth requisite for the contraction of a legitimate marriage. The pretender to the throne of the Duchies is illegitimate. His father's marriage was legally only amorganatic one. It is said that Austria and Prussia have both resolved to repudiate the pretender's claims on this ground.

There are other claimants to Lauenburg. Anhalt and the two Schwartzburgs have protested in the Diet against the accession of Prince Christian to the throne of the Duchy. Anhalt has some pretensions to the succession, with the nature of which we are not acquainted. In any case the Augustenburgs, even if the treaty were set aside, have not the slightest claim to this little Duchy which has only belonged to Denmark since the resettlement of Europe in 1815.

Meanwhile the new King of Denmark has been strengthening his position with his Danish subjects by sanctioning the new common Constitution for Denmark and Sleswig. His Majesty took a few days to consider what he should do, and thereby, although the subject was one which needed great consideration, somewhat disappointed his new subjects. There can be no doubt that the enactment of this Constitution, which will be treated in Germany as an incorporation of Sleswig, will do much to destroy all chances of an amicable solution of the question which the pending Execution is designed to determine by force, and the King might well pause before adding at such a moment to the difficulties which environ him, but to have refused his assent to the law would have been to have sown the seeds of dissension between himself and the only portion of his subjects upon whom he can rely, and would not, certainly, in the present temper of Germany, have bought off the agitation against his title. He has decided wisely, although the Germans already pretend that he was intimidated into the signature by the people of Copenhagen.

Precautions have been taken to prevent any outbreak in Holstein. The garrisons have been largely reinforced. It is not probable, however, that even the most hot-headed Holsteiners will go beyond passive resistance at the present. They await a Federal army. Indeed, they would scarcely know what standard to raise. Although a majority of the inhabitants of the Duchy might like to be separated from Denmark, only a minority would be willing to accept the so-called Prince of Augustenburg as their ruler.

The Corps Legislatif has continued its verification of the elections. Some of the debates have been extremely animated, but nearly all the elections have been confirmed. Apropos of these discussions, we may mention a curious mistake in one of Mr. Reuter's telegrams from Paris, which passed undetected in every newspaper office. The telegram ran, "The election of a curate at Bordeaux was also stated, after a long debate, to be according to law, conformably with the conclusions of the committee." Here was an interesting legal question—the eligibility of priests to sit in the Chamber decided, and no doubt many a reader noted it down as a fact worth record. What really was decided was, that the election of M. Curé, the Government candidate for Bordeaux, which had been vehemently denounced by the Opposition, was a valid one. The clerks of Mr. Reuter, by a very easy mistake, translated the honorable member into a curate.

A bill has been submitted to the Council of State, asking supplementary credits for ninety-one millions of francs for the Mexican expedition. M. Fould's financial statement is looked for with some anxiety.

The Emperor has written to the Bishop of Arras, congratulating him upon his defence of the Faith against the attacks upon it in M. Renan's book.

The Upper House of the Prussian Landtag has not only approved the press ordinance of June, but declared it valid until the new bill upon the press shall have passed into a law. Only eight members were found to oppose these monstrous resolutions. In the discussion the press was denounced in very violent language; thanks to its influence, said one of the speakers, the brutality of the lower classes increased every day. On the other hand, the House of Deputies has voted by very large majorities—278 to 39 and 269 to 46—that the assent of the House should not be given to the ordinance; that it was not necessary for the maintenance of order; that limitation of the freedom of the press by way of ordinance is not lawful; and lastly, that the ordinance was contrary to the Constitution. The vote of the House has had its effect. The King and his ministers have not made up their minds to break entirely with the Constitution or the people. A royal decree, adopted as usual upon the proposition of the Ministry, withdraws the ordinance. The Prussian press, therefore, enjoys again its former somewhat limited yet sufficient freedom, and will, let us hope, make a judicious use of it.

The Upper House has adopted an address to the King by a majority of 72 to 8 votes, after a debate, noticeable for some expressions of Herr Von Bismarck with reference to the Polish question. Count Beninski, a Polish nobleman, had protested against the paragraphs referring to the Polish insurrection, and had affirmed that its only object was to overthrow the Russian rule. Von Bismarck said: "Herr Beninski may really believe that; the Government must, however, hold to the facts. If the insurrection has not yet planted itself in our land, that is attributable much less to the good-will of the Poles, as the previous speaker suggested, than to the military power of the Government. If, however, the speaker were right—if our provinces are not to be drawn into the insurrection—still the Government would be compelled, from political, social, and moral interests, to interpose to prevent the insurrection in Poland from triumphing. An independent Poland on the frontier of Prussia would always be a danger for the monarchy, which would engage a large part of the army. The Government could not, moreover, suffer that a movement should succeed which soils itself with unheard-of crimes, and delights in the apotheosis of assassination."

There has also been a debate upon Poland in the Austrian Reichsrath, from which a similar conclusion as to the intentions of Austria may be drawn. In the debate upon the budget of the Police Ministry some of the Polish deputies made bitter complaints of the conduct of the authorities, and asserting the loyalty of Galicia, declared that such measures were quite unnecessary. The Minister, Van Schmerling, replied that he had proofs of the existence of a party which sought to separate Galicia from Austria, and this party the Government had taken measures to resist. The Minister of Police, in the course of the discussion, asserted that he had proofs of the existence of a secret committee, pretending to be a National Government, and of a military command at Cracow, which acted as a formal administrative body, divided the town into quarters, raised taxes, designated inhabitants of Cracow as suspicious persons. Cracow was crowded with foreigners, and experience had shown that out of every ten travellers eight had false papers.

The enormous preparations Russia has been making for war have seriously affected her financial position. There seems to be no doubt, however, that any sacrifices will be borne by the nation to avoid concessions to the demands of Europe.

Lisbon has been visited by a tremendous fire, originating in the Bank of Portugal.

The news from Japan is very unsatisfactory. A French officer had been murdered; and it was supposed that the English and French fleets would at once take summary vengeance—à la Kagosima, we suppose. Lord Clarence Paget has made a very lame apology for that barbarous act. He says that the town was destroyed because the bad weather would not allow accurate firing. The excuse might be accepted if there had not been two bombardments, and the admiral had not set himself deliberately to work to destroy on the morrow what had escaped on the previous day.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, November 10.

We have a Federal account of a Union success on the Rappahannock, the crossing of that river in force, and the retreat of Lee's forces to the Rapidan, with the impending prospect of a general battle. But the impression of Lee's invincibility is so strong even here, that the result, magnified as it is by the glorification despatches in the newspapers, does not beget much confidence in the success of Meade in getting "on to Richmond."

The interest of the war is centred in the contest going on in Tennessee for the possession of Chattanooga. There is a great game of strategy going on, which must end in the evacuation of Chattanooga by General Grant's forces from sheer inability to keep it and supply it; or their escape by another great battle, fought under disadvantageous circumstances, with the probability of another defeat, with more disastrous results than that of Chickamauga. The report which went out by the late steamer that the Federals had got possession of Lookout Mountain, and thus turned the Confederate position, is a canard.

There was a great jubilation in Philadelphia and in this city on Saturday evening, over the capture of Fort Sumter —"this time sure." It came by a steamer to Philadelphia, with the mention of the particular Pennsylvania regiment (the 147th, I believe) which had had the distinction of running up the "old flag" over the stronghold of rebellion, on the 2nd of November. That regiment would have had a hard time of it, for arrivals since bring accounts to the 5th, up to which day the Union monitors and batteries were pouring broadsides into the old ruin. A few brave men are still holding it against the heaviest and most continued bombardment—as the Yankees say—which the annals of warfare record. I do not know whether this is literally true or not; but there are certainly but few examples on record of more enduring and heroic resistance. President Davis has been to Charleston, and, if we may judge from the tone of his addresses, the enemy are but little advanced towards the capture of the city; and the proofs thicken upon us from within the Confederacy that it will not only be resolutely and hopefully defended, but that it will be totally destroyed rather than that it should fall into the hands of the Yankees.

The grand expedition into Texas, across Louisiana, halts, waiting for the results of a coast attack by a fleet of gun-boats and transports which has left New Orleans with a large land force evidently destined for Sabine Pass, with the joint purpose of passing the fort, and of assailing the small garrison on the land side—a miniature renewal of the affair of Vicksburg.

The removal of Rosecrans continues to be a mystery. The personal charges upon him for cowardice, drunkenness, and mal-administration, which were sent forth by the President's organs as the causes for superseding him, have ceased to be relied upon, although they are by no means withdrawn. He is now arraigned for persistent disobedience of orders from the War Department, continuing through months, and manifested in correspondence; but if not absolutely insubordinate towards the general-in-chief columns of specifications have appeared in the Administration journals, which must have been supplied from official sources. Some of them could only have been obtained from the files of the War Office. But instead of arresting him, or submitting his conduct to a court of inquiry, the same Government which thus assails him now gives out that it means to employ him again. The explanation of this pixture of bravado and pusillanimity is, that while the Government must defend itself from the gross mismanagement which he charges upon them, and would do so, if they could, by remorselessly destroying his reputation, they have discovered that he has a powerful support among the Roman Catholic population, who have begun to consider him a martyr to prejudice. The Government would gladly compromise now, if Rosecrans is willing, by condoning his past offences and giving him an important command somewhere. He has won some favour with them since his removal, by making war speeches of the most violent cast, endorsing every measure of emancipation, confiscation, and extermination, for the retaining of the Southern territory to the Union, at the cost of the destruction or expulsion of the inhabitants, and the overthrow of constitutional Government, if necessary to effect it.

Burnside has been superseded in East Tennessee by General Foster, formerly in command in North Carolina, more lately at Fortress Monroe. It is believed that Burnside's last days in Tennessee were signalled by the loss of a great battle. The particulars have not reached us; but there are some leakings out by telegraph at Washington, that two of his "advance posts" have been taken, and "parts of two regiments captured." In the usual way of interpreting Yankee bulletins, this should mean that he has suffered a heavy reverse, and the reasonable deduction is, that as much as possible is to be made out of the affairs in Virginia, to counterbalance in the public mind the effect of the East Tennessee defeat, when it comes to be known at large. The effects of such a victory for the Confederates in East Tennessee upon the operations against Grant would be necessarily very great, and news from that quarter is looked for with intense interest.

We have got through the fall elections—Maryland was the last and is the most significant. Like all the rest—New Jersey alone excepted—it has gone for the Radicals; but under circumstances which merit more particular mention, as illustrating the theory of the ballot, as practised in this Model Republic, Maryland is a "loyal State." There has been no secession there, no insurrection, no resistance to the greatest excesses of Federal authority, except by a local riot in the City of Baltimore, in April, 1861, which was immediately put down. The present legislature, the governor, and all the State officers and functionaries were elected as Unionists, and the courts are all open for the execution of State laws. But in Maryland, it was thought that there is a strong feeling of opposition to the favourite measures of the Administration; and there was a choice to be made of five members of Congress, whose votes might be important, in deciding the majority of the next House of Representatives, in favour of the whole Administration scheme of policy. Hence the elections were to be carried at all events, and the steps taken were effectual. General Schenck, the military commander of the district, from his headquarters at Baltimore, took the control of the election out of the hands of the civil authorities, and by proclamations and military orders drove the opponents of the Administration away from the polls, after having terrified candidates of that way of thinking from presenting themselves for election and arresting, by way of intimidation, several of those who were so contumacious as to persist against warning. Before the election, citizens who called public meetings to make the usual nominations for elections were seized by order of General Schenck, and only released on a pledge that they would cease to make any political opposition to the candidates of the Administration. The regulation of the voting, and new qualification for voters, on election day were prescribed by military orders; a test oath, unknown to the State laws, was directed to be imposed by the military; soldiers were stationed at the various precincts, with directions to arrest such voters as they might decide to be "disloyal"—disloyalty being defined by the previous military orders to consist in political opposition to the Administration. And the judges of elections were warned to give effect to these orders under penalty of imprisonment for being "disloyal" themselves. All this was in direct violation of the laws of the State, and was so flagrant in its tyrannical injustice, that it brought out strong remonstrances from Governor Bradford—himself one of the strongest and most unconditionally loyal men in the State, elected last year by the aid of the very military authorities which he now protests against as the invaders of State sovereignty. A long correspondence ensued between Governor Bradford and General Schenck, and Governor Bradford and President Lincoln, the result of which was an order from the President modifying a part of General Schenck's military regulations for the elections—a modification which Governor Bradford pronounced to be insufficient to retrieve the proceedings of their unconstitutional character, and which came too late, and was by General Schenck's management suppressed throughout the greater part of the State, so that the original policy was carried out in its full extent, and where it was not known had kept the Opposition from attempting to vote. The replication by the "loyal" Governor Bradford to the President describes the amended and approved ruling of General Schenck for the elections in the following terms, which, coming from a Union governor of a Union State, is a forcible description of the military means by which the freedom of elections in Maryland has been subverted by the Administration:—

"If the sending out of one or more regiments of soldiers; distributing them among several of the counties to attend their places of election, in defiance of the known laws of the State prohibiting their presence; ordering military officers and provost-marshal to arrest voters guilty, in the opinion of such officers, of certain offences; and menacing judges of election with the power of the military arm in case this military order was not respected, is not an 'undue interference' with the freedom of elections, I confess myself unable to imagine what is."

The Administration succeeds, therefore, by a large comparative majority in everything, although the number of voters is, of course, very small. In Baltimore the successful ticket did not get one-third of the ordinary vote, and so throughout the State. The members of Congress appointed in this way, not elected, constitute, with those appointed in the same way in Kentucky, the whole of the majority which the Administration expects in the next House of Representatives. The legislative power of Congress pending in the branch intended to represent the popular element, and which has exclusive control over the money bills, is thus secured to the party of the Administration by the direct application of its military power, in setting aside State laws and State authority, and appointing its own partisans as representatives of intimidated States. The audacity with which this is done and the subservience with which it is accepted by the public as a merely exceptional but necessary act for the self-preservation of the men in power, are sad proofs of the rapid degeneracy into a pure and naked despotism which this republic, as it calls itself, is undergoing.

A provost-marshal in Maryland appointed to carry out this military programme for making members of Congress, was himself a candidate for Congress in one of the districts, and General Schenck, the military commandant, by whom it was executed, is, besides being a major-general, a member of Congress from the Ohio district in which Mr. Vallandigham resides.

The same reckless audacity of reliance upon mere power breaks out in the threat contained in the following paragraph, which comes over the wires this morning, in one of the authorised despatches of the newspaper press, which usually bear the imprimatur of the Department at Washington. There have been some extensive riotings in the Pennsylvania coal regions, and their effect upon the price of coal is a topic of uneasy discussion at the commencement of winter. The manner in which the Government proposes to deal with this grave question of supply, or in which it is supposed by its partisans that it will interfere, is set forth in the following terms:—

"It is suspected that certain coal-dealers unfavourable to the Administration will avail themselves of the outbreak in the coal regions of Pennsylvania as a pretence to advance the price of coal. In such an event prompt action will be taken by the Government, who will justify their seizure of these speculators by the consideration that the Government itself, as a large purchaser of coal, will not hesitate to imprison a few coal-dealers to prevent a panic in prices."

In plain terms, the Government will fix a price for coal, and imprison a "few coal-dealers" in order to enforce the observance of the maximum. It is hinted that as Government wants coal it will take what it wants at its own price, and put the owners into prison who may refuse to give up their property on these terms. There is an old saying, that one man may lead a horse to water but twenty can't make him drink. A regiment of soldiers may take what coal there is in a coal-yard, but how even an army is going to get cheaper coal and a sufficient supply by drafting away most of the labourers who dig it out, inflating the currency, so that capitalists cannot pay enhanced wages to fewer men, and must dig with a prospect of certain loss, or by expelling capital from production by these measures of personal persecution, are feats harder to be performed than that in the proverb. But these loose ideas are about, and there is no doubt that members high in the Government entertain them. They are not a whit more absurd than the favourite plea of Secretary Chase for the issue of irredeemable Government paper—that it saved the Government the interest on a loan; when it is capable of demonstration that enhanced prices, which Government has been compelled to pay on all its purchases of army supplies, by paying in depreciated paper, have added 200,000,000 a year for two years to the capital of the debt, to be hereafter paid in gold.

The "strike" movement for higher wages is extending to all classes of mechanics. The last is the strike of the machinists of this city and vicinity, which includes the labourers in the iron-works, where so much Government work is done and contracted for. The proprietors say their contracts are made with Government at prices corresponding to the sounder condition of the currency, and they cannot give higher wages without ruin—Government must raise the consideration of the contract to the paper standard, or the works must be abandoned. Thus the inflation of the currency comes back again upon its authors.

The Russian ball being over, the excitement has suddenly subsided, and some of the presses are busy in labouring to explain that all this really meant nothing which should be taken as apologising for the Russian Government as a despotism or defending its treatment of the Poles. The distinction is drawn very ingeniously, thus: "As Republicans and Philanthropists, it is the duty of Americans to hate the Russians; but as Patriots and Americans it is their duty to love those who approve of the doing by the Government of this country of the same things towards the Southern States which are detestable in the conduct of our good ally towards the Poles." With the like subtle discrimination, Mr. Seward is approved for having sent a toast to the Russian dinner, in which he complimented Prince Gortschakoff for his successful management of the Russian administration. It was not that it had succeeded in baffling the efforts of England and France to mitigate in some way the horrible injustice and cruel persecutions to which unhappy Poland is a victim, but simply that by so succeeding Prince Gortschakoff achieved a triumph over the two Powers against whom the United States have a feeling of resentment. These are fine distinctions, and will doubtless be appreciated abroad, as well as the other subtleties with which Mr. Seward has so copiously garnished his diplomatic communications with Europe.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

NEW ORLEANS, October 31.

We are wondering now as to the destination of a new expedition which left this city last week and went down the Mississippi. Not less than eight or ten Federal transports crowded with troops and negroes make up the expedition—giving a force of 7,000 or 8,000 men. It is presumed that they are going to Sabine Pass, the scene of a disastrous Federal repulse September 8th. If this is so, as there are no gunboats with the transports, no doubt the troops are to be landed outside the Pass to march by land for an assault upon the battery at that point. According to the Confederate official report of the Sabine Pass affair, there were actually but forty-two men (of the Davis Guards) behind the battery when the gunboat attack was made. Their success in destroying one gunboat, capturing another, killing and wounding forty-eight of the enemy, and taking fourteen five rifled pieces from the gunboats, makes this brief engagement altogether the most remarkable of the war. The captured guns have been mounted in the battery, and there has been abundant time to concentrate a large force from Houston to meet the new anticipated attack; and they are now, no doubt, ready for the expedition which is believed to have departed for that point.

The New York papers of the 21st inst. copy from the Port Royal South a statement that a Federal force has landed at Point Isabel, Texas. We are without this information here, and we do not believe it.

Meanwhile, the Federal army, which was to march so speedily through Western Louisiana to Texas, is still idle at Opelousas. Some of the regiments are reported to have returned to Berwick Bay, for the purpose of joining the new movement along the coast. You have already been advised that Banks must secure Sabine Pass or Galveston as a base, before he can successfully invade Texas from the East.

There is little news to send by this steamer. We have Mobile dates to October 25th, and the Southern papers publish the official correspondence relative to the dismissal of the British Consuls. Affairs at Mobile are unchanged.

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, November 24.

THERE is a good deal of talk in this city, which is seldom silent; but there are no facts, or even talk, of any importance to register this week. The Congress, of course, furnishes no small part of conversation, and the generally accredited rumour, that Lord Cowley has been charged to make serious objections to its assembling, has afforded some of the papers the welcome opportunity of venting a little abuse upon England. As this is the favourite way of letting off the steam whenever French policy is threatened with a little check, such symptoms of ill-temper simply prove that things go less smoothly than might be desired. The consensus of the English press is the proof of that universal conspiracy against French interest—into which it is well known that all Englishmen, of all parties, have entered. But though it is acknowledged that the conspiracy is a tacit one, it cannot be pretended that it is taciturn, and the outspoken avowal that such a Congress could be of no advantage to England, and is not, therefore, to be encouraged by her, is received here as an aggravating circumstance, the shameless confession of a cynical selfishness. It is very shocking to French feelings to learn that the English Government, even a Whig one, thinks itself bound to consider in the first place the interests of England; but the slight knowledge I have been able to acquire of the French character after a twenty years' acquaintance, and under various régimes, makes me doubt whether they would long support a Government which, in the name of philanthropy or any other unprofitable "idea," spent their blood and augmented their taxation. I do not see that the laudable and too necessary duty of paying taxes is more willingly performed here than elsewhere. But they are well aware that this is the Englishman's pride and delight; that he points with exultation to the enormous sums so easily collected in his country; and they think that these might well be increased in favour of the principle of nationalities and to correct the map of Europe. Not contented with refusing the small sacrifices thus demanded for the tranquillity of the Continent, I regret to add that England has just been detected in a still more disgraceful act, one bearing the character of the deepest duplicity. She it was who urged upon the Government and people of France the propriety of taking certain diplomatic steps in favour of Poland, with the sole intention of destroying the secret alliance which she was well aware existed between France and Russia, and which the Emperor's speech acknowledges.

The Danish complication, which threatens to turn the Federal Execution into a war, being the last question of European politics, of course fills a large space in all the papers. The questions between Germany and Denmark, which were in the late King's time so singularly complicated that it was hopeless to attempt making them intelligible, are much simplified by his death—so far, at least, as the matter of right goes. The original union of those countries resulted from the election of the then King of Denmark and his heirs male as Dukes of Holstein and Sleswig. Females have since then been declared apt to succeed to the Danish Crown, but this extension of the original limitation has never been sanctioned by the Duchies. The claim of the present King of Denmark to take Sleswig and Holstein as concomitant parts of the Danish succession is exactly the same which the present Queen of England might have made upon Hanover, with the difference that England was glad to be rid of Hanover, and Denmark is quite determined to keep the Duchies. It is true that the great Powers, in a little Congress about eleven years ago, arranged among themselves to sanction the change of succession, not to revert in Denmark to the old law, but to annex the Duchies as an integral part of the Danish dominions, to the exclusion of the rightful heir to them, the Duke of Augustenburg. It is said, in justification of this, that he took a part against the then reigning sovereign in the troubles instigated by the German Governments in 1849, and this may probably be sufficiently proved. But he was not tried for his treason, and the exclusion from the rights of succession was not pronounced by any court of justice, or by the king himself, as high justiciary. Now, it is an old maxim of law, that till judgment has been pronounced by the competent authority its effects are not in force. The Duke of Augustenburg is undoubtedly the next heir to Holstein, but he has abdicated in favour of his son. His son, however, is as little apt to succeed in German royal law as the Elector of Hesse's children, his mother not having been of royal blood. The only thing, therefore, which seems evident is, that Christian IX. has no other claim to these Duchies than the diplomatic convention of 1852; and it is difficult to see how this could create a right in the absence of the consent of all the agnates. The act being so evidently questionable, it is not at all impossible that a European war may follow to legitimatise it.

The communication made by the French Minister at Washington, as stated in the last telegrams, is thought here to bring strong confirmation of the interpretation I gave of M. Drouyn's concluding despatch to M. Mercier, published in the Yellow Book. Monday's Moniteur had a letter from New York, pointing in strong terms to the useless waste of human life in battles which lead to nothing but its sacrifice, and reflecting on the want of generalship on both sides which renders them thus indecisive. Its tone is so similar to that of a leader in the Times of the same day, that the one would have seemed to have been suggested by the other, if their simultaneous publication had not rendered this impossible. I have before this called your attention to the excellence of the military correspondence from America contained in the Moniteur. The writer agrees with others in regarding the movement now made upon Chattanooga as likely to be the most decisive of the war, but he points out what he considers a fault in the execution of the plan—the numerous detachments sent into East and West Tennessee, from a wish to clear that country of the enemy, instead of waiting to do so after his principal force had been crushed.

The verification of the elections still occupies the Chamber of Deputies, remarkable only for the appearance of a new oratorical talent, M. Thullier, whose brilliant display as commissary of the Government has obtained him the honour of an autograph letter from the Emperor, to be followed no doubt, by the highest dignities in his gift. From Compiegne there is only news of hunting parties and theatricals.

The Prince de Latour d'Auvergne had his audience of leave yesterday, and will probably be in London as soon as this letter. His task will be more easy than it seemed likely to be, as the adhesion of England to the project of a Congress has just been received. Russia and Austria alone now hang back, but the latter will probably quickly follow the example of England. Its hesitations and evident resolve to do nothing in this matter, unless with English concurrence, are said to have given great offence here. A very clever pamphlet by M. Felix Anceigne, L'Alliance Russo-Américaine, has just been published. To those of your readers who are curious in noting the political inconsistency of the United States, it will prove interesting. I need not say that its author, well-known by his advocacy of the Confederation in the Patrie, treats the Northern leaders with great severity. He has chosen a point of view from which French politicians are more likely to understand the American quarrel than any other.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

"PROUD PRESTON" is hastening to the front to do battle in the Confederate cause. A public requisition, influentially and numerously signed by representatives of all classes, has just been presented to the Mayor, and in compliance with the terms thereof, his worship has consented to call an open meeting of the inhabitants of the town, to express their opinion in favour of peace, upon the basis of the recognition of the South. The meeting will be convened at an early date, and there is no doubt whatever that the resolutions arrived at will be tantamount to another practical refutation of Earl Russell's recent mis-statement, if, indeed, they do not go further by giving the signal for a general and indignant condemnation, in the manufacturing districts, of his lordship's policy in regard to the American war.

In its admiration of pluck on the part of the Confederacy, and in demanding fair play on the part of our own country, Preston is another Oldham. But there is a third point upon which, if I am rightly informed, even greater stress will be laid at the forthcoming demonstration, viz., the duty of stopping the recruitment of the Federal armies by the fighting population drained from a portion of the United Kingdom. If Earl Russell, they say, must needs busy himself with his active non-intervention (!), why not expend some of his zeal for "neutrality" in laying an embargo not only upon the steam rams in the Mersey, but upon the exodus from Ireland? It is chiefly upon this latter point that his Lordship will shortly be favoured with the opinion of the people of Preston. Beyond a question, the Irish emigrant is the real arm of Federal strength; and it is equally removed from doubt that it is the duty of our Foreign Minister, if not as a matter of fair play to the Confederacy, at least as a matter of statesmanship and justice to ourselves, that the Federals should cease to derive "aid and comfort" by a gross and, to us, most expensive evasion of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The only requisite (as is ably argued in a pamphlet largely circulated in Preston) for the Washington Cabinet to carry on its project of bloody war ad libitum is the supply of men sufficiently poor to be induced to go forth to fight. The comfortable but hardy farmers have long since ceased to feel such an interest in the war as to go forth themselves to fight. The shoddy traders of New York will most certainly not go. The well-paid mechanics and artisans have something better to do. The Federal Government must therefore seek for its fighting men in foreign lands. But just as it is for their advantage—argues the author of the pamphlet—to drain other countries of the raw material of armies, so it is for the disadvantage of those other countries to be so drained. These last are made by this process militarily, and consequently politically, weak. The first duty, therefore, of Earl Russell should be to watch that no foreign state thus sucks our national life-blood. But what do we find? That it is Great Britain which is virtually giving the gold-thirsty men of New York—callous as they are to the horrors of a monthly and weekly slaughter with the continual drain of life-blood, so long as they can suck gold out of the blood of perishing myriads—it is she who is virtually giving to these men the very means of carrying on this cruel slaughter for their ignoble purpose. With Earl Russell's sanction, we are supplying both the powder and the "food for powder." It is our fellow-countrymen who are first impoverished for the convenience of America, and made fit for emigration—fit for the American recruiting-sergeant's purpose; it is our fellow-countrymen who then perish, that New York merchants may make fortunes in greenbacks; and, to sum up all, it is the raw material of our own military strength which is thus being drained from us, to aid an aggressive Power in its attempt to exterminate a people from whom no Englishman can withhold his sympathy, and whom it may yet be our primest interest to have earlier conciliated as an ally.

While such are the opinions of the people of Preston as to the Irish emigration, which our Foreign Minister makes no effort to stop, let us see what the same people think as to the iron-clads in the Mersey, which his lordship has stopped with a vengeance. The following memorial will best show the state of public feeling upon that subject:—

"To the Right Hon. Earl Russell, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

"The Memorial of the undersigned humbly sheweth,—

"That your memorialists are the representatives of a society composed of persons of various political opinions and religious beliefs, who have united themselves together for the purpose of showing sympathy for, and giving moral support to, the people of the Southern States of America, now engaged, as you yourself have acknowledged—in fighting for Independence.

"That your memorialists have learnt with considerable regret that the Government of which your Lordship is a member persist in detaining two vessels recently built in the Mersey, and to which your Lordship's attention has been directed by the Union and Emancipation Society. Your memorialists are of opinion that inasmuch as there is no proof, but only a suspicion, of the destination of those vessels, and as the law declares there must be at all times a thorough sober persuasion and satisfaction with respect of the guilt of the party accused, it would be a departure from the principles of the English Constitution if the vessels in question were to be detained. Your memorialists believe that, by detaining those vessels, the wicked wishes of those who are fighting to subjugate and exterminate the brave people of the South would be as much complied with as if the vessels were to be delivered up to them. And your memorialists would press upon your Lordship's attention that, in the case of the Alexandra, the Lord Chief Baron said:—'I have no hesitation in saying that, according to all the decisions, a shipbuilder has as much right to build a ship and sell it to either of the belligerent parties, as the maker of gunpowder, or of muskets, or any other warlike implements, has to sell any of those articles to the same parties; it is, in fact, laid down in Kent's Commentaries on American Law that it is the right of neutral subjects to supply both belligerents with arms and all munitions of war.' Again, he said:—'When two belligerents are carrying on war, a neutral Power may supply, without any breach of international law, and without a breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act, munitions of war—gunpowder, every description of arms, everything, in fact, that can be used for the destruction of human beings. Why should ships be an exception? I am of opinion, in point of law, they are not.' And again, he said to the jury:—'If you think the object really was to build a ship in obedience to an order in compliance with a contract, leaving to those who bought it to make what use they thought fit of it, then it appears to me the Foreign Enlistment Act has not been broken.'

"Your memorialists would further remark that the detention of the vessels is a dangerous interference with English trade. Our country is one of the great markets of the world, where every customer may be fully and fairly supplied. The pre-eminence of our shipbuilders is acknowledged by the foreign countries that purchases our ships. But if, to gratify public or private spite, a body of persons can succeed in inducing the Government of this country to detain any vessels on the ground that certain parties choose to suspect them, an important branch of our trade will be injured. Already have our merchants suffered great losses by reason of the interference of Mr. Lincoln's Government with ships trading between neutral ports, and it therefore seems to your memorialists particularly important that no steps should be taken by her Majesty's Government, which, by preventing English shipbuilders from supplying their customers, would increase the evils whereof so many persons complain.

"Your memorialists beg your Lordship to understand that though their sympathies are with the people of the Southern States, they are anxious for a strict neutrality on the part of the English Government. That strict neutrality, they believe, would be violated by the detention of vessels supposed to be intended for the Confederate Government. Your memorialists understand by a 'neutrality' the treating both the belligerents exactly alike; and inasmuch as the Federals buy in this country whatever is necessary to them for the prosecution of their war of EMPIRE, your memorialists plead that the Confederates may, on principles of equity, purchase in this country whatever is necessary to them for the prosecution of their war of INDEPENDENCE. Your memorialists entertain no doubt of the ultimate success of the patriotic Confederates, provided that they are allowed fair play, and that this country does not, by withholding supplies from them, and furnishing supplies to the Federals, help the arms of their enemies. Your memorialists ask your Lordship, therefore, to use your influence that both the belligerents may be treated with equal fairness in the purchases they seek to make in England.

"And your memorialists will ever pray, &c.

"Signed on behalf of the people of Preston by THOMAS GOODAIR, Chairman,
JOHN WORTHINGTON, Treasurer,
JOSEPH DAWSON, Secretary."

The difficulties of the Union and Emancipation Society are thickening apace. It will now be the duty of that body, in its next communication to the Foreign Minister, to explain away the significance of the following incident:—on Monday morning a procession of distressed operatives was marshalled on the way to the Town-hall, to ask an interview with his worship the Mayor on the subject of certain grievances they complain of at the hands of the Manchester Board of Guardians. The procession, which consisted of 200 or 300 people, was preceded by a carriage-van, the occupants of which bore aloft a large placard inscribed as follows:—

"MOTTO OF FREEDOM: A fair day's work and a fair day's wage—and no Bastille to keep our wives and children from starvation."

The processionists crowded the front of the hall, while the van, with its attractive banner, moved up and down King-street, apparently much to the surprise of the Earl of Derby, Sir James Kay Shuttleworth, Lord Edward Howard, Colonel Wilson Patten, and other gentlemen, who happened to drive up to the building at the time to attend the usual weekly meeting of the Central Executive Committee. His lordship granted the desired interview, and one of the spokesmen at once entered into a list of grievances, the chief being in regard to the hours of labour. The Mayor said he could not interfere with the guardians, or any of their arrangements. The deputation said they had been informed that the corporation had applied to the Poor-law Board for money to be expended in public works; that the money had been offered to the corporation, but that the corporation had refused it. The Mayor said this was not true. The money had been granted, but, owing to certain forms not being filled up, it was not yet to hand. When it was received it would have to be carefully expended, and in such works as the Act of Parliament provided, namely, the paving of streets, the sewerage of districts, and other works of sanitary improvement. Most likely the operatives who were employed under the Public Works Act would be paid by piece-work, and it was not improbable that the money would be expended through the boards of guardians, who would make the work a species of labour test. The money would not be indiscriminately distributed, but would be given in return for work done.

A meeting of operatives was subsequently held in Stevenson-square, when the leader of the deputation reported the result of the interview. Some violent speeches followed, and a threat was thrown out that as the operatives had been met by the guardians "with brutal severity and base cruelty," they were now resolved to "demand what they wanted, and to take the case, to a certain extent, into their own hands." Another speaker said that the Mayor was linked in with tyrants and that the link must be broken asunder; and if the grievances were not redressed between that day and next Monday, they would again march with their banners through the streets of Manchester.

The meeting terminated with groans for the Board of Guardians and the detective police.

Mr. Cobden addressed his constituents at Rochdale yesterday evening, Mr. Bright being also present. A large portion of the speeches of both honourable gentlemen was devoted to American affairs. Mr. Cobden said he never believed—and now he believed less than ever—that he should ever live, or that anyone present would live, to see two separate nations within the confines of "the present United States of America." Referring, however, to the drain upon Northern resources in fighting men and money, Mr. Cobden added: "The North are mistaken if they think they can carry on a civil war like this, drawing a million of men from productive industry to be engaged in the processes of destruction,—to spend two or three hundred millions sterling—they are deluded if they think they can carry on a war like that without a terrible collapse sooner or later and a dreadful prostration in every part of the community." Such a confession from Mr. Cobden, which it must be owned was not reassuring, appeared to jar upon the more intensely American susceptibilities of Mr. Bright. The last-named orator lost no time in suggesting, by way of correction, that—thanks to Ireland—the North would have an inexhaustible supply of men. "Don't send us one more man," exclaimed Mr. Beecher, in jocular irony, the other day. "Send every Irishman that will go," exclaims Mr. Bright; not indeed, to recruit the Northern armies, for that would be an infringement of the Foreign Enlistment Act, but simply to leave off bog-trotting, and to take to land-holding in the fertile West. Mr. Bright did not exactly advocate this mode of fighting the battle of the North, but he suggested that it might be found successful if it were tried; and to do him justice he certainly did not deplore the prospect of thus weakening the military strength of his own country. These were his words upon this curious subject: "I am not certain that if the United States of America were to send transport ships to Ireland and offer to carry every Irishman, free of cost, to the United States, and to send them to the lands of the West (!) I am not certain there would be men enough left in Ireland at the end of one year to cultivate one-half of its land."

THE LINCOLN POLICY.—A private letter, dated Washington, November 7, from a thoroughly well-informed source, contains the following:—"There will be no 'vigorous prosecution of the war' this winter. The Administration means to let the war drag, and to use the soldiers for political purposes—that is, by controlling local elections, and by keeping the army comparatively idle, so as to postpone anything that might be decisive on one side or the other till Lincoln secures a re-nomination. The Abolitionists will force the conviction upon the Northern mind that the war is in their hands, and that they alone can bring it to a successful close. The only hope is, that there will be a conflict between Lincoln and Chase for the nomination—Lincoln holding the sword and Chase the (paper) purse. Nor will Congress talk much this winter about the war or the negro. The first thing is, to decide whether the Southern States are States or Territories; and the next thing is, to decide (as will be attempted) that there are no 'State Rights,' North or South. We look for a spiny session. If Sumner should carry through his Bill that the Southern States are not States in the Union, you see at once that the North and South are in unison on that point, for the South says the same thing. If he fails to carry his Bill (as he will) and the Southern States are declared to be still States in the Union—only in rebellion—they are entitled to all their rights; that is, the Emancipation and Confiscation Acts are, and must be, acknowledged to be illegal, and are of course void. Either horn of the dilemma is an unpleasant one for the North to admit, and the discussion of these matters paves the way for peace and for the recognition, sooner or later, of the South by the North. The Lincoln party considers the restoration of the Union a matter of small consequence in comparison with the continuance of its reign, even if its rule extends only over the North. To hold the North, they are willing to 'let the Union slide' and to let the South go. See if it is not so before Lincoln's term ends. This steamer will not carry anything abroad that is startling. The situation in Virginia, Tennessee, and before Charleston is simply unchanged, and winter will prevent active operations. Political matters will be all in all."

ANTHROPOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON.—The Society will meet on Tuesday, 1st December, at eight o'clock precisely, when the following paper, having been read at the previous meeting, on "The Negro; his Place in Nature," by Dr. James Hunt, F.S.A., Pres. A.S.L., the discussion, which was then adjourned, will be continued.

LETTER OF HON. ROBERT J. WALKER TO THE DEMOCRATIC COMMITTEE, PITTSBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.

NEW YORK, September 30, 1856.

"You ask me, if I cannot attend your meeting in person, to communicate for publication my views on the pending presidential election."

"We are approaching the close of a momentous struggle. On the one side is arrayed the Democratic party. It exists in every State, and over its united columns floats the flag of the Constitution and of the Union. On the other side is found a sectional and geographical party, composed exclusively of the States of the North. The Father of his Country clearly foresaw the danger of such a party, and warned us against its fatal tendency, in his affectionate Farewell Address. . . .

"For the first time in our history, such a geographical party is now formed. It is composed exclusively of the States of the North, and is arrayed in violent hostility against the Southern section of the Confederacy. It draws a line, clear and distinct, between the North and the South, and wars upon the people and institutions of the latter. It declares the institutions of the South so degraded and infamous that Congress must exclude them from all that vast territory acquired by common blood and treasure, and which is the joint inheritance of all the States of the Union. Louisiana (including Kansas and Nebraska) was acquired by Jefferson and saved by Jackson. But the South are no longer held worthy to inherit any portion of that territory, acquired by the illustrious patriot of Virginia, and saved by the immortal hero of Tennessee."

"So, too, with all the vast region acquired in the war with Mexico. Two gallant sons of Virginia, Scott and Taylor, were the leaders of those brilliant campaigns. The blood of the South was poured out in copious libations, and mingled freely with the blood of the North, upon the many and well-fought fields of Mexico. Beside the gallant sons of the North, a heroic regiment of South Carolina was swept by the deadly fire of the Mexican forces. Leader after leader, column after column of that regiment, fell mortally wounded; yet the survivors never wavered, and their arms were crowned with victory. Yet no son of Carolina, or of all the South, is held worthy to possess any, the smallest portion, of all that territory acquired from Mexico."

"It is conceded that under the Constitution of the United States slaves are property, and whether they may or may not be held as such in the Territories is the great disputed question of constitutional law. It involves rights of property, and as such is peculiarly a judicial question. But the Supreme Court of the Union is to be superseded by the popular suffrage of the North, and these rights of property are thus to be decided. Such a doctrine is not only sectional, aggressive, and belligerent, but agrarian and revolutionary. It is an overthrow of the Constitution, of all its guarantees, and of every Conservative principle on which it is founded. Such a government would not be a constitutional republic, but an elective despotism. But it is said the North are the majority, and such is their will. Sic volo, sic jubeo, stat pro ratio voluntas. But the votes and will of the French people made Napoleon the Great first their Consul and then their Emperor, and the votes and will of the French people made Napoleon III. first their President and then clothed him with the imperial purple; such was the will of the people; but with us the Constitution is the supreme law, and so declared in that instrument, as framed and ratified by the people of each State."

"The truth is, the Black Republican platform is revolutionary and agrarian; it involves principles which must strike down the tenure of all property in every State as well as in every Territory of the Union. It discards the peaceful arbitration of the Supreme Court of the United States—the great conservative feature of our institutions. It overthrows the Constitution and all its guarantees, and substitutes in their place an elective despotism, by which a majority of the people may abolish, divide, or confiscate all property at each successive election."

"Will this controversy be more wisely decided by the people of the North, a single geographical section, inflamed by sectional passion and prejudice, impelled by newspaper editors, and husting orators, and political priests, with or without knowledge, with or without patriotism, with or without sincere religion, with or without fanaticism, with or without mature investigation, with or without selfish aspirations? Day by day, from the press, the hustings, the bookstore, the pulpit, the lecture-room, the school-house, the theatre, the library, the author's closet, the painter's brush, and the power of song, the North now is, and long has been, trained and educated to hate the South, to despise their institutions, to trample upon their rights, to lacerate their feelings, to calumniate their character, to forget all their noble deeds in war and in peace, and all their generous qualities and high intellectual endowments, and to dwell only upon their faults, which are the lot of our common humanity."

"But this so-called Republican platform is not only revolutionary and agrarian, but by forming a sectional and geographical party, arraying the North against the South and assailing the bulwarks of the Constitution, it exposes the Union to imminent peril. It is the Constitution that makes the Union, and the subversion of the Constitution is the overthrow of the Union. It is revolution, because it changes, in fact, our form of Government. The parchment upon which the Constitution is written may still remain, the empty forms may still be administered, but even these will soon follow, until not a fragment remains of the Government formed by the patriots and sages of the Revolution. If there are those who believe that the Union can long be preserved when the Constitution shall have been subverted, and the supreme judicial tribunal of the Union expunged or obliterated, their delusive hopes, their dreams of domination and power, will soon vanish. We have now not only a sectional and geographical party, based upon a sectional issue and realising all the fears of the illustrious Washington, but we have a party advocating doctrines agrarian and revolutionary, subjecting all property to division or confiscation, and expunging the supreme judicial tribunal. I indulge in no menaces against the Union; I make no predictions on a subject of such fearful import. But this I can say, that the South will not and ought not to submit to degradation; they will not be despoiled by the North of all rights in the common Territory; they will not surrender their constitutional guarantees; they love the Union, but it is the Union of the Constitution, the Union of equals with equals, and not of sovereign States of the North with subject States—say rather, conquered provinces—of the South. Rather than submit to this, they will adopt the last alternative, separation, and will then exclaim—

'Thy spirit, INDEPENDENCE, let me share,
Lord of the lion heart and eagle eye!
Thy steps I'll follow with my bosom bare,
Though rolling clouds should lower along the sky.'

"If my voice could reach even the Black 'Republican' party, I would say, Re-assemble your convention, re-nominate your candidates if you please, elect them if you can, take all the spoils, but tear down your disunion African platform, ere you endorse it at the polls, and give the country some other platform which will not imperil the Union."

"No, my countrymen! If, in the madness of sectional passions and geographical prejudice, you overthrow the Constitution framed by Washington and the sages of the Revolution, you can never provide adequate substitutes. Those who have achieved our country's ruin can never regather the scattered fragments of the Constitution and rebuild the sacred edifice. No! it will be war, civil war; of all others the most sanguine and ferocious. The line which separates the North from the South will be known in all history as the line of blood. It will be marked on either side by frowning fortresses, by opposing batteries, by gleaming sabres, by bristling bayonets, by the tramp of contending armies, by towns and cities sacked and pillaged, by dwellings given to the flames, and fields laid waste and desolate. No mortal hand can lift the veil which conceals the unspeakable disasters of such a conflict. No prophet vision can penetrate the dark abyss of such a catastrophe. It will be a second Fall of mankind, and while we shall be performing here the bloody drama of a nation's suicide, from the thrones of Europe will arise the exulting shouts of despots, and upon their gloomy banners shall be inscribed, as they believed never to be effaced, their motto—

'Man is incapable of self-government.'

"Nor let it be supposed by the North that superior numbers will give them the victory over the South, or exempt them from the calamities of such a conflict. The financial and industrial ruin of the North would be great and overwhelming."

"But crimes, tumults, taxes, misery, deaths, government, State, city and county debts, at enormous rates of interest, would all increase, while liberty itself would expire in the conflict; and the bayonet, as in Europe, take the place of the ballot-box. The goals and poorhouses would be multiplied; sieges and battles prevail, and thousands perish in fraternal strife."

"The taxes to support those who could not support themselves and to maintain large and costly armies in the field, would be incalculable."

"Look at Europe. Her armies, now numbering nearly 4,000,000 men (greater than our whole voting population), trample down the rights and interests of the people and consume their substance, while European government debts have nearly reached ten thousand millions of dollars. But, at least, they have suppressed the guillotine, and possess what they call 'law and order.' But would we have even these, until military usurpation had closed the drama of blood and violence, and written the last sad epitaph of human liberty and self-government?"

"But now the Union between the North and the South, so far as the votes for the sectional candidates of the so-called 'Republican' party are concerned, is already dissolved. For no man anticipates a solitary electoral vote for those candidates in any State of the South; but this controversy is to be settled exclusively in favour of the North, and by the exclusive vote of the North, and the rights, interests and wishes of the South are to be wholly disregarded."

"The flag of the North 'American' party, as they call themselves, is trailing in the dust, and is replaced by the black 'Republican' standard. Your leaders have surrendered the American flag, and taken in exchange the African banner."

"In my inmost soul I believe that James Buchanan is the only man on whom, in sufficient force, the friends of the Union can unite to save the country."

"Come Democrats, come Whigs, come friends of the Union of every party; come to the rescue of that Union which James Buchanan loves so well, and to preserve which the patriot statesman of Pennsylvania has given a long life of devoted service."

"Respectfully, your fellow-citizen,

(Signed) R. J. WALKER."

DR. HUNT ON THE NEGRO'S PLACE IN NATURE.

At a crowded meeting of the Anthropological Society, held on the 17th inst., the following paper was read by Dr. James Hunt, the President:—

I propose in this communication to discuss the physical and mental characters of the Negro, with a view of determining not only his position in animated nature, but also the station he should occupy in the genus Homo. I shall necessarily have to go over a wide field, and cannot hope to treat the subject in an exhaustive manner. I shall be amply satisfied if I succeed in directing the attention of my scientific friends to a study of this most important and hitherto nearly neglected branch of study in the great science of Anthropology.

It is not a little remarkable that the subject I propose to bring before you this evening is one which has never been discussed before a scientific audience in this Metropolis. In France, in America, and in Germany, the physical and mental characters of the Negro have been frequently discussed, and England alone has neglected to pay that attention to the question which its importance demands. I shall, therefore, not apologise to you for bringing this subject in its entirety under your consideration, although I should have preferred discussing each point in detail. I hope, however, this evening to lay before you facts and opinions that will make a good foundation for future inquiry and discussion. Although I shall dwell chiefly on the physical, mental, and moral characters of the Negro, I shall, at the same time, not hesitate to make such practical deductions which appear to be warranted from the facts we now have at hand, and trust that a fair and open discussion of this subject may eventually be the means of removing much of the misconception which appears to prevail on this subject both in the minds of the public, and too frequently in the minds of scientific men. While, however, I shall honestly and without reservation state the conclusions to which I have arrived, I shall at the same time listen with deep attention and respect to those who differ from me, and who support their opinions by facts, by the observation of some travellers, and by their own observation. Heretofore, however, it has happened that much human passion has been introduced, not only into public discussions, but especially into the literature of this subject. Even such a generally fair and philosophic writer as Professor Waitz has accused men of science of promulgating scientific views which are practically in favour of the so-called "slavery" of the Confederate States of America. Many other scientific men could be named who have equally been guilty of imputing such unfair and uncharitable motives. While, on the other hand, scientific men who are thus accused retort by calling their opponents all sorts of epithets. One writer, for instance, exclaims: "How I loathe that hypocrisy which claims the same mental, moral, and physical equality for the Negro which the whites possess!"* No good can come of discussion conducted in such a spirit. If we wish to discover what is the truth, we must give each other credit for scientific honesty, and not impute base or interested motives.

In the first place, I would explain that I understand by the Negro, the dark, woolly-headed African found in the neighbourhood of the Gambia, Senegal, and Kongo rivers. Africa contains, like every other continent, a large number of different races; and these, having become very much mixed, may be estimated as a whole at about 150 millions, occupying a territory of between 13 and 14 millions of square miles. I shall not enter into any disquisition as to the great diversity of physical conformation that is found in different races, but shall simply say that my remarks will be confined to the typical woolly-headed Negro. Not only is there a large amount of mixed blood in Africa, but there are also apparently races of very different physical characters, and in as far as they approach the typical Negro so far will my remarks apply to them. But I shall exclude entirely from consideration all those who have European, Asiatic, Moorish or Berber blood in their veins.

THE NEGRO.

My object is to attempt to determine the position which one well-defined race occupies in the genus Homo, and the relation or analogy which the Negro race bears to animated nature generally. We have heard discussions recently respecting Man's place in nature: but it seems to me that we err in grouping all the different races of Man under one generic name, and then comparing them with the Anthropoid Apes. If we wish to make any advance in discussing such a subject, we must not speak of man generally, but must select one race or species, and draw our comparison in this manner. I shall adopt this plan in comparing the Negro with the European, as represented by the German, Frenchman, or Englishman. Our object is, not to support some foregone conclusion, but to endeavour to ascertain what is the truth by a careful and conscientious examination and discussion of the facts before us. In any conclusion I may draw respecting the Negro's character, no decided opinion will be implied as to the vexed question of man's origin. If the Negro could be proved to be a distinct species to the European, it would not be proved that they had not the same origin—it would only render their identity of origin less likely. I shall, also, have to dwell much on the analogies existing between the Negro and the Anthropoid Apes; but these analogies do not necessarily involve relationship. The Negro race, in some of its characters, is the lowest of existing races, while in others it approaches the highest type of European: and this is the case with other savage races. We find the same thing in the Anthropoid Apes, where some species resemble man in one character and some in another. The father of English ethnology, Dr. Prichard, taught that the original pair must have been Negroes, and that mankind descended from them. His words are:—"It must be concluded that the process of nature in the human species is the transmutation of the characters of the Negro into those of the European, or the evolution of white varieties in black races of men. We have seen that there are causes existing which are capable of producing such an alteration, but we have no facts which induce us to suppose that the reverse of this change could in any circumstance be effected. This leads us to the inference that the primitive stock of men were Negroes, which has every appearance of truth." It is not a little remarkable that although Blumenbach and Prichard were both advocates for the unity of man, they materially differed in their arguments. Blumenbach saw, in his five varieties of man, nothing but degeneracy from some ideal perfect type. Prichard, on the contrary, asserted he could imagine no arguments, or knew of no facts, to support such a conclusion. Prichard, however, was not alone in this supposition; for Pallas, Lacépède, Hunter, Schelver, Doornik, and Link, were also inclined to the same view. We must not dwell on such idle speculations, for on the present occasion we shall not touch on the origin of man: it will be enough if we assist in removing some of the misconception in which the Negro race has been enveloped in the minds of some of my scientific brethren. It is too generally taught that the negro only differs from the European in the colour of his skin and the peculiarity of his hair; but such opinions are not supported by facts. The skin and hair are by no means the only things which distinguish the Negro from the European, even physically; and the difference is greater, mentally and morally, than the demonstrated physical difference. In the first place, what are the physical distinctions between the Negro and the other races of man?

The average height of the Negro is less than the European, and although there are occasionally exceptions, the skeleton of the Negro is generally heavier, and the bones larger and thicker in proportion to the muscles, than those of the European. The bones are also whiter, from the greater abundance of calcareous salts. The thorax is generally laterally compressed, and, in thin individuals, presents a cylindrical form, and is smaller in proportion to the extremities. The extremities of the Negro differ from other races more by proportion than by form: the arm usually reaches below the middle of the femur. The leg is on the whole longer, but is made to look short on account of the ankle being only between 1½ in. to 1½ in. above the ground. This character is often seen in mulattoes. The foot is flat, and the heel is both flat and long. Burmeister has pointed out the resemblance of the foot and the position of the toes of the Negro to those of the ape. The toes are small, the first separated from the second by a free space. Many observers have noticed the fact that the Negro frequently uses the great toe as a thumb. The knees are rather bent, the calves weak, and the upper part of the thigh rather thin. The upper thigh-bone of the Negro has not so decided a resemblance to the ape as that of the bushman. He rarely stands quite upright, his short neck and large development of the cervical muscles give great strength to the neck; enabling him to fight like a ram, or carry large weights on his head. The shoulders, arms, and legs are all weak in comparison. The hand is always relatively larger than in the European. The palm is flat, the thumb narrow, long, and very weak.

It appears from a table prepared by Dr. Pruner Bey, that the humerus and the femur in the Negro and European, of equal height, are shorter in the Negro than in the European: while the tibia, the foot, the radius, and the hand are more elongated than in the Negro race. That the fingers and arms are longer has long been affirmed, but we have to thank Dr. Pruner Bey for the absolute proof.

The great distinguishing characters of the Negro are the flattened forehead, which is low and compressed. The nose and whole face is flattened, and the Negro thus has a facial angle generally between 70 and 75 degrees, occasionally only 65 degrees. The nasal cavities and the orbits are spacious. The skull is very hard and unusually thick; enabling the Negroes to fight or carry heavy weights on their heads with pleasure. The coronal region is arched, but not so much developed as in the European woman. The posterior portion of the skull is increased, however, in proportion to that of the anterior being diminished. But M. Gratiolet has shown that the unequal development of the anterior lobes is not the sole cause of the psychological inequalities of human races. The same scientific observer has also stated that in the superior or frontal races, the cranial sutures close much later than in the inferior or occipital races. The frontal races he considers superior, not simply from the form of the skull, but because they have an absolutely more voluminous brain. The frontal cavity being much larger than the occipital, a great loss of space is caused by the depressing of the anterior region, which is not compensated for by the increase of the occipital region. M. Gratiolet has also observed that in the anterior races the sutures of the cranium do not close so early as in the occipital or inferior race. From these researches it appears that in the Negro the growth of the brain is sooner arrested than in the European. This premature union of the bones of the skull may give a clue to much of the mental inferiority which is seen in the Negro race. There can be no doubt that in puberty a great change takes place in relation to psychical development; but in the Negro there appears to be an arrested development of the brain exactly harmonising with the physical formation. Young Negro children are nearly as intelligent as European children; but the older they grow the less intelligent they become. They exhibit, when young, an animal liveliness for play and tricks far surpassing the European child. The infant ape's skull resembles more the Negro's head than the aged ape, and thus shows a striking analogy in their craniological development.

Weber pointed out that there were four forms of the human pelvis, and that they might be classified under the following heads:—The oval (European), round (American), square (Mongol), and oblong (African). The latest researches of Dr. Pruner Bey enables him to affirm that this law is perfectly applicable to the Negro. The head of the Negro is the test type of the long skull, with small development of the frontal region. The form of the pelvis is narrow, conical, or cuneiform, and small in all its diameters. Vollik has asserted that the pelvis of the Negro male bears a great resemblance to that of the lower mammalia. With respect to the capacity of the cranium of the Negro, great difference of opinion has prevailed.* Tiedemann's researches, although very limited, have until recently been accepted as satisfactory. He stated it as his opinion that "the brain of the Negro is, upon the whole, quite as large as that of the European and other human races; the weight of the brain, its dimensions, and the capacity of the cavum cranii prove this fact." All recent researches have, however, done much to show that Tiedemann's investigations are not only unsatisfactory, but that his conclusion is not warranted by the facts which we now have at hand. Blumenbach's, Knox's, and Lawrence's conclusions did not accord with Tiedemann's. But the most satisfactory researches on this point are those made by the late Dr. Morton, of America, and his successor, Dr. J. A. Meigs, of Philadelphia. Dr. Meigs, in following out the researches of his predecessor, has found that in size of the brain, the Negro comes after the European, Finn, Syro-Egyptian, Mongol, Malay, the Semitic, American Indian, and the Esquimaux; but that the brain of the Negro race takes precedence of the ancient civilised races of America, the Egyptian of all periods, the Hindoo, the Hottentot, the Australian, and the Negroes of Polynesia. Thus we see that the negro has at least six well-defined races above him and six below him, taking the internal cavity of the brain as a test. Pruner Bey says that his own experience with the external measurements did not yield essentially different results. But we now know that it is necessary to be most cautious in accepting the capacity of the cranium simply as any absolute test of the intellectual power of any race.

The recent researches of Huschke on this point are most significant and valuable. He gives the following mean measurements of the surface of the cranium, viz:—

	Male Negro: 53,206 square millimetres.	Male European: 59,305 square millimetres.
Female:	49,898 "	Women: 53,375 "
Relative size of three cranial vertebrae expressed in hundredths (1).
1st vertebra	Negro. 77	Negress. 81
2nd and 3rd together	923	919
	1000	1000
2nd vertebra alone	757	764
3rd vertebra	243	236
	1000	1000

"It is surprising," says Pruner Bey, who quotes these tables, "to observe to what a degree the mean capacity of the Negro cranium approaches in its ensemble that of the European female, and particularly how much in both the middle vertebra predominates above the two others; whilst on the contrary, in the European male, the posterior vertebra, and particularly the anterior, are more developed in relation to the middle vertebra than they are in the negro and in the European female. It should be remarked that the occipital vertebra of the Negress is more spacious than that of the Negro."

Tiedemann affirmed that the hair of the Negro did not resemble that of the orang-utan more than the European, except in the more symmetrical distribution of the gyri and sulci. Tiedemann also denied Soemmering's assertion that the nerves of the negro are larger, in proportion to the brain, than in the European; but Pruner Bey has confirmed Soemmering's assertion.

There seems to be, generally, less difference between the Negro and Negress, than between the European male and female: but on the other hand, the Negress, with the shortened humerus, presents a disadvantage "which one might be tempted to look at as a return to the animal form." Lawrence says, "the Negro structure approaches unequivocally to that of the ape;" while Bory St. Vincent, and Fischer do not greatly differ in their description of the anatomy of the Negro from the facts I have adduced.

It cannot be doubted that the brain of the Negro bears a great resemblance to a European woman or child's brain, and thus approaches the ape far more than the European, while the Negress approaches still nearer to the ape.

With regard to the chemical constituents of the brain of the Negro, little positive is yet known. It has been found, however, that the grey substance of the brain of a Negro is of a darker colour than that of the European, that the whole brain has a smoky tint, and that the pia mater contains brown spots, which are never found in the brain of an European. M. Broca has recently had an opportunity of confirming the truth of this statement. With regard to the convulsions there is unanimous testimony that the convulsions of the brain of the Negro are less numerous and more massive than in the European. Waitz thinks that the only resemblance of the Negro's brain to that of the ape is limited to this point. Some observers have thought they have detected a great resemblance between the development of the temporal lobe in the Negro and ape; but much further observation is required on this important subject.

The eyes are more separated than in the European, but not so much so as in the Mongol. The aperture of the eye is narrow, horizontal, and both eyes are wide apart. All the teeth, especially the last molars, are generally large, long, hard, and very white, and usually show little signs of being worn. In some Negro skulls there have been found an extra molar in the upper jaw. There is sometimes a space between the incisors and canine teeth of the upper jaw. The interior molars sometimes present in the Negro race five tubercles, and this anomaly is sporadically found in other races. It has been noticed in the European and the Esquimaux, but is affirmed by my friend Mr. Carter Blake to be more frequent in the Negro and Australian than in any other race. Sometimes Negroes have thirty-four instead of thirty-two teeth. The skin between the fingers, according to Van der Hoeven, reaches higher up than in the European. The skin is also much thicker, especially on the skull, the palm of the hand, and the sole of the foot. The rete mucosum, which is the chief seat of coloration, presents nothing particular as regards structure. The hair of the Negro is essentially different from that of the European, and consists of a coarse, crisp, frizzly sort of wool, and grows in tufts, like the wool of sheep. It is rarely more than three inches long, and generally not nearly so much.* The larynx in the Negro is not much developed, and the voice resembles sometimes the alto of an eunuch. In the male the voice is low and hoarse, and in the female it is acute and shrieking; at least, this is the opinion that has generally been given by Hamilton Smith and others; but there appear to be exceptions, for Dr. R. Clarke says that "a pleasing manner, soft and winning ways, with a low and musical laugh, may in strict truth be declared to be the heritage of most of the Negro women." There is a peculiarity in the Negro voice by which he can always be distinguished. This peculiarity is so great that we can frequently discover traces of Negro blood when the eye is unable to detect it. No amount of education or time is likely ever to enable the Negro to speak the English language without this twang. Even his great faculty of imitation will not enable him to do this.

Having thus briefly recapitulated the anatomical peculiarities of the Negro, we now come to the physiological difference between the Negro and European.

The assumption of the unity of the species of man has been based chiefly on the asserted fact that the offspring of all the mixtures of the so-called races of man are prolific. Now this is assuming what yet has to be established. At present it is only proved that the descendants of some of the different races of man are temporarily prolific; but there is the best evidence to believe that the offspring of the Negro and European are not indefinitely prolific. This question is one which must be dealt with separately and proved by facts. At present we find that all prima facie evidence is against the assumption that permanently mixed races can be permanently produced, especially if the races are not very closely allied. This subject, however, merits a special discussion, and comes into that large and important question—human hybridity. We must, therefore not agree with the asserted statement, especially when we find that the two scientific men who have in recent times paid the most attention to this subject—I allude to Messrs. Broca and Nott—have come to the conclusion that the offspring of the Negro and European are not indefinitely prolific. With the permission of the Society, I will enter into that question at some future day.

M. Florens asserted that the Negro children were born white; but recent observation has shown that this is not the case. Benet, ex-physician of Runjeet Singh, and Dumoutier, affirm that the children are born chestnut colour. M. Pruner Bey confirms this fact from personal observation.

In the Negro race there is a great uniformity of temperament. In every people of Europe all temperaments exist; but in the Negro race we can only discover analogies for the choleric and phlegmatic temperaments. The senses of the Negro are very acute, especially the smell and taste; but Pruner Bey says that there has been much exaggeration as to the perfection of the senses of the Negro, and that their eyesight, in particular, is very much inferior to the European. The most detestable odours delight him; and he eats everything.

While the anatomical and physiological questions must be decided by actual facts, we have still remaining the psychological peculiarity of the Negro to investigate. It is here, perhaps, that the greatest amount of misconception exists in the minds of the public generally, and not unfrequently in the minds of some men of science. Wedded to the theory of a single pair for the origin of man, they attempt to show that there is in mankind no variety, nothing but uniformity.

That it may be seen I do not exaggerate on this point, I will quote the words of an esteemed friend, which he read last year at Cambridge. He says:—"For as God made of one blood all the nations of the earth, and endowed them all with the same animal, intellectual, moral, and religious nature: so has he bound them all together—in accordance with the high behest that they should increase and multiply and replenish the earth—in one common bond of universal brotherhood."

CHIEF JUSTICES Lowrie, Woodward, and Thompson—the first two Democrats and the last a Republican, together constituting a majority of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania—have declared the Federal Conscription Act to be unconstitutional.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

THE INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—

At Liverpool, to Mr. BISHOP, Commercial-buildings, 17, Water-st.
At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq., Manchester Southern Club Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PERETTER and MULLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4, Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1863.

Mr. J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund acknowledges the receipt of the following additional subscriptions—

J. T. Brown, Esq. . . . .	£2	2	0
D. C. Buchanan, Esq. . . . .	20	0	0

The Advocacy of the Southern Cause.

THE lurid light of a three years' war has photographed with wonderfully vivid minuteness the moral natures of the two peoples now warring on the American Continent. Scarce forty-eight hours since, a popular orator assured an English audience that there never could be two separate nations within the confines of what he chose still to call "the United States" of America; and yet his own words bore the strongest testimony that there already live within those confines two nations radically, irreconcilably, and—thanks to a brief but eventful past which can neither be recalled nor forgotten—historically distinct. So well does the nation which has undertaken the war to make good Mr. Cobden's assertion know and feel this distinction, that the task it has set itself is avowedly nothing short of the absolute extermination of its opponent. It may be doubted whether since the days of antiquity two nations have stood arrayed in deadly strife, between whom there were so many points of antagonism and so few of resemblance. In their representative men, in their political ethics, in their modes of thought, in their motive springs of action, they occupy positions so wide apart that one is almost tempted to describe them as opposite poles of the moral world. Such a conflict cannot long be restrained within territorial limits or the local issues for which it is ostensibly waged; for sooner or later it becomes symbolical of great principles, upon which all mankind must take sides. Into this phase the American war has now entered. If we strip Mr. Cobden's words of the odious modern meaning in which he purposely used them, and take them in their genuine sense, as expressive of the contrast between the rule of the wisest and best and the rule of the many, he spoke a solemn truth when he said that the war was "an aristocratic rebellion against a democratic government." It is a solemn truth in the sense that the South is fighting for constitutional liberty and national self-government, the North for the vindication of the brute force of numbers and the right of conquest. Behold the antagonistic principles exposed to the fiery furnace of a great trial: the one, like good ore, issues purified of dross; the other, at the first touch of the flame, shrivelling the tinsel and false gilt of prosperity, is reduced to hideous cinders. The South—amid the shock of repeated invasions, amid untold sufferings and gigantic perils—has kept wide open the temples of justice, has held sacred the rights of the citizen, and has found time to reconstruct its political fabric upon broader and more solid foundations. The North—engaged in a war to all intents and purposes foreign, and suffering from none but self-inflicted evils—seemed to possess safeguards of constitutional and individual freedom, only for the purpose of serving as the temporary scaffolding to a massive structure of naked military despotism.

Look among the respective sympathisers of the combatants, and wherever you see a man, a faction, or a class bitterly and rootedly hostile to the South, you see worshippers of that New World apotheosis of vulgarity and democracy, which was preached to the nations of the earth as the approach of a political and social millennium. Inconsistent in everything else, these worshippers are consistent only in their blind devotion, after their idol has lost all the meretricious charms for which they once extolled it. Few are bold enough to avow the articles of their creed, many are scarcely themselves conscious of its tenets, all seek to place their sympathies and antipathies on other grounds than the true ones. But test them on their own professions, surrender on the part of the South everything they pretend to hate, and their hatred will flare only the fiercer for the means you take to extinguish it. Thus, when the South threatened to emancipate her slaves by a wholesale arming, her enemies, half in triumph over her supposed prostration, and half in fear, dropped the mask, and the least discreet of their organs said: "It requires no shrewdness to discover that nine-tenths of English Abolitionists are strongly attached to the American Union. They are Liberals as well as philanthropists. They believe that human progress has much to hope and nothing to fear from the re-establishment of the Republic in unimpaired vastness and power."

It is a grave error to suppose that the Yankee is the special product of a certain portion of the American continent. He is the bastard child of our nineteenth century civilisation, claiming to be its legitimate offspring, and he is born under every clime and speaking many tongues besides the English. That peculiar combination of mental and moral deformities which we abhor in the fully developed type, is an insidious social disease which in various stages has made alarming progress in all countries, and in its mildest form infects even classes which would seem the best protected against it. It sits in every council chamber, and has a representative in every Cabinet of Europe; even royal thresholds have no charm to exclude it. Nor is the South wholly free from its presence, though the disease, like many physical diseases, is at present neutralised by a strong excitement. It is because circumstances have accelerated and perfected in America a species of geographical polarisation of ideas, that the South now fights the world's battles against Yankeeism, and bears the brunt of its collective material and moral power. But though the world has a deep interest and a momentous stake in the issues of these battles, since they must necessarily colour to a great extent the currents of thought of many generations, yet it were too much to say that the issues will be absolutely decisive and final. Whether with the pen or the sword, the same battles must be fought in other countries, and first of all, and most fiercely, in England.

It is well, in the advocacy of the Southern cause, to keep this truth prominently in mind. The more it is understood, and the more intimately it is felt, the more closely serried will be the ranks of the friends of the South. A common danger is the strongest of all bonds, a great principle the most sacred of banners, and it should be the object of all who take a leading part in the championship of the Confederacy to bring it home to the heart of every true Englishman that every blow struck in her defence is a blow also against a domestic enemy, and every defeat she sustains threatens what there is best, and wisest, and most honoured in British traditions. Though the logic of reason and of facts is overwhelmingly against the North, yet men's sympathies are directed less by arguments than by instinct. It is by an intuitive, almost unconscious, perception of what we have endeavoured to express, however inadequately, in words, that the intelligence, the social and political respectability—all that orators of the John Bright school hold up to the execration of half-educated apprentices as the "ruling classes"—have from the beginning of the American struggle given their well-wishes to the South. But there is below, or rather beside, these "ruling classes" a fund of sound sense and of sturdy conservatism in the mass of the British people, which needs only to be left to the guidance of its own instincts to go certainly right. The symptoms are multiplying of a deep and general upheaving of the popular mind. Spreading from many centres, a movement, which cannot be correctly described as an agitation, is slowly but steadily reaching every class and interest in the kingdom. The friends of the South have only to be true to themselves and wait the event patiently, though not listlessly, to see it acquire the irresistible momentum of a national impulse.

Two dangers, however, there are, against which we would briefly caution our English and Southern friends alike. From one of these the Confederate cause has heretofore steered clear with surprising success, but as its volunteer champions become more numerous and more various it can scarcely hope always to do so. This danger is contained in the vulgar adage of "fighting the devil with fire," the most foolish of all foolish proverbs, for if there is one weapon which the evil one has least cause to fear, it must be that which he has himself chosen as his own. By nothing has the South gained so much in the estimation of Europe as by the truthfulness, the moderation of statement, the unobtrusiveness, the quiet dignity, which, as a rule, have characterised her official and private representatives. These are weapons which the Yankee, whether American-born or European-born, cannot use and cannot contend against. With their opposites it would be absurd to attempt to match him.

The other danger is the treatment of the slavery question. It is not true that slavery was the cause of the dissolution; neither is it true that slavery had nothing to do with the catastrophe. The truth is perhaps best told in a metaphor; and this is, that a rope, stretched beyond what it can bear, will break where there is a flaw or there has been fretting; but it is the tension, and not the flaw or the fretting, which breaks the rope. There is, besides, a two-fold and contradictory error, into which partisans of the South are prone to fall on this subject. One is, to concede too little to reasonable prejudices; and the other, to concede too much to unreasonable ones. The Southerner should remember that aversion to slavery is an article of the Englishman's political creed, and a part of the national conscience, and that, therefore, he has no right to obtrude views which belong to his peculiar position or to seek to make converts. On the other hand, the Englishman is bound not to accept fictions in the place of attested facts; he should make allowances for the unsolved problems arising from circumstances wholly abnormal and unprecedented, as also for the natural sensitiveness and irritability of men grossly and habitually slandered; and above all he is bound in honour to give the Southerner credit for honest motives and good intentions. If a man is tried for murder, his counsel will not either justify murder in the abstract, or apologise for his client, and promise, if let off this time, he will never commit the crime again; but, if the counsel really desires a verdict of acquittal, he will seek to establish by evidence, either that his client did not kill the man, or that the killing was, from the attendant circumstances, justifiable, and not malicious. These general principles, rapidly and of necessity imperfectly sketched, contain, to our thinking, the philosophy and the true grounds of the advocacy of the Southern cause.

Many Critics and the War.

THERE are always plenty of critics who will tell you why a battle was lost or thrown away. Why Napoleon I. was defeated at Waterloo, and how he must have supped in Brussels on the night of the battle, if he had been gifted with the genius of one out of half-a-dozen historians of the war, has been explained fifty times over. But the military historian, even though he possess the omnipresence of a Kinglake, does not come up to "our special correspondent." He is the man, lynx-eyed, keen-witted, and hard-nerved, to detect through all the smoke and din of battle the most trivial error, to decide, off-hand, the merits of every move in the terrible game, to stamp with his approval or condemnation, almost before the echoes of the artillery have died away, the army and its commander, and to anticipate the judgment of posterity by a few strokes of the pen, dashed off in eager hurry to catch an outgoing mail. It is impossible to read the comments of the Times correspondent on the battle of Chickamauga Creek without a sense of the ludicrous. Here is a raw civilian who never set a squadron in the field, acting as judge and jury upon a sort of commission of inquiry into the conduct of General Bragg, and deliberately passing one of the most unjust and sweeping censures we ever knew cast upon a military commander. Nothing that Bragg did satisfied this exigent correspondent. He was wrong in the time he made the attack, in the point where he began the attack, in his method of executing the attack. He could neither lead his forces into battle nor gain their confidence in camp. It was only his reputation for excessive caution which led Rosecrans into difficulties; only his tardiness and irresolution in action which saved Rosecrans' army from destruction. First-rate leaders of divisions and brigades, gallant soldiers, excellent opportunities, were all thrown away, because General Bragg knew not how to avail himself of them, because chances which presented themselves to hundreds of his subordinates could not be appreciated by their chief. According to the Times correspondent General Bragg is absolutely one of the most incapable leaders that the war has produced. The series of charges against him is overwhelming. But for Longstreet he would have discontinued the battle upon the repulse of his attack upon the enemy's right wing; but for Longstreet General Thomas would have held Missionary Ridge unmolested, and the Federals would have claimed the day; and it was rather against Bragg's wishes than by his orders that the Confederate success on the left was converted into a substantial victory, and the Federals driven a disorganised mass from the crests of Missionary Ridge. But Bragg's blunders did not close here; the Federals never stopped in their flight until they reached Chattanooga—a remarkably long flight considering they were not pursued. Fresh Confederate troops came up on the 20th and 21st. If Longstreet had been in command he would at once have thrown them into the Federal lines at Chattanooga, and pursued the army to Nashville. Now, Chattanooga is naturally strong and easily fortified, the Federal troops work admirably with the spade; twelve hours, or twenty-four, would have sufficed to render the town impregnable to assault, and yet Bragg is censured for not having marched his army straight against the fortifications. It is easy to be bold where there is no responsibility. General Bragg is a soldier of experience, and knows the danger of fighting without a reserve. To have dashed his army against the entrenchments of Chattanooga would have been to imperil the Confederacy. With twice his number of troops it would have been a terribly hazardous enterprise; with the actual force under his command it would have been madness. So far from attaching blame to the Confederate general for not attacking Chattanooga, we believe it to have been "a crowning mercy" to the South that the attempt was not made. As to the charge of indecision and inactivity after the battle, it is too grave to be implicitly relied upon on the ipse dixit of a newspaper correspondent. The notion of despatching the whole of the Confederate army, by the most tortuous of roads, through a barren, hilly district some 150 miles in the direction of Knoxville, leaving Chattanooga open to reinforcements and supplies, and the Federal army free to aid Burnside, make new roads, and seize upon a strong position in the rear of Bragg's army, thus cutting in two the forces of the Confederacy, can hardly have been entertained by a council of war, and is probably a piece of mere camp gossip. After all, the best answer to this sort of criticism is Bragg's retention of the command. President Davis has not fallen into the mistake, made so frequently by his opponents, of yielding to the first clamour of disappointment. He has seen and judged for himself. He is competent to form a sound opinion, and he has left Bragg at the head of the army. If the faults of this general had been so obvious, his incompetency so glaring, as the Times correspondent would have us believe, the President would not entrust to him the army on which the fortunes of the Confederacy so materially depend.

The last accounts from Tennessee are all in favour of the South. General Bragg's force is said to number 60,000, and Longstreet is stated to be on his way to Knoxville with 16,000 men. The first blow had been struck at Rogersville, thirty miles from his head-quarters, where, according to Federal reports, 600 men, four cannons and thirty-six waggons had been captured; but by any mail we may hear that a great battle has been fought in the neighbourhood of Knoxville decisive of the fate of East Tennessee, and threatening serious consequences to the Federal hold upon Kentucky. Up to the latest date there is no appearance of any attempt on Burnside's part to retreat. If not, where Longstreet marches with his dashing corps d'élite there will be sharp fighting, and neither General Burnside nor General Foster is the man to cope with him. The situation at Chattanooga is unchanged. The Confederates hold Lookout Mountain. Between them and Hooker's force runs the Creek, and on Raccoon Mountain opposite to them are entrenched the Federals. All is reported quiet, and Bragg is said to have granted the farmers of Georgia in his army thirty days furlough to sow grain. This betokens no immediate activity at Chattanooga, nor is the Confederate general likely to assume the offensive in this quarter. Chattanooga may be turned but it cannot be stormed. The movements which will drive the Federals thence or force them to capitulate range over a vast extent of ground, and will require some time for development. At Knoxville, along the frontier line of Alabama and Mississippi, on the enemy's communications, must be fought the battles which will decide the hold of the Federals upon Chattanooga.

In Virginia General Meade's advance has come to a sudden halt somewhere about Cedar Mountain, the scene of one of Stonewall Jackson's early triumphs and of Banks's reverse. Lee's force is reported to be strongly entrenched on the south bank of the Rapidan, and Stuart's cavalry in somewhat awkward proximity to the Federal camp, General Kilpatrick's force having been shelled out of its quarters at Stevensburg some miles north of the Rapidan river. It is not probable that Meade will push much further South. He is checked for want of supplies now; and his army would be seriously impeded if he continued his advance with the chance of having to fight Lee's army thirty or forty miles from his railway communications, and the Confederate cavalry ready at any moment to play havoc with his teamsters. All doubt, then, about Lee's ability to hold his own may be dismissed. It is, indeed, doubtful if he has despatched any considerable force into East Tennessee. But if he should have his troops well in hand and within easy call, he may yet surprise General Meade by another forward movement, from the results of which the Federals will hardly be able to extricate themselves as easily as on the occasion of their last race to Washington.

Strangest of all the news, is the reported Confederate plot in Canada, for the seizure of the steamers on Lake Erie, the liberation of the prisoners in Fort Johnson, and the burning of the lake cities. Lord Lyons is the obliging informer. Mr. Seward warned him of the awful doings of the Finian brotherhood; he returns the courtesy by divulging a dark Confederate plot. What with providing against Confederates in Canada, keeping the peace in New York and Pennsylvania, suppressing conspiracies in Ohio and Kentucky, checking guerillas on the Mississippi, extricating Burnside, saving Chattanooga, beating General Lee, and raising 300,000 men, the War Administration of the North is likely to have its hands full this winter.

The Attorney-General v. Sillem.

WHILE the case of the Alexandra is still sub judice we shall not attempt to enter into a discussion of the legal arguments on either side, or into the technical questions at issue in regard to the charge of the Chief Baron. But a few words on the principles involved in the case, and on the consequences which may follow its decision may not even now be deemed inopportune.

In the first place, notwithstanding the remarks of Mr. Attorney-General, we cannot but attach some importance to the rule that a penal statute is to be construed strictly. Legis ignorantia neminem excusat; and if the defendant were to plead that he did not gather from the words of the Act the sense attached to them by the Court, that plea would avail him nothing. It seems, therefore, that the sense attached to the words of the Act ought always to be such that a defendant cannot be supposed to have good reason for attaching to them a less extended sense; for if misconception of the law be not an excuse, then the law ought not to be so interpreted that misconception would appear to have been excusable. Therefore, as a matter of simple justice, in the case of a penal statute, the construction should be in favour of liberty; should be such that no man who has honestly tried to understand and obey it should suddenly find himself entrapped thereby.

Secondly, in ordinary cases, a statute must be interpreted by itself, and in no case can its significance be extended by any interpretation from without. For, although every man is bound to know the law, no man is bound to understand the reasons or know the history of the law. But when, as in the present case, the meaning of the statute is rendered extremely uncertain by the clumsy language used by its non-legal constructors, it does not seem unreasonable that a clue to its meaning should be sought in the explanations given by its authors, for the guidance of the Court and for the interpretation, but not the extension, of its terms. Of course no argument could be drawn in this way against the plain words or natural construction of the Act, but only for the elucidation of a meaning altogether ambiguous.

Thirdly, where the subject matter of the statute has reference to international relations, it does not seem unreasonable—we speak as laymen—to seek a key to its obscurities from the law of nations applicable to such subject matter. And when the statute is to be put in force, really though not nominally, for the benefit of a foreign Power, it does not seem inequitable—in default of domestic cases in point—to inquire how the Courts of that foreign Power have interpreted a similar statute forming part of their own municipal code.

Fourthly, in spite of sundry assertions to the contrary, it is certain that the American law, and all but certain that our own, was framed with the purpose of enforcing the observance of a view of international obligations substantially accordant with that of Sir Hugh Cairns: viz., that neutrals may lawfully sell and convey any article whatsoever to a foreign Power or to its ships on the high seas; but may not lawfully reinforce its armies or its ships of war within their own territory, or make their coasts, ports, or waters, the base of belligerent operations by land or sea. It is quite clear, in reading the history of the negotiations between the Federal Government, M. Genet, and Mr. Hammond, which led to the passage of the first American Foreign Enlistment Act, that the President and his advisers took and acted on this view of international rights and duties; and that their object, in bringing in the Foreign Enlistment Bill, was to obtain power to enforce, by their municipal authority, what they believed to be the rule of public law. Nor can it well be disputed, that the reason of the distinction drawn is closely connected with the law of contraband and the belligerent right of capture. If a vessel be sent for sale to the belligerent, outside of neutral jurisdiction, that right of capture is not interfered with. The neutral has merely exercised his right of trade, without infringing what has been well called "the contradictory or conflicting right" of capture, in which lies the belligerent's remedy, and in consideration of which the trade in contraband of war is held not to be unneutral. But if an armed vessel be supplied to a belligerent within neutral waters, that compromise is violated; the belligerent is ousted of his remedy, and is remitted to his natural right of treating the supply of contraband to his enemy as an unneutral act.

We conclude, then, that so far as international law tends to throw light upon the interpretation of the Foreign Enlistment Act, it tends to show that the purpose of that Act was simply to prevent the departure of belligerent expeditions from within neutral territory, and not to interfere with the trade of neutrals in ships of war or other contraband. And in support of this conclusion, we must cite the American case of the Santissima Trinidad, in which Mr. Justice Story held that the despatch of an armed vessel from a neutral port for sale to a belligerent was no violation of the American statute, which is strictly analogous to our own. We have already given our reasons for holding that, in the present case, international law and American precedents may be called in to assist, sub modo, in the interpretation of the ambiguities of our own statute.

Coming next to the history of the Foreign Enlistment Act, we find that it was passed with the view of restraining certain English sympathisers with the revolted colonies of Spain from—not supplying ships suitable for war to those colonies, but—actually mustering large bodies of troops within the realm, and fitting out privateers in our ports, to take an active part in the war. We find that thereupon it was objected by certain of the Opposition, that this Act was directed only against the kind of assistance useful to the colonists, and that Spain might still receive the aid of British ships to transport her troops; whereupon the clause with reference to transports was inserted, and that section of the Act became a grammatical muddle, such as is seldom seen, even on our Statute Book.

It is plain, however, that the original purpose with which the section was framed had no reference to such a case as that of the Alabama, or that which is assumed to be the case of the Alexandra. The danger in the minds of the framers was, not the building of ships which should be sent unarmed from our ports and pass into the hands of the colonists by regular sale, either in foreign ports or on the high seas; it was the participation in the war by British ships, making British ports their point of departure, and by British subjects, armed, enlisted, and mustered on British shores. The object was to suppress private war, not to impose restrictions on industry or commerce. We are told, indeed, that trade in contraband is contra bonos mores, and entitled to no regard or consideration at the hands of the legislature. But this is an absurd and antiquated doctrine, belonging to the days when war was considered the normal condition of nations, and when neutrals tamely acquiesced in the total prohibition by one belligerent of all trade with the other. Now it is understood that all neutral trade is perfectly lawful; that the right of belligerents to intercept it is one of the most exceptional and limited character; that that right in no way extinguishes or overrides the right of the neutral trader, but is simply an exercise of force sanctioned by international usage in special cases for special reasons; and that the status of the neutral carrier of contraband is not that of a smuggler, or a culprit, but, as regards the world at large, that of an honest merchant engaged in a trade involving peculiar hazards, and, as regards the belligerent, that of an enemy who is an enemy only if caught in the fact, and only in a limited sense, and for the single purpose of confiscation. An adventure in arms, ships, or horses is just as lawful and honourable as one in silks or china, differing only in that to the perils of the sea is added the risk of capture. And the proof of this is that the carrier of contraband is not punishable save by seizure of his goods, and that only by the belligerent enemy, and only on the high seas, and directly on their way to an enemy's port; and that, if he can rescue his goods and vessel, and get safe into a neutral port, he cannot afterwards be called in question on account of that voyage.

It seems, then, so far as the history of the Act throws light on its interpretation, that its purpose was simply to prohibit the departure of belligerent expeditions from within British territory, and in no wise to interfere with the most perfect freedom of the merchant's trade and the shipwright's industry.

The preamble of the Act states its purpose to be the preservation of the peace of the realm: its preservation, that is, either from disturbances arising within the Queen's jurisdiction (as if two vessels, built and armed for different belligerents, should engage in hostilities in our very territorial waters,) or from acts provoking the just resentment of foreign Powers—(for it can never be supposed that it was intended to deprecate the unjust hostility of foreigners by a sacrifice of British liberties,)—that is, from dangers arising out of violations of international law. The former peril clearly cannot arise from the building of unarmed ships for sale; the second, involving an infraction of international law, cannot arise where no rule of international law has been infringed. It seems, then, from the preamble, that the statute was not directed to the prevention of such acts as that now called in question.

At last we come to the construction of the section which refers to the equipment or armament of ships to be used for hostile purposes against a Power with which Great Britain is at peace. Amidst a mass of tangled and ungrammatical verbiage, we find three things distinct and clear:—

It is not forbidden to build a ship with any intent whatever.

It is forbidden to arm a ship with the intent aforesaid.

It is forbidden to equip, furnish, or fit out a ship with the intent aforesaid.

It is forbidden to attempt or endeavour, or be concerned in any attempt to furnish, equip, or fit out a ship with the intent aforesaid.

Now it seems certain, to begin with, from the phraseology of the section, clumsy as it is, that the acts prohibited must be done or intended to be done within the realm. Also, that "equip, furnish, and fit out," all mean one and the same thing, whatever that may be; and that their repetition is merely the foolish affectation of redundancy peculiar to amateur lawyers and legislators.

Secondly, as building is not forbidden, it is clear that the equipment must be something wholly apart from building; for if the legislature had intended, as Mr. F. W. Gibbs extravagantly supposes, to make the construction of a ship for the service of a belligerent unlawful, it certainly would have prohibited building.

Thirdly, we are ready to grant that the equipment in question is probably to be taken as something different from arming.

But fourthly, it seems clear that it must be an equipment not mercantile or ambiguous, but clearly warlike, and useful only for warlike purposes. On this point there are two American decisions well worth citing. The first is the official interpretation put upon the American Foreign Enlistment Act by Washington's Government, according to which all equipment of a distinctly warlike character is unlawful, and all equipment of a mercantile kind, or ancipitis usus, is lawful, in the case of a vessel confessedly intended for a belligerent Power. The second is the judicial decision that the addition of two ports to a privateer, in a neutral harbour, was not an "additional warlike equipment" within the sense of another clause of the statute.

It appears, then, from the words of the Act itself, that it was not intended to prevent the construction for a belligerent Power of a ship capable of being used for war when suitably equipped, but having no equipment of a distinctly warlike character, whether armament or otherwise, which should be wholly incompatible with a peaceful character. It was left free to British builders to build and sell what ships they like, to whom they like, and for whatever purpose. It was forbidden only to arm such vessels, or to equip them in any manner distinctly warlike.

Is it contended that the Alexandra was armed, or that she had any "equipment" of a character inconsistent with the needs or convenience of a vessel intended for other purposes than those of war? If not, she ought never to have been tried. Is it contended that her possession of a warlike equipment, apart from her build, was established beyond a doubt, or that the decision on that subject could be reversed on a new trial? If not, what is the present object of the Crown?

We hope, at all events, that a new trial will not be granted on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence. There were two points to be established: the equipment of the ship, and her destination. Failing on either point, a verdict against the Crown was inevitable. Now what was the nature of the evidence as to the destination of the vessel? The principal witnesses were Chapman and Clarence Randolph Young. Of the one it is enough to say that he was a crimp; the latter stood self-accused, in open court, of a life of infamy, to which no one could suppose that he would scruple to add the trifling guilt of perjury. If these witnesses were not to be believed, then the verdict cannot be pronounced to have been against the evidence; and we can hardly suppose that the Court will take it upon them to declare that the jury were bound to believe these witnesses.

Divers alarming consequences have been threatened as likely to result from a decision against the Crown; notably, that in our next war the seas will swarm with cruisers fitted out in American ports, and merely sent to take their armament on board elsewhere. This is to result, of course, from the assumed certainty that the American Courts will follow the precedent set in this case. But what is their present position? The Bolivar left an American port, was armed at St. Thomas, and started thence to cruise under the flag of Buenos Ayres against Spain; and it was held that American law had not been violated. Will the case of the Alexandra, if a decision be given against the Crown, give American citizens any rights which they do not already enjoy under the decision in the case of the Bolivar? We know that the case of the Mauvy is cited to show that the American law does not allow ships to be equipped in the ports of the Union to cruise against Powers with which the Union is at peace. But it is not so. The Mauvy had a regular armament on board; she carried fourteen guns; she would, had she sailed to make war under the Russian flag, have left New York in full fighting trim, and a decision in favour of the Alexandra could in no way affect our right to protest against such a proceeding as that.

On the other hand, a decision in favour of the Crown would cripple a branch of commerce which is of the highest national value. It is not only the shipbuilding trade that is interested in this matter. As a thoughtful contemporary not long ago observed, it is of the greatest moment to us, as a maritime nation, to retain in our hands an unquestioned supremacy in the art of building men-of-war. That art has now become a regular branch of the trade of private shipbuilders. English shipbuilders have it now in their own hands, and, if not driven out of it by hostile interference on the part of Government, they will keep it. But if it be decided that they may not sell ships of war to belligerents—and this would be the practical effect of the condemnation of the Alexandra—they will lose the whole of this trade. Foreign Powers will not give orders for ships of war the execution of which orders will be stopped if they should go to war—that is, if their fulfilment should become of urgent importance. The domestic demand is too rare and uncertain to sustain the art as a regular branch of trade; it will die out, and we shall feel its decay among us as soon as we find ourselves hard pressed by maritime rivals. The harsh measures pursued by the Government towards the shipbuilders of Liverpool have done much to bring about this alarming consummation. It is for our courts of justice to apply the remedy, and at once to save the rights of British trade from administrative encroachments, and to preserve to the country one of the most vital elements of her maritime preponderance.

THE CASE OF THE ALEXANDRA.

Special Summarized Report.

Last week we gave an abstract of the argument of Sir Hugh Cairns in this case on behalf of the defendants, the claimants of the ship Alexandra, as against the Crown. Mr. Karslake, Q.C., at the conclusion of the speech of Sir H. Cairns, addressed the Court. He called attention to an authority contained in "Fortescue's Reports," bearing date the year 1721, where the Judges attended the House of Lords to decide whether His Majesty had power to prohibit the building of ships of war for foreigners in any of His Majesty's dominions; and it was decided that the King had no such power. The same opinion had been given in 1713. That was the only English authority before the passing of the Act. He wished to impress upon the Court that on the part of the person who is the owner or controller for the time being of the vessel there must be that fixed intention which was mentioned in the case of the United States v. Quincy, and that you must ascertain who was the person who had that fixed intention before you could claim the vessel. It was the bounden duty of the Crown to show that at the time when the forfeiture was incurred there were some particular persons who were acting in some way or other against the section of the statute. The "intent," too, of those persons must have been a practical intent. Now, the Attorney-General, in moving for the rule, had contended that the existence of a hull being presupposed, then any equipment, however innocent, per se, superadded to the hull, caused the forfeiture of the vessel, provided the "intent" pointed at in the Act could be proved, thus absolutely denying that the equipment need have a warlike character at all. The contention on the part of the defendants was, that the equipment must be of a warlike character. Let them look at the 8th section. By it you were not forbidden to equip a ship of war belonging to a belligerent, and coming to the neutral port, with any innocent equipment; the section prohibited expressly a warlike equipment. Consequently, if the Attorney-General were right, this contradiction would ensue, that it would be lawful to superadd any equipment, other than warlike, to a man-of-war, but unlawful to superadd precisely the same equipment to a hull. The Act made a new crime; it constituted that a crime, which, before the Act, was perfectly lawful. Therefore the Act must be taken strictly. He denied, that their interpretation made the Act a dead letter. Why, what said Earl Russell himself about these evasions, as they had been called, of the Act? The noble lord, in a letter to Mr. Adams, dated the 16th October, 1862, had used words to this effect, that "this Act and any other Act might be evaded by many subtle contrivances, but Her Majesty's Government could not on that account go beyond the words of the Act." That letter had been inserted in the last edition of "Wheaton." The Crown complained that in charging the jury the Chief Baron did not in every case repeat all those words in the 7th section about "attempting and endeavouring and procuring to fit out," &c. Why, the Attorney-General himself at the trial asked the jury to concentrate their attention on the first eight counts, in which the principal offence was charged. In point of fact, the jury was asked whether the ship was "equipped" or not, and the jury said "No." The "equipment," it was contended, must be of a warlike character, whatever the "intent" might be. The ruling of the Chief Baron was right, and the verdict of the jury on that ruling fully warranted. Mr. Mellish, Q.C., next addressed the court on the same side. He said that it was lawful for any shipbuilder to build in this country a ship adapted for war, and to equip that ship in a manner enabling her to take the seas, and to do this under a contract with a belligerent, provided only that the "equipment" was not warlike. He assumed that the words "equip," "fit out," "furnish," were identical. It was absurd to talk of building a ship, if the ship could not sail away when built. Why it was not a ship at all. If that was what the Act meant, why did it not say, "you shall not build a ship"? The words about the "intent" prove the point. Every kind of ship, be it a whaler, a transport, or a man-of-war, had a distinctive character; and when you spoke of "equipping" any one of these, you meant equipping it with those things which gave it the distinctive character of a whaler, a transport, or a ship of war. The real object of the Act was, to prevent the Crown being insulted by the sailing of armed expeditions from its ports. Suppose a ship of war, fully armed, to come into a port disabled, by the 8th section it was lawful to furnish her with every necessary to enable her to take the seas again; it was only unlawful to furnish her with things of a warlike character. The Lord Chief Baron here put the extreme case of a vessel, "a mere wreck," coming in; to which the counsel replied that no doubt she could be lawfully restored to a perfect condition. Much had been said about evading the Act, about sending out a vessel equipped with an innocent equipment, and another vessel carrying out the warlike equipments in order to transfer these to the former vessel on the high seas. Surely this was not a very practicable thing. Why the Alabama had run all the way to the Azores unarmed, rather than attempt such an act as that supposed on the high seas. The Crown would strain the case, so that the Act would say, "you shall not build and sell a ship to a belligerent at all." But to sell a ship to a belligerent is lawful on every principle—nay, it was a peaceful trade, an act of commerce at all times possible, while the fitting out an armed ship is possible only in time of war. There was no evidence whatever to show that there was any intention to put any warlike equipment on board the Alexandra. The agents of the United States were on the watch. As far as they could judge from what happened in the case of the Alabama, the builders of the Alexandra rightly supposed that an innocent equipment would be lawful, and a warlike equipment unlawful. But there was a new point to be taken. Would the Court grant a new trial on the ground that the "verdict was against the evidence"? In civil causes a new trial might be granted on that ground or on the ground of "misdirection." In criminal cases a new trial could not be granted at all. In penal cases which were of a mixed nature, "misdirection" was ground for a new trial, but that "the verdict was against evidence" was no ground at all. This was a penal case, and therefore on that ground the Court would not grant a new trial. After a short argument from Mr. Kemplay, the Attorney-General rose to support the rule for a new trial on behalf of the Crown. He commenced by an able criticism of the speech of Sir H. Cairns. He protested against the coincidence set up between international and municipal law. The boundaries of the latter could not be prescribed by the former. His speeches "elsewhere" had been quoted as consistent with his position now; but what he said elsewhere and what he declared now was this: that municipal legislation was exceptional, and that foreign nations had a right to call upon us to exercise our municipal powers, even beyond the prescriptions of international law. The Alabama had incurred the penalties of the Act, but had got off. As to international law, with which Sir H. Cairns had made our municipal law to square, why so far as that was concerned, an armed expedition might leave our ports and the belligerent would have no right to make reprisal; there was no antecedent obligation on a neutral to prevent such acts; yet that was the very reverse of the doctrine of Sir H. Cairns and his theory that the municipal law was bounded by the law of nations. The Lord Chief Baron had said, "If Birmingham may supply guns, why may not ships be supplied?" But that was the very point. Doubtless a ship might lawfully be made, armed, and sold, but not so with "intent to commit hostilities against one of the belligerents." The Act, in truth, threw its net as widely as possible. It was not framed to aid us in doing that which, before it passed, we might fairly enough have been asked to do. It gave new powers. Why, without such an Act, the sovereign might be neutral, while the subjects did deeds which entitled the world to say that the sovereign was not neutral. A weight was thrown into the scale against one of the belligerents, and that belligerent must, in spite of Grotius and Vattel, declare war to rid itself of the evil. If England were at war with France, and if the subjects of a weak maritime Power did such acts, why this country would at once declare war. In truth, a ship differed from an ordinary instrument of war. She was in herself complete. "She walked the waters like a thing of life." Suppose two Powers at war without ships; why, you inaugurated a field of war which had no previous existence. Ordinary contraband of war was of no use till the elements of armaments were combined. The ship was that combination already realised. The result in our case of these acts must be that the Confederates would be building in our ports, while the Federals would be blockading those ports at the line of protection. Then would ensue endless difficulties about the legality of captures, about the exact place of capture, and the neutral State would inevitably be embroiled. Supposing a ship "equipped innocently," to leave a port with a vessel by her side full of all the necessary guns and munitions, to be transferred as soon as possible, and the belligerent to remonstrate; would that belligerent be satisfied if for answer he got the pettifogging interpretation of Sir H. Cairns? Such elusions and evasions had been condemned in our own and the American Courts as mere disguises of a real offence. The trade in contraband of war could not be considered absolutely lawful; it was contra bonos mores. Why, the loan of money by a neutral to a belligerent formed a bad consideration for a contract. If the trade in contraband tended to entangle the neutral, why should it not be put down? Let the Court look at the Queen's proclamation, which, by virtue of the Act 16 and 17 Vict., cap. 107, prohibited the exportation of certain articles contraband of war. That Act, and the Acts on which it was founded, gave no such power over ships. Therefore it was necessary that concerning ships there should be special legislation. The true principle of interpretation was to construe the Act so as to "cure the mischief, advance the remedy, and give life and spirit to the law." To be guided by state papers and speeches in Parliament was a false principle. They only looked at the broadest and most glaring evil, not to the particular clauses of the Act. The rules of Washington were framed under peculiar circumstances. By treaty the enemies of France were debarred from buying and fitting ships in the American ports; and that being so, every other nation was protected, for by the law of nations the arming of vessels and selling them was only lawful when done without partiality. These rules were a political act; they embodied an assertion of the rights of neutrality against the assumption by the French Republic of a right to promote its warlike operations within the territory of the United States. It was only wise that in the absence of legislation Washington should refrain from the condemnation of vessels incipitibus usis; and all Kent meant to say was, that these rules were warranted by the principles of the law of nations. Let them consider the rules put forth by the British Government in reference to the Nashville and Tuscarora. On the theory of Sir H. Cairns it might be argued that, because those rules were in accordance with the law of nations, therefore the course of possible future legislation was to be prescribed by and confined to the regulations thus set forth. Why, the President himself, in his message of 3rd December, 1793, said that "it rested with Congress to correct and improve the existing regulations, to extend and regulate the doctrines laid down by the Courts of the United States." So Chancellor Livingston, who certainly held that, by the law of nations, ships might be manned and armed in neutral ports, also laid it down that "it was the duty of a neutral to preserve neutrality by vigilance in preventing any act of hostility; and that, therefore, the United States had endeavoured to prevent belligerents from 'fitting out' ships in their ports, and to punish those who might contribute to such attempts." Next, as to the construction of the Act: the preamble pointed to the welfare and peace of England, not to the duties of neutrals towards belligerents. The enlistment of men and the arming of ships were both spoken of as tending to endanger the peace and welfare of the country; there was no ground for reducing the enlistment clauses to a mere question of allegiance. The preamble further declared that the existing law was not sufficient; it must, then, have been intended to prevent a mischief which previous laws had failed to stop. It was clear that our legislature wished to govern beyond the American Act. The latter Act, in its enlistment clauses, did not forbid the enlistment of a foreigner to go and fight for his own State; whereas, by our Act, a Federal citizen attempting in this country to enlist another Federal to go to America to fight against the Confederates, would be within the Act. This principle was visible throughout the Act. Now, in the 7th section of the English Act the words were in the disjunctive, but in the conjunctive in the American Act. They said, in respect of the principal offence, "fit out and arm," we said, "equip, fit out, furnish, or arm;" they said "with intent," we said "with intent or in order;" so we had inserted the words, "transport or store-ship." Similarly, in the 8th section, they prohibited the "changing of guns for guns of greater calibre," we substituted the words "for other guns;" so they spoke of "equipments solely applicable to war," we said "equipments applicable to war." Now, the word "equip" included "to man;" but the word "fit out" excluded that notion. As Lord Tenterden said, "the master's duty is to fit out, victual, and man." The word "equip" certainly would include the strong bulwarks found in the Alexandra; so the word "fit out," would include the structure of "steam-rans" and "cupola vessels." Indeed, he was prepared to argue, if necessary, that the words would include every part of the process, from the laying of the first plank to the completion of the ship. The words "with intent or in order," referred, not to the equipment but to the employment of the ship; they could not qualify the "equipment." He contended that a ship not of a distinctively warlike character at all, but a mere merchant ship, a weak ship, might be within the Act; for such a ship might be armed sufficiently to injure trading vessels. Sir H. Cairns had argued that however certain the intent to commit hostilities might be, yet if the equipment was innocent the ship was free; that a vessel like the Alabama, with a structure exclusively and undeniably warlike, yet because she was equipped with things incipitibus usis, was free. The warlike purpose, he contended, determined the whole question. What were the facts? Skilled witnesses, looking at the Alexandra, were compelled to say that she was a ship-of-war; she could not be a merchantman; she might be a yacht; she was built as a gunboat; her bulwarks would have been prejudicial to her for all purposes but those of war; her hammock nettings also showed her warlike character. It was not material whether her warlike character existed in her structure or her rigging; the object clearly was to complete her as a gun-boat, and nothing more was necessary to be done short of arming than to screw an iron plate on her deck for pivot guns to run on; every equipment was in her with that exception. Was it, then, to be argued that if this iron plate had been screwed on, there would have been a breach of the Act, but that if the Phantom had sailed out with her with this pivot-plate and the guns on board, and the plate had been affixed and the guns transferred just outside the line of protection, then there would have been no breach? What was this but an evasion? The 8th section regulated the hospitality to be afforded to ships of war visiting our ports, cutting it down to those things which did not augment the warlike force of a belligerent. Because the legislature prohibited an addition to that power, was it to be argued that it did not prohibit the creation of a ship? The 7th section said, "you shall not create a ship of war," the 8th section said, "you shall not add to the warlike force of a ship." The Attorney-General then entered upon a minute criticism of the charge of the learned Judge at the trial, referring especially to his lordship's remark, that "you might make, equip, and arm a vessel, and then sell it to a belligerent, and you might equally do it under an order from the belligerent." That was the very point. Doubtless you might build, man, and arm a ship on speculation, take it abroad, and sell it, but to build one under a contract was exactly what you might not do. As to the point raised by Mr. Mellish, a new trial might be granted, on the ground that the verdict was against the evidence; for this was an action in rem, not a penal action. The Attorney-General concluded with an eloquent appeal to their lordships to interpret the statute wisely and dispassionately; not straining it at all, but giving effect to the plain meaning of the words, suppressing the mischief and advancing the remedy. The speech occupied eight hours and thirty minutes in delivery. The Solicitor-General then addressed the Court. He said that Sir H. Cairns had tried to narrow the rules of international law, and to cut down the Act of Parliament so as to square the two. It could not be said that the trade in contraband of war was absolutely legal. The argument in favour of the interests of trade and commerce was counterbalanced by the arguments in favour of peace. A ship was not a mere instrument of war; it carried the instruments of war; it was a nationality, a country in itself; it was a combination of armaments. The Act of Congress was not prescribed by the law of nations; Washington went to Congress to get wider powers, and our Act again was wider than that of Congress. Now as to the seventh section, the "intent" of the belligerent or his agent was sufficient; the object therefore, was prevention, and forfeiture would ensue irrespective of the intent of the equipper. There were two classes: "principal and accessories." In the first there might be the "intent," in the second a guilty knowledge, which would be evidence of the intent of the principal. If the aggressive power were essential then the words of the section became conjunctive. The United States v. Quincey proved that "fitting out" was something less than "arming." He agreed with the remark that fell from the Bench that that case had been much over-rated out-of-doors, and was by no means satisfactory. In the case of the Independencia, there was an absence of the men's rea. She was built, fitted out, and taken to Buenos Ayres on speculation; had she been ordered, it would have made all the difference. He agreed with the remark, that according to the American cases a man might fit out, arm, and man a vessel on speculation, run her into a foreign port, and sell her; but then there was the question for the jury, whether he intended to employ her in the service of one particular belligerent. If, however, such a case were to arise here, it might be a question whether the Courts of England would extend the doctrine so far. Sir H. Cairns required that the equipment must be distinctively warlike. He said that the equipment must be determined by the intent as to the employment of the ship. Suppose the case of an emigrant ship. If it could be proved that it was intended to carry troops by that ship, that intent would at once make the ship a transport within the Act. The proof of the design was the real point, and the building of a vessel in any way suited to fulfil the design was within the Act. The Act against the slave-trade said, "No man shall build, fit out, equip, or prepare a ship, &c., for the purpose of procuring any negro to be transported," &c. How was that interpreted in the American Courts? The learned counsel referred to Attorney-General v. Goodie, 12 Wheaton, p. 460, and 10 Wheaton, p. 133. In the former case, it was said that if the purpose existed that was sufficient; the act and the intent constituted the offence; and it was not an objection that the "fitting out" was imperfect. And in the latter case the Court said that "the law did not suppose that the equipment must be specially adapted for the purpose, nor was complete equipment necessary, if the design existed." The Queen's Advocate, Mr. Locke, Q.C., and Mr. T. Jones, followed on the side of the Crown. The Lord Chief Baron said that the Court would consider their judgment.

THE HONOURABLE WALKER.*

As a rule, English pamphlets are still-born, and seeing that ninety-nine out of a hundred of them are as heavy as Bradshaw or as Blue-books, we cannot be surprised that editors and authors' friends fling them into the waste-paper basket without reading a line more than the title-page. Somehow or other these matters are better managed on the other side of the Channel, and French pamphlets are popular both at home and abroad. Now we beg to inform all whom it may concern—that is, all who appreciate a clever and brilliant jeu d'esprit—that "A Familiar Epistle to Robert J. Walker" is the very opposite of the ordinary English pamphlet. It is droll enough to rouse the dormant risibility of the "pained impotent," and withal it so bristles with facts that no one can fail to perceive that it is a true story. The Hon. Walker is trotted out just as Rarey used to trot out his horses, and put through a most ludicrous performance for the amusement and edification of the public. The man "of many homes and many principles," is made, by copious extracts from his own speeches and his own writings, to tar and feather himself, until such a grotesque abortion of nature is presented, that no lens volens the spectator is compelled to follow the advice lately given by a noble lord to a Scotch audience, and to laugh heartily. It is a merit of this pamphlet that it is thoroughly genial as well as humorous and witty. The Hon. Walker is not gibbeted, for then to some persons he might be an object of pity as well as of contempt and ridicule; but the author merely directs our attention to the antics of the little creature, joyously and conceitedly wallowing in the mire. Between the histories of Titus Oates and the Hon. Walker there are a few close analogies. Both humbly craved and received the bounties of a party whom they afterwards deserted and slandered. But there is also a marked difference. The English Titus Oates made political prostitution and the hired informer's trade hideous, and his own name infamous; the Yankee Titus Oates has habituated his vices in such motley that we are merry when we ought to feel only disgust, and if the name of the Hon. Walker should be remembered for a generation, it will be so as food for laughter. A mere time-server can no more get a niche in the historical Chamber of Horrors than can a London pickpocket get his bust exhibited in Madame Tussaud's.

But who is the Hon. Walker? We will introduce him to our readers by quoting from a biographical sketch prefixed to the "Familiar Epistle," and although the biography is brief it is very complete:—

* A Familiar Epistle to Robert J. Walker, formerly of Pennsylvania, later of Mississippi, more recently of Washington, and last heard of in Mr. Coxwell's Balloon. From an Old Acquaintance. To which is prefixed a Biographical Sketch. London: Saunders, Otley and Co.

Robert J. Walker was once a man of mark in America, and has held some, if not all, of the titles which, with Republican simplicity, he affixes to his name. He is about as old as the century. Born and educated in Pennsylvania, after a futile attempt to obtain public office and position in his native State, he migrated to Mississippi, then almost a wilderness, with but 55,000 inhabitants. Here the shrewd and plausible young Yankee pushed himself rapidly forward to fortune and place, till at last the highest honour the State could confer was given him, in 1836. He was then made one of her senators in Congress, in which post he remained until 1845, thus filling that position at the very period of the act of Repudiation by his two States, (native and adopted), and before his successor in the Senate, Jefferson Davis, had entered public life. Mr. Walker was then, and for twenty years afterwards, a most "ultra-Southern" man in his sentiments, or at least in his speeches; including the most violent advocacy of State rights and slavery. In fact, like most men of Northern birth domiciled in the South, he out-heroded Herod in his violent affection for Southern doctrines and interests; and on this account, when the Southern administration of Mr. Polk came into power, a seat in his Cabinet was accorded to Mr. Walker. On the 3rd March, 1845, he left the Senate, and took the post of Secretary of the Treasury—not "Minister of Finance," as he terms himself; for that office does not exist in the United States, and its duties are performed by the Chairman of the Finance Committee in the Senate, not by the Secretary of the Treasury. He supported warmly the measures and principles of the Southern party while in the Senate and during his term of office, and here ends the most respectable part of his career. He never returned to Mississippi; but after 1845 lived chiefly in Washington and New York, professing to practice law in the Supreme Court, but really occupied in various speculations; his ideas, unlike his stature, being on the largest scale. Jefferson Davis succeeded him in the Senate, and years after, when he had almost forgotten as a public man, Robert J. Walker made a brief reappearance in public life, through the friendly suggestion of the man he now defames. President Pierce, in 1856, first nominated him "Commissioner to China," a title he now assumes, but on the duties of which he never entered, as he resigned his commission immediately. Mr. Buchanan, desirous of being useful to him (it is said at Mr. Davis's suggestion), appointed him Governor of the Territory of Kansas. This office Mr. Walker held only one year, Mr. Buchanan having been compelled to withdraw him in consequence of his abandonment of the policy and principles of the Administration, and his management of that Territory, then in a state of revolution. On his first arrival there, Mr. Walker's despatches denounced as "a band of disorganisers and revolutionists" the very men and the very party whom he afterwards joined; and from that hour he has been the sworn foe of the friends, political associates, and principles of his whole previous life; for Robert J. Walker was the first to insist on the recognition of Texas as a Slave State, and for the benefit of the Slave States, a "shrieker" then, not for "Union," but for "strict State Rights," a denouncer of Abolitionists and Englishmen, whom he placed in the same category; himself a slaveowner and an able defender of that "institution"—in fact, the very reverse, in practice and in profession, of all he now presumes to preach to the people of England.

In one detail the above sketch is not quite accurate. It is true the Hon. Walker was nominated Commissioner to China, and that he never entered on his duties; but it is not true that he resigned his commission. So far as we know, the Hon. Walker never resigned any place by which he could get money. The explanation is, that the Senate refused to confirm the appointment of the President, and so the Hon. Walker was never, ex de jure or de facto, Commissioner to China. There is an incident connected with the affair which the Hon. Walker cannot have forgotten. He had received some money either for outfit or for salary in advance, which he had to refund. The Hon. Walker was in a fix, for he had not the means of reimbursing the Treasury. Under these circumstances an eminent Washington banker came to the rescue, and found the cash. It is fortunate for him that his debtor has now placed on record so emphatic a condemnation of repudiation.

The Hon. Walker is now an agent of the Federal Government, and his business is apparently to show that Mr. Chase's greenbacks are as valuable as gold. It is no disparagement to the man "of many homes, and of many principles," to say that he has found the task assigned him impossible of execution. We Englishmen give Mr. Chase all due credit for his clever manipulation of the finances of the United States, but we are not gullible enough to believe that he has found the philosopher's stone, and we know all about kite-flying. The Hon. Walker has, however, done his best. Having no case, he has undertaken to abuse the other side. He commenced operations with a "letter," entitled "Jefferson Davis and Repudiation." How Mr. Lincoln must have roared when he saw the pamphlet! Why, Walker, the Hon. Walker, was senator for Mississippi when the repudiation was perpetrated, and Mr. Davis was not in public life; and the Hon. Walker, Senator for Mississippi, said nothing about repudiation until eight years after it had been accomplished. Read what "Jonathan Slingsby, of Screamsville," the author of "A Familiar Epistle," writes about it:—

The only appearance of Jeff. Davis in Mississippi during those years was in the very unimportant function of Presidential elector (a nominal responsibility only), in 1844, three years after the Repudiation question had been settled, and again, in 1845, in Congress of the United States, as representative for one year. He had resigned his seat in Congress to go to the Mexican war, as before stated, and did not actively commence his public life until 1847; never having said, spoken, or written anything about Repudiation until 1849, eight years after its demise, like a tardy Antony delivering a funeral oration over the disinterred body of a slaughtered Cæsar. You and I know, very well, Robert, that he was not "in at the death," as you were; and that he never was Governor of Mississippi, or held any office of profit or trust in that State, in the whole course of his life; and that your attempt to saddle him with the responsibility for acts in which he had no art or part, is an adroit afterthought of your own.

Robert! Robert! your vanity must surely have got the better of your discretion, when recalling your own biography, and enumerating your own past honours, you prove yourself (by figures that cannot lie) an accessory before the fact, when the deed was done—present, if not aiding and abetting—and can only find a letter, dated eight years afterwards, to criminate Jeff. Davis, who then first appears on the scene. People will ask if you, by your own admission, were really the man of the day in Mississippi from 1836 to 1845, when the act was concerted and perpetrated, how came it to pass that your opposition to the measure did not in that most Democratic State, impede your advancement, and destroy your popularity? And if you had really and truly (as you affirm), "always earnestly opposed the doctrine of Repudiation in Mississippi," how does it happen that in sending over to America for the proofs against Jeff. Davis, you did not also obtain some eloquent extracts from your own writings or speeches, to that effect?

Surely here is matter for jovial mirth. Whilst the Mississippi repudiation was in progress Mr. Davis was not in public life, and, therefore, cannot by any sophistry be held responsible for the offence; but the Hon. Walker was then the representative of Mississippi, and if there is any responsibility must bear his share of it—ay, and the lion's share. And yet the Hon. Walker charges Mr. Davis with the guilt of this "repudiation." What a parody of the well-known drama of Punch and Judy! The Hon. Walker, like the bumptious beadle, erects a gallows, and by mistake hangs himself.

Reader, get "A Familiar Epistle," for we cannot give you all the fun of it unless we reproduced the entire pamphlet; but we will, for amusement of our distant subscribers, give one more scene from the "Walker" farce.

The Hon. Walker has turned Abolitionist, that is, he talks Abolitionism. He raves about the Southerners as "the lords of the whip and the chain and the branding-iron." Now, the Hon. Walker lived in Mississippi, and was himself a slaveholder. He knows "that the 'whip, the chain and the branding-iron,' are mere figures of rhetoric—the first being used more rarely upon slaves than upon British soldiers and American seamen; the second never, except upon criminals white and black indifferently; and the 'branding-iron' being a pure invention of sensation-mongers." But perhaps the Hon. Walker draws a little on his own experience. He was a Yankee emigrant in the South, and all the Yankees are exceedingly spiteful to the negroes; and so it is possible that he cunningly devised some means by which he secretly tortured his slaves; but he knows that he dared not have done so openly. But we will let the Hon. Walker speak for himself. The following passages express his opinions when he was getting his bread out of the Democrats, and before he became the lackey of the Republicans:—

The avowed object of this party is the immediate abolition of Slavery. For this they traverse sea and land, for this they hold conventions in the capital of England, and there they brood over schemes of abolition in association with British societies. There they join in denunciations of their countrymen, until their hearts are filled with treason, and they return home Americans in name but Englishmen in feelings and principles. Let us all then feel and know, whether we live North or South, that this party, if not vanquished, must overthrow the Government and dissolve the Union.—Extract from Letter of Hon. R. J. WALKER, January 8th, 1844, in favour of Annexation of Texas.

If my voice could reach even the Black Republican party, I would say, Re-assemble your convention, re-nominate your candidates if you please, elect them if you can, take all the spoils, but tear down your African platform ere you endorse it at the polls, and give to the South a perfect justification for withdrawing from the Union.—ROBERT J. WALKER in 1856.

This movement at Lawrence was the beginning of a plan originating in that city, to organise insurrection throughout the Territory; and especially in all towns, cities, or counties where the Republican party have a majority. Lawrence is the hotbed of all the Abolition movements in the Territory. It is the town established by the Abolition Societies of the East, and whilst there are respectable people there, it is filled by a considerable number of mercenaries, who are paid by Abolition Societies to perpetuate and diffuse agitation throughout Kansas, and prevent a peaceful settlement of this question. Having failed in inducing their own so-called Topeka State Legislature to organise this insurrection, Lawrence has committed it herself, and, if not arrested, the rebellion will extend throughout the Territory. . . . In order to send this communication immediately by mail, I must close by assuring you that the spirit of rebellion pervades the great mass of the Republican party of this territory, instigated, as I entertain no doubt they are, by Eastern Societies.—Extract from Despatch of Hon. Walker, Governor of Kansas, July 15th, 1857.

The clever pamphlet is not by any means exhausted; but we must part from it, particularly as we desire elsewhere to find space for another and rather long extract from the Walker records. We have now—following the example of "Jonathan Slingsby"—contributed our mite towards the Hon. Walker's notoriety, and in conclusion we will throw out a hint which, if acted upon, will make him one of the lions of the ensuing festive season. Managers are anxiously casting about for the newest jokes to fill up the comic business of their pantomimes. What better material can they desire than the career of the Hon. Walker, as set forth in "A Familiar Epistle"? Pit, boxes, and gallery would be equally delighted with a pantomimic version of "The Yankee Walker's" attempt to bamboozle John Bull. A clown's song faithfully embodying the adventures of the man "of many homes and of many principles" would be more in vogue than was "Hot Collins" in the days of Grimaldi, and "The Yankee Walker" would be sure of a double encore.

LITERARY NOTES.

What prompted the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel* to write on the American question we cannot conceive. He is thoroughly ignorant both of the history of the American Union and of the principles of the Federal Constitution; and he writes, not in the style of an Englishman, but in that of a Massachusetts minister. His chief authorities are the Abolitionist organs of New York and Boston, and the correspondents of the Daily News and Morning Star; and he actually quotes the infamous scurrilities of the once notorious Helper as evidence against the Southern planters. We quote one or two sentences from his book, which sufficiently show his qualification for the task he has undertaken. He begins as follows:—

"At the time when the Americans rebelled against the British Crown, the slaveholding Colonies would not have entered into the Union without obtaining from the rest a recognition of their right to their slaves."

Which were "the rest?" Which of the States, in 1776, were not slaveholding? And is Mr. Noel aware that the clause for the rendition of fugitives from service passed in the Constitutional Convention as utterly unopposed as would be, in the House of Commons, a law obliging runaway apprentices to fulfil their contract? In the next chapter we find the following ridiculous proposition:—

"The revolt of the Slave States, which is essentially unlike the revolt of the United States, much more resembles a revolt of the Southern counties of England. If five millions and a half of Englishmen in the southern counties, well governed, with no wrongs to redress, no rights to claim, fairly represented, and fairly taxed (!) were to rebel against the Government in London, they would do exactly what five millions and a half of Americans, in similar circumstances, have done, in rebelling against the Government at Washington; and those who would condemn a rebellion of the southern counties ought not to support a rebellion of the Southern States."

Even the Morning Star would hardly be capable of such babyish nonsense as this; and no American schoolboy of ten years old would have any difficulty in pointing out the stupendous blunders involved in this comparison. These passages sufficiently explain the intellectual qualifications of Mr. Noel for the task he has undertaken. When we add that he is a warm admirer of General Butler, and that he records with bitter exultation the burning of the undefended town of Jackson by General Grant, we have said enough to enable our readers to judge whether his book can be worth their attention.

Professor Goldwin Smith† has set himself an impossible and more than Herculean labour, if he really hopes to prove that the Bible does not allow the existence of slavery, as compatible both with morality and with Christianity. But his argument does not grapple with this question at all. It amounts, in brief, to this: "Moses, because of the hardness of their hearts, allowed the Jews to keep slaves, and regulated their treatment. But this does not amount to an enactment of slavery as an institution generally necessary or desirable." Of course not: if it did, it would amount to a condemnation of free labour. But if Moses permitted slavery, and undertook to regulate it, it is clear that He who gave laws through Moses did not consider slavery as Mr. Smith considers it, a thing malum in se and altogether abominable. We are ready to grant to Mr. Smith that the ill-treatment of slaves is altogether contrary to the law of God and the spirit of Christianity. We do not pretend to say that there are not features in the American system of slavery, especially in its legal aspect, which might well be mitigated or abolished. But we do challenge Mr. Smith to find in the Bible any condemnation of the institution of slavery, as such, or to explain away the distinct sanction—observe, we do not say injunction—of slavery by the Mosaic law. We ask him, also, honestly to state, side by side, the Mosaic and the Southern law in regard to homicide committed on a slave; and then to say, if he dare, that the former gives a more effective protection to the servant than the latter; or if that consideration which is said to be the sole protection of the slave in the South, "that he is his master's money," is not stated in its most naked form by the Jewish lawgiver.

Dr. Forbes Winslow's work on mental diseases‡ will be of great service, if it induce hard-working men to take advice on the first alarm, to give prompt heed to the first symptoms of danger threatening the brain, and save themselves, while there is yet time, from a fate infinitely worse than death. To one case after another of the hundreds recorded in this volume we find the painful moral attached, "If the patient had taken advice when he first began to suffer from these premonitory symptoms his reason and his life might have been preserved." And Dr. Winslow states it as his own conviction that eight cases of brain disease out of ten are curable, if taken in time. His book is full of curious anecdote, but not pleasantly to be read just before bedtime, nor wholesome for people having the slightest tendency to hypochondria. It contains good advice for them, but it is hardly likely to have a beneficial effect upon their nerves.

The authoress of the "Heir of Redclyffe" has filled two thick volumes (small octavo) with curious learning about "Christian Names."|| For those who love this kind of knowledge, which is of more interest than use, these volumes will have many attractions. We wish, however, that the lady had finished her work. If she have corrected the press, she has been exceedingly careless in doing so; and on nearly every page we find some sentence which we cannot construe, or some collocation of words utterly without sense, through which the original meaning of the writer is hard to discover. It is a pity that a work on which so much labour has been bestowed should be disfigured by such blemishes as these.

Mrs. Browning's little work on "The Greek Christian Poets" deals, in that lady's charming manner, with a branch of learning with which few scholars are familiar. The authoress was one of those rare creatures who are learned without being pedantic, and while excelling the majority of men in intellect and knowledge, remain none the less womanly in heart and character. If only she had remembered that the English grammar was as well worth respect as the Latin, and had sought rather in the stern and coherent dialogues of the Greek tragedians than in the mystical and often unintelligible songs set down for the Chorus, she would have ranked among the greatest of our poets. We remember to have heard an excellent judge of scholarship say to a pupil—"Brown, two things are necessary in Greek iambs: first that they should be Greek, and secondly that they should be iambs; yours are neither." We have read English verses of Mrs. Browning's to which that censure would have been equally applicable; and a similar remark is provoked by some of her prose. Nevertheless, we heartily recommend to our readers this relic of one of our most exquisite female writers.

If Mr. Coventry Patmore would write English, or if he had any ear for rhyme or metre; if he had the critical faculty in sufficient degree to know when he is writing nonsense and when he is writing poetry, or if he would profit by censure and avail himself of admonition, he would earn deserved fame. We admire his pearls so much that we are very intolerant of having to seek them in a rubbish heap. "The Victories of Love"† is a dust-bin rich in neglected jewels and silver; but only reviewers—the chiffonniers of literature—are likely to find its treasures.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

[Though anticipated by his later dates of 10th and 17th October, published in THE INDEX of 5th and 19th inst. respectively, our correspondent's letter contains so many interesting items, which have not appeared before, that we give it in extenso.]

RICHMOND, October 3.

THERE is a pause in military operations. The latest intelligence we have from Chattanooga represents Rosecrans as fortifying himself strongly in front of that town, while the Confederates occupy the hills around it, and threaten the safety of his whole army. General Bragg's headquarters are on Missionary Ridge, from which height his batteries command completely the railway and county road leading eastwardly. Longstreet is possessed of Lookout Mountain, where he controls the approaches from the West. All the supplies for the Federal troops are drawn from Bridgeport, a point on the Tennessee River, several miles below Chattanooga, and are conveyed by a circuitous route to the latter place across a pontoon bridge immediately opposite the town. Our cavalry are over the river actively engaged in cutting off the forage and provision trains. Such is the "situation," as we understand it, at Chattanooga. The lines of Rosecrans are drawn without the corporate limits in a semicircular sweep, both his wings resting on the river. It is believed that General Bragg might carry his entrenchments by direct assault, but that he is averse to making the attempt because of the very great loss of life that would inevitably result from it. He is sanguine that the surrender of Rosecrans is only a question of time, unless the Federals can succeed in opening communications with the latter to reinforce his army and replenish his commissariat. Twenty-five thousand men have been withdrawn from the Army of the Potomac and sent to him via Washington, and the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and "Fighting Joe Hooker" has been called from his recent inglorious obscurity and sent to take Burnside's late command, which is to constitute a part of the relief. A very few days will show what is to be the result of the struggle in the West. If it shall terminate in the capitulation of Rosecrans, or the utter expulsion of his forces, shattered and demoralized, from Tennessee, the cause will look brighter than it has done at any time since the loss of Fort Donelson.

It is amusing to see how the press of the North falls back upon its stereotypes to account for the defeat of Chickamauga. They agree in the confession that only the obstinate courage and desperate fighting of General Thomas's corps on Sunday the 20th saved their whole army from rout and annihilation, and they hail General Thomas with plaudits as the fifteenth or twentieth savior of the Union; but the explanation of the advantage gained by the rebels is the same which has been given of all their reverses from the day of Bethel down to the night of the Wilderness. Rosecrans was overpowered by numbers. Of course he was. The miserable rebels were more than two to one against him. Four weeks ago, when Rosecrans was advancing, we were told that he was at the head of a host against which it would be madness to contend—that he had men enough to drive Bragg to the Gulf of Mexico, &c., and when Bragg fell back into Northern Georgia they boasted it was because he saw the folly of attempting a feeble and hopeless resistance to the resistless onset of their legions. But all at once these legions are scattered and driven into their earthworks at Chattanooga, leaving the ground behind them strewn with their dead and wounded; and then we learn that the grand army which was to overpower the Gulf States, and bring the South speedily to submission, was after all a very inconsiderable force, numbering not half as many as that beggarly herd of disaffected and undisciplined conscripts which the Confederate general had to oppose them. It is difficult to say which statement is the more discreditable to the enemy. If, as we believe, Rosecrans was fairly beaten by a force not at all greater than his own, the mendacity of their present assertions is amazing, especially when considered by the light of Mr. Seward's circular. If, on the other hand, as is most improbable, the western leader undertook the task of extermination with an inconsiderable body of men, the gasconade of the Yankee newspapers over the evacuation of Chattanooga can only be measured by his own inconceivable folly.

The greater part of the prisoners taken at Chickamauga have already arrived in this city and been consigned to the prison encampment at Buile-isle, where they will remain until exchanged, or until the return of cold weather shall necessitate a change of quarters. The stands of colours have also been sent by special messenger to the office of the adjutant-general. The thirty-six pieces of artillery captured in the fight, General Bragg will pretty surely turn to good account against their former owners.

Of our wounded generals we have encouraging accounts. The gallant Hood has borne the amputation of his leg with as little loss of strength as we could have expected, and his recovery may be hoped for in a few months. General Benning was very slightly injured, and is already in the saddle again. General Preston, of Kentucky, who was reported wounded, and subsequently as dying of his wounds at Atlanta, I am glad to learn, was not even scratched, and is at the head of his brigade, ready to win new laurels in this already glorious campaign.

Generals Preston Smith, of Tennessee, Helm, of Kentucky, and Deshler, of Alabama, all brigadiers, and all under forty years of age, fell while gallantly encouraging their men, and are deeply lamented by the army. Helm and Deshler had received a military education at the Academy at West Point. Helm was the son of the ex-Governor Helm and the grandson of the celebrated Ben Harden, and thus represented the highest elements of the Kentucky character. Deshler's father is a clergyman, living near Huntsville, Alabama. The general himself was as conspicuous for his piety as for his courage. Preston Smith, at the breaking out of the war, was engaged in the practice of the law at Memphis, in Tennessee, and had given great promise of future distinction in the courts. Thus, in every battle of this cruel strife, are the gifted young men of the South taken from us, till the lists of the early dead comprise more of genius and virtue than are left amongst the living. May God inspire their successors to emulate their bright example!

Contrary to the general expectation, there has been nothing done on the line of the Rappidan as yet, though all things portend an early engagement. I incline to the opinion that after waiting vainly several weeks for an advance on the part of Meade, General Lee is about to strike a blow at the enemy—a movement which would infuse the liveliest joy among his troops, who have been pining with inaction since the retreat from Gettysburg, and burning to repair the injury of that disaster. There never was an army in a state of higher efficiency than that of General Lee, in all respects, except in the cavalry arm, which falls behind the standard of excellence only for the want of horses. A good deal of dissension has taken place in the daily papers with regard to the corps of Job Stuart: some critics declaring that they accomplish but little in comparison with their opportunities. And I observe that a most agreeable and amiable writer in Blackwood's Magazine for September remarks upon their delinquency in discarding the use of the sabre in the charge, preferring their carbines and revolvers at short range as the more serviceable weapon. The English officer in Blackwood unwittingly does them injustice, I am sure, in his statement that they cannot be made to charge upon infantry, and the umilitary critics of the daily press at home write without a proper knowledge of the facts. The Confederate cavalry of General Lee are weak only in numbers. Again and again have they put to rout the heavy squadrons of Pleasanton and Stoneman, supported by large bodies of Yankee foot, and many successful charges have been made by Hampton and Fitzhugh Lee and Mumford upon the very bayonets of the enemy. In the use of the sabre they are undoubtedly inferior to the cavalry of the old military organisations of Europe, where all the dexterities of fence are made a part of the early instructions of the drill sergeant; but it may be doubted if in perfect command of the horse and endurance in the saddle they are not superior to any regular cavalry on earth. Mistakes have been made in the use of the dragons, heretofore, which, we may hope, experience will correct; but when the history of the war shall be fully and faithfully written it will be seen that the Confederate trooper has borne his due share of the hardships and reaped his proper measure of the glory of the conflict.

With reference to Charleston, I can but refer you to my last week's letter, and with that you will apply what was said therein to the intervening period. The bombardment is maintained on both sides, our batteries throwing shells into the works on Morris Island, and the enemy's monster guns hurling great cylinders of iron at the debris of Sumter, monotonously, at intervals, throughout every day. The enemy's fire is exceedingly accurate, and their explosives rarely miss bursting; so that Sumter is in a chronic state of eruption, breaking out every few minutes with brick and mortar dust, and scattering the fragments of its once firm walls over the blue waters that girdle the island fortress. In spite of the well-directed fire of our own rifled ordnance, the Yankees make good progress with their Morris Island defences. The negroes and Irishmen are killed off daily; but the covered ways and bomb-proof casemates are carried on to completion. If Charleston can be taken by engineering, by mechanical contrivances, by a line of telegraph up and down the beach, by signal stations, &c., &c., Gilmore will assuredly do it; but the utmost that he will be enabled to accomplish by his indefatigable labours on the island, it is thought, will be to obtain command of the entrance to the harbour, and thus maintain the blockade of the port to the relief of the fleet, which has hitherto been kept off the bar. As yet, the Swamp Angel is silent, and the city is undisturbed. It cannot be long before their further plan of attack upon the harbour is developed, and then we may look for another trial of strength between the besiegers and the besieged.

The total number of Federal prisoners now confined in this city, irrespective of commissioned officers, is 8,550, and more are on their way to the Confederate capital, so long the object of their destination. General Winder estimates that provision will have to be made for 14,000 or 15,000 during the winter, and he has made application in person to the city council to be allowed the privilege of using the public almshouse, a very handsome and commodious building on the north-eastern extremity of the town, as a military prison; but the council refused to turn the paupers adrift for the accommodation of Yankee prisoners, and it will be necessary to fit up more tobacco factories for the reception of those sojourners. The press of the Northern cities has endeavoured to excite resentment against the Confederate authorities by false representations with regard to the comfort of these factories, alleging that they are loathsome places of confinement, and that cruelty is thus officially practised against their soldiers that fall into our hands. The factories are, in point of fact, as comfortable and healthy prisons as could possibly be provided. The very saturation of the floors with the nicotine of the tobacco, is an effectual security against vermin, which are the greatest pests of the common gaol, and it was indispensable for the purposes to which the buildings were originally devoted that they should be close against the weather. No one who has visited the military prisons of Richmond has failed to observe the cleanliness and order of these establishments, although the habits of the miscellaneous herd that have infested them since the beginning of the war have made the maintenance of cleanliness and order no easy matter to the commandants.

General Pemberton, who commanded at Vicksburg, is at present in the city. General Kemper is also here, slowly recovering from his Gettysburg wounds.

The weather is glorious—the beautiful October, which streaks the woods with crimson and saffron, and hangs its curtains of haze along the horizon, blesses us with delicious days, and starlit, tranquil nights, all unconcerned with the war, its devastations and alarms.

WAR CHRISTIANITY.

WHATEVER may be the honesty of Mr. Ward Beecher's political creed, his faith in English ignorance is unquestionably very great. But for a conviction, almost respectable from its intensity, a Yankee "War Christian" would hardly have the audacity to attempt to palm off, even on the packed audience of Exeter Hall, fictions so simple as those with which this reverend gentleman entertained his hearers on the evening of the 20th ultimo. Unfortunately, we are not quite so ignorant as Mr. Beecher fondly imagines. We have little space to waste on the exposure of fallacies so transparent; but, if only with the charitable object of sparing him such exhibitions in future, we will give Mr. Beecher a few lines. We will not descend to argument. We will confine ourselves entirely to fact.

It is simply an imposition, then, on popular credulity to lay claim to the slightest credit on behalf of the North with respect to emancipation. It is simply untrue to say that, as States, they have ever made a sacrifice for the sake of the blacks, or taken a step with regard to slavery with any other object than that of making out of it the largest possible profit to themselves. It is simply a falsehood—stamped as such by the words of the Constitution, no less than by every circumstance and every document surrounding or bearing upon it—to attribute to the Constitution of the United States any squeamishness with regard to slavery, any idea of a "compromise" with it, any thought of putting it away, or even out of sight, as an unholy or undesirable thing. Most impudently untrue of all is it to claim for New England in particular any superiority in this respect.

The truth lies in precisely the opposite direction. If slavery is a sin, the guilt of it lies upon New England with tenfold weight. So far as the private acts of individuals are concerned, there is no single Southern State but has emancipated more slaves than all her six combined. As a body of States, she has not freed a single slave. She never dreamed of emancipation till her own slaves were found not to pay, and she had sold them to the South. So far as their laws are concerned, four of her six States are slave States now. It is only when, by the separation of the other slave States, she is losing the benefit of their slavery, that she begins to clamour in earnest for its abolition. Whilst, for the worst and most crying evil of it all, it is not only by the enterprising cupid-ity of Northern men that the slave trade has been exulsively maintained, but it was by the arguments, the entreaties, the threats of the New England States that its legality was insisted on for years throughout the Union against the persistent and united opposition of the South.

Such are the facts. They are susceptible of the easiest, the most abundant, and the most irrefragable proof. Let Mr. Ward Beecher beware how, in his eager hatred of those whom he was proud to call brethren so long as the brotherhood could be turned to gain, he force them too much on the minds of honest Englishmen.—Church and State Review.

THE "SO-CALLED" EARL RUSSELL.—A correspondent of the Charleston Courier, referring to Earl Russell's designating the Confederate States, as the 'so-called' Confederate States, observes:—"Nobody that knows anything about them can doubt that they are States, and that they are confederated. The name Confederate States, therefore, truly expresses what they are. The fact that they are Confederate States is as certain as the existence of the sun or the moon, and it would not be more absurd to speak of the sun as the 'so-called' sun, or the moon as the 'so-called' moon. The late Lord John is a Russell and an Earl, and is therefore properly called Earl Russell, but by the authority of his own example he ought to be styled the 'so-called' Earl Russell." The correspondent of the Courier was probably not aware, or he would have been less angry, that for the greater part of Earl Russell's life—that is, until he rose to the Peerage—he was designated in official documents as "John Russell, commonly called Lord John Russell," he only being a lord by courtesy. The "so-called" is a mere diplomatic formality that signifies nothing.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOV. 25. MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

THERE has been quite a change in the aspect of the Money Market during the past few days, and the general gloominess which prevailed last week has given place to brighter prospects, and in all monetary circles business has assumed a more encouraging tone. The anticipations in some quarters that the Bank directors would, at the last weekly meeting, have advanced the rate to 7 per cent., were not realised; and the Bank return fully justified them in not announcing any alteration, as it proved far more favourable than was anticipated, and showed that the reported withdrawals of gold had been overstated. At the same time, far more satisfactory accounts arrived from the Paris Bourse, which greatly tended to allay the unsatisfactory feeling which prevailed. The demand for money, both at the Bank and in the open market, has only been moderate, but the brokers do not yet seem disposed to lower their terms to any considerable extent. The general quotation is still 6 per cent., though in a few exceptional cases 5½ has been taken. The joint-stock banks are not quite so hard in their terms, most of them now making advances at 5½ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money is tolerably plentiful, and short loans on Government Securities can now be obtained at 3 to 3½ per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The specie movements at the Bank of England have not been on a very extended scale; but, for the first time during the past month, a small amount of gold, £17,000, has been sent in; but on the other hand, £220,000 has been taken out, chiefly for Alexandria. The only arrival of specie has been £15,460 by the Canada from New York. Bar gold has been in considerable demand for exportation, but bar silver is again becoming dull. The supply by the last West India packet has been sold at 61½d. per oz., being a decline of ½d. as compared with the previous sales. Mexican dollars are not at present in demand, and the supply on hand is small. The last mail for the East took out £302,052, of which £214,000 was in gold, and £88,000 silver. The proportions were—to India, £51,000; China and the Straits, £38,052; and Alexandria, £213,000.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The market for the English Funded Securities has within the past few days shown more elasticity than for some time past. The Bank Directors not having further advanced the rate of discount on Thursday gave a general stimulus to operations, and dealings freely took place at a slight advance in prices. Since then business has continued moderately active, and an advance on the week of ½ per cent. has been established, Consols closing at 92½ to ¼ for money, and 91¼ to ¾ ex. div. for the account. Exchequer Bills also show an improvement, being at present 6s. to 2s. dis. The foreign stock market has, under the circumstances, been particularly quiet. An average amount of transactions has taken place, but without exhibiting anything of a speculative movement, and, in sympathy with the other markets, quotations, in most instances, show an improvement. Greek Stock closes at at 30½ to 31; Mexican, 37½ to 38; Spanish Passives, 34½ to 34½; Do. Certificates, 13½ to 14; Turkish (1854), 89½ to 90, and do. (1862), 70 to 70½.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The dealings in American Government and Railway Securities continue to be exceedingly limited, and notwithstanding the nature of this intelligence recently received with regard to the progress of the war, there seems no disposition whatever on the part of the brokers to operate except to a very limited extent. The following comprise the dealings of the week:—United States Six per Cents, 65, 65½. Ditto, ditto, Five per Cent., 59. Atlantic and Great Western, New York Section, first mortgage, 76½, 76 and 76½. Ditto, ditto, Pennsylvania Section, 76, 76½, 76½, and 76½. Illinois Central, Six per Cents, 83. Ditto, ditto, Seven per Cents, 73. Ditto, $100 shares, $90 paid, 23, and 22½ dis. Ditto, ditto, all paid, 70½. Panama Railway, second mortgage, 106. Pennsylvania Central Bonds, second mortgage 88. Philadelphia and Reading Railway, $50 shares 36.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The general aspect of the railway share market has considerably improved within the last few days; the more settled state of the money market, and the better appearance of things in most departments, causing dealers to operate more freely, and for most of the leading descriptions of securities prices have advanced, and with a prospect of further improvement. The most important changes have been a rise of 1 per cent. in Bristol and Exeter, Edinburgh and Glasgow, Great Western, Brighton, London and North-Western, London and South-Western, and South-Eastern; of ½ per cent. in Great Eastern, of ¼ per cent. in Great Northern, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, North Staffordshire, and North British, and of ¼ per cent. in Midland and North-Eastern (Derwick). On the other hand there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in Great Southern and Western (Ireland) and Metropolitan. In Foreign Railway shares, although the business transacted has not been of a very active character, there has been general firmness exhibited with respect to prices, and the same may be said with regard to shares in British possessions.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

There have been few transactions in this Stock during the week, but purchases could only be made at full rates, the quotations ranging from 54—56 to 56—58. We close to-day at the higher rate, with a steady market.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

A General Court of the Governor and Company of Adventurers trading with Hudson's Bay has just been held at their house in Fenchurch-street, for the purpose of electing a Governor and Deputy Governor and Committee for the ensuing year. Sir Edmund Head presided. The report recommended the payment of an interim dividend of 5s. per share in January next, being equal to the rate usually distributed at that period, the regular accounts not being made up till the 31st May in each year. The fur trade this year, so far as the results could be ascertained, had been more than ordinarily favourable; the construction of a line of telegraph from Canada to British Columbia had been found to be perfectly practicable, and the requisite negotiations on the subject were in progress with the home Government as well as with the Government of the two colonies. A mineral survey of the Company's property, with reference to the fact of gold having been found within its limits, is hoped to be effected within a moderate time; and, finally, it was announced that the Government of the United States had manifested a disposition to deal fairly and promptly with those large claims which the Company possess under the Oregon treaty.

The report was adopted without any discussion, and the following officers were elected: Governor, Sir Edmund Head, Bart.; Deputy-Governor, Mr. Curtis Miranda Sampson. Committee: Mr. Eden Colville, Mr. George Lyall, M.P., Mr. Daniel Meinertzhagen, Mr. James Stewart Hodgson, Mr. J. H. W. Schroeder, Mr. Richard Potter, and Mr. Bonamy Dobree. On the motion of Mr. R. A. Heath, a vote of thanks was accorded to the committee, and the meeting separated. A meeting has been held of the Inns of Court Hotel Company, when some strong remarks were made with regard to the accounts, several items of expenditure being considered excessive. It was explained that these expenses were incurred by the promoters of the Company, and not by the directors, who were nevertheless bound by the articles of association to pay them. A very favourable opinion was expressed with regard to the eligibility of the site selected for the hotel, and to the prospects of the undertaking generally. The report was adopted. The third ordinary general meeting of the Bahia Steam Navigation Company was held this afternoon at the office, Bridge-street, Westminster, when a report was read and adopted which stated that the directors congratulated the shareholders on the steady increase in the receipts of the company, and the prospect of a still larger revenue in the next year. The balance to credit of traffic account was £8,688, which, after deducting expenses in London and insurance, would leave a profit of £5,736, out of which the directors announced a dividend at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, leaving a balance of £582 to be carried to the reserve account, which would then amount to £2,990.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

A prospectus has just been issued of the West India and Pacific Steam Ship Company (Limited). It is intended by the directors, the principal members of which are actively engaged in the commerce of London and Liverpool, to assume the working and further development of a line of steamers already established between Liverpool, the West Indies and the eastern terminus of the Panama railroad, and to employ such branch steamers as shall bring the main line into communication with the West India Islands, Venezuela and Mexico. Subsequently, other routes in that part of the world are to be occupied. It is remarked that the success which has attended the employment of steamers on the Pacific is shown in the fact that the shares of the Pacific Steam Navigation Company and the Pacific Mail Steam Ship Company are now worth upwards of 50 per cent. premium. It is believed that the traffic on the Atlantic side of the Isthmus is likewise susceptible of great development, and there will be the less tendency to competition with established interests, because the traffic which the Company aim at is mainly that of goods. A prediction is made that the time is not far distant when the tea, silks and other products of China will be conveyed in less than sixty days by steam to England by the Panama route. Operations are to be entered upon at once, owing to the transfer of an existing business to this Company—The Bedford Hotel Company of Brighton (Limited), is another new scheme just put forward; the objects of the undertaking being to effect an amalgamation with the Brighton Club and Norfolk Hotel Company, by which mutual advantages will be secured. The capital proposed is £100,000, in 10,000 shares of £10 each. A great portion of the capital is said to be already subscribed.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The American Produce Markets have generally been the turn firmer since our last, the tendency of money having appeared more favourable. The advices to hand from New York have not had any marked effect. For cotton, the demand during the last day or two has somewhat improved, and a fall of ½d. per lb. at the close of the previous week has been recovered. Provisions continue to sell steadily; New York bacon sides making 46s. to 48s. for sizeable kinds. Arrivals of American beef are now daily expected, and buyers keep their orders open as far as possible, in consequence. American butter moves off to a fair extent, at 9s. to 10s. for the better sorts. In lard there is very little doing. The grain markets are showing increased firmness, and for good qualities of American wheat, rates are 1s. per lb. higher. Barley flour is also the turn dearer, and of both articles, home as well as foreign, supplies are light. Petroleum has sold steadily during the week, at 1s. 11d. to 2s. per gallon for refined, and £18 per ton for crude. In oils, the only variation is another decline in the price of linseed, which is now quoted 39s. to 39s. 6d. Tallow continues depressed, and prices are further reduced, 6d. to 9d. per cwt. At the colonial wool sales, which are progressing with a good deal of animation, larger purchases than usual have been made on American accounts, in wool ranging from 11½d. per lb. and under. The jute speculation has somewhat abated, and to-day some parcels were realized at 10s. to 20s. per ton under the highest point. Hemp of all kinds remains without essential change. The tobacco trade has not presented any new feature. Generally, dealers buy only for immediate demand, but stocks are well held, and quotations for the most part firm. French turpentine has declined to 65s. per cwt., but American remains nominally as last quoted. The sugar speculation is still unchecked, and we have again to record an advance in prices, the market closing with an upward tendency. For cheapest Manilla sugar 41s. was paid to-day. In drugs, dyes, and drapery articles we have but little change to note, further than a decline in camphor to 100s. Metals generally have been more active. Scotch iron has risen to 64s. cast, and spelter is 5s. per ton dearer. English tin is reduced £3, but foreign is unaltered, Straits commanding £113 per ton.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Nov. 25.

Our Cotton Market within the last few days has again shown a decided improvement both as regards the amount of business transacted and the prices obtained. The late stop put to the trade by the uncertainty which prevailed, with reference to the value of money has been entirely removed by the improved state of affairs both here and in Paris, and both sellers and purchasers are operating with far more freedom. American cotton has been more firmly offered, and at one period a decline of 1d. per lb. had to be submitted to, but the markets have now all improved, and to-day are quoted at from ¼ to ½ advance upon nearly all descriptions. The sales of the week have amounted to 36,000 bales, of which 17,600 bales were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present period have been 2,365,210 bales; and to the same period in 1862, 2,434,510 bales. The total imports this year have been 1,491,474 bales; and to the same period last year 1,084,053 bales. There have been exported this year 431,042 bales; to the like period in 1862 400,613 bales. Taken for consumption this year 1,193,500 bales; same period last year 1,030,800 bales. Taken on speculation this year 659,100 bales; same in 1862, 969,760 bales. Computed Stocks at the present time 256,290 bales, and to the same time last year 291,660 bales. The closing quotations were: American 27d. to 28½d.; Egyptian 28d. to 29½d.; Fair Dhollerah 22½d. to 23½d.; and Surats 16½d. to 24½d.

MANCHESTER, November 24.

The depression of feeling existing at the date of our last report has been alleviated to some extent by the non-advance in the Bank rate of discount on Thursday; yet there is an impression on peoples minds that the Money Market will become more stringent as the new crop of cotton comes forward from the various sources of supply, owing to an increased amount of specie having to be transmitted by each successive mail to the East, to pay for cotton shipments.

Manufacturers and spinners, whose contracts are about running out, are becoming rather anxious to take fresh orders at a considerable decline on the prices of a fortnight back; but very little business is being done.

Stocks of goods are beginning to accumulate in agents' hands, and if there be no increase in demand shortly, there will be a resort to short time again on the part of manufacturers.

Yesterday and to-day there has been a firmer feeling displayed in the Liverpool market, and prices are quoted ¼d. to ½d. per lb. higher here. On the strength of this, sellers here have put up their quotations to the same extent, and some little business has been effected at this advance.

There is a good demand to-day for 44 inch. shirtings at increased rates; but as this trade is only very small in the aggregate, the general tone of the market is not affected thereby.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country. Strange and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been slandered, abused, and libelled beyond any civilized people on earth, insult added to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality, shielded and armoured-plated with the cry of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality," while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe it, and think, on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an inefficient blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over from this country, both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater, sacrificing her commercial interests to a fear of War with the North. The so-called "neutrality" practised against the South has been their greatest hardship, and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. How strange and inexplicable has been our conduct towards the combatants!—the Confederate States have declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South consented, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an iron thunderbolt in the other, and we have given him a serpent. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally declare what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence; nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. It is time that we should decide between the two. In our opinion the North should blot out the South or not, or whether the South ought to have her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the freemen of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her to the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle men to be free, then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of concert of action among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends, as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire.

WM. H. TRAPMAN, Esq.,

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathize with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Wainier Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOFZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

THE COTTON TRADE: ITS BEARING UPON THE PROSPERITY OF GREAT BRITAIN, AND COMMERCE OF THE AMERICAN REPUBLICS; CONSIDERED IN CONNECTION WITH THE SYSTEM OF NEGRO SLAVERY IN THE CONFEDERATE STATES. BY GEORGE MCHENRY. "The resolutions of the States who favoured Abolition were adopted entirely with the view of obtaining additional political power, and imposed on the South the strongest obligation to rise in self-defence. It was a fraternal feeling which induced the Southern States to make common cause with the North in the war of the Revolution. The South had no especial cause of complaint; it was flourishing by its trade with Great Britain; but it was actuated by that feeling and principle, to take up arms; and now, was she to be asked to give up her domestic institutions? The South asked for no new guarantee, no new security; but she desired that the Constitution should be preserved from violation."—Speech of Jefferson Davis, United States Senate, July 12, 1863. ### AMERICA.

ANOTHER Federal army is "safe." General Burnside, like Rosecrans and many other Northern commanders, has been defeated in the open field, and driven to his inner line of defences, and, not perceiving that for an invader to be on the defensive, to be besieged, to be skulking behind fortifications, is to be defeated, writes confidently to his Government that his position is impregnable, that he is "safe."

We ought, however, to give General Burnside credit for showing plenty of fight. He advanced as long as he could, and in his retreat warmly contested his ground. On the 14th November, General Longstreet crossed the Tennessee River at London, but for days and even weeks before this, Burnside had been harassed. The 850 prisoners from his division, of which the arrival is announced in Richmond, are captures made prior to the operations that ensued from the Confederate passage of the Tennessee. One effect of the constant pressure on Burnside's outposts was to keep him on the alert, and accordingly, the first portion of Longstreet's troops that crossed on the 14th were, in attempting to move towards Lender, driven back nearly to the river. During the night the rest of the Confederates crossed, and on the 15th the Federals retreated, being closely followed up. With undiminished vigour the Confederates made several assaults during the night, and in the morning (16th) the Federals retreated to Concord, where they formed line of battle, and a fight ensued, which lasted until nightfall. We may judge of the character of this battle from what followed. The Federals gave up all hope of disputing the advance of the Confederates, and in darkness beat a hasty retreat to their inner line of defences at Knoxville. Still they were not permitted to rest by their vigilant, untiring pursuers. Early on the 18th they were attacked at several points, and heavy skirmishing continued until evening. On the 19th, after a cannonading, the Confederates charged, and this was decisive. The Federals were ousted from all their positions and fled into Knoxville; the Confederates capturing a portion of the chief fortifications only half a mile from the town, and after that Knoxville was completely invested. Such is a brief outline of events, which are interesting in themselves and will probably have a highly important bearing on the issue of the campaign in Tennessee.

The Federals estimate their own loss on the 16th and 19th at 500, and the Confederate loss at 1,400. We expect that 500 is far too low a figure for so much fighting; and moreover, as the Federals were always retreating, it is utterly impossible that they could ascertain the loss of their enemy. When General Halleck dresses up an account for the market, he should not venture on arithmetical assertions that everybody knows must be mere guess-work.

General Meade has visited Washington to consult with Mr. Lincoln, and the impression in the North is that he will now go into winter quarters. Others think that he will immediately assume the offensive. At present, however, he has been as quiet as the troublesome Confederates will permit him to be. The news from Virginia is made as meagre and indefinite as possible, but it has crept out—perhaps as a prelude of worse intelligence—that there has been sharp skirmishing on the Rapidan, and that the Federals have been driven back. This must be rather discouraging to those who urge Meade to advance, on the ground that Lee has sent all his troops to Bragg, and has only a thin line to deceive his enemy. General Meade is evidently of a different opinion.

At Chattanooga there has been no change of importance. It is rumoured that both sides have been heavily reinforced, but all such rumours are in themselves totally unworthy of credence. The Confederates continue to shell the Federal position, and if we may believe the Northern reports, with as little effect as the Federal bombardment produces on Fort Sumter. It seems that in war science will not do all, and that battles are to be won by close quarters and the bayonet.

The only item from Charleston, besides the stereotyped "bombardment of Sumter continued, and no harm done," is that four monitors have passed up the channel to ascertain the depth of water. It is said that twenty-five shots were fired into the city without doing any damage.

General Banks' expedition landed at Brazos Island, Texas, on the 3rd and 4th November. As soon as the Confederate authorities were cognizant of this, they destroyed Fort Brown, and a portion of Brownsville, a small wooden town of rather less than 3,000 inhabitants, and notorious as the most rowdy place in Texas. The Confederate forces being withdrawn, General Banks occupied Brownsville on the 5th without opposition. There is no doubt the Texan boys will give a good account of themselves in their own peculiar manner.

But after all, General Banks may not long trouble the Texans. It is said that "a revolution in favour of the French was feared at Matamoras; and as the American consul was fearing personal violence, a portion of Banks' troops were in readiness to go to his protection, if necessary." If Banks means to keep even temporarily a footing in Texas he has not a man to spare, and looking at the position of affairs in Virginia and Tennessee, and remembering that at New York the bounty paid for a recruit is $700, we should have supposed the Federals had enough to engage their attention without interfering in Mexican affairs. The paragraph we have quoted is probably only brag and bluster. But it is a dangerous game in this case, and an accident may lead to a complication not intended by the authorities at Washington.

A certain class of people ought to have good memories. It was announced in Washington that the advanced guard of General Washburn in the Teche country was attacked by the Confederates on the 3rd November and beaten, but that it rallied and repulsed the Confederates with the loss of 200 prisoners and 100 killed and wounded. It was further notified that "the Federals lost 40 men killed." It is now admitted that the Federal loss on that occasion was 677 men. It will better enable us to understand the progress of the war if we recollect that the Federals always apply the rule of division to their own losses and that of multiplication to those of their enemy. Indeed, to confess the truth would be highly inconvenient, for their losses are frequent and heavy. It is stated that in the late attack upon Franklin's troops near Opelousas the Federal loss "was 670 men, one regiment being captured entire."

Our New York correspondent gives what we believe to be the only rational account of the alleged conspiracy for making Canada the basis of a Confederate invasion. His view of the duty of Lord Monck under the circumstances, cannot fail to strike every candid mind as just and equitable; and if the Governor-General of Canada had indeed played the part ascribed to him by the Northern press and Government, it cannot be doubted that an indignant public opinion in this country would call him to a strict accountability. We desire, also, to invite the special attention of our readers to our correspondent's clear and moderate statement of the questions now at issue between the two American belligerents, in reference to the exchange of prisoners—questions which have furnished occasion for slanderous accusations of the South, as inconsistent with the attested character of its people, as their promulgation is in accordance with the notorious practice of the Yankees.

The Supreme Court of Pennsylvania gave judgment on the 9th November upon the constitutionality of the Federal Conscription Act. The matter was brought before the Court in the form of three suits in equity, the plaintiffs severally praying for an injunction to restrain the defendants (draft officers) from coercing them, the plaintiffs, to enter the army. It was not alleged that the defendants were not acting according to the instructions contained in the Act of Congress; but that the Act itself was unconstitutional and therefore invalid. Chief Justice Lowry commented on the difficulty of giving a judgment upon an issue that was a political question, because both sides thought themselves morally right and would not change their views in accordance with the Court. But the Conscription Act was an exception to the rule, for the appeal was to the Constitution, a "written standard." Now it is not denied that Congress has the power to raise armies, and therefore the point in dispute is as to the mode of doing it. "Is it admissible to call forced recruiting a necessary and proper mode of exercising this power?" Assuredly it is not for the suppression of a rebellion, because the Constitution provides a remedy under such circumstances, viz., calling out the militia of the States; and when a remedy is provided, it is evident that all other modes or remedies are forbidden. It is urged that the militia is inefficient or insufficient. Several Presidents have noticed the inefficiency of the militia and advised its reorganisation, and so it is probable that the allegation is true. But must we, therefore, conclude that Congress has the power to set aside the constitutional remedy and to substitute another? No; for Congress is authorised to make the militia as effective as possible, and so is barred the plea of inefficiency. But Chief Justice Lowry properly remarks that it is not the function of the Judiciary to sit in judgment on the reasons that prompt the action of the Legislature. An Act of Congress might be passed for a very inadequate reason, but that would not make it less binding. If Congress can pass such a conscription law "for any reason, we must sustain it for that reason. The question then is, may Congress, independent of the fact of rebellion or invasion, make forced levies in order to recruit the regular army?" Against an affirmative reply there are two objections. Such an authority is not granted to Congress by the Constitution and is altogether opposed to the spirit of the Constitution. "In all other matters of allowed contribution to the Union, duties, imports, excises, and direct taxes, the rule of uniformity, equality, or proportion is fixed in the Constitution." Now it is likely, that if the framers of the Constitution had contemplated the concession of such a power to the Federal Government as that of conscripting for the army, that it would have been granted without any rule or restriction? Is it likely that the Federal Government, which is the creature of party, would have been authorised to draft for the army, without the rights of the several States being protected by express stipulations? Then again, we must remember that the militia was an institution before the creation of the Federal Government, and that its continued existence is guaranteed in the Constitution. But if the Federal Government is empowered to make forced levies when, where, and how it will, it is plain that the militia only exists by sufferance and may at any moment be abolished; for by such levies the Federal Government can conscript the very population that feeds the militia. Now volunteering is not antagonistic to the militia, but only calls for that portion of the people who are not necessarily included in the militia; and as in case of insurrection or invasion, the Federal Government has the power to call upon the militia for aid, the militia is at all times available for the defence of the country. There are, then, four principal reasons upon which the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania granted the injunction prayed for, and by so doing pronounced the Conscription Act unconstitutional.—1. The Constitution grants a specific remedy for rebellion, and therefore all other remedies are not granted; and this is an argument of peculiar force, inasmuch as the Constitution reserves to the States all powers not specifically bestowed upon the Federal Government. 2. In case of rebellion, the Federal Government is authorised to call upon the militia, and if that force is inefficient, it is empowered to add to its efficiency, and is therefore bound to increase its forces through the militia. 3. The Federal Government is empowered to raise armies, but not through a forced conscription, because such a mode would place particular States and parties at the mercy of the General Government, as the Constitution does not provide for the protection of the States and citizens in an emergency which it does not contemplate. 4. It is provided by the Constitution that the States' militia shall be conserved; but that is impossible if the Federal Government has an unlimited power of conscription, which includes the right to conscript the whole population from which the militia is recruited, the existing militia, and even the State officers.

Thus the second State in the Union, by the voice of its Supreme Court, decides that the Conscription Act is unconstitutional and therefore invalid. A fortnight since we noticed that the Supreme Court of New York, the first State in the Union, had decided that the Indemnity Act was unconstitutional and invalid. These decisions may not have much practical effect, but they serve to show how thoroughly revolutionary is the present Washington Government. The Lincoln Administration may ignore the State tribunals, as it did in Pennsylvania, by refusing to appear before the Supreme Court, but by so doing it will only give a fresh proof that it is unable to appeal to the law, and depends upon the sword for its support.

The Richmond Enquirer of the 11th November gives some statistics about the bombardments of Fort Sumter, from their commencement on the 17th August until the 5th November. The number of shots fired at it was 15,583, and of these 12,302 struck. The casualties of the garrison were 27 killed and 69 wounded. The flag was shot down 34 times. The average weight of shot being 200 pounds, the weight of iron was 3,116,000 pounds, or 115,430 pounds of iron to each man killed, 30,370 pounds of iron to each casualty. If the charges of powder averaged 15 pounds, we have 233,745 pounds of powder used, or 8,657 pounds of powder to each man killed, and 2,434 pounds of powder to each casualty. Thus the North will find that although to bombard a fortress at a distance is very noisy and safe work, it is also very expensive and ineffectual.

Complaints are made in the Northern papers about the treatment of Federal prisoners in Richmond. The truth is, they are comfortably housed, clad as well and often better than Confederate soldiers, have the same rations as Confederate soldiers, and in sickness are as well cared for as Confederate soldiers. To treat their prisoners well is a point of honour with the Southerners. But assuming that the Federal authorities believe that their prisoners are badly treated, is it not remarkable that they should have stopped the exchange under the cartel? Some weeks ago we stated that a dispute had arisen between the commissioners of exchange as to the numbers held on either side. Since then the Confederate agent, Mr. Ould, proposed to General Meredith, the Federal commissioner for exchange, that the prisoners should be at once exchanged, and the excess on either side should be released on parole. After a considerable delay General Meredith refused the offer in very insulting terms, hinting that the Confederate authorities meant to make an unfair use of the exchange, and put valuable officers and men in the field who would otherwise be kept out of service. This charge very well exposes the true reason of the policy of the Yankee Government. A fair exchange they consider is not for their benefit. They do not think their men, either officers or privates, are equal to the men of the South, and so they put a stop to the cartel. Mr. Lincoln and his admirers, only intent on present advantage, do not perceive that the stoppage of the exchange is the forerunner of the refusal to take prisoners, and that however much Southern patriots may endure, it is not likely that the Irish and German mercenaries will be inclined to enlist in Mr. Lincoln's service, when they know that there is no surrender and no quarter.

The Richmond Sentinel publishes a review of the war in which the position of the Federals in 1862 is compared with their present position. After the first battle of Manassas the Lincoln Government became aware of the magnitude of the task they had in hand, and made elaborate preparations for the invasion of the South. The autumn and winter of 1861 were devoted to collecting and drilling armies, which in February, 1862, were hurled against the South. In May, 1862, there were in Virginia 210,000 Federal soldiers:—

McClellan in the Peninsula	.. ..	156,000

Besides these there were those who remained at Washington and Alexandria, those who occupied Maryland, and the garrison of Norfolk. Burnside had 20,000 men in North Carolina. At Beaufort there was an army of 12,000. Simultaneously two large armies under Grant and Buell penetrated Tennessee; a third, under Pope, operated on the Mississippi; a fourth was in Missouri and North Arkansas; and a fifth occupied New Orleans. The exact strength of the Western armies is not known, but they were all able to operate independently.

Such was the aspect of Federal affairs in the spring of 1862. What is the condition in the autumn of 1863? Mr. Lincoln, unable to obtain the recruits he required for supplying his various armies, has been obliged to amalgamate them. The army of the Potomac is so wasted that it retreats when General Lee, with his forces also lessened, advances. The armies in Virginia have become one army, no longer aggressive, and which is needed as a protection for the Federal capital. In the West, also, the armies have been united, and are hardly pressed by the Confederates. The contrast thus suggested is very striking. The invader intending to overrun the South has been compelled to assume the defensive.

The Canadian papers devote considerable space to a curious case of kidnapping. A person named Redpath was seized in a principal street in Montreal, charged, it was supposed, with the crime of murder, in broad daylight, and conveyed by force to the ferry-boat, and then to the railway station, and was ultimately brought to New York. It then appeared that the wrong man had been arrested, and Redpath, who is a British subject, was released after two days' confinement, but not until he had signed a document releasing his captors from the consequence of their illegal proceeding—which document will not, under the circumstances, be any bar to Redpath's claim. What gave the affair more importance was, that the United States Consul, Giddings, had in some way or other interfered in and sanctioned the arrest. Mr. Giddings has written a letter to excuse himself, and to explain that he acted under a wrong impression. However this may be, it is remarkable that a British subject can be seized on British territory, and carried to the United States, without any warrant from the British authorities. An action for damages has been commenced by Redpath against Mr. Giddings.

We learn from the telegraph that President Davis has acquitted General Polk of mismanagement at the battle of Chickamauga. Of General Polk's bravery and devotion to his country there never was the least question.

Butler and McNeil are at their work. The former has imprisoned a Norfolk merchant for six months for smuggling whisky. The Norfolk merchants had better prepare to divide their profits with Butler, and let him have their spoons, or they will share a like fate. We can hardly credit the report that all Confederate prisoners taken in his department, which includes Virginia, are to be under his jurisdiction. If so, we venture to predict that the Confederates in that part of the country will neither take nor give much quarter.

McNeil, who murdered ten Confederates for the supposed death of one old man, who afterwards turned up, is going to hang "a guerilla" each time the telegraph is cut between St. Louis and Fort Smith. McNeil will not be balked of blood.

The "Great Canadian Conspiracy"—assuming that the whole affair is not a canard, and we do not think it is—was at best a small matter, and would not have attracted much attention but from the conspicuous part played by Lord Lyons. At first it was reported that a plot had been hatched to burn Buffalo and several other towns, and generally to wage war on the United States, the Canadian shore being the basis of operations. This was, of course, mere moonshine, and the true story appears to be as follows:—

On Johnson's Island, which is situated at the mouth of Sandusky Bay, and is about fifty miles from the Canadian shore, there are confined a large number, some say 2,000, Confederate prisoners. The object of keeping the Confederates on Johnson's Island is the gratification of Yankee barbarity. The Southerners, accustomed to a warm climate, are there exposed to a peculiarly rigorous and unhealthy climate, and their sufferings may be more readily conceived than described. Several applications have been made to the Federal authorities to change the place of imprisonment, but no notice was taken, and the Confederates were left in what is neither more nor less than torture. Under these circumstances it seems that a body of Confederates (it is not clear that the Confederate Government was concerned in the affair) determined to attempt the rescue of their fellow-countrymen. The task, though difficult, did not seem hopeless. The prisoners were guarded by 400 men. By the terms of the Ashburton treaty, the United States could keep only two vessels of war (for revenue purposes) on the Lakes, and they were debarred from erecting fortresses on the shore. We mention these circumstances because they are to a great extent a justification of the remarkable officiousness of Lord Lyons. The necessary guns were provided, and the enterprise appeared likely to succeed, when the inhabitants of Buffalo were startled by a telegram from Washington warning them of the plot. The British authorities had been on the track of the Confederates, and had communicated their suspicions to the British Minister at Washington, who, upon evidence too flimsy to raise more than a passing suspicion in the mind of a London detective, informed Mr. Stanton of the conspiracy. We do not say Lord Lyons exceeded his duty, but it is to be regretted that circumstances imposed such spy work upon him; and moreover, we cannot but remark, that it is not very much to the credit of this country that we are obliged to confess to the Federal Government that we are unable to enforce the observance of treaties in our own territory, and to call upon the Federals to look after their own interests. We certainly were under the impression, that the Governor-General of Canada had sufficient force to keep in order, say 150 Confederates, armed or unarmed. To betray such weakness is to invite aggression, and if we are so weak, it would better have consorted with our honour and our welfare to have kept the Confederates in check, and not have enacted the ignominious part of spy to the Federal Government.

The object of Lord Lyons was not to keep the Confederates in Johnson's Island, though that is the effect of his conduct; and no doubt, considering the terms of the Ashburton treaty, we are bound in honour to see that the weakness of the Federals shall not be used against them; but we do not agree with the mode in which the treaty was in this case upheld. In addition, however, to a sense of duty, it is pretty certain that Lord Lyons was instigated by a desire of reciprocating the politeness of the Federal Government. The North has warned us of a Fenian conspiracy in Ireland, and in return we warn the North of a Confederate conspiracy in Canada. It was really a fine opportunity, and justifies the observation of the New York Herald that never before "in the history of American independence has the British Government exhibited so signal a solicitude for the welfare of the United States." It seems that the Yankees are going to take advantage of our subservency. They will not move the Confederates from Johnson's Island, for they have no other convenient place of torture, and the British Government admits it cannot guarantee that the Confederates will not be able to fit out an expedition from the Canadian shore. It has therefore been agreed (so it is reported) that the Ashburton Treaty is to be so far set aside as to allow the United States to erect fortifications, which will certainly be useful to them if ever they undertake the invasion of Canada.

Mr. Wendell Phillips has lately made a speech, in which he stated that Mr. Lincoln had told him that the greatest folly of his life was the issuing of the emancipation proclamation. Mr. Phillips is not the man to invent such a story. The New York Tribune, which is notoriously inventive, denies that Mr. Lincoln made such a declaration, and the New York Herald, which is quite as truthful as the Tribune, says that Mr. Lincoln has on many occasions expressed such an opinion.

Mr. Ward Beecher has been publicly welcomed by his congregation on his return from Europe. Mr. Beecher's speech on that occasion was for the most part becoming a Christian minister. However, the cloven foot of political partisanship would show itself. He said he liked England still better when he left her, but "not her wrongheadedness, not her prejudices, not that corruption among her commercial classes, which is the parallel of the corruption in our country in years past by barbarous interests through slavery." Mr. Beecher was followed by a Rev. Mr. Holme, who made a joke about his friend's sea-sickness by a profane application of a verse in Revelations, and observed that Mr. Beecher was permitted to speak to an English audience "as almost never man spake."

The negroes in New Orleans have had a public meeting, at which they adopted a petition to be allowed to vote in State and Federal elections. The meeting was under the management of white men, who did nearly all the talking. This movement is set afoot by politicians, who are perfectly aware that black votes will be very marketable.

New Orleans has been for a long time under Federal government, and we have often been told that commerce was reviving. We should think that trade would not be much encouraged by the United States marshal seizing all the cotton in the city, which he has lately done.

The Democrats in Delaware have adopted a wise policy, by retiring from the contest and publishing a protest against the military intimidation which makes the election a mere farce. An effort is to be made to annul the elections both in Maryland and Delaware, on the ground of their being controlled by powers unknown to the Constitution.

The Richmond papers of the 18th announce the arrival at Wilmington of the steamers Dundee, Flora, Banshee, Syren, Alice, A. D. Vance, Hansa, Antonica, Despatch, and General Scott.

There has been a considerable advance in the price of gold in New York. On the 14th November, as we announced in our last issue, it was 46½ per cent. prem.; on the 16th it was 47½ per cent.; on the 19th it was 51½ per cent.; and this rise was ascribed to the drain of specie to Europe. On the 21st it was 53½ per cent., being an advance of 7 per cent. in a week.

ENGLAND.

HER Majesty's Government has declined to accept the invitation of the Emperor of the French to the Congress at Paris. A summary of the despatch from Earl Russell to Earl Cowley, communicating the resolution of the Cabinet, will be found in another part of our impression.

His Excellency Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, the newly-appointed ambassador from the Court of the Tuileries, arrived at Albert Gate House on Sunday evening from Paris.

The last mail from India brought the sad intelligence that Lord Elgin, the Governor-General, was rapidly sinking from dropsy on the heart, and that there was little hope of his recovery. It was also reported that his lordship had resigned his office, and had requested the Queen to appoint his successor. His loss is a heavy one to England and to India, and will be deeply mourned. It also affords a terrible example of the cost at which England has bought the Empire of the East, for Lord Elgin is the third of the men who have governed India with renown, who were in point of age nearly equal, and who fell under the stroke of labour and an Eastern climate. Lord Dalhousie ruled India when he was in the prime, or even the youth, of life, and returned home to die; Lord Canning, at the close of his perilous and successful administration, died without any enjoyment of the ease and honour to which he held so good a title; and now Lord Elgin, his successor, has been cut off before his career was accomplished.

Lord Elgin traced his descent from the Bruce, and was the son of the Earl of Elgin who brought the famous Elgin marbles to this country. Lord Elgin was born in London on the 20th of July, 1811. He was educated at Eton and at Christ Church, Oxford, from which college also came the late Sir Robert Peel, Lords Derby, Dalhousie, and Canning, Mr. Gladstone, and the late Sir George Lewis. In 1841 he entered the House of Commons as Member for Southampton, being then Lord Bruce, and supported Sir Robert Peel. In 1842 he was offered the governor-generalship of Jamaica by Lord Stanley (now Earl of Derby), who was at that time Secretary for the Colonies. In 1846 Lord Elgin was appointed Governor-General of Canada, and there he remained for eight years, to the advantage of the colony and to the promotion of its loyalty to the mother country. In 1857 he was appointed Ambassador to China, and on his way thither did an act which stamped him as a man of power and resolution; for, on mere rumours of the Indian mutiny, he diverted the troops under his charge to Calcutta, wisely seeing that India must be pacified before China could be conciliated. His embassy to China was successful. Canton was taken, and the Treaty of Tientsin was negotiated. In 1859 fresh troubles broke out in China, and the Peiho disaster called at once for active measures. Lord Elgin returned to China, Pekin was captured by the troops under Sir Hope Grant, and Lord Elgin, entering the Celestial City in state, compelled the submission of the Chinese Government, and negotiated the treaty from which both countries have derived so much benefit. On the retirement of Lord Canning, Lord Elgin was appointed Governor-General of India, but his tenure was destined to be but brief. He had suffered from heart complaint, and in spite of his great precautions he has fallen a victim to that disease. At the time of his illness he was in the north-west provinces, and having lately been traversing some elevated tracts in the Himalaya, was on his way to meet Sir Hugh Rose at Lahore.

The successor to Lord Elgin has been nominated and will go to India by the next mail. From what we have said it will be seen that three peers have successively held the greatest vice-royalty known to the ancient or modern world. Now it has been determined to appoint a man not even of aristocratic connections. The new Governor-General is Sir John Lawrence. If a man has a right to that which he has saved, then Lawrence rightly will rule India. Sir John Lawrence in 1857 held down, by his intrepidity and his wisdom, the turbulent Punjab. He had no abundance of troops or of resources; his province had only been conquered but a few years; yet he restrained the fierce Sikhs and the mutinous Sepoys in his own province, and sent such supplies of men and munitions to the siege of Delhi that it has been said that but for Laurence Delhi would not have fallen, and if Delhi had not fallen England would not have held India. His administration in peace was conspicuous for success in the dispensation of justice, in undisputed command, and in matters of revenue and finance. Sir John Lawrence is moreover, in a sense intelligible enough, an East Indian. His appointment will be popular in India because his fame belongs entirely to India. While we doubt not his ability and his success, let us hope that many years may be given him for the display of the one and the consummation of the other.

A public meeting was held in the City-hall at Glasgow, on Thursday last, for the purpose of hearing an address by Mr. James Spence, at Liverpool, on "Southern Independence." The attendance was enormous, and the hall was crowded long before the hour named for the commencement of the proceedings. Mr. James Hannan occupied the chair. Mr. Spence first endeavoured to show that under the Constitution each State remained a sovereign community, governing itself, except in regard to those matters which were committed to a general agent. So there was nothing in the Constitution forbidding the secession of any State. The Declaration of Independence stated that whenever a government no longer attained certain ends and among them the pursuit of happiness, it was "the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and institute a new government." To say that the right to abolish existed, but not the right to secede, was as absurd as to say that you might have a right to kill a man, but have no right to leave his company. What said Mr. Lincoln in Congress on January 12th, 1848? "Any people, anywhere, being inclined and having the power, have a right to rise up and shake off the existing Government, and form a new one that suits them better. This is a most valuable and a most sacred right, a right which we hope and believe is to liberate the world; nor is this right confined to cases in which the whole people of an existing Government may choose to exercise it. Any portion of such people that can, may revolutionize and make their own of so much territory as they inhabit." Mr. Lincoln then was a secessionist of the deepest dye. Many of the Northern States had passed what were called Personal Liberty Bills, the object of which was to defeat an express clause of the Constitution. For years the people of the Northern States had made a practice of vilifying and reviling the South, and when the result was seen in an armed invasion of Virginia, with murder and servile insurrection, these acts had been applauded. Finally, the election of the President was purely sectional. It drew a line across the North and South. Moreover the people of the North and South were two peoples, distinct and even antagonistic. That was proved by the conduct of each in the war. In the North, merriment and feasting, diamonds and shoddy wealth; in the South, fasting, penury, and sorrow. In the North, the bribing of mercenaries to fight, the destruction of liberty, and every cherished doctrine of the Constitution; in the South, the Constitution the guide of action. So also the Union was worked at a profit to the North and at a loss to the South. The South had not been indifferent on the tariff question. South Carolina had nullified the tariff bill, and armed to resist it, to the peril of the Union. Slavery was not the cause of secession. If slavery had been the grand object the South would have clung to the Union. The question of slave territories was a mere struggle for votes. No Southerner would ever dream of transplanting himself and his slaves. In New Mexico in twelve years there were only a dozen slaves domiciled. The North did not care for the negro; otherwise, why had not Mr. Lincoln freed the slaves of Delaware, Maryland, Missouri, and Kentucky? The proclamation of emancipation was only meant to throw dust in the eyes of the House of Commons and the Chamber of Deputies. Its only effect could be a servile insurrection, and on that point he would read the words of Dr. Channing—the real Channing, not the present one. Dr. Channing said, "Were our national Union dissolved, we ought to reprobate as sternly as we do now the slightest manifestations of a disposition to stir up a servile war. Still more, were the Free and the Slaveholding States not only separated, but engaged in the fiercest hostilities, the former would deserve the abhorrence of the world and the indignation of Heaven were they to resort to insurrection and massacre as means of victory. Better were it for us to bare our own breasts to the knife of the slave than to arm it against his master." The South had never invented slavery, and had always protested against the slave-trade. It was the people of Great Britain who took the slaves from Africa and planted slavery in the South. The first result of Northern success in the present struggle would be a war with this country. We ought to attempt something to end the war. Neutrality did not necessitate inaction. More than one of the Powers of Europe who had desired to move on this subject, had been restrained by the inaction of this country. Wars ceased from the moral, not the material, exhaustion of a country. What conceivable fact so patent to produce on the North the conviction that its object was unattainable as the recognition of the South by Europe? That step should have been taken when the great attempt on Richmond had failed and the Northern army lay helpless, and the Northern spirit was broken down. Yet he did not urge recognition; all that he urged was that our Government should enter into relations with the other Powers of Western Europe, in order that they in their united wisdom might decide what measures should be taken. Mr. Spence concluded his able address with an eloquent appeal to his audience as men, as citizens, and as politicians, to make an effort to assuage the tempest and to restore to America peace on the only possible basis, the independence of the South. The speech of Mr. Spence was listened to with great interest, and many parts of it were loudly applauded. The mention of Mr. Lincoln as a Secessionist called forth hisses against such a doctrine from such a person, and the name of Beecher was considerably hissed and slightly cheered. At the close of the speech Mr. John Macadam proposed the following resolution: "That in the opinion of this meeting the war in America is an injury to the world, and that the present aspect of the conflict affords no hope of its early termination unless by means of the moral influence of Europe; we therefore earnestly hope that the Government of this country will enter into communication with the European Powers, to concert with them as to the best means of bringing about peace, and that a memorial be presented to the Government expressing these sentiments." Mr. Councilor Moir here interposed with a resolution condemnatory of slavery, but it was eventually, after considerable uproar, agreed that the sense of the meeting should be tested on Mr. Macadam's resolution. An unmistakable majority of hands was held up in favour of the resolution, and a still more evident minority against it. The chairman then declared the motion carried an announcement which was received with loud cheers and waving of hats and handkerchiefs. The victory for the Southern cause at Glasgow is now the sixth achieved, and in every case the meetings have been held in our large manufacturing towns, where the current of public opinion was naturally supposed to run in favour of the North. About the feeling of the small towns in the rural districts of the south, west, and east of England there has never been much doubt. We have reason to believe that similar meetings will be held in Barnsley, Macclesfield, and other towns, and that Mr. J. Spence will appear at each of these. What the English people really require is to be informed of the true state of the issue between North and South. For years the Abolition party has possessed the ear of the people on the platform and through the press. Their opinions consequently on American affairs are based on ex parte statements. There is no lack of readiness to learn; the people are open to argument and conviction. Those, then, who labour to enlighten the masses on American affairs as Mr. Spence has done, deserve the gratitude of our common humanity.

The Hon. R. J. Walker presided at an elegant banquet at St. James's Hall, holden in pursuance of the proclamation of President Lincoln, which "invited his fellow-citizens at home and abroad to set apart and observe the last Thursday of November as a day of thanksgiving and prayer to our beneficent Father who dwelleth in Heaven." Mr. Adams, and his secretaries, Messrs. Wilson and Moran, were present. The proceedings commenced with an address from the Hon. R. J. Walker, who called upon Mr. Hunting to read the proclamation. Then Sella Martin, the runaway negro, offered up prayer, and then the company sang a hymn. After the banquet Mr. Walker proposed the "President of the United States," and delivered an address on the rise and progress of the rebellion, and the prospects of its speedy suppression. Mr. Adams returned thanks, and addressed himself chiefly to the task of proving the proposition that the President had good grounds for calling on the people to offer up thanksgiving. To do that, he said it would be necessary to recall to mind the course of events. The President had come to his post with less of practical experience in government than any individual had done since the foundation of the Government. It was only by a little contrivance that he succeeded in getting to Washington at all; treachery was disseminated through all the departments of Government. Now the Government was safe, and was served faithfully. Was not that something to be thankful for? The case was the same with regard to the foreign representatives. It had taken nearly three years to make European governments believe that the President's power could be maintained. Now the Foreign Department worked faithfully and harmoniously, and that was a reason for thankfulness. By the machinations of the preceding Administration the national credit had been shattered. Now the people rushed in swarms to offer their money to the Government in exchange for the "obligations" which they were anxious to obtain. Throughout all the channels of military organisation the President at first had been unable to find one man out of those who could be trusted. Now no man was suspected of betraying their movements to the rebels. Similarly as to the navy: half the ships had to be burnt for fear of treachery, and the other half were dispersed over the world. Now their naval power was respected on every sea. Every man had thought that the emancipation of the slaves was impossible without the ruin of all classes. The crowning act of President Lincoln's administration was that, in two distinct measures he had opened a way for a practical result which had been supposed unattainable. The proclamation and the enlistment of the negro were the two great instruments by which emancipation without revolution would be carried out. Last year there had been a great expression of popular sentiment against the proclamation. Now the bulk of the people, having seen the result, had joined in one voice to sustain the Government in executing that policy. The people had rallied round the Government, and had maintained the policy of the President. They had money, they had men, and they had ideas, which they meant to establish as the only true and successful conclusion of the struggle. All this had been effected through the agency of a President, who came into power "with less practical political experience than any one preceding him." The next toasts were "The Queen," "The Day," "The Union—from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes to the Gulf, from the source to the mouth of the Mississippi—for ever one and inseparable;" "The Emancipation Proclamation—Slavery's Epitaph, written by the finger of God on the heart of the American President." Other similar toasts and sentiments followed.

A field for Earl Russell's activity in the enforcement of the Foreign Enlistment Act has been allowed to lie untouched by the Government. One Edward Lynch, a yeoman of Queenstown in the county of Cork, has deposited before Mr. Robert Hall, J.P., that during the time that the Federal ship-of-war Kearsage lay at Queenstown; namely, from the 2nd to the 6th day of November last, he, Edward Lynch, with two other Irishmen, went on board the vessel; that he was well entertained on board, and that his two comrades were enlisted for the Federal army, but that he was rejected for his lack of height. Besides his friends, three other men passed the doctor and were duly enlisted, and that the pay was understood to be twelve dollars a month. That all these men, with a boatman who came on board later, sailed away in the Kearsage. Another Irishman, named Patrick Kennedy, also of Queenstown, has deposited before Mr. Mullin, J.P., that he went on board to be enlisted in the naval service and was taken as a landsman; that three other men were examined and passed with him, and that on the next day seven or eight men from Rengashetty, all Irishmen, came aboard, and told him they had passed the doctor; that all these sailed away in the vessel, but that he slipped overboard and came back with the pilot. He also declared that there were from 150 to 200 men taken on board, nearly all Irish. Mr. Eastman, the American Consul for Queenstown, was on board. The promised pay was twelve dollars a month. Surely the ingenuity of the Government can, if it please, find some method of checking these breaches of that Act which, in some respects, they are so zealous to observe.

Mr. A. G. Kidson, of Glasgow, has received, in his capacity as justice of the peace, several depositions made by persons in the employment of Messrs. J. and G. Thompson, the builders of the ship Pampero, which has been seized by the Customs authorities. One of these men states that he has been offered, as a reward for information as to the ship, a handsome sum of money, a free passage to the Northern States, and an excellent situation; or, if he preferred it, such a sum of money as would make him independent. Another man was offered £50, or a passage to the Northern States or a situation. Three other persons made similar depositions. These, we suppose, are the means by which the De Costas and the Clarence Yonges are converted into such excellent witnesses.

On Monday last, the Rev. Addington P. Venables, of Exeter College, Oxford, was consecrated in the chapel of Lambeth Palace to the Bishopric of Nassau, vacant by the death of the Right Rev. Dr. Caulfield. The ceremony was performed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishops of London and Oxford.

Mr. John Laird, M.P., has been entertained at a banquet in the Music Hall, Birkenhead. The object of the banquet was to celebrate his noble gift of a building to be used as an hospital for the benefit of the town. Mr. H. Segar presided, and was supported by Lord Richard Grosvenor, Lieutenant-colonel King, and Captain Hokey, R.N. About 150 gentlemen were present at the banquet.

The iron frigate Northumberland is approaching completion. She is of the same class as the Minotaur and the Agincourt. Her length is 400 ft., her breadth 52 ft. 3½ in., and her depth 41 ft. 6 in. She has a burden of 7,000 tons, and her engines will be of 1,250 horse-power, nominal. She has no outer keel, but her inner keelson is a huge wrought-iron girder 3 ft. 4½ in. deep, which runs throughout the vessel from end to end. To this the jointed ribs are riveted, which are placed so closely that there are only alternate intervals of 1 ft. 11 in. and 2 ft. 4 in. between each. These ribs are made of wrought iron, in lengths varying from 10 ft. long and 3 ft. deep, to 4 ft. long by 18 in. deep, and are riveted by the longitudinals, which run from end to end of the vessel, and which, by intersecting the ribs at the intervals stated, divide the framework into a series of square compartments of enormous strength. There are five longitudinals on each side of the keelson, which form single massive girders, running from end to end of the ship, curving with the curve of her lines, and converging in the bows and stern, so as to make one solid girder of the whole frame. The cross-beams which carry the decks are of wrought iron, and beneath the oak upper deck is an iron one to keep out shells. The height from the floor to the lower deck beams is 21 ft., from lower deck to main deck 9 ft. 2 in.; and from main deck to upper 7 ft. 2 in. clear. The armour of the vessel is composed of 9 in. solid teak beams, and 5½ in. of rolled plates, fastened through with bolts to the inner skin of wrought iron. The sides have a slope inward of 2 ft., and an incline of about one foot in ten. The beak, to be used as a ram, projects 6½ ft. beyond the apparent bows above. The stern is quite round, and at both bows and stern the armour is reduced to 4½ in. The bow piece is a single forging, and weighs thirty-one tons. The Northumberland will carry forty-eight of the heaviest guns on her main deck, with two pivot guns, and six broadside guns on her upper deck. Her ports will be 3 ft. 6 in. high, and 20 in. wide. She will have an iron tower on her upper deck, 18 ft. long by 13 ft. wide, coated with 4½ in. iron, and pierced for riflemen. Her draught of water will be 24 ft., and she will carry enough coal for ten days' steaming. Her speed is expected to be fourteen knots an hour. She will have five masts, three to be square-rigged, two with fore-and-aft sail, and all to be of iron. Her plates will be rolled plates of the Milwall Company, and her engines will be supplied by Messrs. Penn and Sons.

The Birmingham Annual Show of cattle, pigs, and sheep, agricultural machinery, poultry, and dogs, is being held this week, with even more than accustomed success. The classes of the renowned Herefords, Short-horns, and Devons, together with the Leicester and Southdown sheep, might seem to form a sufficient attraction both to men of business and to amateurs. But even the tastes of all lovers of animal kind have been consulted, and Birmingham has an unrivalled exhibition of Dorking, Hamburg, and Cochin-China fowls, fowls of the game or fighting breed, Mandarin ducks, and pigeons in every variety. This department of the exhibition could not be other than successful, for it is under the especial patronage of three duchesses, a marchioness, fourteen countesses and baronesses, and twenty other ladies of rank. The council, moreover, that presided over the exhibition of dogs, shows a long list of noblemen and gentlemen famous in the fashionable and the sporting world. No less than 570 dogs are exhibited. More than 100 of these are pointers, sixty are setters, and fifty are retrievers. The chamber spaniels, the smaller breeds, and the water spaniels, appear to the number of forty. There are seventeen splendid bloodhounds, and a good class of greyhounds. Mastiffs, Newfoundlands, terriers, Skyes, Dandie Dinmonts, are all to be seen and admired. There is a St. Bernard too, in height 2 feet 9 inches, 11½ inches round the arm, and 3 feet 5½ inches in girth. Beyond and above all, there are magnificent foxhounds, sent even in the heart of the season from the world-known kennels of the Duke of Beaufort, Lord Fitzhardinge, Colonel Clowes, and Mr. Milne. The whole show is wonderfully attractive and peculiarly in conformity with English tastes and habits.

THE CONTINENT.

The English Government has refused to take part in the Congress and the magnificent scheme of the Emperor's may, therefore, be considered as disposed of. The correspondence upon the subject was published in Friday's Globe. It commences with an extract from a despatch from Earl Russell to Earl Cowley, dated the 11th of November, informing the Ambassador that the Queen had received a letter from the Emperor—which letter is also published, and is, in all important points, the same as that addressed to the German Confederation and published in the Moniteur—and that Her Majesty had replied that any suggestion or proposal made by the Emperor would always command her most earnest and attentive consideration, and that she had directed her confidential advisers to submit to her their advice and opinion. On the following day, the 12th, the Foreign Secretary informs the Ambassador of the view which the Government take of the proposal contained in the Emperor's letter. The changes, his lordship observes, made in the period which has elapsed since the Treaties of Vienna, have not been more than might have been expected. Changes took place in the half century that followed the peace of Westphalia and Utrecht, but it was not then thought necessary to proceed to a general revision of those treaties. "It is the conviction of Her Majesty's Government that the main provisions of the Treaty of 1815 are in full force; that the greater number of those provisions have not been in any way disturbed, and that on those foundations rests the balance of power in Europe."

Referring to the changes which have taken place, Earl Russell puts a series of queries. Is it proposed to give the changes a more general and solemn sanction? Is such a work necessary? Would it contribute to the peace of Europe? Is it proposed to obtain from the Powers which have not yet recognised the de facto changes that recognition? What are the proposals of the Emperor as to those parts of the Treaty of Vienna which are menaced? Are they, if agreed to by a majority of the Powers, to be enforced by arms?

Upon all these points Her Majesty's Government must obtain satisfactory explanations before they can come to any decision upon the proposal made by the Emperor.

Her Majesty's Government would be ready to discuss with France and other Powers, by diplomatic correspondence, any specified questions upon which a solution might be attained, and European peace thereby more securely established.

But they would feel more apprehension than confidence from the meeting of a Congress of sovereigns and ministers without fixed objects, ranging over the map of Europe, and exciting hopes and aspirations which they might find themselves unable either to gratify or to quiet.

Her Majesty's Government have no reason to doubt that the Emperor Napoleon would bring into such an assembly a spirit of moderation and of justice. They feel confident that his object is to give security to the peace of Europe. The only question is as to the means by which that object is to be attained.

To this despatch, which could leave no doubt in the mind of the Emperor that the final reply of England would be a refusal, M. Drouyn de Lhuys responds on the 23rd, in a despatch addressed to the Marquis de Cadore. He observes that "the Imperial Government have no intention either to apologise for or to criticise the Treaties of Vienna; the Emperor declared, on mounting his throne, that he should consider himself bound by the engagement, subscribed by his predecessors." The Cabinet of London recognises that several of those stipulations have been seriously infringed. England herself has been eager to give her adhesion to those changes.

We admit, with Lord Russell, that it is not absolutely necessary to give to those changes a more general and more solemn sanction; but we consider it would be an advantage to clear away the ruins, and re-unite in a single body all the living members.

Coming to the questions of Earl Russell, he observes that the Emperor, as the youngest of the sovereigns, considers that he has no right to fix beforehand for other Courts the programme of the Congress; that was the motive of his reserve. "It is, moreover, so difficult to enumerate the questions not yet solved, which may disturb Europe."

A deplorable struggle is bathing Poland in blood, is agitating the neighbouring States, and threatening the world with the most serious disturbances. Three Powers, with a view of putting a stop to it, invoke in vain the Treaties of Vienna, which supply the two sides with contradictory arguments. Is this struggle to last for ever?

Pretensions opposed to one another are exciting a quarrel between Denmark and Germany. The preservation of peace in the north is at the mercy of an accident. The cabinets have already, by their negotiations, become parties to the dispute. Are they now become indifferent to it?

Shall anarchy continue to prevail on the Lower Danube, and shall it be able at any moment to open anew a bloody arena for the dispute of the Eastern question?

Shall Austria and Italy remain in presence of each other in a hostile attitude, ever ready to break the truce which prevents their animosities exploding?

Shall the occupation of Rome by the French troops be prolonged for an indefinite period?

Lastly, must we renounce, without fresh attempts at conciliation, the hope of lightening the burden imposed on the nations by the disproportionate armaments occasioned by mutual distrust?

Such are, sir, in our opinion, the principal questions which the Powers would doubtless judge it useful to examine and decide.

The French Minister proceeds to observe that Earl Russell cannot expect him to specify the solutions, or the sanction to be given them; that would be the work of the Congress. "It would be illusory," he says, "to pursue the solution through diplomatic correspondence." He refers to the opinion expressed by Lord Clarendon, and concurred in by the other Ministers at the Congress of Paris, in favour of "friendly mediation, before appealing to arms;" and concludes:—

The solicitude of the Emperor goes further; it does not wait for dissensions to break out in order to recommend an application to the actual circumstances of the salutary principle engraven on the latest monument of the public law of Europe, and His Majesty now invites his allies "to enter into explanations, and to come to an understanding."

Earl Russell's rejoinder is dated the 25th, a circumstance which proves that the Government had made up their minds to refuse without the slightest regard to the character of the reply they might receive to their inquiries. He observes that England is quite as disinterested in the matter as France; that she seeks no aggrandisement; and that she has only to counsel moderation and peace.

But France and Great Britain being thus disinterested themselves, are bound to consider what is the position, and what, in a Congress, will be the probable conduct of Powers who may be called upon to make sacrifices of territory or of pre-eminence and moral strength.

Recapitulating the programme of M. Drouyn de Lhuys, his lordship asks, "Is a general Congress of European States likely to furnish a peaceful solution of the matters in dispute?" At the previous settlements of Europe it was possible to distribute territories and define rights by a Congress:

At the present moment, after a continuance of long peace, no nation is willing to give up any territory to which it has a title by treaty or a claim by possession.

He takes two of the questions, and proceeds to examine the chance of a Congress contributing to their peaceable settlement. And first, with regard to Poland.

Is it probable that a Congress would be able to secure better terms [than the promise given to the representatives of England, France, and Austria] for Poland, unless by a combined employment of force?

Considerable progress has been made by the military preponderance and by the unsparing severity of Russia, in subduing the insurgents.

Is it likely that Russia will grant in the pride of her strength what she refused in the early days of her discouragement?

Would she create an independent Poland at the mere request of a Congress?

But if she would not, the prospect becomes one of humiliation for Europe, or of war against Russia; and those Powers who are not ready to incur the cost and hazard of war may well desire to avoid the other alternative.

The best thing, in his lordship's opinion, is to wait.

Then as to Italy. Is it intended to ask Austria to renounce the possession of Venetia? Austria would decline to attend a Congress in which such a question should be raised; but it is impossible to summon an Italian representative to sit in Congress without discussing the state of Venetia. As to Denmark, the addition of Spain, Portugal, and Italy, to the deliberations would not improve the prospect of a satisfactory solution; and it is not expedient to call a Congress to find a remedy for the anarchy of Moldo-Wallachia.

And having disposed of the Congress in this wise, his lordship concludes in these words.

Were all these questions, those of Poland, Italy, Denmark, and the Danubian Provinces, to be decided by the mere utterance of opinions, the views of Her Majesty's Government upon most of them might perhaps be found not materially to differ from those of the Emperor of the French.

But if the mere expression of opinions and wishes would accomplish no positive results, it appears certain that the deliberations of a Congress would consist of demands and pretensions put forward by some and resisted by others; and, there being no supreme authority in such an assembly to enforce the decisions of the majority, the Congress would probably separate, leaving many of its members on worse terms with each other than they had been when they met. But if this would be the probable result, it follows that no decrease of armaments is likely to be effected by the proposed Congress. M. Drouyn de Lhuys refers to a proposal made by Lord Clarendon in one of the last sittings of the Congress of Paris. But Her Majesty's Government understand that proposal to have reference to a dispute between two Powers to be referred to the good offices of a friendly Power, but in no way to the assembling of a general Congress.

Not being able, therefore, to discern the likelihood of those beneficial consequences which the Emperor of the French promised himself when proposing a Congress, Her Majesty's Government, following their own strong convictions, after mature deliberation, feel themselves unable to accept his Imperial Majesty's invitation.

After this refusal it matters little what is the character of the replies received from other Powers. The Mémorial Diplomatique professes to know all about the Austrian answer, and gives an analysis, the substance of which is, that Austria appreciates the Emperor's excellent intentions, and will be happy to help him to carry them out, but thinks the Treaties of 1815 still existing, and desires to know the programme of the deliberations.

The English answer, as might have been expected, has been very ill received in Paris, and many people insist that there must be war; but between whom?

The Emperor will not go to war with England for rejecting the Congress, and the proposition has brought about an approximation between him and the Powers with whom it appeared possible some time since that he might go to war. It is a very involved "situation," and he would be a rash man who would pronounce dogmatically in what manner the knot will be untied.

The verification of Powers has continued to provide the Corps Legislatif with an ample amount of work. Most of the elections contested have been confirmed after debates more or less animated. One or two have been annulled on points of form, and two, although the deputies were members of the majority, on the ground that their return had been secured by corruption. Amongst these victims of their excessive liberality was one of the rich family of Pereires.

According to Polish accounts the insurrection has revived again. It is making head in all the Governments, as well in Lithuania as in Congress Poland, and the number of the insurgents in the field is rated very high; in one Government at 3,000. We do not place any reliance upon these statements. On the other hand we see no reason to doubt that the Russian Government is pursuing a system of wholesale deportation of Poles into Russia.

The Schleswig Holstein excitement runs higher and higher in Germany. The newspapers are filled with reports of public meetings and other demonstrations in favour of the claims of the Prince of Augustenburg, or rather of the separation of the Duchies from Denmark. The whole nation seems to have gone mad. Nothing can well be more ludicrous than the threats which are dealt out to England and Europe in leading articles and speeches. Germany is ready to make war against the whole world, if it dares to hint that treaties are to be respected. The Chambers of some of the smaller States have passed very spirited resolutions, promising the Government to make any sacrifices to effect the great object, and the governments of these States have generally given in their adhesion to the popular view. Even Saxony and Wurtemberg, both of which acceded to the Treaty of London, have declared their determination to use all the means in their power to upset it. The Wurtemberg Minister had the shameless impudence to pretend that the conduct of Denmark had released Wurtemberg from its obligations: as if a quarrel about one instrument could release a Government from another instrument, to which almost the whole of the States of Europe were parties. However, the small States are only sowing the seeds of their own destruction. They have encouraged hopes which cannot be gratified, and in its disappointment the people will turn on them.

Austria and Prussia have, as was to be expected, declared themselves bound by the Treaty of London. They pretend, indeed, that the arrangements of December, '51 and January, '52, were preliminary conditions of the Treaty—a contention which has no validity—but they give no support to the pretensions of the Prince of Augustenburg, and place themselves directly in the face of the popular cry for the severance of the Duchies from the Danish monarchy. They admit, too, that even if the Treaty of London did not exist, King Christian would be the legitimate sovereign of Lauenburg. And in accordance with this view they voted against the reference to the committee of a proposal to augment the number of troops designed for the Execution. That proposition was, however, carried on Saturday's sitting of the Diet, which at the same time adopted resolutions excluding Baron Dirckinck, the Danish representative, and suspending the exercise of a vote for Holstein.

It must not, however, be supposed that Austria and Prussia intend in the least to drop their old policy of perpetual interference with Denmark until practically the same results are achieved as the more vehement Germans would accomplish at once.

They have both protested, as from their standpoint was unavoidable, against the new constitution for the kingdom proper and Sleswig, as an incorporation of that Duchy, and they will press on Federal Execution in Holstein, not for putting the Prince of Augustenburg on the throne, but for enforcing the pretended constitutional rights of the Duchy and of the Confederation. It is unfortunate that so excellent a pretext should be afforded them in the new constitution, and it will be well for Denmark if by some mediation the Execution can be delayed. Federal occupation at the present moment, although nominally intended only upon the constitutional question, might be turned to the benefit of the pretensions of the Augustenburgs.

Earl Russell has already stepped into the arena. Sir Alexander Malet has communicated to the Austrian, Prussian, and Bavarian plenipotentiaries at the Diet a despatch, which, according to a telegraphic summary, says that the support given to the claims of the Prince of Augustenburg by some of the German Governments has attracted the attention of the English Government, which, therefore, hastens to make its views known. As might be expected, England intends to faithfully observe the stipulations of the Treaty of 1852, "according to which Christian IX. possessed an hereditary right to all the territories at that time united under the Danish Crown; and expected that all Powers who signed or acceded to the Treaty would share this opinion." From this colourless summary it is not easy to ascertain what is the real character of the despatch. It may be an energetic notification of the purpose of the English Government to maintain the Treaty, or a practical abandonment of the Danish cause.

In the Duchy of Sleswig all the officials have sworn allegiance to the new king, and the municipalities of the most important towns in the German portions of the Duchies have voted congratulatory addresses. In Holstein a portion of the officials—how large cannot yet be said—have refused the oath. As soon as the delay accorded them expires the Danish Government will act energetically against the recusants. The garrisons have been largely reinforced, and every preparation has been made to suppress any movement. In Lauenburg there seems to be very little agitation. As we have said, Austria and Prussia admit that King Christian is entitled to this Duchy, independently of the London Treaty. It is curious to observe, from the different protests handed into the Diet, that almost every one of the small German States has pretensions of some kind to the succession to this Duchy.

The bill for the legalisation of the military reorganization, which has just been presented to the Prussian Parliament, insists upon the three years' service, to which the House of Deputies is so determinedly opposed, and there is therefore no hope of a settlement of this the original quarrel between the king and his people.

The Italian Chamber of Deputies has been discussing the treaties of commerce and navigation with France. Some vehement objections were raised against both, but the latter Treaty is the one which creates most dissatisfaction. It concedes privileges on the part of Italy to French vessels which are not accorded by France to Italian vessels. The Treaties were, however, approved by a large majority, the numbers being 157 to 49.

A terrible outrage committed in Palermo comes before the Chamber for discussion in a few days. A poor lad, born dumb, has been tortured to death by the military authorities. They pretended that he was feigning dumbness to escape the conscription, and burnt him with hot irons. This torture seems to have lasted a month. 154 wounds were found upon his body. The authorities excuse themselves upon the ground that they were justified by the law in the measures they took.

The railway which the King of Italy lately opened with so much pomp will not be really opened for months. The whole affair was a costly coup de theatre. Part of the triumphal progress had to be performed posting, and unfortunately that part was through the country most frequented by brigands. It is said, and as it has been confirmed from many quarters we mention the story, which at first we suspected might be an invention of the enemy, that the carriage in which the English Minister, Mr. Elliott, was travelling, chancing to upset, the diplomatist was so frightened that he fired a pistol, which he had prepared for such emergencies, at the postilion. Fortunately, the honourable gentleman was as weak of aim as of heart.

SOUTHERN PRISONERS' RELIEF FUND.

The following is the copy of a letter received by the Treasurer of the Southern Relief Fund, dated

"NEW ORLEANS, 3rd November, 1863.

"The last steamer from New York brought me your kind letter and munificent donation. A thousand thanks for your ready zeal, and particularly to the Committee and other kind friends of our cause, who so generously responded to our call for aid. Could I convey to you the blessings of those whom this timely gift will make comfortable, you would, in a measure, realise the gratification we experience, who are simply the agents of your bounty. This work of love is all that makes living in this city endurable; and should our means to clothe the naked and feed the hungry cease, I think more would succumb and follow those of our good citizens who have already sunk under their troubles. To go amongst our brave boys who are here as prisoners, to witness their cheerful endurance of captivity and privation, and their firm faith in our great and glorious future, would strengthen the hopes of any who are doubtful of our ultimate success. You cannot imagine how much we feel the sympathy of our absent friends. In a land of peace, surrounded with all the elegances of life, and the bustle of business and the excitement of society, to remember us even in thought is a happiness; but when to that sympathy of feeling is added the much-needed pecuniary assistance, we do indeed feel that all the world is not looking cold upon us in our struggle for life and liberty. That God has given to our brave soldiers friends even among strangers, and you may rest assured their wives and children, left to the mercy of the charitable, will not be neglected. Our winter opens very drearily, food and fuel are advancing every day, and I fear we shall have much suffering. If this cruel war could only be brought to an end we might hope to see our beautiful city free from those horrid intruders, our homes once more cheerful, our absent friends again with us, and our loved ones returned from battle-fields and hospitals. You would hardly recognise your old home, the smiling faces of Carondelet-street, so full of business and excitement, are gone. You would only see the long rows of palaces closed, dark and dusty, save where here and there one has been taken for 'military purposes,' to store stolen furniture, or a recruiting office for 'American citizens of African descent.' Canal-street, once so brilliant with beauty and fashion, is now given up to strutting officers and dirty soldiers, black and white. The Southern ladies no longer dress for display or promenade for pleasure. Independent of the sights and sounds, no one has the heart to be gay, or the wish, if they had the means, to be extravagant.

I have this day valued upon you for £100, which will be applied as above, in aid of the prisoners in New Orleans. Pray continue the good work.

(Signed.)

P.S.—I will draw upon you for the £200 against the Aged and Infirm Fund, as it is required.

I am astonished that an Ethnologist, a student of the Science of the Races of Man, could deliberately make the statement that all races have the same intellectual, moral, and religious natures. Rather the reverse is the real fact. Intelligence is the great peculiarity of man, and it is in the instincts of each race that we find the greatest difference. Mr. Dunn, however, it must be acknowledged, does not carry out the principles he here enunciates, for he fully admits the fact that, practically, Negro children cannot be educated with the whites. He also admits that some of the lower races are not able to receive complex ideas, or have little power of thinking and none of generalisation, although they have excellent memories.

The assertion that the Negro only requires an opportunity for becoming civilised, is disproved by history. The African race have had the benefit of the Egyptian, Carthaginian, and Roman civilisations, but nowhere did they become civilised. Not only have the Negro race never civilised themselves, but they have never accepted any other civilisation. No people have had so much communication with Christian Europeans as the people of Africa, where Christian bishops existed for centuries. They possess some knowledge of metallurgy, but no other arts: their rude laws seem to have been borrowed and changed to suit their peculiar instincts. With the Negro, as with some other races of man, it has been found that the children are precocious, but that no advance in education can be made after they arrive at the age of maturity; they still continue mentally children. The dark races generally do not accept the civilisation which surrounds them, as is shown in the South Sea, where they remain the uncivilised race by the side of the Malays. The opinion of Dr. Channing, of America, is often quoted respecting the Negro. He says: "I would expect from the Negro race, when civilised, less energy, less courage, less intellectual originality, than in ours; but more amiableness, tranquillity, gentleness, and content." Now, if possible to civilise them, there is no doubt they would show less energy, courage, and intellectual originality (of which they would be utterly deficient); and as to their amiableness, tranquillity, gentleness, and content, it would be more like the tranquillity and content shown by some of our domestic animals than anything else to which we can compare it. It has been said that the present slaveholders of America "no more think of rebellion amongst their full-blooded slaves than they do of rebellion amongst their cows and horses." It has also been affirmed (and I believe it the truth) that not a single soldier has been required to keep order in the Slave States.

The many assumed cases of civilised Negroes generally are not of pure African blood. In the Southern States of North America, in the West Indies and other places, it has been frequently observed that the negroes in places of trust have European features; and some writers have supposed that these changes have been due to a gradual improvement in the Negro race which is taking place under favourable circumstances. It has been affirmed that occasionally there are seen Negroes of pure blood who possess European features. Some observers have assumed that improvement has taken place in the intellect of the Negro by education, but we believe such not to be the fact. It is simply the European blood in their veins which renders them fit for places of power, and they often use this power far more cruelly than either of the pure-blooded races. At the same time, there are doubtless many exceptions to this rule; depending perhaps on the amount of mixture of blood and inherited peculiarities. It is affirmed that the Negro only requires early education to be equal to the European; but all experiments of this kind have proved that such is not the case. To such a statement I would oppose the opinion of Pruner Bey, who says that "with regard to the regular Caucasian features, with which some travellers have endowed certain Negro peoples, among many thousand Negroes which have come under my observation there was not one who could lay claim to it."

Instances have often been quoted in which a reputed European skull has shown the character of the Negro. Such an instance there is in the College of Surgeons, another in Morton's museum, and one in Gall's collection; but if we admit these to have belonged to the pure race, we shall only be admitting that in one character the European skull sometimes resembles a Negro; but there will be plenty of other characters to show that they did not belong to the same race or species, and it ought simply to caution us not to base our ideas of race or species upon one character. We know that species of the mammalia frequently cannot be distinguished by the form of the skeleton, and we must therefore not be surprised to find that we are unable to prove a distinction of species in mankind if we take the cranium, or even skeleton, as a sole test.

We now know it to be a patent fact that there are races existing which have no history, and that the Negro is one of these races. From the most remote antiquity the Negro race seem to have been what they now are. We may be pretty sure that the Negro race have been without a progressive history; and that they have been for thousands of years the uncivilised race they are at this moment. Egyptian monuments depict them the inferior race they are at this minute, and holding exactly the same position to the European. Morton truly observes: "Negroes were numerous in Egypt, but their social position in ancient times was the same that it now is, that of servants and slaves."

Some writers have assumed that the Negro has degenerated from some higher form of civilisation, but we see no evidence to support such an assertion. We, however, fully admit that there are found traces of a higher civilisation, especially along the coasts visited, during all ages, by Europeans. The working of metals and imitation of European manufactures also exist in many parts of Africa. Indeed, there seems to be a great sameness in this respect throughout all Africa. Consul Hutchinson has given an interesting account of the finding of some implements used by the natives of Central Africa, exactly resembling those used by the Anglo-Saxons.

He says: "You will be surprised, no doubt, to hear that I brought down with me from the tribes of Filatahs, in Central Africa, iron heads of spears with wooden shafts and iron-spiked ferrules, heads of javelins and arrows, double-edged swords, knives, beads for ornaments, potteryware for culinary purposes, exactly similar in pattern to those that are described by Mr. Wright, in a paper on 'Fausset Antiquities,' which he read before the British Association at Liverpool, in 1856, and which antiquities, I need scarcely tell you, were excavated at Canterbury, as well as proved to have been used in this country before the introduction of Christianity to our shores. Even the cowrie (the shell of the cypræa moneta), which is described in Mr. Wright's paper as having been found among other relics of our Anglo-Saxon forefathers, is in this very day the currency among the Filatahs. It may perhaps increase the interest of my statement, which can be demonstrated by the articles I brought home (being deposited at the Royal Institution museum at Liverpool), when I add that they were obtained from tribes who had no record of ever having been visited by any white man previous to the time of our voyage at the end of 1854."

There is good reason to believe that, like all inferior races, there has been little or no self-migration of the Negro races since the earliest historical records. The European, for ever restless, has migrated to all parts of the world, and traces of him are to be found in every quarter of the globe. Everywhere we see the European as the conqueror and the dominant race, and no amount of education will ever alter the decrees of Nature's laws.

We hear much of late in this country of the equality of the Negro and European, because we have little real knowledge of the Negro; but in America the Negro is better known. As Dr. Van Evrie observes: "In the United States, among a people almost universally educated, and where the fact of 'equality' is almost universally understood and acted on, personally as well as politically, the advocacy of woman's 'equality,' in the sense that they (in England) argue it, or 'equality' of the Negro to the white man in any sense whatever, is inexcusable on the ground of ignorance; and those thus warring against the laws of nature and progress of society deserve to be treated as its enemies, or as absolute maniacs, and irresponsible for the evils they seek to indict upon it." It has been assumed, on very insufficient evidence, that the Negroes in America improve in intelligence in every generation, and that they gradually approach the European type. M. Quatre-fages recently directed our attention to this point, as did Sir Charles Lyell many years ago. It is affirmed that the head and body also approach the European, without any mixture of the races.

M. Quatre-fages quotes the following from M. Elzéar Reclus: "We do not intend here to touch upon the question of slavery; we would merely state a certain fact—the constant advance of Negroes in the social scale. Even in physical respects they tend gradually to approach their masters; the Negroes of the United States have no longer the same type as the African Negroes; their skin is rarely of velvet black, though nearly all their progenitors have been imported from the Coast of Guinea; their cheekbones are less prominent, their lips not so thick, nor the nose so flattened; neither is the hair so crisp, the physiognomy so brutish, the facial angle so acute, as those of their brethren in the old world. In the space of one hundred and fifty years they have, as far as external appearance goes, passed one-fourth of the gulf which separates them from the white race." But we must be careful how we accept such statements.

On this point Dr. Nott has very judiciously observed: "Sir C. Lyell, in common with tourists less eminent, but on this question not less misinformed, has somewhere stated that the Negroes in America are undergoing a manifest improvement in their physical type. He has no doubt that they will, in time, show a development in skull and intellect quite equal to the whites. This unscientific assertion is disproved by the cranial measurements of Dr. Morton. That Negroes imported into, or born in, the United States become more intelligent and better developed in their physique generally than their native compatriots of Africa, every one will admit; but such intelligence is easily explained by their ceaseless contact with the whites, from whom they derive much instruction; and such physical improvement may also be readily accounted for by the increased comforts with which they are supplied. In Africa, owing to their natural improvidence, the Negroes are more frequently than not a half-starved, and therefore half-developed, race; but when they are regularly and adequately fed they become healthier, better developed, and more humanised. Wild horses, cattle, asses, and other brutes are greatly improved in like manner by domestication; but neither climate nor food can transmute an ass into a horse or a buffalo into an ox."

The real facts seem to be that the Negroes employed in domestic labour have more intelligence than those who are employed at field labour, who are nearly in the same state of intelligence as when they left Africa. We see, therefore, in this improvement of the Negro simply the effect of education, but not of climate or other physical agents. We fully admit that the domestic Negro is improved in intelligence in America, resulting from the imitation of the sayings and doings of the superior race by which he is surrounded; but much of this improvement is owing to the mixture of European and Negro blood. The pure Negro is true to his character, and it is said that he is no sooner taught to read than he will take every chance of reading his master's letters; and if he be taught to write, he will soon learn to forge his master's signature. This applies with equal and perhaps greater force to those free, semi-civilised Negroes who are held by some in such theoretical veneration.

I intentionally avoided touching on the great diversity of physical type found in Africa, as this subject is not the object of the paper. There can be no doubt, however, that there is, in both North and South Africa, every shade of colour, and races with very different features. There are also in Central Africa some races, such as the Mandingoes, Fulahs, and Wolofs, who are quite distinct from the typical Negro. In these races some of the characters found in the pure Negro are found in only a very modified degree. How many races inhabit Africa, and their relation to one another, is not the subject of present inquiry. M. Pruner Bey has very judiciously made the following observations on this point:—

"We must admit that the inferior orbital margins are frequently narrow and retreating; that the noses become longer and more prominent; that the lips, turned up in some tribes, are only full in others; that prognathism diminishes, without, however, disappearing entirely; that the aperture of the eye becomes wide; that the hair, short and woolly in most, grows longer; that the transverse diameter of the chest becomes enlarged; that even the pelvis, though much more rarely, acquires more rounded outlines; that the limbs acquire more harmonious proportions; that the hips, thighs, and legs become more fleshy and the foot more arched; but as regards the crowning of the work, i.e., the skull, especially the cerebrum, all the variations in the Negro race remain confined within limits which deserve our attention. In the Arian race the skull presents three fundamental types: the elongated form (producing in some exceptional cases prognathism) which approaches the limits of the Negro type; the short and round form, approaching the Turanian race; and finally, the typically beautiful oval form which seems to have resulted from a combination of the two former. Nothing like it is to be found in the Negro. The skull is and remains elongated, it is elliptical, coniform, but never round; his facial bones may approach the pyramidal form by increasing the distance between the cheekbones, and may in this respect resemble the Kaffirs and the Bechuanas, but this is all." This generalisation appears to me to be in accordance with all the known facts respecting the craniological development of the chief African tribes, which thus form one great ethnic family, although composed of many distinct races.

I need not enlarge on the well-known and admitted facts respecting the intense immorality which exists amongst the Mulattoes and others of mixed blood. There are, at the same time, perhaps, some exceptions to this general rule, which has been observed in every country where these people exist. I propose on some future occasion to lay before you evidence to show that nearly all the Negroes who are asserted to have arrived at any mental distinction have European blood in their veins.

Of all the questions connected with the Negro, the most difficult to settle is that of his intelligence. Amidst conflicting testimony, it is difficult to discover the truth. We may admit, however, that there are instances of the pure Negro showing great powers of memory, such as the acquirement of languages; but we must also remember that memory is one of the lowest mental powers. Numerous instances have been collected by different partisan writers to show that the Negro is equal intellectually to the European; but an examination of these cases nearly invariably leads to the conclusion that there has been much exaggeration in the statements made by writers as to the aptitudes of the Negro for education and improvement.

The exhibitions of cases of intelligent Negroes in the saloons of the fashionable world by so-called "philanthropists" have frequently been nothing but mere impostures. In nearly every case in which the history of these cases has been investigated, it has been found that these so-called Negroes are the offspring of European and African parents. We admit, however, that the African Negro occasionally has great powers of memory, in learning languages, &c., but this is not admitting what is generally claimed for him. Some writers, who advocate the specific difference of the Negro from the European, have very injudiciously admitted that occasionally the Negro is equal in intellect to the European, but this admission has materially weakened their argument in favour of a specific difference. If this is so, let me ask those who hold such an opinion to give the name of one pure Negro who has ever distinguished himself as a man of science, as an author, a statesman, a warrior, a poet, an artist. Surely, if there is equality in the mental development of human races, some one instance can be quoted. From all the evidence we have examined, we see no reason to believe that the pure Negro ever advances further in intellect than an intelligent European boy of fourteen years of age. Many writers have mentioned the precocity of the Negro children. Sir C. Lyell has observed: "Up to fourteen years of age black children advance as fast as the whites;" and Eliot Warburton has remarked that the modern Egyptian, "when young, is remarkably precocious in intellect, and learns with facility. As he grows up, his intelligence seems to be dulled or diminished. He has no genius for discovery, and though apt in acquiring rudiments, he is incapable of generalising. He fills subordinate departments well, but appears incapable of taking or of keeping a lead." Sir C. Lyell expresses his surprise at the results of the mixture of some European blood with the Negro, and thinks "it a wonderful fact, psychologically considered, that we should be able to trace the phenomena of hybridity even into the world of intellect and reason." It would, indeed, be remarkable if all men were endowed with the same instincts; but not so wonderful if we do not accept such an unfounded hypothesis. The pure Negro seems incapable of much mental cultivation; and Archbishop Sumner's much-talked-of "improvable reason," as a distinction between men and animals, only finds a limited application in the Negro race. The reason of animals is improved to some extent by domestication and training, and this is all we can say of the Negro. Dr. Madden observes: "It will be seen by all the answers the missionary gentlemen in our different settlements have given to my queries respecting the mental capacity of Negro children, that they are considered universally, in that respect, equal to European children, and by some men quicker in their perceptions and more lively in their powers of apprehension." To which Dr. R. Clarke adds: "This is observable from the ages of five to twelve or thirteen years; but from that period of life to the age of eighteen or twenty, it becomes less strongly marked, and there appears to be less activity in the mental faculties."

Professor Owen gives it as his opinion that we are unable "to appreciate or conceive of the distinction between the psychological phenomena of a chimpanzee and of a Bojesman;" but we think we are able clearly to appreciate the psychological distinction between the Negro and the chimpanzee; just as we are able to see that there are decided mental and moral distinctions between the European and the Negro. We fully admit, however, that the psychological distinction is simply a question of degree and not of kind.

The day is not far distant when we shall be able to analyse the mental character of the Negro far more minutely than we can do in the present infant state of psychological science. In dwelling on the mental character of the Negro we must, therefore, for the present, rely on the general observations of those unbiassed travellers and others who have been much associated with the Negro race. In the first place we will see what is the evidence recently published of our English consuls, who have the best opportunities of judging of the character of the people amongst whom they are placed.

Consul Hutchinson, who spent no less than eighteen years on the West Coast of Africa, and who is as competent a judge as any man now living, says, that "his own observations on the African tribes tend to show that the African is not exactly the style of 'man and a brother' which mistaken enthusiasts for his civilisation depict him to be." He gives the result of a ten years' attendance at the Missionary school at Cape Palmas of one of his servants, a Kruman, and says that at the end he was asked what he knew of God? He replied: "God be very good; He made two things—one sleep and the other Sunday, when no person had to work." Consul Hutchinson says that "the thirst for each other's blood, which seems a daily habit amongst too many of the Negro tribes in Western Africa, appears to me to be incompatible with ordinary notions of common humanity." He adds that for scores of years European missionaries and English traders have mixed with them in social intercourse, yet they still cling "to their gris-gris, juju, fetishism and cannibalism as with much pertinacity as they did many hundred years ago." He adds: "Here we have all the appliances of our arts, our science, and our Christianity, doing no more good than did the wheat in the parable that was sown amongst the briars and the thorns. To attempt civilising such a race before they are humanised appears to me to be beginning at the wrong end. I have passed many an hour in cogitating and endeavouring to fabricate some sort of education likely to root out the fell spirit that dictates human sacrifices and cannibalism; but I fear years must elapse before any educational principle, in its simplest form, can produce an amendment on temperaments such as they possess."

Consul Burton considers that M. Du Chailu's remarks "concerning the commercial shrewdness and eagerness, the greediness and rascality of the Negro, apply to him everywhere in his natural state." He says that he believes "that an abnormal development of adhesiveness, in popular language a peculiar power of affection, is the brightest spot in the Negro character; as in children, it is somewhat tempered by caprice, especially under excitement, yet it has entitled him to the gratitude of many a traveller." Exaggeration, he considers, is the characteristic of the mind of both the East and West African. He says that "they justly hold labour as an evil inferior only to death."

These are the opinions which have been published by the last two consuls who have written on the subject, and we shall now examine the evidence of some other witnesses.

M. Du Chailu describes the general characteristics of the tribes he visited as speaking the Mpongwe language as far superior to the Negroes of Congo. He says "the Negroes possess an imaginative mind, are astute speakers, sharp traders, great liars, possessing great powers of dissimulation, and are far from being in many respects the stupid people they are believed to be. In everything that does not require mental labour and forethought, they seemed to me to learn almost as fast as any amongst the more intellectual races, to a certain point." He also affirms that they have little power of forethought or power of reflection, and that there is "a total lack of generalisation." He also says, that although these people "are often treacherous, they have noble qualities, are given to hospitality, and the women show great kindness of heart, especially when one takes into account the way they are treated."

Brehm says that "there seems to be a complete absence of moral sentiment amongst the natives of East Sudan, who not merely excuse theft, murder, and treachery, but consider these actions as praiseworthy in man. They first learned under a Turkish ruler to distinguish murder from justifiable homicide in war. Lying and deceitfulness are considered as marks of mental superiority; and those who suffer death on the gallows are buried with the same honours as the rich merchant or the sheik."

is very degraded; the moral feeling entirely undeveloped; all their actions proceed from animal impulse, or a cunning calculation of their own advantage. Generosity and indulgence exhibited by the white man they consider as weakness. Power imposes upon them and excites their hatred, which would become dangerous were they not aware of their powerlessness. The only efficacious punishment for them is the whip. They delight in sowing discord; are thievish and revengeful; void of any religious feeling, they are given to the crudest superstition. Their frame, however, is well developed and powerful; their teeth magnificent; their legs slender; they digest like beasts of prey." This certainly is a severe judgment, and may be partly explained by the large amount of mixed blood in Cuba.

Colonel Hamilton Smith thus describes the Negro. "The Negro is habitually dormant, but when roused shows his emotion by great gesticulations, regardless of circumstances. War is a passion that excites in them a brutal disregard of human feelings; it entails the deliberate murder of prisoners, and victims are slain to serve the manes of departed chiefs. Even cannibalism is frequent among the tribes of the interior. Notwithstanding the listless torpidity caused by excessive heat, the perceptive faculties of the children are far from contemptible; they have a quick apprehension of the ridiculous, often surpassing the intelligence of the whites, and only drop behind them about the twelfth year, when the reflective powers begin to have the ascendancy. Collectively, the untutored Negro mind is confiding and single-hearted, naturally kind and hospitable. Both sexes are easily ruled, and appreciate what is good under the guidance of common justice and prudence. Yet where so much that honours human nature remains in apathy, the typical woolly-haired races have never invented a reasoned theological system, discovered an alphabet, framed a grammatical language, nor made the least step in science or art. They have never comprehended what they have learned, nor retained a civilisation taught them by contact with more refined nations as soon as that contact had ceased. They have have at no time formed great political states, nor commenced a self-evolving civilisation. Conquest with them has been confined to kindred tribes, and produced only slaughter. Even Christianity, of more than three centuries' duration in Congo, has scarcely excited a progressive civilisation. Thus, even the good qualities given to the Negro by the bounty of nature, have seemed only to make him a slave trodden down by every remorseless foot, and to brand him for ages with the epithet of outcast—the marked, unceasing proof of a curse as old as the origin of society, not even deserving human forbearance. And true it is that the worst slavery is his lot even at home, for he is there exposed to the constant peril of becoming also a victim, slaughtered with the most revolting torments. Tyrant of his blood, he traffics in slavery as it were merchandise, makes war purposely to capture neighbours, and sells even his own wives and children."

Van Amringe thus describes the Negro race: "Even after having lived centuries with the white people, from whom they have received every possible instruction for the purpose of developing an attribute which would be so serviceable to them, as well as those whom they serve, they are very far from having a virtue for which they are distinguished or even trusted. The Canaanite (Negro) is indolent, careless, sensual, tyrannical, predatory, sullen, boisterous, and jovial. Such are the specific characteristics, and the sensual relations are founded upon them. It has been a favourite theory with some visionary philanthropists that intermarriages of the different species would be highly favourable to the race; but we have never heard of any of them who was willing to commence the practice in their own families. There is certainly no method that could possibly be devised, which would as certainly and as expeditiously degrade the whole human family as amalgamation. If there is any hope for the improvement of the condition of the dark races, the history of mankind shows it can only be founded upon the preservation of the Sæmistic (white) species. This is the only species endowed with any power to drag the cumbrous dark races out of the slough in which they have been wallowing for ages."

Burmeister, an excellent observer, says: "I have often tried to obtain an insight into the mind of the Negro; but it never was worth the trouble; the only available result obtained was, that there is not much mental life in the Negro, and that all his thoughts and actions were merely directed to the lowest requirements of human existence."

Carl Vogt has recently observed: "Most of the characters of the Negro recognised externally remind us irresistibly of the ape: the short neck, the long lean limbs, the projecting pendulous belly; all this affords a glimmer of the ape beneath the human envelope. Such similitudes are equally detected on examining the structure of individual parts."

Mr. Winwood Reade says, "It must be acknowledged, that putting all exceptions aside, the women of Africa are very inferior beings. Their very virtues, with their affections and their industry, are those of well trained domestic animals. But if the women of Africa are brutal, the men of Africa are feminine. Their faces are smooth, their breasts are frequently as full as those of European women; their voices are never gruff or deep. Their fingers are long; and they can be very proud of their rosy nails. While the women are nearly always ill-shaped after their girlhood, the men have gracefully moulded limbs, and always are after a feminine type—the arms rounded, the legs elegantly formed, without too much muscular development, and the feet delicate and small."

A king of Ashanti cut off the hands of a slave, and had her scratch his head for vermin with the stumps. If any one had accused him of barbarity he would not have understood the accusation. It was his idea of a good practical joke." He continues, "It will be understood that the typical Negroes with whom the slave is supplied, represent the dangerous, the destitute, and the diseased classes of African society. They may be compared to those which in England fill our gaols, our work-houses, and our hospitals. So far from being equal to us, the polished inhabitants of Europe, as some ignorant people suppose, they are immeasurably below the Africans themselves. The typical Negro is the true savage of Africa, and I must paint the deformed anatomy of his mind as I have already done that of his body. The typical Negroes dwell in petty tribes where all are equal, except the women, who are slaves; where property is common, and where, consequently, there is no property at all; where one may recognise the Utopia of philosophers, and observe the saddest and basest spectacles which humanity can afford. The typical Negro, unrestrained by moral laws, spends his days in sloth and his nights in debauchery. He smokes hashisch till he stupifies his senses, or falls into convulsions; he drinks palm-wine till he brings on a loathsome disease; he abuses children, and stabs the poor brute of a woman whose hands keep him from starvation, and makes a trade of his own offspring. He swallows up his youth in premature vice; he lingers through a manhood of disease; and his tardy death is hastened by those who no longer care to find him food. Such are the 'men and brothers' for whom their friends claim, not protection, but equality! They do not merit to be called our brethren; but let us call them our children. Let us educate them carefully, and in time we may elevate them, not to our own level—that, I fear, can never be—but to the level of those from whom they have fallen." This last remark is made in the supposition that the typical Negro is degenerated from some higher African race; but we think such an hypothesis is not warranted by history, archaeology, or any well established facts.

Dr. Van Eyrie, of New York, who has paid considerable attention to the character of the Negro, and had ample opportunities for observation, thus describes the Negro:—"But while the analysis of a single bone or of a single feature of the Negro being is thus sufficient to demonstrate the specific character or to show the diversity of race, that great fact is still more obviously and with equal certainty revealed in the form, attitude, and other external qualities. The Negro is incapable of an erect or direct perpendicular posture. The general structure of his limbs, the form of the pelvis, the spine, the way the head is set on the shoulders, in short, the tout ensemble of the anatomical formation, forbids an erect position. But while the whole structure is thus adapted to a slightly stooping posture, the head would seem to be the most important agency; for with any other head, or the head of any other race, it would be impossible to retain an upright position at all. But with the broad forehead and small cerebellum of the white man, it is perfectly obvious that the Negro would no longer possess a centre of gravity; and therefore, those philanthropic people who would 'educate' him into intellectual equality, or change the mental organism of the Negro, would simply render him incapable of standing on his feet, or of an upright position, on any terms. Everyone must have remarked this peculiarity in the form and attitude of the Negro. His head is thrown upwards and backwards, showing a certain though remote approximation to the quadrumanal, both in its actual formation and the manner in which it is set on his shoulders. The narrow forehead and small cerebrum (the centre of the intellectual powers), and the projection of the posterior portion (the centre of the animal functions), render the Negro head radically and widely different from that of the white man. Thus an anatomist, with the Negro and orang-outang before him, after a careful comparison, would say, perhaps, that Nature herself had been puzzled where to place them, and had finally compromised the matter by giving them an exactly equal inclination to the form and attitude of each other."

Dr. Louis Buchner, has drawn a most graphic picture of some of the physical characters of the Negro:—"An uninterrupted series of the most various transitions and analogies connect the animal world, from the lowest to the highest. Even man, who, in his spiritual pride, deems himself elevated above the animal creation, is far from forming an exception to this rule. The Ethiopian race connects him by a number of the most striking analogies with the animal world. The long arms, the form of the foot, the thin calf, the long small hands, the general leanness, the undeveloped nose, the projecting jaw, the low receding forehead, the small head, the narrow pelvis, the pendulous belly, the deficient beard, the colour of the skin, the disgusting odour, the uncleanness, the grimaces in talking, the shrieking voice, are the many marks which manifestly exhibit the most decided approach of the negro to the ape. That he also resembles him in his intellectual capacity is sufficiently known and established by the best observers."

M. Pruner Bey, one of the most eminent of living Anthropologists, has written the most complete memoir on the Negro yet published, and this author must, for some time to come, be the supreme authority on this subject.* Many years ago he thus expressed himself respecting the psychological character of the Negro:—"The capacity of the Negro is limited to imitation. The prevailing impulse is for sensuality and rest. No sooner are the physical wants satisfied, all psychical effort ceases, and the body abandons itself to sexual gratification and rest. The family relations are weak; the husband or father is little concerned. Jealousy has only carnal motives, and the fidelity of the female is secured by mechanical contrivances. Drunkenness, gambling, sexual gratification, and ornamentation of the body, are the most powerful levers in the life of the Negro. The whole industry is limited to ornaments. Instead of clothing himself he ornaments his body. Like certain animals, the Negro seems apathetic under pain. The explosions of passion occur when least expected, but are not lasting. The temperament of the Negro has been called choleric, but it is only so to a certain extent. It is a momentary ebullition, followed instantly by perfect apathy. Life has for the Negro no longer any value when he cannot supply the physical wants. He never resists by increased activity, but prefers to die in a state of apathy, or he commits suicide. The Negro has no love for war; he is only driven to it by hunger. War, from passion or destructiveness, is unknown to him." This is a sufficiently clear and truthful picture, and the following summary, with which M. Pruner Bey concluded his paper, presented to the Paris Anthropological Society, is equally to be commended for its truth and moderation. "The Negro has always appeared to me as partaking of the nature both of the child and the old man. Anatomists worthy of our confidence—Jacquart, Serres, and Huschke—have, in this sense, interpreted the details of the anatomy of the Negro. The elongated form of the cranium, the proportions of the cerebral lobes and their respective forms, the prominence of the inferior border of the orbits, the flattened nose, the rounded larynx, the less marked curves of the vertebral column, the lateral compression of the thorax and pelvis, with the vertical direction of the iliac bones, the elongated neck of the uterus, the proportion of the parts composing the extremities, the relative simplicity of the cerebral convolutions, &c., are characteristic features of the Negro race, which are found in the fetus or the infant of the Aryan race, in the different periods of development. The propensity for amusements, for material enjoyments, for imitation, and the inconstancy of affection, are the appanage of the Negro as well as of our children. The flexuosity of the arteries, the flattening of the cornea, the weakness of the muscles, the dragging walk, and the early obliteration of the cranial sutures, the obstinacy and love of repose, are met with in the Negro as in our aged men. In short, the great curve of human development, and its backward direction, appear to be sufficiently extended to appreciate the differences characterising the Negro race opposed to our race, always taking into account the differential characters resulting from adaptation to external conditions. If our interpretation leaves open many gaps, the future may fill them up, perhaps, in the same sense. If, finally, the Negro, speaking always figuratively, partakes of the nature of the ape, it must still be admitted that it is not the most ferocious, malicious, nor the most pernicious, but rather the most patient, and frequently the most useful animal. In any case, an honorable mediocrity is his inheritance."

The general deductions we would desire to make are:—1.

That there is as good reason for classifying the Negro as a distinct species from the European as there is for making the ass a distinct species from the zebra; and if we take intelligence into consideration in classification, there is a far greater difference between the Negro and European than between the gorilla and chimpanzee. 2. That the analogies are far more numerous between the Negro and apes than between the European and apes. 3. That the Negro is inferior intellectually to the European. 4. That the Negro is more humanised when in his natural subordination to the European than under any other circumstances. 5. That the Negro race can only be humanised and civilised by Europeans. 6. That European civilisation is not suited to the Negro requirements or character.

No man who thoroughly investigates with an unbiased mind can doubt that the Negro belongs to a distinct type of Man to the European. The word "species," in the present state of science, is not satisfactory; but we may safely say that there is in the Negro that assemblage of evidence which would, ipso facto, induce an unbiased observer to make the European and Negro two distinct types of man.

The facts I have quoted I believe are sufficient to establish the fact that the Negro is inferior intellectually to the European, and that the analogies are far more numerous between the ape and the Negro than between the ape and the European.

We shall not enter at length into the three last propositions. Suffice it to say, that no subject needs more attention at this minute than the position which the Negro race is fitted to hold in nature. I have said it devolves on the student of the Science of Man to assign to each race the position which it shall hold. This is surely a momentous and most difficult problem, but one which science must not evade. As the student of mechanical science has given to the world his inductions and discoveries, so must the student of the Science of Man endeavour to deduce from actual facts principles of guidance for the relations of one race of Man to another.

It is painful to reflect on the misery which has been inflicted on the Negro race, and the ignorance of Anthropological Science, especially the great question of race. By our ignorance of the wants and aspirations of the Negro, and by a mistaken theory respecting his origin, this country has been the means of inflicting a prodigious, and, at present, totally unknown amount of mischief on these people. Our Bristol and Liverpool merchants, perhaps, helped to benefit the race when they transplanted some of them to America; and our mistaken legislature has increased the death-rates of the slaves to an alarming extent by absurd and unwarrantable attempts to prevent Africa exporting her surplus population. All this has been done on the theoretical assumption of a mental equality of the different races or species of Man. In an attempt to benefit the Negro, we have brought on him endless misery and rendered some of the most beautiful and productive islands in the world of little more use to humanity at large than they were before the discovery of Columbus. But men wedded to a theory become blind to all facts, and will learn nothing from experience. All the millions of money which have been spent, and which has inflicted great hardships on our own working classes, might have been saved had we taken the trouble to investigate the character of the Negro race. Scientific men have yet to do their duty in showing what are the true facts.

It may be said that some of the propositions I have advanced are in favour of the slave trade. Such, however, is not my own interpretation of these propositions. No one can be more conscious of the horrors of the "slave trade" as conducted at this time. Nothing can be worse for Africa generally than the continual capture of innocent men and women by brutal Europeans. Few things can be more horrible than the manner in which these people are attempted to be carried across the Atlantic. Nay, more, nothing can be more unjust than to sell any man, woman, or child into "slavery," as understood by the Greeks and Romans, where the life of the slave was absolutely at the disposal of the master whenever his caprice or fancy thought fit to take it. We protest against being put forward as advocating such views.

But while I say this, I cannot shut my eyes to the fact that slavery, as understood by the ancients, does not exist out of Africa, and that the highest type of the Negro race is at present to be found in the so-called Slave States of America. Far superior in intelligence and physique to both his brethren in Africa and to his "free" brethren in the Federal States, nowhere does the Negro attain such a long life as in the Confederate States, and this law formerly obtained in the West India Islands before our mistaken interference. Nowhere does the Negro character shine so highly as it does in his childish and fond attachment to his master and his family. The Negro cares far more for his master and mistress than he does for his own children after they are a few years old. I by no means join in that indiscriminate abuse of the Negro character which has been indulged in, especially by those who have only seen the Negro in his savage state, or the "emancipated" (from work?) in the West India Islands. On the contrary, there is much that is to be admired, and more that is useful in the Negro, when properly and kindly treated. Brutal masters there are in every part of the world; but we must not found a law on exceptions. Scientific men, therefore, dare not close their eyes to the clear facts, as to the improvement in mind and body, as well as the general happiness, which is seen in those parts of the world in which the Negro is working in his natural subordination to the European. In some respects, the Negro is certainly not only not inferior, but even far superior to the European. If, for instance, the European was alone in the Confederate States of America those fertile regions would soon become a barren waste. The Negro is here able to work with impunity, and does himself and the world generally much good by his labour. Occupations and diseases which are fatal to the Europeans are quite harmless to the Negro. By their juxtaposition in this part of the world they confer a material benefit on each other.

But it may be asked, "Why remove the Negro from his own country? Why not humanise him in Africa?" No doubt this sounds very feasible, and no pains should be spared to introduce every possible humanising influence into Africa. There is little doubt that the African is more easily humanised out of his native land, away from all his savage associations; but this need not prevent us from doing all we can towards civilising him in his own country.

It has been affirmed on the best authority (although frequently denied) that domestic slaves are only sold in Africa for some crime. No one, we presume, will dare assert that there are no criminals in Africa. "What shall we do with our criminals?" may be a problem which is occupying the attention of the political economist of Africa—like His Majesty the King of Dahomey—as well as the Government of Great Britain. Is Africa not to be allowed to export her criminals, or are they so worthless and unmanageable that no people will have them? What is to be done with unruly or criminal slaves? As a king of Old Calabar said, "You bind me down not to sell them, tell me it is wrong to kill them: what must I do with them? I will give you some, and then you won't take them!" Would it not be well to allow a regular export of the surplus population, instead of permitting, and indeed encouraging, the butcheries of the so-called King of Dahomey? The difficulties of humanising, much less of civilising, the African in his own country are very great; yet, if such healthy sentiments were generally diffused in this country as have been lately published in an admirable work, entitled "Wanderings in Western Africa," it is impossible to say what great results might in time be attained. This author well says, "Ever remember that by far the greater number of the liberated were the vilest of criminals in their own land, and that in their case exportation becomes, in fact, the African form of transportation."

There is abundant evidence to show that the Negro will not work without a considerable amount of persuasion. Even Dr. R. Clarke is obliged to admit that the Creoles of Sierra Leone "manifest the utmost contempt for agricultural pursuits, and the same feeling seems to actuate the half-educated liberated African lads." Another writer observes, that "In Sierra Leone the Christian tenderness of the British Government has tended to demoralise them. . . . The women have become as vicious as those of Egypt, the basest of kingdoms—worse than the men, bad as they are. . . . Theft is carried to such an extent, that no improvement is possible at Freetown."

I have stated that one of the results of my inquiry leads me to believe that English institutions are not suited to the Negro race. There seems to be a maximum testimony to show that the liberated and the Creoles in our colonies are a perfectly worthless set. They accept all the vices of our civilisation with none of its duties. A recent public writer, in behalf of the English colonies on the West Coast of Africa well says:—"The African is far more innocent and natural a creature when he has never been brought within the range of civilised life. The liberated Africans are far superior to the rising generation—in energy, in talent, and in honest principles. To handle a hoe has now become a disgrace, and the people have lost their manhood by becoming gentlemen. . . . only the ignorant can boast of the extensive freedom we have given the African. Freedom, indeed, we should have given, but it ought to have been qualified to suit their capacities."

In now bringing my remarks to a close, I cannot, perhaps, do better than quote the graphic picture of the present state of Africa, which has only been published during the last few weeks. There is much true science and healthy manhood in these sentiments. The work of which I speak is evidently the work of a man who has devoted much attention to the study of the great science of mankind; and I am pleased to find that my own views find ample support in the conclusions of this accomplished and scientific observer. Speaking of the Negroes of Bonny, he says: "The slaves were a truly miserable appearance, lean and deformed, with krakra lepra and fearful ulcerations. It is in these places that one begins to feel a doubt touching the total suppression of slavery. The chiefs openly beg that the rules may be relaxed, in order that they may get rid of their criminals. This is at present impossible, and the effects are a reduplication of misery. We pamper our convicts, Africans torture them to death. Cheapness of the human article is another cause of immense misery to it. In some rivers a canoe crew never lasts three years. Pilfering—'Show me a black man and I will show you a thief,' say the traders—and debauchery are natural to the slave, and they must be repressed by abominable cruelties. The master thinks nothing of nailing their hands to a water-cask, of mutilating them in various ways; many lose their eyes by being peppered, after the East Indian fashion, with coarsely-powdered cayenne; their ears are cut off, or they are flogged. The whip is composed of a twisted bullock's or hippopotamus's hide, sundried, with a sharp edge at the turns, and often wrapped with copper wire; it is less merciful even than the knout, now historical. The operation may be prolonged for hours, or for a whole day, the culprit's arms being tied to a rafter, which keeps them at full stretch, and every fifteen minutes or so a whack, that cuts away the flesh like a knife, is administered. This is a favourite treatment for guilty wives, who are also ripped up, cut to pieces, or thrown to the sharks. If a woman has twins or becomes mother of more than four, the parent is banished and the children are destroyed. The greatest insult is to point at a man with arm and two fingers extended, saying at the same time, Nama shubral i.e., one of twins, or a son of some lower animal. When a great man dies, all kinds of barbarities are committed; slaves are buried, or floated down the river bound to bamboo sticks and mats, till eaten piecemeal by sharks. The slave, as might be expected, is not less brutal than his lord. It amazes me to hear Englishmen plead that there is moral degradation to a Negro bought by a white man, and none when serving under a black man. The philanthropists, doubtless, think how our poorer classes at home, in the nineteenth century, would feel if hurried from liberty to eternal servitude by some nefarious African. But can any civilised sentiments belong to the miserable half-starved being, whose one scanty meal of vegetable per day is eked out with monkey and snake, cat and dog, maggot and grub?—whose life is ceaseless toil, varied only by torture, and who may be destroyed at any moment by a nod from his owner? When the slave has once surmounted his dread of being shipped by the white man, nothing under the sun would, I believe, induce him willingly to return to what he should call his home. And as they were, our West Indian colonies were lands of happiness compared with Oil Rivers; as for the 'Southern States,' the slave's lot is paradise when succeeding what he endures on the West Coast of Africa. I believe these to be facts, but tant pis pour les faits. Presently, however, the philanthropic theory shall fall, and shall be replaced by a new fabric built upon a more solid foundation."

In conclusion, let me observe, that it is not alone the man of science who has discerned the Negro's unfitness for civilisation, as we understand it. Here is Mr. Anthony Trollope, who is certainly quite guiltless of ever having examined the evidence of the distinction between the Negro and European, and yet truly says of the Negroes:—"Give them their liberty, starting them well in the world at what expense you please, and at the end of six months they will come back upon your hands for the means of support. Everything must be done for them; they expect food, clothes, and instruction as to every simple act of life, as do children."

We must for the present leave aside all questions as to the origin of the Negro, and simply take him as he exists, and not as poets or fanatics paint him. We shall then learn, that it is only by observation and experiment that we can determine the exact place in nature which the Negro race should hold, and that it is both absurd and chimerical to attempt to put him in any other.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. ## The Crisis in Tennessee.

THE conflict in America grows in intensity as the months roll on. The third year of the war is now at its close. There have been half-a-dozen great battles in 1863, in which more than 100,000 men have been hurled together in deadly collision. Not a month has passed without its tidings from hard-fought fields and its holocaust of victims. And with all this enduring struggle, its sacrifices of life and treasure, its wasting effect upon the population of North and South, its hardships and its indecisive issues, there is no sign of weariness or submission on either side in the field. On the contrary, the fighting is more desperate, the masses of men that confront one another are larger, and the area over which the war extends is vaster. The war administration of Washington is not satisfied with conducting the operations of an army of 100,000 men in Virginia, directing the movements of General Grant with double that number, and urging on Gilmore and Dahlgren against the walls of Charleston. It is intent upon new conquests; it launches fresh armies into a hostile State more than equal in size to France, and even plants the Stars and Stripes, as if in vaunting defiance, almost within sight of the outposts of the French army in Mexico. The last mail brings us news of battles all along the Confederate line. In Virginia, in Tennessee, and in Louisiana engagements more or less serious are reported, and in all of these the Federals have been worsted. Yet, at such a critical moment, when every man is needed to strike a blow at the vitals of the Confederacy, great expeditions are on their way to Texas; and when £160 is paid for recruits in New York the strength of some 30,000 disciplined soldiers is frittered away in a country where 2,000 guerillas will suffice to carry on a successful war for twenty years. One solitary gleam of success has attended the Texan expedition. General Banks has occupied Brownsville without opposition. But at Opelousas, in Louisiana, the Federals marching overland have suffered a severe defeat, and the result seems to be that the great scheme for overwhelming Texas with their armies has entirely failed. The Federals will hardly attempt Sabine Pass again; they have unpleasant recollections of Galveston. The ultimate transhipment of their whole force to Brownsville would be quite in accordance with the insane war policy of Mr. Lincoln, and as this movement would be about the most desirable one that could be made for the Confederates, we may expect to hear of its execution. But what is to be expected of a war carried on in this desultory and aimless manner, and in which the object seems to be less a real military success than a demonstration of Mr. Seward's "big" ideas, and an opportunity for the display of another substantial accession to Federal territory on paper?

We have alluded to the Texas expedition as illustrative of the imbecility of the Washington Cabinet, but it possesses beyond this very little interest. It is on the Tennessee River that the great battles of the war have to be fought—possibly by this time have been fought. The long-expected stroke has been delivered by the Confederates in East Tennessee, and Burnside's army, surrounded and overwhelmed at all points, has been thrown back behind its fortifications at Knoxville. From the accounts received up to this time, it is difficult to comprehend the general movements of the Confederates upon this point. Only Longstreet is mentioned, and the attacking force would seem to have entirely consisted of a portion of Bragg's army. But this would be clearly an erroneous inference. For some time past it has been known that one or two divisions had been despatched southward from Culpepper along the Virginia and Tennessee railroads. General Jones, in command of a force of some 7,000 or 8,000 Confederates has never been more than a few miles distant from the Federal outposts. Only last week we heard of the defeat of the Federals at Rogersville, some thirty miles north-east of Knoxville, with heavy loss. A week earlier their advance was attacked and driven in at Philadelphia, thirty miles south of Knoxville. The obvious conclusion is, that the assailing force is made up of Lee's, Jones's, and Bragg's armies. Only thus can we account for the numerical superiority of the Confederates in the field. The advance upon Knoxville seems to have been made simultaneously in several directions. But Longstreet's corps crossed the Tennessee River at London on the 14th, driving in the Federal pickets. After some smart skirmishing and two or three night attacks, Monday morning found the Federals drawn up in line of battle at Concord within a few miles of Knoxville. They were again attacked and defeated and only saved by the approach of night, when they took refuge behind their outer defences at Knoxville. About the same time heavy bodies of Confederate troops drove in the Federals stationed along the Kingston and Central roads; and finally, the main body closing up, captured "with a bayonet charge, a portion of the strong fortifications only half a mile from the town." Thus in five days they had driven the enemy some twenty miles, had overborne him invariably when he offered resistance, and on the sixth day had completely invested the town. Of the losses in these engagements it is premature to speak. The Federals estimate their own casualties at 500; and with their usual liberality, allot three times that number to the Confederates—an evident extravagance. The losses of the army that was beaten in those four or five days' heavy fighting must have greatly outnumbered those of the victors. However, the Federals are consoled by the report that Burnside has taken up an impregnable position. This is the third impregnable position he has held within the last month. At Philadelphia he was secure, at London he occupied unassailable heights. Once at Knoxville all anxiety about him is over. We agree with the Federal authorities in their conclusion: all anxiety is over, for there is no possibility of his escape. It is almost a canon in the art of war that an army which cannot maintain itself in the field cannot hold a large town against an enemy of equal force; still less when it is cut off from all possibility of supplies and reinforcements. Knoxville is a town of some 2,500 inhabitants, covering a large tract of ground. How is it possible that its garrison, or the army that is cooped up behind its entrenchments, can hold out against simultaneous attacks along the half-dozen roads that converge upon the town? We know something of Longstreet's tactics. He is not the man to throw his chances away. A fierce artillery fire and a dashing assault have in all probability settled the fate of Burnside's army before this, and with it the possession of East Tennessee. There remains to be considered the possibility of an attack in force upon the Confederate army before Chattanooga by General Grant. But we have as yet no positive information that General Sherman has reached the Federal lines; and we are by no means sure that General Grant has supplies, horses, or ammunition sufficient for a forward movement. And it must be remembered that defeat in this case would be ruin to the Federal cause. It could never recover the loss of the Army of the Cumberland superadded to the capture of Burnside's force. General Grant knows that the South has brought an immense force into the field against him; that he will have to operate at a decided disadvantage; and that even a victory would be so far resultless that he would be unable to follow it up until the spring. We are not inclined therefore to believe in any great offensive movement on his part. Whether he will be allowed to pass many more weeks unmolested we very much doubt. Under any circumstances the capture of Burnside's corps will seriously imperil his position and add to his difficulties. Grant has drained Tennessee to retain his hold at Chattanooga. Between Nashville and Knoxville there is no army to arrest the progress of Longstreet's army. If Burnside's army is destroyed, nothing but want of supplies, or the impossibility of moving great bodies of troops during the next two months, can prevent Grant's lines of communication falling into the hands of the Confederates. It has been said, hitherto only too truly, that the victories of the South have been barren of results. But this almost confirmed hope of Longstreet's triumph opens up a new view. It promises to be the most successful operation of the war. It may turn out to be the crisis of the struggle.

Beaten at Opelousas, beaten at Knoxville, beaten on the Rapidan. So run the telegrams. The Federals, who stopped short at the sight of the Confederate intrenchments on the Rapidan, have in their turn been attacked and routed. The fight may have been a mere affair of outposts: it may have been a serious disaster. We are at the mercy of Mr. Stanton. But it tells us unmistakeably that the Federals under Meade have their work cut out for them, and that whilst they cannot afford to "deplete" their army by sending off troops to Chattanooga, neither can they look for an easy triumph if they advance upon the Southern capital. Practically, the campaign in Virginia seems to be at an end. It leaves the Federals with half the effective force they had in the field this time last year, and General Lee strong enough to send away half his army to secure a great triumph in Tennessee.

The Cloven Foot.

ACCORDING to the custom of Radical members, Messrs. Cobden and Bright have duly performed ko-too before the electors of Rochdale. The former, as the representative of that borough, was in his proper place; why the Member for Birmingham should have selected his fellow-townsmen, rather than his constituents, as the recipients of his homage may seem to require a little explanation. The truth is, that Birmingham and Bright do not suit one another as well as they hoped. The men of the city of iron are somewhat rough and very radical, but they are thoroughly English; and Mr. Bright's foreign policy is as loathsome to their manliness as his hearty abuse of his betters is congenial to their baser passions. Rochdale, on the other hand, is the head-quarters of the White Feathers. It is the only place in England that believes in peace at any price. It is the only town that refused to furnish a volunteer company for the cure of domestic alarms and foreign dreams of invasion. In a word, it is the only place in England that could have produced John Bright; and the only one, therefore, in which he feels thoroughly at ease. Hence, when he wishes to obtain a favourable hearing for some sentiment more disgraceful, or some paradox more extravagant, than usual—when he wishes not merely to show but to parade the cloven foot of treason freed from the ill-fitting restraints of decency and pretended loyalty, without fear of being hooted, he goes to Rochdale; and Rochdale always welcomes him, as she did on Tuesday week, with ready sympathy and uncritical credulity.

With both speakers the American war was the chief topic; the only one on which they could hope to arouse anything like real interest in their audience. Mr. Cobden took up the ground of slavery. He deplored the ignorance of Northern resources displayed by the higher classes, who, he affirmed, were actually unaware of the existence of very many cities much larger than Rochdale—as is natural enough, where cities grow from nothing into greatness in a dozen years—and therefore could not possibly be justified in their convictions of the impossibility of a forcible restoration of the Union. He declared that, though in all other points of view it did seem impossible that the South should be conquered, yet that she must be crushed in the end, because she had gone to war for the maintenance of slavery, and because she had fired the first shot in a wanton and unjust quarrel. Finally, he expressed his hope that Lancashire would ere long be supplied with abundance of cotton grown by the labour of free negroes in the valley of the Mississippi. We charitably suppose Mr. Cobden wholly ignorant of the history of the West Indies. If he were not, he would know that free negroes don't work, unless they are crowded into so small a space that they must work or starve; and that even then they do not work so well as slaves. He would know that emancipation would reduce the South to the condition of Jamaica, and that she would never again send us half-a-million bales per annum. He would know that the whole manufacturing interest of Lancashire has been built upon the system of slavery in the Cotton States; and that, if its foundation be torn away, it must fall to the ground with a mighty and irremediable ruin, crushing two millions of English people in its fall. We would remind him, also, that the resources of the North are much better known in England than the resources of the South in New York. We would remind him that, at the outbreak of the war, the general belief of the North was that Southern resources could not stand the strain of an ordinary war for six months; whereas they have stood the severest strain ever put upon the strength of any nation, and at the close of the third year of war show no signs of giving way. Moreover, it is clear that at the outset Englishmen, and even English statesmen, greatly overrated the comparative strength and resources of the North. Few educated and thoughtful men believed that the South could be conquered, if she were really in earnest; but every one thought that she would be overrun, devastated, starved, defeated in battle; and if any one had predicted in June, 1861, that in November, 1863, the Federal armies would be at a standstill in Virginia, Tennessee, and Louisiana; that General Lee would still hold the Rapidan, and that Texas, Alabama, Georgia, the Carolinas and Southern Virginia would still be in the hands of the Confederates, and no portion of their original territory, except here and there a fragment on the seacoast, be securely held by the invaders, he would have been laughed at. So far, then, as ignorance has influenced English judgment on the probable issues of the war, it has led us to overrate the chances in favour of the invader.

Mr. Cobden makes, on his own authority, two misstatements as to the origin of the war, which we are obliged to correct. One is, that it was begun by the South. This is, as a matter of dates, simply and utterly untrue. The expedition treacherously, and in violation of a distinct compact, sent by Mr. Lincoln to attack Charleston, sailed some days before its sailing was announced to the Southern Commissioners; its sailing, of course, with that purpose, established a state of war, and fixed the responsibility of commencing it on the Federal Government. It was not till after the latter had formally announced this fact to the Confederate commissioners that Fort Sumter was summoned. Although, therefore, the first shot was fired by the South, the first attack was made, and the war begun, by the North.

Secondly, Mr. Cobden states that "this is a war for the perpetuation and extension of slavery." What does he mean? Does the South propose, or did it ever propose, to force slavery upon the Northern States? Is it not fighting simply to get quit of all connection with those States, and leave them to arrange their own institutions in their own way? And, leaving the question of extension aside, suppose the South were fighting to maintain slavery; what of that? Suppose that in former times France had sent envoys to excite servile insurrection in our West India Islands, would not that have afforded us a casus belli, and would the warmest opponents of slavery have contended that we ought not to resent it? Or suppose the French Directory had proclaimed freedom to the negroes of Jamaica, and landed an army to take possession of the island, should we have been wrong in fighting against the invaders, albeit for the maintenance of slavery? This is exactly the position of the South. If she be fighting to maintain slavery, it is against a Power which has no more right or title to meddle with slavery in the Slave States than France had to meddle with slavery in Jamaica, or England to make war on Spain in order to liberate the negroes in Cuba. Suppose that Portugal, in her attempt to re-conquer Brazil, had offered freedom to the slaves: does Mr. Cobden hold that the Brazilians would thereby have been put in the wrong, or that any step of that kind could have affected in any way the justice of their cause? If it be true that, in electing Abraham Lincoln, the North declared war on slavery, and that the South took up that challenge, and armed to defend her institutions and her rights, her position was exactly what that of Spain would be if France were to order her to emancipate the Cuban slaves and she were to take up arms to resist the demand.

But this is not the case. Not having at hand the document quoted by Mr. Cobden, we are unable to say whether or no the discussion in the Committee of Thirty-three did really turn on the question of slavery, and on no other. All we can say is, that the Republicans would have been willing, and if unwilling could have been compelled, to make any terms, and give any guarantees on the question of slavery which would have availed to keep the Cotton States in the Union. Also, that the real issue was, for the South, not slavery or emancipation, but secession or dependence. Slavery had been the battleground, for many years, between the Northern Sectional party, and the Unionists, including the whole Southern body politic. The question at issue was, whether or no the North, by mere dint of increasing numbers, should obtain an absolute control over the policy of the Union, and reducing the Southern States to a helpless minority, direct affairs in a purely sectional spirit, and for Northern interests only. As the means of preventing this was the creation of new Slave States, it was on the question of slavery that both parties concentrated their force. The South brought to bear the pride of race, the patriotism of her citizens, the interests of her planters, the hereditary opinions of her whole people, and the sectional irritation aroused by Northern insults. The Republicans brought to bear the prejudices of the Germans, the Western greed of land, the Yankee hatred of aristocracy, the fanaticism of the Abolitionists, the ambition of the place-hunter. The war was transferred from Congress to the Territories, and there decided against the South. From that moment the North became preponderant; it only rested with the Northern people to say whether its preponderance should be used for purposes of sectional domination. That question was answered by the election of Abraham Lincoln, on a sectional platform, by a purely sectional majority. Nothing remained for the South but secession or subjection. It was not a question of slavery, it was a question of independence; slavery might have been preserved by compromise; independence could only be gained by war. In choosing war, therefore, the South showed what had been the real dispute. The North, when she drew the sword, made it equally clear. She demanded not the emancipation of the slaves, but the restoration of the Union; and when, at last, she had recourse to emancipation, it was ostentatiously proclaimed to the world that emancipation was only resorted to as a means to an end: that end, the subjection of the South. How, then, dare Mr. Cobden affirm that this is a war between slavery and freedom? or how deny that it is exactly what Lord Russell called it—a war for independence on the one hand, and for empire on the other?

Mr. Bright, after years of sorrowful reflection, has at last discovered in this war a new proof of the wisdom, strength and excellence of democratic institutions. Still, he says, the tide of emigration sets as strongly as ever towards the United States. Strange it would be if it did not. War has not reached the Northern States, and is not likely to reach the regions peopled by the emigrants; the conscription does not touch those who preserve their claims to the protection of Great Britain; and even democracy cannot destroy the attractions offered by an unlimited supply of land at less than 3s. sterling per acre. And, while the English Government enforces its Foreign Enlistment Act only for the benefit of the Federals; while Irishmen love the pleasure of a fight even better than the pay, and while a bounty of £100 is offered to recruits in New York; it would be strange if Ireland did not furnish Mr. Lincoln with food for powder, and, as the correspondent of the Standard says, supply a cheap and abundant manure to the fields of Northern Virginia. Under such circumstances, and with such temptations, Russia herself could attract as many emigrants. "But further," says the Member for Birmingham, "the Government of the United States is now the strongest in the world, within its own dominions: it can do what it pleases with the lives, liberties, and property of its subjects; and surely this proves the inherent vigour of democracy." To us it seems to prove the very opposite. We see in the present condition of the United States a proof of such moral and political weakness as could hardly have been predicted by the bitterest opponents of democracy. The Government is naturally so weak that it cannot carry on a foreign war of magnitude without resorting to the most extravagant abuses of despotic power at home; the Constitution is so rotten and unworkable that it affords no means of checking the usurpation of absolute power by the Executive, and no effectual protection for the liberty of the citizens; the people are reduced by democracy to that degree of moral cowardice and political degradation, that they dare make no stand against the confiscation of their franchises and the establishment of an unmitigated military despotism. The failure of democracy is trebly demonstrated; first, by the necessity of a dictatorship; secondly, by the assumption of a dictatorship, without any sort of legal warrant, by an executive magistrate endowed by law with most limited powers; and thirdly, by the tame acquiescence in such a usurpation of the great mass of the people.

The real meaning of the violence with which such men as these have espoused the Northern cause is not to be sought in their speeches on American affairs, but in their harangues against the social and political order established in England. It is to be found in the spirit which animates their bitter denunciations of the possessors of hereditary wealth and influence. It is betrayed in their attacks on the holders of property in land; in their suggestion that a "reform" in Parliament would enable poor men to become landholders—which Parliament could only do by ordering a general confiscation and gratuitous distribution of landed property. It is explained, in short, whenever their vehemence disturbs the sober garments of the English Liberal, and allows us to catch a glimpse of the cloven foot of the cosmopolitan anarchist. These men are, by instinct and association, the sworn foes of order; for order implies subordination, and their insatiable vanity cannot endure the presence of a superior. They revolt against every influence but that of the tongue, and against every power but that which a fluent tongue can sway—the power of the multitude. They saw in the Northern States of America the realisation of their own ideal. There, was no queen, to be addressed in the language of reverent loyalty by men proud to call themselves her subjects. There, was no Church, preserving ancient traditions, and the influence of an educated clergy and an ancestral faith. There, was no aristocracy, born to hereditary wealth, and educated for political power. There, every avenue to greatness was open to a scheming brain and a fluent tongue. There, no restraints could check, even for a moment, the will and pleasure of the sovereign rabble, or the ascent of the rabble's favourite to place and power. There, a Cobden might be Minister, and a Bright aspire to the Presidency. And yet, owing to a peculiar position and favouring circumstances, the nation so situated flourished in marvellous prosperity, and served to point every oration addressed to audiences unable to discern that it enjoyed that prosperity in despite and not in right of its institutions. The idol has been rudely overthrown. Its utter rottenness, its hollowness, the base metal that underlay its gilded exterior, are exposed to every eye; and instead of being held up for adoration by the votaries of anarchy, it is everywhere used as a warning and example to point the consequences of a headstrong revolt against tradition and authority and order. What wonder that the anarchists are frantic with rage against those who have brought this to pass; that the idolators strain their lungs, and exhaust their vocabulary in cursing those who have broken their idol to pieces? Anarchy and Order are face to face in the New World as they have never yet been face to face in the Old, and everywhere the enemies of order feel that the overthrow of the South would be their victory, and that the dissolution of the Union is the death-knell of their hopes. In the Southern States order presents essentially the same features as in England—a constitutional Government, administered by the best and highest minds in the land, controlled by the educated classes, rooted in the affections of the people; an aristocracy, with hereditary wealth, open to every man who can win his way to enter its ranks by his own genius, talent, or industry; a yeomanry, cultivating their own lands, and living on their produce, in perfect independence and in strong attachment to the institutions of their country; and a peasantry who are happier and more contented in the name of slaves than the half-pauperised peasantry of Europe in the title of freemen. Against this order the great embodiment of anarchical principles has measured its strength, and more depends on the issue than all observers can discern. We can all, however, see far enough into the nature of this quarrel to understand the reasons which enlist all the anarchical elements of society here on the Northern side; to understand why Cobden and Bright should love the North, and why Englishmen in general should not.

England and the Congress.

WE have not failed to render our tribute of respect and admiration to the noble thought which undoubtedly inspired Napoleon III. in his eloquent appeal to the sovereigns of Europe. Since the day when the dagger of Ravallac dispelled the vision of universal peace that rose before one of the best of French sovereigns and one of the wisest of French statesmen, the idea of Henri IV. and of Sully had been buried amid antiquarian rubbish, scarcely ever alluded to even by philosophical historians, and then only as a beautiful Utopian dream. It is not the least glory of the present Emperor's reign that he has revived this idea with increased grandeur and brilliancy; for though in his lifetime the age may not be ripe to give it shape and body, men's minds will continue to revolve it, and a more advanced generation may seek to realise it. The goal may never be reached, yet mankind will be the better for seeking to reach it. Wars will probably never cease so long as human nature remains unchanged; but it is not absurd to hope to remove them gradually further and further from the centres and to the outskirts of European civilisation; and though small minds cavil at such a thought as that which underlay the French invitation to a European Congress, there is in it more of practical policy and sagacious statesmanship than in all the pusillanimous schemes of peace philosophers, from Seneca down to Cobden. It is scarcely more than four hundred years since the Western nations dimly perceived that they each formed part of a compact, closely knit, and indissoluble political "system," or community, or, if the term is preferred, family. With all who look upon history as something beyond a list of dates and names, and who can see facts beyond those that are recorded in diplomatic formulas, this European commonwealth of independent nations has a recognised existence. Everything that tends to give it a tangible shape in the eyes of the diverse populations adds to its vitality and moral power, and is that much gained for the cause of peace. Members of a family will and do quarrel, and no conventionality of intercourse and behaviour can wholly restrain the workings of conflicting passions, but it will surely not be contended that an honest effort to promote mutual intimacy and to render the obligations of the family tie better understood and more sacred, is useless or unwise. At this time every member of the European family stands armed to the teeth, and each for the last few years has spent a greater proportion of its resources than at any previous epoch in preparing itself for deadly strife against the others. To meet in family council at such a time could at worst precipitate by a very brief period what must inevitably come otherwise; it is far more likely that it would avert the danger.

While we have thus appreciated as they deserved the motives and intentions of the Emperor, we have not been blind to the practical difficulties opposed to their realisation. It was natural to expect, from the character and habits of thought of the English people, that these difficulties would present themselves most formidably to them, and would find probably an exaggerated expression in this country. Less easily dazzled by brilliant conceptions, accustomed to look with suspicion at everything outside of a familiar routine, the English nation would be the first to perceive that, while the proposed Congress might do much good, it could not do all the good its originator hoped and promised. This, we believe, was in truth the feeling of the nation, and it was expressed, with singular unanimity, by the public press. But from this feeling, and the hesitation and reserve which it might cause, to the attitude actually assumed by the British Government, there is a long step, and one so grave and unexpected, that few men besides Earl Russell would have so rashly taken it. That even he was not allowed to take it without the serious remonstrance of his more prudent colleagues, we may infer from the reports of his withdrawal which were current little more than a week since. There can be no doubt that he and Earl Clarendon respectively typified refusal or acceptance of the Emperor's invitation. In the net and peremptory refusal, therefore, which he made haste to publish to the world, we must recognise the ascendancy of the Russell influence in the councils of the State; just as in the strikingly uncourteous and offensive language used, which deprives his despatch almost of the decorum of a diplomatic document, no one can fail to recognise a notorious feature of the Foreign Secretary's personal character. Were Earl Russell a man of bold and consistent views, we might give him credit in this instance for at least an original, albeit a mistaken, policy; but his eccentric and erratic course compels us to seek elsewhere than in his deliberate convictions of expediency for the impulse which he has in the present case obeyed. There is a suspicious coincidence between the tone of his reply and the tenor of the speeches made nearly at the same time by the great mouthpieces of the Radical party. Were this the only indication, and not one of many, daily becoming more numerous and convincing, we should hesitate to express the fear, which we sincerely trust may be unfounded, that the head of the Foreign Affairs of this country has surrendered himself to the guidance of the least respectable and most dangerous of its political factions.

A certain show of transient popularity attaches to every public act which is calculated to fret or annoy or disappoint our French neighbours and beloved allies. Not but that the Englishman of the present day disclaims indignantly the prejudices which caused his father to believe that every Frenchman went to bed and rose in the morning with the stern determination, first and last in his mind, to "avenge Waterloo." Not this, but there is something irresistibly flattering to the amour propre of even the least prejudiced nation, which Frenchmen ought to be most competent to appreciate sans dire, since they in their most amiable moods exhibit it toward us in at least an equally strong degree. Yet a feeling of this nature is of necessity ephemeral with a nation like the English. Already in the clubs and the salons of the higher spheres of society the question is asked, "Whither are we drifting in our foreign policy?" It is a question which will soon re-echo in wider circles, and it is not one to be satisfactorily answered. If there has been any policy at all it has been one of absolute isolation. To alienate every friend in Europe and America whose sincerity there was an à priori reason for trusting, and to conciliate at all costs whoever from disposition or antecedents must inevitably be a natural enemy, appears to have been within the last few years the one task and purpose of English statesmanship. It is to be doubted whether an entente cordiale, fostered with the Federal States of the north of America by making officers of the Crown and colonial governors spies on the actions of their enemies, will, in the judgment of the British public, be a sufficient compensation for the rude breaches made in the friendly relations of this country with the next greatest civilised Power of Europe. It is more than doubtful whether Englishmen are yet ready to see their country occupy the position wished for it by Cobden and Bright, and to become in very deed a shop-keeping nation, having no concern, and desiring none, in the great political problems of the century.

It is not the wont of this journal to prophesy, even in matters where it may claim to be specially well-informed, but we record, without fear of its being falsified by events, our prediction, that despite the refusal of the Foreign-office to participate, the European Congress called by the Emperor will meet. No man better than he is able to distinguish between the act of an ill-tempered, petulant, and self-conceited minister, and the deliberate action of a great nation; and in the case of the despatch published last Friday, the distinction is easily made. The Congress, then, will be held, and what is more, if it assumes but a tithe of the importance which the originator is anxious to give it, Great Britain, though Earl Russell be her Foreign Secretary, will send a representative. This is quite in consistence with that noble lord's inconsistencies. His mind resembles that curious missile of the Australian savage which returns somehow near the place from which it is hurled. In every question that has of late occupied public attention, he ended by taking the side opposite to his starting point. Denmark and America are notable illustrations, if any were needed. So, let our irate confères of the French press take comfort. La perfide Albion, only waiting like a coy damsel to be asked a second time, will yet take her seat at the council board which is being decked out in the gay capital of continental Europe.

MRS. GREENHOW'S IMPRISONMENT.*

THE organs of the Federal Government in this country are, for reasons best known to themselves, very lavish in their denunciations of the Russian tyranny in Poland. We have, in this respect, the rare felicity to agree with them. We hold the original spoliation of Polish territory to have been one of the foulest crimes ever committed by strong nations against a weak one. We consider the sanction given to that monstrous iniquity by the Congress of Vienna as one of the most deplorable concessions ever made by righteous principles to diplomatic necessity. We regard the abolition of constitutional government by the Emperor Nicholas in 1831 as amounting to a moral forfeiture of his title to the kingdom. We think their tame acquiescence in the extinction of the Republic of Cracow an ineffaceable stain upon the honour of England and France. We should rejoice to hear that the Poles had driven the Russians out of Warsaw, and that the chief agents in the cruelties of the last two years had expiated their crimes on the scaffold. We differ with our contemporaries only in this—that we have no sort of respect or sympathy with that gang of assassins which calls itself the National Government. But we are surprised at their extraordinary inconsistency. Their American patrons are well aware that the similarity between the cause of Russia and that of the Federal Government is so close that for the partisans of Lincoln to cry shame on the Cossacks of Berg and Mouravieff would provoke the ridicule of Europe. They make common cause with the Czar, as engaged like themselves in the suppression of an unjustifiable rebellion, and applaud his measures of severity as being, on the whole, almost as energetic as their own, and more successful than theirs are likely to prove. Seward fraternises with Gortschakoff; Butler recognises a kindred spirit in Mouravieff; the comrades of Admiral Wilkes accord a hearty welcome to the officers of the Russian squadron, and the orators of New York and Boston congratulate their country that she has one faithful friend in Europe. They do well. It is right and natural that the despot by right divine should be "hail fellow well met" with the despot by democratic election. It is proper that the Cossack and the Yankee should be on the best of terms, and that either should refrain from flouting the crimes of the other, while the world is puzzled to say which deserves the palm of iniquity and atrocity. But we are wholly at a loss to understand what the journals which admire Abraham Lincoln find to blame in Alexander II. The Czar, at least, has torn up no Constitution which he had sworn to observe; he has not destroyed by force the liberties of a free State; and if he has sent his troops to pillage, burn, and murder in a country which refuses to obey him, is not this exactly what has been done by the President of the United States? If his generals have hanged men taken in arms against them, Mr. Lincoln's officers have shot their prisoners in cold blood. If the Cossacks have burned houses and beaten their proprietors, so have the Federal soldiery. If the Russians are charged with flogging women, so are the Yankees; and if the charge has not in either case been distinctly proved, the reasons for the absence of proof are in each case easy to understand. If the Governor of Lithuania has allowed his troops a license surpassing that usually accorded in cities taken by storm, so have the generals of the United States. If the general in command at Warsaw has threatened with fine and imprisonment women who venture to wear mourning, General Butler stigmatised as "women of the town," and gave up to the brutality of his soldiery, all women who might seem, by word, or look, or gesture, to express the loathing which they felt for the invaders of their country. And, finally, in any authenticated account of Russian misdeeds in Poland, we find nothing worse than the treatment suffered by the authoress of the volume before us.

Mrs. Greenhow is a lady of Southern parentage, of warm Southern sympathies, and of a spirit and talent not common even among the women of the South. Her social position may best be understood when we observe that she was, in his old age, the favourite and political pupil of John C. Calhoun, the most eminent Southern statesman of the last generation, and one of the most eminent men that America has produced; while her niece is the widow of Stephen A. Douglas, one of the last among the great statesmen of the North. Her rank in the society of Washington was equivalent to that of a daughter of the Zamoyskis or Czartoryskis in Poland. The leading men of both parties were among her personal acquaintance; she had, even in 1860 and 1861, conversed with Senator Wilson of Massachusetts, and discussed politics with Baker of Oregon. Seward had been her guest; and she records the expression of his repentance, when the "irrepressible conflict" he had predicted and fostered came to be fought out on the field of battle. "If Heaven would forgive him for stringing together two high-sounding words, he would never do it again." It was not against the wife of a brother rail-splitter or a backwoods attorney, but against a lady connected with the most distinguished men and belonging to the best society in the land, that President Lincoln perpetrated the insults and outrages which this volume records.

The book is calculated to amuse almost as much as to interest us. There are several anecdotes, reminiscences of the gossip of the capital during the last days of Mrs. Greenhow's liberty, which are eminently characteristic of Mr. Lincoln, his wife, and their political entourage—of the naïve simplicity of the President, utterly unaccustomed to the decencies of civilised life, and fully aware of his deficiencies, seeming by his manner "to apologise for being where he is"—of the gross vulgarity and extortionate rapacity of Mrs. Lincoln—of her extraordinary toilette, and still more extraordinary behaviour, and of the intrigues constantly going on around the ill-placed couple. Moreover, English readers are supplied with an explanation of the panic fear of assassination manifested by the President elect, during the time immediately preceding his inauguration. After all, his terror did not imply that gross and abject cowardice which it seemed to indicate. His own party, four years before, had made an attempt, which had nearly proved successful, to poison President Buchanan; several persons had fallen victims to the attempt, and the President's health suffered for months under the effects of the poison administered. We recommend those who wish to read the whole history of this nefarious transaction to seek it in Mrs. Greenhow's pages. Her description of the state of Washington immediately after the battle of Manassas is also worth reading. But we pass on to that part of her narrative which more immediately illustrates the character of the Yankees, and the temper of the Government they have chosen.

It should be remembered, in justice even to the creatures of that Government, that Mrs. Greenhow was really and honestly suspected of being a Confederate spy. She was not imprisoned, as many ladies of Baltimore have been imprisoned by General Schenck, for expressing sympathy with the Confederates, for singing Southern songs, or for wearing a red and white rose in her hair. The charge against her was one of treason; and of a kind of treason which, under martial law at least, is everywhere punished with death. Resident within the Federal lines, she contrived to communicate to her countrymen intelligence of the utmost military importance, which involved the Federal commanders in serious dangers. In this she performed a patriotic service of the highest merit; but she unquestionably gave her enemies the right, if they could detect her, to hang her as a spy; and, failing detection, the case against her was so strong that no injustice would have been done had she been detained in close custody until the authorities were satisfied that she had no further power of mischief. A lady who takes on herself the duty of a spy is not exempted by her sex from the punishment which the laws of war assign to spies. But, on the other hand, a spy who is a lady is not, by being a spy, deprived of the rights of womanhood. She is not to be maltreated, outraged, and treated with brutal insolence because she has rendered herself liable to a definite penalty by committing what, though often a deed of the highest virtue, is nevertheless an offence punishable with the extreme severity of military law. You have a right to hang, but not to insult her.

We need not say that a distinction of this kind is wholly unintelligible to Yankees; and if they had understood it, the temptation offered by the chance which placed a Southern lady at their mercy would have been too strong for them to resist. Accordingly, when they had made up their minds to seize Mrs. Greenhow, she was spared no affront that they could offer. She was arrested on her own doorstep, and confined in charge of ruffianly "detectives" in one of her parlours while the house was searched. Then, after obtaining a brief opportunity to destroy certain fatally compromising papers in her own possession, she was subjected to the indignity of a personal search by one of the class of women employed for that purpose; after which she was held prisoner in her own house, with her child of eight years old, and never allowed to escape from the vigilance of her guards—all of them men—for a single moment. On one occasion she was even subjected to brutal personal violence by the chief of her gaolers, a scoundrel bearing the rank of captain. Next, her house was made a gaol—several persons, and among them women of the lowest character, being shut up there.

"Another plan was also adopted to reduce me to submission. My food, which up to this time, though plain and often uneatable, had been sufficiently abundant, was now so reduced in quantity and quality as to be inadequate to satisfy the cravings of hunger. My child, as well as myself, suffered greatly under this new infliction. I wrote to Provost-marshal Porter, protesting against this inhumanity, but he turned a deaf ear to my remonstrance; and my little Rose, who was allowed to play on the pavement under escort of a guard, was often indebted to the kind friends who sent her food whilst there that she should not cry herself to sleep from hunger."

We must not lay the blame of these infamies simply on the wretched scoundrels who were the immediate perpetrators. Repeatedly did Mrs. Greenhow represent to their employers the treatment she received, but always without success. This is the part of her story which seems most surprising to English readers, who are accustomed to be ruled by gentlemen. No one thinks very highly of the courtesy or chivalric feeling of Lord Russell; but who can imagine his receiving with indifference such a statement as the following—addressed in vain to Mr. W. H. Seward?—

"During the first days of my imprisonment, whatever necessity forced me to seek my chamber, a detective stood sentinel at the open door. And thus, for a period of seven days, I, with my little child, was placed absolutely at the mercy of men without character or responsibility. During the first evening a portion of these men became brutally drunk and boasted in my hearing of the nice times they expected to have with the female prisoners, and rude violence was used towards a servant girl during that first evening. For any show of decorum afterwards practised towards me I was indebted to the detective, Captain Dennis. . . . My object is to call your attention to the fact that during this long imprisonment I am yet ignorant of the causes of my arrest; that my house has been seized and converted into a prison by the Government; that the valuable furniture it contained has been abused and destroyed; that during some period of my imprisonment I have suffered greatly for want of proper and sufficient food. Also I have to complain that more recently a woman of bad character—recognised as having been seen in the streets of Chicago as such by several of the guard—calling herself Mrs. Onderdunk, was placed here in my house, in a room adjoining mine."

Rose, a child of eight years old, shared her mother's confinement, and was eventually removed with her to the regular gaol, in which it was thought fit to lodge these two dangerous enemies of Mr. Lincoln. Here they were subjected to fresh annoyances. Their window looked into a prison-yard tenanted by the fugitive slaves—of whom some of Mr. Lincoln's agents were trying to make "soldiers," such soldiers as the heroes of Beckham's landing—and by negro women; and the scenes that were witnessed there were disgusting beyond description. Rose fell ill, and her mother's attempts to procure assistance for her were made the occasions of fresh outrage and insult. She wrote to ask for the attendance of a medical gentleman from whom she had received some kindness, not choosing to receive the visits of an ignorant ruffian, who could neither spell nor behave himself, and for these qualifications had been placed in charge of the prisoners.

"A few hours after I despatched this note, my door was rudely thrown open, and Dr. Stewart, the 'Brigand Sergeant,' as he signed himself, unceremoniously entered, saying, 'Madam, I come to see you on official business.' I said, 'It ought to be of a very grave character to warrant this intrusion.' He seated himself, his hospital steward standing near the door. 'Madam, did you write a letter to the Provost-marshal this day?' 'Yes, I wrote to the Provost-marshal, but I have yet to learn how you, a subordinate, dare question me in regard to any correspondence I may hold with your superior.' 'Madam, I have every right; you have caused me to be rebuked by Major Allen and General Porter for neglect of duty,' &c. I said, 'Sir, in my letter to General Porter there was not the most distant reference to you. I asked that Dr. Macmillan might visit my child, knowing him to be a man of science and a gentleman, and my note furnished no warrant for General Porter to rebuke you. As to Major Allen, his impertinence is only equalled by your own at this moment.' He replied, 'Madam, I will believe General Porter in preference to you.' I thereupon rose from my seat, and said, 'Sir, I have borne with you quite as long as is consistent with my self-respect, and I now desire you to quit my room, as it is no part of my plan to submit to personal insult.' He rose also, coming with rage, and stood confronting me, almost a giant in size, and said, 'I will not quit your room; I am here by the order of Brigadier-general Porter.' 'Sir, I command you to go out; if you do not, I will summon the officer of the guard and the superintendent to put you out.' With that he attempted to lay hands upon my child. I interposed my own person, and said, 'At your peril you touch my child. You are a coward, and no gentleman, thus to insult a woman.' 'I will not go out of your room, madam,' he said, this time livid and trembling with rage or fear, I don't know which. I then went to the door, and rapped—for he remembered that he was locked and bolted in my room, that he remembered the humane and Christian order. 'Call the officer of the guard.' The sentinel on duty being a friendly one, no time was lost in summoning him. When the officer appeared and the door was opened, it happened to be that same Lieutenant Carlton, from Zanesville, Ohio. He was very much agitated, for this man was his superior officer. I said, 'Sir, I order you to put this man out of my room for conduct unworthy of an officer and gentleman, and I will report you for having allowed him to enter here.' He nervously rubbed his hands, and said, 'I am sure Dr. Stewart will come out, if you wish it.' 'Sir, I said, 'do your duty; order your guard to put him out.' The sergeant, corporal, and guard—who all hated Stewart for his arrogance—were eager to obey. Whereupon this valiant Dr. Stewart actually slunk out."

One more specimen of the usual treatment of ladies by Mr. Lincoln's Cossacks will probably be sufficient for the endurance of our readers:—

"This day, as I raised my barred windows, and stood before one of them to get out of the smoke and dust, &c., the guard rudely called, 'Go away from that window!' and raised his musket and levelled it at me. I maintained my position without condescending to notice him, whereupon he called for the corporal of the guard. I called also for the officer of the guard, who informed me that I 'must not go to the window.' I quietly told him that, at whatever peril, I should avail myself of the largest liberty of the four walls of my prison. He told me that his guard would have orders to fire upon me. I had no idea that such monstrous regulations existed. To-day the dinner for myself and child consists of a bowl of beans swimming in grease, two slices of fat junk, and two slices of bread. Still, my consolation is, 'Every dog has his day.'"

"January 30.—I wonder what will happen next. My child has been ill for several days, brought on by close confinement and want of proper food. Just now I went to the door and rapped, that being the prescribed manner of making known my wants. The guard came. 'What do you want?' 'Call the corporal of the guard.' I said: 'What do you want with him?' 'That is no business of yours; call him.' 'I won't call him.' 'You shall' (rap, rap, rap). The guard: 'G—d—n you, if you do that again I will shoot you through the door!' 'Call the corporal of the guard!' Here horrid imprecations followed. I thereupon raised the window and called, 'Corporal of the guard!' The ruffian called also, finding that I was not to be terrified by his threats. But, when the corporal came and opened the door, I was seized with laughter, for there stood the Abolitionist, blabbering like a child, that he hadn't orders to shoot the d—d scoundrel woman, who was not afraid of the devil himself."

"I sent for the officer of the guard, who was Lieutenant Carlton, of Zanesville, Ohio, and reported this outrage. He said that the guard had acted by his orders in refusing to call the corporal of the guard, and that he had no idea of allowing his non-commissioned officers to act as servants, &c. I told him that my child was ill, and I demanded the use of a servant; whereupon he told me that a servant should not be allowed me, save night and morning. I replied, 'Very well, sir. I will resort to the window, then, as my only expedient.' A servant after this was sent, but had to perform her functions with a sergeant of the guard standing over her."

After several months' confinement, Mrs. Greenhow was at last banished without trial, and sent South, to join the friends for whose sake she had endured so long and tedious a martyrdom. We fear that she has not yet seen the last of Northern hostility; but, happily, those who have suffered the practical insults which the Federal Government delights to inflict on women and children are not likely to feel keenly the vituperations of the Daily News or the organ lately described by Punch as "the London Yankee Journal."

THE THANKSGIVING ENTERTAINMENT AT ST. JAMES'S HALL.

SIR,—On the 3rd of October, Mr. Lincoln, in order to encourage his friends and dismay his enemies in the then approaching elections, drew a bill on Providence at seven weeks date, that is, he called upon his subjects at home and abroad to set apart the 26th of November as a day of national thanksgiving for victories to be won. His mandate was obeyed by his lieges resident in England. It was stated by the London papers on Friday last, that "the day was observed as a holiday by the Americans in London, and in all parts of the country, and business was suspended at the Legation and at the Consulates." In this passage there is a slight inaccuracy. The inhabitants of the southern part of the American continent, the peoples of Central America, the Mexicans, the British-American subjects, and the Confederates, did not observe Thursday last as a day of thanksgiving; and yet all these are quite as much Americans as are the 20,000,000 of people under the sway of Mr. Lincoln. What the passage really means is, that the loyal Federals in London, of all sorts, conditions, and of all nationalities obeyed the mandate of their master. Now the Yankees are smart, very smart, and they devised a plan by which the day set apart for solemn prayer and thanksgiving might be used for a political purpose. So those whose names are on the books of the Treasury at Washington and those who hope to have their names written therein, met together at St. James's Hall to dine and talk buncombe for the glorification of Abraham Lincoln. Before directing your attention to the speech of Mr. Adams, who honoured the motley gathering with his presence, I cannot forbear noticing a very odd incident in connection with this entertainment. Neither the Daily News nor the Morning Star reported the proceedings on the Friday. How can we account for such an omission on the part of the London Federal organs? It could not be that they considered them too sacred for publication, for on Saturday they copied the report from the other papers. It could not be that the Daily News and Star were not invited to the banquet. I can only account for the circumstance by assuming that the entire staffs of these journals were amongst the guests, and that their feelings were too much overcome by what transpired to enable them to read, much less to write out their notes. If this is the true explanation, it is a touching instance of devotion to a cause.

The Chairman at the St. James's dinner was the Hon. R. J. Walker. In this selection there was a beautiful fitness. Who could better preside over an audience of all sorts and conditions, and of all nationalities, than a man "of many homes, and of many principles"? Mr. Walker, by birth a Pennsylvanian, by adoption a Mississippian, the senator for Mississippi whilst the repudiation was being effected against which he did not then but does now protest, the embryo commissioner to China whose appointment the Senate would not confirm, the sometime Governor of Kansas whose term of office was cut short by a recall, the one-time slaveholder—"lord of the whip, the chain, and the branding-iron" as he calls himself, lately the stern opponent of Abolitionism, and now that it pays him, the warm Abolitionist,—why, he was the very man to take the chair at such a gathering. The Hon. R. J. Walker's address is not published, thanks to the good-nature of the reporters who were present. Nor are we informed who was Mr. Walker's "vice." Perhaps Mr. R. C. Young occupied that position, for he, like Mr. Walker, has much to be grateful for. Randolph and Robert cannot but feel a strong sympathy for each other. They are both deserters to an enemy's camp, both have borne false witness against their former patrons, and both have received and are still receiving wages from their new employers.

After a prayer by a negro, Mr. Martin, (we are not told whether Mr. Martin is one of the negroes upon whom Mr. Walker used "the whip, the chain, and the branding-iron") and a hymn sung in "unison,"—a fat contractor having stoutly protested against anything bearing the name of harmony—the Hon. Robert proposed, and his Excellency Mr. Adams, the United States Minister, responded to, the toast of the evening, "The Health of the President of the United States."

Mr. Adams is in no respect an orator: on the stamp and in the halls of Congress he would be distanced by almost every competitor. He is, as Mr. Bright would say, the accident of an accident, and owes his position, not to what he has done, but to the reputation of his father and grandfather. We think, however, that on Thursday last Mr. Adams established a new claim on the gratitude of the Government he represents in this country. His speech, though not brilliant, or witty, or humorous, or true, or profound, was marked by that species of ingenuity which a west-country attorney like Mr. Lincoln cannot fail to appreciate. He began by admitting, with much frankness, that at the present time the United States was suffering from a great calamity, and then proceeded to construct a theory to show why, in a time of calamity, a day should be set apart for national thanksgiving. He said what we dare say is true, that Mr. Lincoln "came to his post with less of practical experience in government than any individual had done since the foundation of the Government;" and yet Mr. Lincoln had succeeded, not in conquering the South, but in getting together an army and navy under very trying circumstances. Mr. Adams repeats the little romance of the intended seizure of Mr. Lincoln, when he was on the way from Illinois to Washington; but he does not explain why, if the Confederates were bent on secession, they should have desired to prevent the North having for a President a man, who, according to Mr. Adams's own admission, was exceedingly inexperienced in the art of government. Mr. Adams thinks that in three years—that is, since he has been in the diplomatic service—"the Governments of Europe have seen reason to modify their views of the condition of the Government of the United States." I perfectly agree with Mr. Adams, but I cannot conceive what there is in this fact for him to be thankful for. The next point in his Excellency's speech is a bold one—a flight of imagination that even Mr. Seward may envy. Mr. Adams positively congratulates Mr. Lincoln upon restoring the national credit, which had been shaken by the secret enemies of the United States in the former Administration. I really think that the loyal Federals must have greeted this announcement with irrepressible cries of "Walker!" When Mr. Lincoln came to power, so far from the national credit being undermined, so far from Southern statesmen betraying their trusts, he found the finances of the country in a condition that they never will be in again, even by the aid of national bankruptcy and repudiation. The public debt was a mere bagatelle, and the taxes authorised by Congress were freely paid. Now there is a huge public debt; gold is at 50 per cent. premium, and Government notes at a proportionate discount, and the taxes authorised by Congress are not collected. Mr. Adams may be thankful for this condition of affairs; but to say Mr. Lincoln has restored the national credit, is simply to utter what schoolboys call "an awful whopper." The President also, according to Mr. Adams's account, had a military difficulty. He says he had three sets of military men to deal with—traitors, the timid and lukewarm, and those who were too old for service. If any one will take the trouble to look over the army list of the United States he will find that this assertion is not true, and that all the Northern commanders who have in any way distinguished themselves were soldiers before the time of secession. And then, sir, is it not the fact that when Mr. Lincoln made his first calls, men flocked to his standard with wonderful alacrity; and that now, neither by volunteering nor by drafting can Mr. Lincoln recruit his ranks? So when Mr. Adams says that loyal Federals ought to be grateful because Mr. Lincoln has overcome the military difficulties that he had in 1861, he not only asserts that which is palpably untrue, but that which is the very reverse of the truth. Speaking of the navy, Mr. Adams observed that "at the beginning of the Administration the President, when he looked after his navy vessels"—I wonder if there are any army vessels!—"found that some ships had to be burnt to save them from treacherous surrender, and the rest had been sent away as far over the globe as they could go." I am aware, sir, that many naval officers threw up their commissions when the Confederacy was established, but I am also aware that not a single ship was taken to the South. No doubt, seeing that a portion of the United States Navy was the property of the South, Southern officers would have been morally justified in surrendering their ships to the Southern Government, but as from a high and honourable chivalry they did not do so, I should have thought that even a Yankee who has mixed with gentlemen, as Mr. Adams must have done sometimes during his residence in this country, would have found it impossible to speak of such conduct except in terms of respectful approval. Mr. Adams, who, by the way, proposed in Congress to give the South new guarantees for the maintenance of slavery, says that Mr. Lincoln's emancipation proclamation is something to be grateful for. According to Mr. Wendell Phillips, Mr. Lincoln is of a different opinion, and thinks the attempt to stir up a servile war in the South one of the most foolish acts of his life. Such are Mr. Adams's reasons for thanksgiving and according to him the Federals are the most grateful people on earth; for not only are they very much obliged for infinitely small mercies, but they give thanks for mercies not received.

After Mr. Adams had resumed his seat, the hilarity of the meeting was sustained by sensational toasts. One was a little in opposition to the preceding speech. It was, "The Day—devoted to thanking God for our victories in the Cause of Liberty and Union." Mr. Adams admitted calamities, and only expressed gratitude because other troubles had been avoided. This toast reminds me of the Quaker's motto—"Honesty and Riches, but by all means Riches." The loyal Federals do not object to Liberty, but they will by all means (if they can) have Union. A Mr. George Thompson proposed this toast. I presume he is the person who has spent his days in agitating for various associations, who became agent for a naughty Indian Prince whom we dethroned and whom Mr. Thompson wished restored, who got into Parliament for the Tower Hamlets, and who, not finding the House of Commons a congenial place, went to America and tied his hand at Abolition preaching. I am glad to find that such a person has ceased to be a British subject, for of course, if he had not been a citizen of the United States, or rather of one of them, he could not have proposed the above toast. Another sentiment was, "The Union, &c., for ever one and inseparable;" and it occurs to me that if the Union is for ever one, it does not much matter whether it is or is not separable. Mr. Morse gave a toast about the Emancipation Proclamation being "written by the finger of God" on Mr. Lincoln's heart. Captain Mayne Reid, who contributes new versions of "Robinson Crusoe" to cheap prints for the edification of boys, proposed, "The Army and Navy—invincible champions of freedom, who bleed that our country may live."

I should think, sir, that by this you must share my regret that the Star did not treat us to a verbatim report of the proceedings, and that the speeches of Messrs. Thompson, Walker, & Co. are consequently lost to the world. But though we cannot, like the Federals, be grateful for less than nothing, or for worse than nothing, we ought to be grateful for the little and imperfect sketch that we have of the thanksgiving entertainment at St. James's Hall.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
E. Q. V.

CORTINAS.—The Mexican "General," who is reported to have defeated a revolution in favour of the French at Matamoras, and whose name is variously spelled by the telegraph, is doubtless the bandit chief Cortinas, of infamous and murderous notoriety in those regions. For many years this man and his bands have been the terror of the inhabitants of both the Mexican and the American bank of the Rio Grande. On one occasion, in a time of profound peace, he surprised the town of Brownsville, plundered it, and hung or carried off some of the principal citizens of the place. Being pursued by the Texans into Mexican territory, and his gang severely punished and dispersed, he was not subsequently much heard of until the outbreak of the present war. Since then he appears to have been in the pay of the Federal Government, and has on one or two occasions led marauding parties against the Confederates on the southern frontier of Texas.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, November 17.

Just before the late elections, the sensation press on the Government side proclaimed the discovery of a conspiracy in the Western States, extending from Ohio into Missouri, to overthrow State Governments as well as the Federal Government. The plotters intended, on some given day, to release all the Confederate prisoners in the several prisons, arm them, with their assistance seize the State arsenals, organize an army, and set up a new North-western Government, in amity, if not in confederacy, with the South. It was a very absurd story; but it found believers, and had its influence upon the elections. Some fools were induced to vote the Administration ticket, under the alarm that if they did not strengthen the Government they would have revolution at their own doors. The most diligent inquiry after the elections has been unable to discover any symptoms of the plot, beyond the loose talk of two or three insignificant personages, of whom the most reputable was an ancient washerwoman for a Western encampment.

There has been a repetition during the past week of these experiments on popular credulity, in which the Government at Washington has a disreputable share. Suddenly there came, via Canada and Washington, the astounding report of a formidable rebel invasion of the United States, by the way of the Lakes. The Confederates were coming down in force from the North. The first rumour was of an attempt to release, by force, the Confederates who are imprisoned at Johnson's Island, near the City of Sandusky, on Lake Erie, but the story grew wilder and wilder. There were a hundred thousand rebel refugees and sympathisers in Canada. They were armed and ready for a raid on the defenceless frontier. But as they must cross the wide lake, rumour provided them with the vessels, and they had laid their plots to seize others belonging to the Americans. Some of their vessels had already been seen hovering about Sandusky. The Government at Richmond had organised the thing, and were sending armed propellers and gun-boats, via the St. Lawrence River and the Welland Canal, to make a fleet on the Lakes, with which to attack and destroy Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, Sandusky, and other Lake cities, and plunder and ravage the border.

The Canada papers appear to have helped on this rare fooling, by affecting to believe a great part of the story, and by furnishing to the newspapers here a huge mass of incoherent conjecture, which increased the popular scare and the Government confusion. The inhabitants along the frontier were excited to a frenzy of apprehension, and the War Department encouraged it by hurrying forward telegraphic warnings of danger, to any exposed point, despatching major-generals to superintend the defences, and forwarding troops and batteries to defend the North from a threatened irruption of the Confederates from Canada!

No satisfactory proof has yet been published that any part of this is true, not even that there was any actual plot discovered for the liberation of the prisoners at Johnson's Island. It begins to be thought that nothing more will be shown than the natural agitation among the prisoners of plans for escape, and the natural expressions of a desire by their countrymen, refugees in Canada, to help them escape; perhaps a correspondence on the subject, the discovery of which is sufficient to defeat it without any extraordinary demonstrations. The first information at Washington of these plots, is said to have been given through Lord Lyons by the Governor-General of Canada. The terms of this caution have not been made public; the fact that it was given from that quarter is the only thing which has transpired to redeem the affair, and its treatment at Washington, from ridicule; and it is very possible that Lord Monck's communications may have been very insufficient grounds for the precipitate proceedings of the War Department, or the public conjectures which have been based thereon. The inspirations from the Foreign-office in London may have stimulated him to strengthen the new entente with Washington, by sending, as proofs of goodwill, suggestions which have been taken too gravely, or used insincerely, and for a purpose; but it is to be hoped for the honour of England, that he did not, as these Yankees have boasted that he has done, volunteer to collect and forward to the authorities at Washington information or suspicions of the design of the captives at Johnson's Island to escape. There is no international obligation to do such an act of apparent inhumanity. It is doubtless part of his duty to take care that no naval or military enterprise shall be fitted out from Her Majesty's ports against the territory or commerce of the United States; but he must be prepared to show that such an enterprise was really on foot, and practically advanced, and that the aid of the United States was necessary to enable the people of Canada to enforce their own laws within British jurisdiction, and that, moreover, the liberation of these prisoners in violation of some law or obligation of Great Britain was a necessary and well-ascertained part of the scheme to break some British law, before he can justify himself to the English people for turning informer against these unfortunates to their gaolers. Before Lord Monck is adjudged capable of this baseness, it would be well to know what he did in fact communicate to the Washington authorities. They who have watched these people closely, believe they have designedly exaggerated their own perils, and allowed currency to false impressions of the communications of Lord Monck, in order to signalise to the people here the new friendliness of their relations with the British Ministry, and to cover up their own change of tone towards England by confessing indebtedness to her spontaneous interposition to suppress a "rebel" plot. The English people, with their national love of fair play, will scrutinise the case closely, and require to know whether this is only another specimen of the Federal art of governing by fraud, or whether British officials in Canada have been indeed acting as police detectives for the Federal Government, and supernumerary gaolers of its prisoners.

The general subject of prisoners has indeed become a very serious question. Exchanges have been virtually suspended, the few cases being exceptional since May last, and the presses of the North have charged the Confederates exclusively with the responsibility therefor. The prisoners, and more especially the Federal prisoners, who have so many means of reaching the public with their complaints, speak indignantly of their treatment, in respect to food, clothing, and shelter, and the Federal presses have been for the last six weeks absolutely overflowing with tales of the destitution, starvation, and cruelty with which Union captives are treated in the Richmond prisons, and with horrible stories of the numerous deaths of released prisoners from the effects of absolute want and starvation ere they reach their homes. They are subjects which need some explanatory comments.

The responsibility for the stopping of exchanges no longer rests with the Confederates. The correspondence on that subject has been published in full, at Richmond, and has found its way to this city in the Richmond papers. It explains why the Administration at Washington has never given any part of it to the public. The reading of it has converted every thinking man to the belief that it is the obstinacy and bad faith at Washington which stopped the exchange of prisoners and still stops it. It is made to appear plainly that the Federal Government consented to exchange originally with reluctance, and only because it believed the preponderance in numbers to be against the North, and that they broke their own agreements without justification, as soon as they became persuaded that the advantage would be with them. This has been continued with so much willfulness and tenacity, that it has come to be believed that it is a part of the deliberate policy of the Administration to refuse or avoid all general exchange of prisoners, on the ground that the war with the South is to be one of exhaustion; and that the North, by reason of its superiority of population, can better afford to leave its soldiers in captivity than the South—whose fewer numbers make the return of its veteran soldiers of so much more importance for defence. It is a policy which is in strict conformity with the ideas of destructiveness upon which this whole war has been conducted by the Government of the United States.

There was an original agreement made in the first year of the war between the authorised agents of the two Governments for an exchange of prisoners. It was subsequently varied in some particulars by general orders of the United States authorities, to which, as it appears fully in the correspondence, the Confederates assented. They were charged, indeed, with setting up practices at times at variance with these terms, but no such charge was substantiated by the Federal commissioner; and in nearly every instance of complaint which he makes, he is shown to have misstated or been misinformed. The whole case is fairly put in the following passage, addressed by Colonel Ould, the Confederate Commissioner, to General Meridith, the United States Commissioner, on the 24th of August last: "I propose that all paroles, on both sides, heretofore given, shall be determined by the General Orders issued by the War Department of the United States, to wit: No. 49, No. 100, and No. 207, of this year, according to their respective dates, and in conformity with paragraph 131 of General Order No. 100, so long as said paragraph was in force. If this proposition is not acceptable, I propose that the practice heretofore adopted respecting paroles and exchanges be continued. In other words, I propose that the whole question of paroles be determined by the general orders of the United States, according to dates, or that it be decided by former practice." There could not be a more just and liberal proposition. It was not accepted, and both sides have accordingly gone back to their independent exercise of the right to discriminate and adjudicate, according to their own sense of justice and policy, upon each individual case as it arises.

There was a persistent clamour against the South that they had refused to allow the exchange of Northern officers in command of insurrectionary negroes, and that all exchanges were consequently stopped on that account. They might defend this action and take the responsibility, if they had chosen to take that course; but there is not a word in the whole correspondence which favours the idea that the negro obstruction was raised at all.

In the course of the correspondence, the insincerity and duplicity of the Administration at Washington were several times exposed and proved, with a force to which there was no other reply but convicted silence. A conspicuous case is that which concerns the treatment of the Confederate general, John Morgan, who was captured in Ohio. The privilege of parole was denied him, and he was, after being handled with personal ignominy, shaved and dressed like a convicted felon, and placed in the Ohio penitentiary. To the application by the Confederate Government to know the cause of this unusual and brutal treatment of a prisoner-of-war, the agent of the United States replied that General Morgan was held in retaliation for the severity of confinement inflicted by the Confederate authorities on Colonel Straight, who had been captured while making a cavalry raid into Georgia. The Confederate commissioner replied with the proof that Colonel Straight was in no other wise held or restrained than any other prisoner-of-war, and the corresponding treatment of General Morgan was again demanded. Instead of complying with this demand, the natural result of the correction of this grave error, the United States commissioner then averred that General Morgan was not held by or imprisoned by the authority of the United States at all, and that the United States were not responsible for the bad treatment he had received in Ohio. There was one obvious and conclusive comment upon this: that the United States had distinctly stated that it held General Morgan as a hostage for Straight, and when that claim was disallowed, how could they say they did not have control over him at all? The Confederate commissioner asked this question. It has never been answered to this day, and Morgan is still a prisoner. The whole story, as I relate it, is in the correspondence, and is a fair example of the candour and good faith with which the United States deals with these and other questions.

There is nothing in the various disputes about comparative numbers which could not be settled by any two fair-minded men in an hour's conversation. They are not settled, simply because the War Department at Washington thinks the South suffers most by non-exchanges. It is, moreover, made apparent by the correspondence that it is only by sharp practice in figures, and the assumption of some very unjustifiable grounds for refusing credits to the Confederates, that the United States can make out the preponderance of prisoners which they claim.

The mutual accusations of hard and cruel treatment of prisoners by both parties make a subject for very serious contemplation, and require that some words should be put in defence against the torrent of impeachment which is poured out upon the South, where no explanations can ordinarily come from themselves.

The sufferings of the Southern prisoners in the fetid camps of the West have been often told of, but the Northern presses give them no circulation, not even to supply a syllable of disproof. In one case they recorded the freezing of a dozen or two soldiers last winter at Camp Douglas, as an item of current news; but they carefully abstain from mentioning the severity of restriction, the daily insult and daily privation, the want, disease, and mortality to which they were exposed, and, as accounts reach us through those who witness their treatment, are still exposed. The story is the same in regard to most of the Northern prisons which is told of the prisons in Richmond, from which come up shocking tales of a dearth of provisions, amounting almost to actual famine, and angry denunciation of the Confederate Government for in-sensibility to their sufferings.

It is not known how much of this is actually true, and how much is the impulse of a personal grievance or of exaggeration for a political purpose, but it must be taken into the account largely on behalf of the Southern Government, that there is confessedly a dearth of provisions at Richmond, and that prisoners must share this dearth, at least in an equal degree with their captors. It is not necessary to accept for this all that the papers of the North are constantly affirming to be true, that the Southern people are starving for want of food, that their armies are about disbanding and their Government to be dissolved, because they have not food for their soldiers or the means of getting it. If this were so, there is a hideous inconsistency in denouncing this pauper and starving Government for cruelty in its inability to feed its enemies, when they must starve, if they are treated only as well as its own soldiers. But in the actual and acknowledged difficulties of the food question in Richmond, there is a very excellent plea against the railing charge of cruelty in not feeding those in its power, as well as the United States, with their abounding resources and open markets and uninterrupted harvests, feeds their prisoners. The equitable claim of this Government is only that the South shall feed Union prisoners as well as it can; and there ought to be no charge of neglect or cruelty if they are fed as well as its own soldiers. If that be at the starvation point, as the exulting Federals aver that it is, there is an allowance for the South, which the rest of the world will not be slow to make, that it is by the Northern blockade of its ports, and the Northern devastation of its fields and destruction of its resources, that it is made incapable of dealing generously and bountifully with the unfortunates in its power. And if the threat which now comes from the North be executed—that it will feed on famine rations the Confederate prisoners in its hands, because the South is short of provisions and puts Union prisoners on scant allowance—the world will only recognise another of the brutalities in the prosecution of this war, which have made the Government of the United States odious among Christians.

The fact, however, remains to be ascertained to what extent of privation these prisoners have been actually submitted, and whether the public necessity is not temporary and will not be removed, as late accounts imply that it will be, by a transfer of these prisoners nearer the source of supply for subsistence. I have no doubt that the Confederate authorities will do all they can to relieve their wants, and will, at least, put the Union prisoners upon an equality with the Confederate soldiers; and that is all their friends have a right to expect. One thing, at least, is indisputable: the United States can end the complaint at once, by a fair exchange of prisoners. The Confederates will go home cheerfully to take their risk of the short commons, and the Federals to the plenty they are invited to, and more fighting if they like it. The Government does not choose to do this, and it ought to have the blame.

There are harrowing accounts published or frequent deaths of exchanged Union prisoners, before they can reach home; and in every case the fatal result is attributed to cruel treatment at Richmond. A proper answer to most of this is, that there are no exchanges made now, except of the sick and wounded, and naturally, of the worst cases of both. The fatigue of travel through the broken roads, on the imperfect means of transportation which are left; the effects of excitement and change, and the neglect which the daily journals have chronicled in the care, after they were delivered, of those sent forward, account for a great share of this mortality—not omitting the consideration that if there has been a want of good medical attendance in Richmond, something of extenuation may be found, in the persistent exclusion by the Federal authorities ever since the beginning of the war, of all sorts of drugs and medicines from the Southern people, as among the humane means of recalling them to their allegiance to the Union. Nor ought it to be overlooked, that we do not get represented here the Richmond complaints of the death and sufferings of their returned sick soldiers.

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, December 1.

The end of my last letter contradicted the earlier part, in which I had set forth the difficulties in the way of the projected Congress, the concluding paragraph being written on the "very best" authority. The somnambule who gave me this private information was doubtless present in spirit at the Cabinet Council being held at that moment in London, but—I acknowledge the fault was mine—I was impatient to know the result before post hour, and interrupted her vision at the critical moment, so that she gave me the opinion of one of the members of Her Majesty's Administration instead of the final decision. Friday's Gazette dispelled my illusion and that of the world in general here, and there has been weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth—especially gnashing of teeth—ever since. The Constitutionnel, in King Cophetua's vein, in sorrow rather than anger, but a very angry sorrow, reproaches England with the abandonment of Poland, and indifference to Italy. That occupation of Rome by the French troops so worried her, and see how she lets the occasion pass when it offered the opportunity for the withdrawal "by an honourable and practical arrangement"! The Opinion is quite of the opinion of the Constitutionnel, above all in the matter of the withdrawal of the army of occupation, and it expresses a very decent regret at the, perhaps not unwelcome, rupture of the intimate alliance between France and England which has rendered the Empire so strong. The Pays is angry, and, with the Constitutionnel, consoles itself by thinking that Earl Russell's despatch does not express the opinion of England. More than one of the papers are unmanly enough to twit Lord Russell with a speech which they say he made one evening after dinner at Blairgowrie, their version of which is in flagrant contradiction with his after-council despatch on the subject of the Treaties of 1815.

There was a marquis in the early days of Louis XIV. who was nicknamed the Duc du Congrès—a nickname which he disliked to hear. The reader of the diatribes in the French papers would be tempted, judging by their wrath, to suppose all the journalists in France had been promoted to this dignity. The France alone, after blaming the "pacific non possumus" of England, insinuating that the Emperor's proposal, if not a solution was at least a formula, remembers that there is still much to be done at home, and that France may now attend to these things, and abandon to the risks they have chosen those who so obstinately refused to enter on the path of salvation she had laid out for them.

In the discussions on the elections, which have resulted in three only being declared invalid, two of them on the ground that they were "English elections," which in French means procured by the illicit application of those arguments which wealth has at its command, there was used for the first time an expression which is destined to become famous. M. Chaix d'Estange, one of M. Mire's victims, having been dismissed from the post of Procureur Imperial on occasion of the latter's acquittal by the Court of Douai, speaking as commissary of the Government, divided its friends into two categories. There are friends of the first degree and friends of the second degree. Those of the first degree are silent friends, who approve all the acts of the Government without venturing to inquire if they be right or wrong. They are friends indeed. The second degree comprises those inconvenient friends, who waver in their conviction of the infallibility of Government, sometimes ask questions, and even offer advice. Of these latter M. Chaix d'Estange has a very poor opinion; in this respect not perhaps unlike ministers in other countries.

The loan which I mentioned as being in contemplation more than a month ago will shortly be applied for. Its amount is variously estimated at twelve and twenty-four millions. The Mexican expedition, which has this year cost eleven millions, will account satisfactorily for the smaller sum, but if a larger be required it can only be in the prevision of an impending war. The difficulties of the money market, added to the uncertainty in which the political future is shrouded, have at present a most depressing effect on all business. Government is too deeply interested in alleviating this feeling of anxiety not to take some measures to restore confidence. The discussion of the address which will come on soon will probably afford the opportunity of quieting apprehensions, or, at least, of fixing opinion.

Last night's France announces that Mr. Lincoln, notwithstanding the presence at Washington of Juarez's representative, has granted exequaturs to several consuls appointed by the Mexican Regency. Many see here another proof that the Federal Government has come to some understanding with France, for it is an act of extreme courtesy to recognise the agents of a Government whose existence is not yet a diplomatic fact. Amid the changes and shiftings of Yankee politics, this hot haste to recognise the consequences of an occupation against which we have M. Drouyn's word that Mr. Seward did not protest, is not the most unforeseen event.

Galignani advertises to-day a cure for melancholy in the shape of the "Familiar Epistle" to the Chinese Commissioner, H. J. Walker. It has come in very good time to raise the spirits of his countrymen here, who have been very crest-fallen since the arrival of the last news from the South-west. They will learn from this a thing or two, which they may have forgotten, and I am sure will agree with me that a franc's worth of such racy fun goes further towards lightening the load of the National Debt than they are beginning to boast of, than a hundred francs' worth of melancholy. The wise ones will lay in this stock of good chaff to enliven their winter evenings. A friend's reputation makes a cheery bonfire to take off the chill of reverses, when one cannot warm one's fingers at the conflagration of some Southern homestead, which, if pleasant, is also dangerous. Then the mud which sticks to one's friend is a moral white-wash for one's own conscience, and after reading his backslidings one feels oneself immaculate. Add to this exquisite pleasure of seeing a demonstration that one's friend is—not a fool, the more exquisite pleasure of defending him, and you will allow that the Northerners will get a good pennyworth for their money. I have been told that this production is not from a Pennsylvanian pen, but there is internal evidence which inclines me to think that it is, as it professes to be, from a countryman and a friend, one perhaps who would have liked R. J. W.'s berth himself, and fancies he could have done better in it.

The Moniteur has a paragraph to say that Government has no connection with the very warlike pamphlet, "Napoleon III. et le Congrès," which has just come out. I do not believe in any warlike intentions on the part of Government, but at all events it is evident that no such threats will precede at so long an interval a declaration of war which can only take effect in spring.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, December 2.

"To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom, in Parliament assembled,

"The humble petition of the magistrates, councilors, manufacturers, tradesmen, shopkeepers, operatives, and other inhabitants of the borough of Preston, in public meeting assembled,

"Humbly sheweth—That your petitioners are of opinion that the war in America is an injury to the world, and that the present aspects of the conflict afford no hope of its early termination, unless by means of the moral influence of Europe. They therefore beg very respectfully to urge upon your Honourable House to use all just and honourable means to procure a cessation of hostilities, with a view to afford an opportunity for the peaceful separation of the States.

"And your petitioners will ever pray, &c."

Such is the result of the monster meeting which, as was stated last week, was then on the eve of being held at Preston; and no time will be lost in transmitting the foregoing document to the noble lord at the head of the Government, with a request that his lordship will himself present it to the House, immediately upon the opening of the forthcoming session of Parliament.

The speeches in support of the petition were characterised by more than ordinary ability, eloquence, and vigour. The adherents of the Southern cause, though they were met by the strongest Northern force that could possibly be mustered in the town, commanded so large a majority as completely to overwhelm their opponents, and the meeting was eventually carried to a triumphant issue. One of the leading orators was the Rev. W. C. Squier, a minister of the Unitarian Church, "a staunch anti-slavery man all his life," and withal "a faithful follower of Mr. Cobden upon nearly every political question save that of the American war." As the reverend gentleman's address might be fairly received as an expression of the opinions of the numerous and highly influential body of his co-religionists in Lancashire—opinions which are shared by all other Nonconformists that deserve any respect for their cultivation of educated thought or for their freedom from political and religious cant—an epitome of his arguments can hardly be deemed out of place here.

In advocating peace upon the basis of the independence of the South, he should endeavour (remarked the reverend speaker) to say nothing that would provoke bitter feelings in the breast of any one. He did not suppose that all who heard him would agree with every opinion he might express, but he trusted that in the utterance of his opinions he should so conduct himself as a gentleman and a Christian that his most vehement opponent would have no reason to complain. The object of that meeting was, as he understood, to assist in remedying a gigantic evil, which was not limited to the country wherein it took its rise—an evil which was working as a curse to the world—had changed a republic into a despotism, had corrupted the morals of a great and glorious people, had called out bad passions that could not easily be subdued, had brought free institutions into contempt, had crippled the commerce of the globe, and stricken with "plague, pestilence and famine" the brave and much-enduring operatives of our own land. Every friend of the human race ought to regret that evil, and do his very utmost to abate it. The secession of the Southern States was a political necessity, and the wonder was, not that it took place when it did, but that it had not taken place long before. The mere right to secede was contained in the very essence of federation. To argue that secession was illegal because it was not expressly contemplated in the articles, was as idle as to argue against the legality of divorce because divorce was not mentioned in the marriage service. But apart from the consideration of the technical right of secession—which right he held to be manifestly unimpeachable in the case of States which were themselves sovereign and independent—there was a higher law, which, in the utter absence of such mere right, had been appealed to before now. The right of men to choose their own form of Government had been asserted again and again by Englishmen, by Frenchmen, and by the Americans themselves. The French exiled the Bourbons, recalled the Bourbons, and exiled the Bourbons again—not in obedience to law, but above law. We drove out the Stuarts, recalled the Stuarts, and drove out the Stuarts again, not because we acted according to law, but above law. In obedience to the same "higher law" the Americans themselves rebelled against the sovereignty of the mother country. It was the height of folly, therefore, for those who were the children of revolutions to deny to others the exercise of those rights which have made them what they are. The President of the Northern States had himself argued in favour of those rights. "Any people, anywhere," said Abraham Lincoln, "being inclined and having the power, have a right to rise up and shake off the existing Government, and to form a new one that suits them better. This is a most valuable right—a right which we hope and believe is to liberate the world; nor is this right confined to cases in which the whole people of an existing Government may choose to exercise it; any portion of such people, that can, may revolutionise and make their own such portion of a territory as they inhabit." How, in direct contravention of his own doctrines, could Mr. Lincoln meet secession with war? Because he was the slave of the present necessities of his party. When the news of secession reached England he (the reverend speaker) was then what he now and always was—a strong anti-slavery man. He had seen with his own eyes how the accursed thing flourished and fattened in the Union. He had read of United States officers stooping to become the catchers of slaves. He had embraced the principles of William Lloyd Garrison, the leader of the American Abolitionists, whose dictum was this: "The Union must be destroyed in order that slavery may perish." The Southern States should, therefore, have been permitted to depart in peace. Slavery would then have been confined within narrow limits: the slaveowners would then have had no halo of patriotism encircling their brows; the opinion of the civilised world would have been against them; and under the influence of that opinion, a peaceful and gradual emancipation would have taken place, such as had already been accomplished to our own honour in the West India Islands. But instead of letting the South go in peace, the North madly rushed to arms. (A voice—"Who fired the first shot?") The war had begun before that "first shot" was fired. When South Carolina had once left the Union, the occupation of Fort Sumter by Union troops was itself an act of war. The "first shot" was a notice to quit, which Major Anderson was only too ready to acknowledge, for he instantly gave up possession, because he felt he was in the wrong. The Federal flag was hauled down, and the Confederate flag was hoisted, and there it still flows. It has been struck down sixty-three times, but there it still waves. It still waves, in testimony to the courage of the brave men who have sworn to defend it. After referring with much feeling to the fearful desolation caused by the war, the reverend gentleman said: If left to themselves, and without the peaceful remonstrances of Europe, the war between North and South would probably go on for years. The South could not end the war until their soil was free from the tread of the invader; and the North would not end the war, because they were growing rich upon it—as persons grow rich who borrow money and never pay it back. But with all their superior advantages, the North could never subjugate the South. The Washington officials were using Ireland as their recruiting ground and Birmingham as their gun-shop; and if they had not bought ships in England, it was only because they could get them cheaper by seizing them under false pretences, as they seized the Peterhoff. Was that British neutrality as between North and South? But if our Government could not be fairly neutral, they could at least be pacemakers. There was once a party in this country known as the "Peace party," of which Messrs. Cobden and Bright were distinguished members. It was once the principle of that party to advocate mediation instead of war. Mr. Cobden once stood up for that Christian principle with all the weight of his high character, but Mr. Cobden had turned his coat. He was as great an admirer of Mr. Cobden as was any man, and he was proud to call himself one of Mr. Cobden's followers. But after reading Mr. Cobden's recent speech at Rochdale, he was compelled to affirm that that honourable gentleman was now, not for mediation, but for war. (Confusion, followed by prolonged cheering.) Mr. Cobden's former principle was the principle now held by that meeting, and should always be the principle of every Christian man. Their desire was not for war, but for a peaceful separation of the combatants; and with this view they would ask the British Government—always ready to represent the true feelings of the country—to tender its good offices, or induce the King of the Belgians to do so, to mediate between the contending parties; and if either party refused to listen to the proposals, that party would be confessedly in the wrong. (Applause.)

Mr. Charles Chapman, in seconding the adoption of the petition, said he had travelled over the Southern States before the war broke out, and at that time there was not a cannon foundry, not a powder-mill, nor any other appliance available for military purposes. Whence, then, came the means by which the Southerners maintained the struggle? It came out of their own breasts. By their patriotism, unanimity and devotion, they had continued the struggle for three years, and if it were necessary for thirty-three years would they continue it. The object of the meeting that night was to convey a reply to what Earl Russell said at Blairgowrie. For his part he feared not to stand on that platform, and contradict that statement to its very base, and he had no title of doubt that an overwhelming majority of the people of Preston would that night proclaim Earl Russell to be wrong. But there was another point upon which he wished to touch. It had been frequently said, "Let them fight it out; it is no concern of ours." Apart from the inhumanity of that advice, he would ask was it no concern of ours, that when we walked the streets we saw the poor man wending his way, with a down-cast countenance and a paltry dole in his pocket, scarcely sufficient to keep body and soul together?—that we had his pale, sickly, wife standing in the doorway with scarcely a rag on her back to shield her from the cold blast of winter? Was it no concern of ours that we saw her children stretching out their thin hands to her for bread—and she had none to give? It was very much a concern of ours, and thousands in that room could feelingly bear him out in that assertion. It remained for them to choose one of two things: peace or war. Would they say that Britannia should go across the ocean bearing the olive branch in her hand? or would they lift up their voices that night and say that this war ought to continue, and our wretchedness along with it? From his own experience of America, he believed that respect for English opinion was more deeply and firmly rooted in the hearts of the American people than in that of all the world beside. The expression of the feeling of England would most certainly have some influence with her wayward children. If England would exert that influence and be the means of bringing this fearful struggle to a termination, there would be no page in her history that would shine more gloriously before the world. (Loud cheering.)

The following amendment was moved, but rejected:—

"That this meeting views with satisfaction the policy hitherto pursued by Her Majesty's Government, with regard to the American war, and hereby expresses a hope that Her Majesty's Ministers will maintain the same policy to the termination of that deplorable struggle; and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Earl Russell."

The proceedings, which were characterised by the greatest enthusiasm, terminated with the formal adoption of the petition to the House of Commons.

With winter close upon us, the distress is exhibiting symptoms of an alarming increase. At the weekly meeting of the Relief Committee on Monday last, the Earl of Derby in the chair, Mr. Commissioner Farnall reported that in seventeen out of the twenty-seven unions in the cotton districts pauperism had been gradually spreading during the past month, and the ratio was increasing from week to week. In commenting upon the unfavourable character of his report, Mr. Farnall assured the committee that, if that which was generally anticipated—namely, a hard winter—should come upon us, with perhaps four or five weeks of frost, not a single able-bodied man would be found employed on the public works; and as those now employed on them had had no opportunity of putting anything by from their scanty earnings, they must, in the case referred to, fall upon the rates. It was true that a considerable sum was still in the hands of the committee, but no such amount would be sufficient to save the unemployed operatives from much privation and hardship. There could be no doubt, he said, that the high price of cotton rendered the position of the manufacturers extremely perilous, and little work was being done by them, except to order. But there was an impression abroad that our difficulties were almost overcome, and that we had nothing to do but to get through the coming winter as comfortably as possible. He trusted that what he had stated would tend to remove any such misapprehension as to our real condition and prospects. Colonel Wilson Pattee said it would be interesting to know whether the increase in pauperism arose from the total or partial stoppage of factories, or from other causes? Mr. G. L. Ashworth (Mayor of Rochdale) said that in his town alone there was an increase of three hundred in the number of cases relieved by the guardians, while there was also a considerable increase in the number of cases on the books of the Relief Committee; and almost the whole of the increase in both instances arose from a diminution of work in the cotton-mills. Mr. Ashton said that at Hyde, without the total stoppage of a single mill, there were four hundred more people out of work now than during the previous week, owing to the fact that many manufacturers had found it necessary to stop portions of their machinery. The Earl of Derby: So that there are so many fewer people employed in the mills?—Mr. Ashton: Yes; and probably the number actually thrown out of work is greater than the returns show.

While such was the complexion of the deliberations within the Town-hall, there was an ominous commentary upon them kept up outside. A crowd of distressed operatives thronged the street in front of the building, to demand, as they had done last week, an interview with the Mayor. On one of the banners displayed in the procession were printed these words:—"WE HOLD A NUMBER OF NAMES OF FAMILIES WHO ARE STARVING TO DEATH."

One of the leaders, pointing to those words, said it was truly deplorable that, with truth, they could parade such an announcement through the streets of Manchester; but it was true that hundreds that very day were literally in a state of starvation, through the meagre allowance of the board of guardians. The board had behaved better to them last winter; but families who were then allowed 10s. a week were now knocked down to 4s. a week. There was a man (he continued) who was going before the Mayor that day, and he had a family of nine children, and last winter he was allowed 8s. a week to keep house with; but last week when he went before the board they knocked him down to 4s., and he was told that if he wanted any more he must go into the workhouse. He intended to get his workhouse order, and when he got it he would take it to the New-Cross, and publicly burn it as an example to evil-doers. Another of the leaders said that last Monday they gave three groans for the board of guardians, and three more for the detective police who were employed as spies; and he warned the newspaper reporters that if they were "guilty of holding back the true statement, they would receive the same treatment." A deputation consisting of three of the men eventually had an interview with the Mayor, and represented their grievances to him. The Mayor informed them that it was a matter of time to place the Public Works Act in operation, and that when in operation only those would be employed who were able and willing, and they would only be paid proportionately to the labour they performed. As to the guardians, he had no power over them whatever. The guardians were elected, as he and the council were, by the ratepayers, and their functions were entirely distinct. The deputation retired, and when the men rejoined their comrades in the street they marched to Stevenson-square, where the result of the interview with the Mayor was announced. Speaking was kept up until after one o'clock, and the result was a determination to hold a meeting on some future day.

On Friday last a steamer, partly in an unfinished state with fittings for an armament, but without any guns on board, entered the port of Calais, hoisting the Confederate colours and declaring her name to be the Rappahannock. Inquiry proved that before coming into the possession of her present owners she was the property of the British Government, then named the Victor, a corvette, which, with other vessels, had been publicly sold. Her repairs, so far as completed, were made in the Government dockyard at Sheerness. It was at first reported by telegraph that she had been seized by the Customs authorities at Calais, but later accounts prove that her present nationality is fully recognised by the French Government.

THE TWO CONFEDERATE ARMIES.—Coming, as I have, to the army of General Bragg, a stranger to its generals and familiar only with the Army of Virginia, where I have spent so many pleasant hours, I must profess my surprise at observing the want of harmony and the utter absence of enthusiasm which prevail in this Western camp. It is not that the men are one whit less brave for the division generals less able than those under General Lee; but, if I read matters aright, there is not at the head of this army that firm, mild, sagacious, temperate wisdom, before which petty differences are hushed, which daunts political intrigue and self-seeking, and which presents to every man, from the highest to the lowest, a living example of purity, unselfishness, and patriotism, before whose lustre all historical characters of modern times, except, perhaps, Wellington and Washington, pale their ineffectual fires. To the merits of General Bragg, by no means inconsiderable, I am far from being blind. But it is no injustice to him to say that he never can inspire enthusiasm such as is wanted in a mighty and unequal struggle of this kind in either his officers or his men. That this Western Confederate army if subjected to the command of a general whose character is electric, as was Stonewall Jackson's, might become the rival of the army of General Lee, I have no manner of doubt; but in its present condition its choicest achievements will be, when engaged, level battles like Murfreesboro, or unimproved and unrepaid victories like Chickamauga; and, when at rest, dissatisfaction, heart-burning, recrimination, such as have never been absent from the Federal armies, will continue to sweep like pestilence through its ranks, and disqualify it daily more and more for bringing its work to perfection.—The Times Correspondent.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, Dec. 2.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

THE tightening process in the Money Market is making way. The Bank directors have advanced the minimum rate to 7 per cent., and it is said they will in all probability go to 8. The external drain, if it goes forward in this manner, will eventually produce inconvenience, and though for the moment everything may seem sound and favourable, we shall before long have serious disasters. The strain upon trade will be great if the bullion movement should proceed much further. India, Brazil, and Egypt, will, it is conceived, still require large supplies of specie, principally in payment of cotton purchases.

Since the advance in the rate of discount, the brokers and discount houses have given notice that money at call has been increased from 4½ to 5 per cent., and at short notice, 5 to 5½ per cent., and money left for longer periods will be subject to special arrangement. The Joint Stock Banks are allowing 5 per cent. for deposits, and on the Stock Exchange, the quotation for advances is 6½ to 7 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

Another week has passed without any gold having been sent into the Bank, whilst on the other hand the withdrawals have again been large, amounting, with £205,000 taken this afternoon for Egypt, to £333,000. At the same time the arrivals of specie have been fair, the total being about £402,543; but of this only £25,253 is from New York, the remainder being from the West Indies and the Brazils. The West India steamer La Plata took out to-day £31,890. The silver market has been particularly active this week, several large purchases having been made for export; two or three of the principal banks have been buyers, and the latest price quoted was 61½d. to 61¾d. Before the arrival of the Bombay telegrams announcing an advance in the exchange and the rate of interest, the quotation was 61½d., and without much business doing. The only gold-ship at present known to be at sea is the Monarch, with £247,500.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

In the early part of the week the market for the English funded securities was very well sustained, and a good business transacted. But since Monday there has been a decided change for the worse. The operators refused to transact business to any extent, and prices fell considerably, and to the latest moment not only was there no rally, but quotations closed with a further declining tendency. As compared with this day week the fall in Consols has been fully ¾ per cent., the last price being 90½ to 90½ ex. div. for money, and the same for the January account. Exchequer Bills have further declined, being now 10s. to 5s. dis. The Foreign Stock Market has been in a very agitated state during the last few days; prices for all the leading descriptions have been jumping about considerably, but in the end quotations are all lower. Greek has declined during the week ¼ per cent., but this is attributed to a letter which has just been published in one of the daily papers, on the subject of Greek Finance, which is not regarded very favourably. Mexican have received 2½ per cent., the present price being 35½ to 35½. Spanish Passives are down to 33 to 33½, and the Certificates, 13 to 13½. Turkish (1854), 89 to 89½, and do. (1862), 69½ to 70.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

There is still very little doing in American Government and railway securities, and the recent advices reporting the successes of the Confederate army have rendered dealers less disposed than ever to operate, even on the most retail scale. The transactions which have taken place have been almost entirely for investments in some of the most stable securities. The following comprise the dealings of the week:—United States Five per Cent, 60, 58½, and 59; Virginia State Six per Cent, 35 and 33; Atlantic and Great Western Railway New York Section, 76½ and 77½; Do. do. Pennsylvania Section, 76½, 76½, and 77; Erie $100 Shares, all paid, 64 and 63½; Illinois Central, 82; Do. do. $100 Shares, $90 paid, 23½ and 23 dis.; Do. do., all paid, 69½; New York Central (Convertible Bonds), 80½; Do. do. $100 Shares, 50; Pennsylvania Central Bonds First Mortgage (Convertible), 87.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for British railway securities has been very much depressed throughout the week, the unsettled state of the money market, and the threatening aspect of political affairs on the continent tending to make dealers extremely cautious. Although a rather large number of transactions are recorded, they have been generally for only trifling amounts. The chief feature of the week is the great fall in Metropolitan, which have declined not less than 6 per cent. In most of the other descriptions there has also been a decline, but not to the extent that might have been anticipated under the circumstances. As compared with this day week, there has been a fall in Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire of ½ per cent., and of ¼ per cent. in Great Eastern, Great Northern, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, London and South-Western, Midland, North-Eastern (Bewick), North Staffordshire, South Devon, and South-Eastern. In foreign railway shares, about an average business has been transacted, but at a decline in price; and shares in British Possessions have been operated in to a fair extent.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been steady all the week, advancing on purchases, the price alternating between 54, 55, 56, 58. To-day, with the advance in the Bank rate of discount, a panic appears to have seized all speculative stock, and with these Confederates have suffered, the closing prices being 50 to 52.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 50,000,000 rupees in Bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were—to Calcutta, 27,000,000 rupees; to Bombay, 21,000,000 rupees, and to Madras, 2,000,000 rupees. The minimum price declared was, as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee in Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11½d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 1½ lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11½d. will receive about 94 per cent.; on Bombay at 2s. 0½d. about 38 per cent.; Madras at 1s. 11½d. about 10 per cent.; and all above these prices in full.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The British Union Assurance Company is a new undertaking just brought forward. It is urged that a wide field still exists both at home and abroad for the extension of life and fire insurance, as shown by the fact that not more than one in twelve of the heads of families in the United Kingdom have provided for those dependent upon them by life assurance, and that the property insured against fire amounts to only about one-third of its real value. The fire and life branches are to be conducted separately, as regards liabilities and accounts, and the expenses of management are to be divided between them. In the life department operations are to be commenced immediately, the requisite arrangements having already been made. The proposed capital is £250,000, with power to increase to £1,000,000, in 25,000 shares of £10 each, but the first issue is to be limited to 10,000 shares.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the fifth ordinary general meeting of the East India Irrigation and Canal Company, the directors' report was unanimously adopted, and the chairman remarked that the progress made was equal to the expectations of the directors. The traffic receipts on the canal, so far as constructed already, amount to £3 per day; and it is admitted to be one of the most useful works ever devised in India. When all the canals are all completed, there will be altogether 153 miles of cheap uninterrupted water communication, affording a constant and remunerative return. A meeting has been held of the proprietors of the Victoria (London) Dock Company, at which a proposition was submitted by the lessees for the purchase of the stocks for transfer to the St. Katherine and London Dock Company. The terms offered were £107 10s. for every £100 stock, and £21 10s. for every £20 share. The proposition was unanimously agreed to. At the ninth annual Meeting of the Law Union Fire and Life Insurance Company, Mr. James Cadden in the chair, it was shown by the directors' report that, during the present year there had been an increase of 25 per cent. in the fire department, and 40 per cent. in the life department, over the new business of the previous year. The total receipts for the year, exclusive of the sums received for duty, amounted to £54,063; and the balance of receipts over expenditure was £16,180, increasing the net assets of the company to £126,790.

THE GREAT SHIP COMPANY.

Proceedings having been instituted to conduct the winding-up of the Great Ship Company, under the cognisance of the Court of Chancery, a large number of the shareholders have resolved to nominate Mr. R. P. Harding (Harding, Puller and Co.) to the office of official liquidator. It should be observed, however, that the Great Eastern is advertised to be sold by public auction at Liverpool early in January.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

With a further advance of 1 per cent. in the Bank of England rate of discount, the tendency to improvement noticed last week in some departments of the produce markets has disappeared, and we are again generally very quiet. Upon prices, however, it is only in exceptional instances that the effect has been in any way important. Cotton has perhaps been the most influenced, and, with a great indisposition to purchase, prices are down fully 1d. per lb., but, as it invariably occurs in reactions of this kind, quotations are very uncertain and irregular. The American provision trade is dull, good sizeable singed bacon sides now offer at 42s.; middles are all in second hands, and meet very little inquiry. American butter is the most saleable of any kind in this market, and is firm in price. Cheese sells steadily at late rates. The grain markets maintain an upward tendency. American wheats are quite 1s. per quarter higher, and fine flour, which is scarce, is 6d. per barrel dearer. Petroleum has given way 1d. to 2d. per gallon, in the face of excellent deliveries; 1s. 10d. to 1s. 10½d. is now the price for refined, and £17 per ton for crude. The depression in linseed oil still goes on, a further reduction of 1s. to 1s. 6d. having taken place. We reduce our quotations accordingly. Rosin keeps very firm here, but is dull at Liverpool. Turpentine maintains the previous value. Tallow has receded another 20s. per ton, and the market is heavy at the decline. The colonial wool sales, which closed yesterday, have evidenced a good demand on American account for qualities at and under 11½d. per lb. Very little has been done in jute, but at the sales to-day there was a good competition, and firm rates were paid. The tobacco trade is dull, and in some cases prices have favoured buyers, but the variations are not important. The sugar speculation has paused at last, whilst some small sales have been made at 1s. decline from the highest point. This, however, leaves the price of clayed Manila as much as 41s. per cwt. The metal trade has continued active, and in the face of dearer money Scotch pig iron has further advanced 1s. to 1s. 6d. per ton, whilst spelter is again higher, being to-day quoted £18 15s. per ton on the spot and £19 2s. 6d. January shipments. In dye and dyestuff articles the only new feature is some activity in lac dye, principally B. Mirzapore brand. The purchases are chiefly speculative. In chemicals, iodine is easier, citronelle and lemon-grass oils dearer.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Dec. 2.

THERE has been a fair amount of business transacted in the Cotton Market during the week, but within the last day or two there has been far less animation exhibited, in consequence of the uncertainty with regard to the Bank rate of discount. Holders do not appear disposed to force sales, and purchasers are equally apathetic. The total sales during the week have amounted to 57,000 bales, of which 26,000 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year to the present time are 2,440,110 bales, and for the same period in 1862, 2,473,320 bales. The imports this year have reached 1,534,717 bales, and to the same period last year 1,089,573 bales. This year exports have so far been 436,405 bales, and to the same period in 1862, 403,565 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 1,231,500 bales; same time last year, 1,052,700 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 722,220 bales, same in 1862, 984,140 bales. Computed stocks at the present time, 256,130 bales, and at the same period in 1862, 272,270 bales. American cotton has been in good demand, at a rise of about 1d. per lb. In Sea Islands there has not been so much doing; for Egyptian there has been a good demand, and a large business has been done in Surats. To-day the market has been weak, at a further decline of from ¼d. to ½d. per lb. The closing quotations were Middling Orleans, 27d. to 28½d. Mobile, 27d. to 28½d. Upland, 27d. to 28½d. Estimated fair Egyptian, 23d. to 30d. Peruvians, 27½d. Bahia, 26½d., and Surat, 16d. to 26½d.

MANCHESTER, December 1.

From Tuesday to Saturday last our yarn and cloth market was very inanimate, buyers acting very cautiously and dealers anxious to sell. On Saturday, telegraphic advices came to hand from Bombay, dated November 7th, reporting an active demand there at an advance of fully 3s. per piece for shirtings on the prices of the fortnight previous. This intelligence caused some excitement, and a few orders were placed where sellers were not too extravagant in their demands.

On Monday, telegrams were received from Calcutta, dated 12th November, and Bombay the 14th idem, reporting a brisk business at advancing prices. The excitement prevailing here on receipt of this later intelligence, was checked by the quiet tone evinced by the Liverpool market, which, later, it was generally known, was only waiting for some such news as this to send it up in price higher than was ever attained before. The rate of exchange in Bombay having advanced to 2s. 2d. per rupee, clearly showed to the Liverpool dealers that large amounts of specie would have to be sent out by the next mail to India to meet the demand there, and that most probably the drain towards that quarter will be a continuous and excessive one for some time to come, and that the advance in the Bank rate of discount will not be delayed longer than next Thursday at the latest.

To-day, Tuesday, our market has been stagnant, owing to the small business doing in Liverpool, and to the serious decline in prices there. Buyers who were arranging contracts yesterday will do nothing at all to-day, but let all business lie in abeyance for the present.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and fiendish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the deepest interests of our country. Strange and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, our old arch-enemy, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kindred, have been slandered, abused, and libelled beyond any civilised people on earth, insult added to injury, and the foulest duplicity and partiality, shielded and armoured-plated with the cry of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to the South, the South has always been "Neutrality!" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe, —and think, —on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an inefficient blockade, and opposed to any supplies going over from this country, both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater sacrifice, her commercial interests to a fear of War with the North. The so-called "neutrality" practised against the South has been their greatest hardship, and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. Exchange and intercourse have been our conduct towards the combatants—the Confederate States having declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South is conquered, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give this blood-thirsty tyrant the cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner the support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of honesty and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence: nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North should blot out the South or not, or whether the South ought to have her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the friends of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle them to be free, then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the "Confederate States of America" to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of concert of action among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The bare necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.
The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of those sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.
Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

SOME days must elapse before an authentic account reaches Europe of the late events at Chattanooga, and in the meantime we can only give the Federal version, pointing out those details which are palpably at variance with the truth. To what extent the army under General Bragg has suffered from the numerical superiority, or the excellent strategy, or the luck of General Grant, we know not; but the Federal reports, both official and newspaper, are so contradictory that they themselves give the lie direct to the sensational announcements of the total rout of the Confederate army, and that "Bragg's army is represented to be destroyed."

It appears that about the 15th or 17th of November, General Bragg commenced to withdraw his forces from his position fronting Chattanooga. For about a week this movement was concealed from the enemy; but on the 23rd, either from information or by accident, the Federals made a reconnaissance in force. They then discovered, what it was impossible to conceal, that Bragg had sent away the whole of his heavy artillery and could not reply to their cannonading. The Federals possessed themselves of the heights to their left, but beyond this no important movement was made on the 23rd. And now we are confronted by accounts which are conflicting as to dates as well as to events; but possibly the difference of dates is only a mistake of the telegraph, and that General Grant's reports should be dated the 25th, and not the 24th. What we shall do is to take the latest and fullest reports.

As soon as the Federal commander learnt the position of his enemy, there is no doubt he made all possible haste to bring up his forces for an assault. But armies are not moved in an hour; the Confederates were unmolested during the whole of the 24th, and on that night General Bragg evacuated Lookout Mountain. On the morning of the 25th the Federals occupied Lookout Mountain, and just two days after they had ascertained that their enemy was weakened they made an attack on the Confederate position at Missionary Ridge. Now it is manifest that on this occasion the Confederates could not have been surprised, although no doubt they were taken at a disadvantage. From the moment that they were unable to reply to the Federal artillery they knew that the enemy was aware of their position, and would as speedily as possible avail himself of it. The Confederates showed no sign of demoralization, but on the contrary twice repulsed the Federals, and it is said inflicted heavy loss upon their assailants. Sherman was largely reinforced, and the Confederates were then forced from their position and retreated southward.

Such is the story of the Federals, and assuming it to be true in every particular, it shows how little reliance we can place on the reports of captures of men and material, and demoralization of General Bragg's forces. We repeat, the Confederates were not taken by surprise. For a week before the 23rd they were engaged in a retrograde movement. They then had two days' notice that their movement was discovered. We venture to say that there were few guns within reach of the Federals, except those which were not considered worth the trouble of removing. Troops which made such a gallant stand on the 25th, twice repulsing the enemy, were not likely to flee in panic, or surrender themselves by hundreds and by thousands. When the truth is known, it will be found that after having more than a week to carry out the plan of withdrawal from Chattanooga, General Bragg had not left a considerable part of his forces cut off from all support, and that the reported capture of 10,000 Confederates is upon a par with the Pope and Halleck capture of 10,000 after the evacuation of Corinth. The friends of the South may regret that it was necessary to withdraw from Chattanooga and that the movement was discovered by the enemy; but there is no reason why they should give the least credence to the report of the rout of Bragg's army. We can very well understand that "Grant's victory has created comparatively little popular enthusiasm or public demonstration throughout the North."

From Knoxville we have no definite intelligence. It is said that General Longstreet has advanced his rifle pits to the immediate neighbourhood of the Federal works, and that General Wheeler has cut off the Federal supply train between Cumberland Gap and Knoxville. It was also rumoured that the Confederate had occupied Knoxville. From Virginia the news indicates that an engagement is somewhat probable. General Meade has crossed the Rapidan, although the roads are represented to be in a wretched condition. Lee's forces have been reviewed by President Davis. The Confederates cavalry is as active as ever. General Mosby made a night attack on Brandy Station, destroyed the Federal forage and thirty or forty wagons, and captured 139 mules. How true it is that the Federals in the South only command as much territory as is covered by their encampments, we see from a body of guerilla troops making a descent upon a plantation scarcely six miles from Norfolk, and carrying off 100 slaves that had been previously captured by the Federals.

Advices from Charleston state that the Confederates are building bomb-proofs in the ruins of Sumter, and that General Gilmore does not intend "to take possession of the site of Sumter, he being satisfied that he could not hold it, but will content himself to completely destroy its aggressive and defensive power." Perhaps the grapes are sour, for on the 20th of November a demonstration against Fort Sumter was made on rafts, and repulsed.

Mobile despatches of the 19th ult. assert that General Taylor had defeated Franklin's forces and Weitzel's division. There is no news from Texas.

The object of the Texas expedition, at a time when the Washington Government required every available man elsewhere, has been an inextricable puzzle to military critics. The New York letter which we print elsewhere, gives what is no doubt the true solution of the mystery. By the treaty of admission in the Union at the time of her independent existence as a Republic, it was stipulated that Texas might, on certain conditions, be subsequently subdivided into four States. The fulfilment of the conditions matters little, so that the legerdemain of creating a State out of a few counties of Western Virginia can be repeated with any plausibility of pretext. The constitutional forms of electing a President are about the only remnant of the Constitution which still has a hold on the minds and imaginations of the people of Federal America. Now it happens that all the really "loyal" States together form, either in the Electoral Colleges or in the House of Representatives, only the bare majority required for either mode of election. The slightest division, therefore, in the popular vote of the North, between more than one candidate, would render the election, or even re-election, of a President in 1864, by the forms of the Constitution, absolutely impossible. Could anything more clearly than this simple fact demonstrate the utter absence of all warrant in the Constitution for a war to coerce "rebel" States back to their "allegiance"? It is for this reason that unsettled territories are pushed for admission as States—that Western Virginia has been invested with that title, and that Texas is now invaded for the purpose of a nominal subdivision. Every other State where the Federals have a foothold, however slender, were it only a block-ading station on the coast, will, by a similar trick, be "restored" to the Union; and we have no doubt that, by virtue of the siege of Charleston and the encampments at Hilton Head and Morris Island, South Carolina will be made to appear as casting her vote for the re-election of Abraham Lincoln.

Our Richmond correspondent throws an unexpected light upon the recent events in Tennessee. It appears that already at the date of his letter, November 7th, the retreat of Bragg, if not actually decided on, was expected by all who understood the military situation. His statement of the feeling towards that commander, in the army and among the people, has at this moment a more pointed emphasis than he doubtless himself wished to give it. We have, however, retained what he says on this subject, because the great value of our Richmond correspondence is the intelligent fidelity with which it reflects public opinion in the Confederacy, and its unimpeachable truthfulness. The writer is not impartial—we should not wish him to be so; but he never knowingly conceals or colours unpleasant facts. General Bragg's unpopularity is, moreover, a matter of notoriety which has reached England through various channels already, and is in a great measure confirmed by the wholly unbiased opinions of military critics here. It is a misfortune, and most probably an undeserved one, on his part. He appears to lack what Napoleon prized more in his generals than talents, good luck; and he seems to lack, also, that faculty of inspiring his troops with enthusiasm and personal devotion which is nowhere more indispensable than in the commander of patriot armies like those of the South. In loyalty, self-sacrificing patriotism, and dauntless courage General Bragg has no superior; his abilities as a strategist are of a high order. It is doubtless the appreciation of these qualities that has caused the President, at the risk of his own popularity, to sustain the general against what he must have felt to be unjust and unfounded clamours. But the time may arrive when even this laudable firmness, so characteristic of President Davis, must give way to the conviction that a general who has once lost the implicit confidence of his troops, however little he may have deserved such a misfortune, has also lost his usefulness as the commander-in-chief of a great army.

The Federal ironclads do not appear to be very seaworthy or manageable. The monitor Lehigh, on picket duty near Charleston, grounded, and was considerably damaged. The Sanguanon, one of the new ironclads, started to join the fleet at Charleston, but her machinery broke down and she was obliged to return to Washington. A few days afterwards, whilst lying at that place, she was discovered to be sinking, and was with difficulty saved from going to the bottom.

It is no compliment to a nation to say that it honours the sepulchre of those that have died in its service, for savages do that, but still it was meet and proper that the Federals should form a cemetery at Gettysburg for their soldiers who fell on that bloody field, and that at its consecration the nation should be represented by its chief magistrate and other high officials. We have before us in the New York Herald a full report of the ceremony, and we have read it with a feeling of mingled sorrow and disgust. When Mr. Lincoln left Washington on such a solemn errand we could not expect that he would be dignified, for all sense of dignity and propriety seems foreign to his nature; but it was to be expected that for once he would abstain from buffoonery and cease to play the part of a west-country jester. The expectation is disappointed. On the eve of the consecration of the last resting-place of his gallant soldiers, Mr. Lincoln arrived at Gettysburg and was serenaded. He stepped out on the balcony, and, within sight of the new-made graves, spoke as follows:—

I appear before you, fellow citizens, merely to thank you for this compliment. The inference is a very fair one that you would hear me, for a little while at least, were I to commence to make a speech. I do not appear before you for the purpose of doing so, and for several substantial reasons. The most substantial of these is, that I have no speech to make. (Laughter.) In my position it is somewhat important that I should not say any foolish things.

A Voice.—If you can help it.

Mr. Lincoln.—It very often happens that the only way to help it is to say nothing at all. (Laughter.) Believing that is my present condition this evening, I must beg of you to excuse me from addressing you further.

After this, we see no reason to disbelieve the report that when Mr. Lincoln visited the battle-field, whilst the dead were yet unburied and many of the wounded were yet uncared for, he called upon an officer to sing a comic song.

The oration delivered by Mr. Edward Everett commenced eloquently and in a spirit that was worthy of the occasion; but he did not proceed far before he exhibited the rancour and mendacity which have disgraced the Federal cause from the first, but which were singularly disgraceful when manifested at the consecration of a cemetery. For his review of the campaigns that preceded the battle of Gettysburg, he was indebted to the imagination of General Halleck, and for his statement of the causes of the war he was indebted to Mr. Sumner and politicians of that class. After three years war, when even Mr. Seward no longer prates about Union feeling in the South—when the whole world has been surprised at the complete devotion of the people of the South to the Confederacy—Mr. Everett dared to assert that the majority of the Southerners were and always have been, in favour of reunion. He said:—

I do not believe there has been a day since the election of President Lincoln when, if an ordinance of secession could have been fairly submitted to the mass of the people in any single Southern State, a majority of ballots would have been given in its favour. No, not in South Carolina.

This quotation, though brief, is sufficient to show the character of the oration, and we will not weary our readers by refuting all his sophistries about the Constitution and the right of secession; and certainly we will not so far forget what is due to the reputation of the illustrious band of patriots to whom was entrusted the direction of Confederate affairs, as to reply to his impertinence and vilification. If there were no other reason, the ceremony of the consecration of the Gettysburg cemetery would amply justify secession, and explain the loathing the Southerner feels at the idea of any political association with the Yankee.

The exchange of prisoners is still delayed, and in the meantime a plot has been discovered to liberate the Federal prisoners at Richmond. The scheme was a very wild one, but the Confederate authorities have not neglected the warning. Since the discovery of the plot the guards have been doubled, the militia placed under orders, and every cannon on the heights turned upon Belle-Isle.

In reply to the charge that the Federal prisoners were half-starved, it has been stated on authority that they have been supplied with full rations. If there is any truth in the report that all guerillas when taken are ordered to be immediately shot, and the order is acted on, the Confederates will soon be relieved of the cost of keeping prisoners. In the first place, the guerilla bands are recognised by the Confederate Government as part of the national forces; and secondly, according to the law of nations, when a country is invaded every citizen who raises his hand against the invader can demand the treatment, if captured, that is accorded to a regular soldier, unless the place of his residence is in the actual military occupation of the enemy.

Mr. Wendell Phillips has delivered a lecture in Boston on political affairs. He said that Mr. Lincoln was not his first choice; he would have preferred Fremont, who was not a learner but a master, and whose education had not to be conducted in the presidential chair at a cost of $25,000 per annum. Mr. Phillips observed, that "Lincoln hates slavery, but has no heart to befriend the negro." Still, he would support Mr. Lincoln, and content himself with getting rid of Mr. Seward. He said, "Seward has been the Marplot of every policy, the unbelieving Judas, the rock a-head of the ship of State, the nucleus around which gather the disloyalty, timidity, selfishness, baseness of the nation. Let us complete the civil revolution. Let us put down the faithless Secretary and hold up the faithful President."

A Federal contractor of supplies for the subsistence department of the army has been sentenced to five years' imprisonment in the penitentiary for delivering adulterated coffee. If Mr. Lincoln is to imprison all his fraudulent contractors, he will require some new gaols, and be deprived of the active support of his warmest and most reliable adherents.

The blockade-runner Banshee, has been captured. She had previously made eight successful voyages, which will, no doubt, leave her owners a handsome margin of profit.

A correspondent at Queenstown directs attention to what he justly calls one of the most extraordinary cases of confession and repentance, the restitution by the Kearsage of sixteen of the men openly enlisted in that port. The Kearsage returned to Queenstown on the 7th inst. for that purpose, and landed the men, dressed in the uniform of the Federal navy.

Private telegrams have been received by the last Cunard steamer to the effect, that the celebrated General Morgan had effected his escape from the penitentiary in Ohio, where he, a prisoner of war, had been confined and subjected to the same personal indignities as a convicted felon.

The labouring classes in the North are still agitating for higher wages, and the movement is likely to give some trouble to the Government.

Wall-street has been very much agitated by the military intelligence. On the 23rd November gold was 53½ premium. It then fell rapidly from day to day until it was quoted at 43½. On the 28th, our latest date, it advanced to 47½, owing to unfavourable military rumours. It has been reported, but not credited, that Mr. Chase has tendered his resignation of the Secretaryship of the Treasury to the President, in order to take the place of the Hon. Mr. Taney, who, it is said, has resigned the position of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. As there is to be an appeal to the Supreme Court respecting the validity of Mr. Chase's paper currency, that gentleman would, no doubt, find the position of judge very useful in defending his measures.

ENGLAND.

LORD WODEHOUSE left London last evening for Copenhagen to congratulate Christian X. on his accession to the throne. Instructions have been furnished to his lordship with respect to the policy of the British Government in the matter of the Danish monarchy and the affairs of Slesvig Holstein.

According to the latest advices from India, the Earl of Elgin was still alive, but daily growing weaker.

Sir George Clerk, who has been twice Governor of Bombay, will be appointed to the seat in the Indian Council vacated by the elevation of Sir John Lawrence to the viceroyalty.

It is announced that the Court of Exchequer will not give judgment in the Alexandra case until next term; that is to say, that judgment will be given on some day between the 11th and the 31st day of January, 1864.

All persons who venture to speak on politics before a public audience should endeavour to be accurate in their statements. They should be yet more careful in quotation, more careful again when quoting those whom they wish to censure, and even yet more careful when they know that some one has said something, but when they do not exactly know what was said or who said it. Lord Hartington, M.P., a member of Lord Palmerston's Administration, and perhaps as well known on the other side of the Atlantic as on this, made what is now called an "extra-Parliamentary utterance" at the meeting of the East Lancashire Union of Mechanics' and Literary Institutions and Evening Schools on Saturday last, and exhibited a most striking example of the fate of those who disregard the great classical injunction which bids all scholars "verify quotations." His lordship, while enlightening the men of Haslingden on education and things in general, said, "I was astonished the other day to read in the speech—I forget whether of Mr. Cobden or Mr. Bright, at Rochdale, I think it was Mr. Cobden's—that not a citizen of the United States was the poorer for the war." Well, if Mr. Cobden ever had made such a statement his lordship might well be astonished; for though Mr. Cobden does perhaps display a little weakness when he gets on the seductive topic of Republicanism and the Federals, yet he is too good an economist to venture on an assertion of that nature. Lord Hartington will look in vain for these words in the speech of Mr. Cobden. Perhaps, however, he may hope to find them in Mr. Bright's oration. We, however, have read the effusions of both those honourable gentlemen and cannot discover the words. The only language at all similar is in a sentence at the conclusion of Mr. Bright's speech, wherein he says, "Notwithstanding this terrific struggle, their (the Federals) agriculture, their manufactures, and commerce, proceed with an uninterrupted success." Such language, however, is in perfect harmony with the view expressed by Mr. Cobden in his speech, where he says, "They (the Federals) are mistaken if they think they can carry on a civil war like this, drawing a million men from productive industry, to be engaged merely in a process of destruction, and spending £200,000,000 or £300,000,000, without a terrible collapse sooner or later, and a great prostration in every part of the community." Lord Hartington has not only cast an imputation utterly groundless on Messrs. Cobden and Bright, but he has done worse even than that. He has despoiled a man of equal notoriety with either Mr. Cobden or Mr. Bright of one of that man's undying declarations. It was Seward who gave birth to the phrase of the "irrepressible conflict;" it was Seward who limited the war to ninety days; and it was Seward who at Auburn early in November declared that "there was no State that had not been made stronger, and no citizen that had not been made richer, by the war." Doubtless these were the words present to the mind of Lord Hartington. They are words the author of which shall not be forgotten so far as lies within us. We look forward with calm anticipation to the day when the fruition of the prophecy shall be fully realised. Meanwhile we will jealously watch lest any one rob Seward of this the last and greatest of all his splendid predictions.

The Charing-Cross railway was provisionally opened on Wednesday, December the 2nd, and will be opened for traffic in about four weeks time. It is at once the first, and as far as can be judged the most important, of the series of undertakings which will eventually bring the railways of Great Britain into the heart of the Metropolis. At present the great blot of the system of railway travelling in England is the difficulty and delay incurred in a passage from the terminus of one railway to that of another. Thus the northern railways' termini are at least two miles distant from those stations south of the Thames which form the heads of the lines penetrating to the south, south-east and south-west of England. Similarly the western and eastern termini are five miles apart, and in nearly all cases the traveller must make his way through the most crowded and most impassable streets. Now the Charing-Cross railway consists at present of a short line from the London Bridge station to Charing-Cross. The station at London Bridge, on the south of the river, is the great point of departure for the Continent and the towns scattered over all the south-east of England, and is, therefore, the head of the line peculiarly frequented by the class of men to whom the annihilation of space is gold. The line starting then from this point runs almost due west, through the borough of Southwark to the South-Western railway station, thence it turns north and crosses the river on the west side of Waterloo Bridge on a bridge erected on the site of Hungerford Suspension Bridge, and the station is on the site of Hungerford Market. The line will also have a branch starting from a point situated at a short distance west of the London Bridge station, and crossing the river to Cannon-street, in the heart of the City. Assuming, as we justly may, that Charing-Cross is the centre of London and Cannon-street close upon the centre of the City, it is at once apparent that enormous strides are already made towards bringing all the southern railways to the very doors of our houses. It is further intended to connect the North-Western, Great Northern and Midland railways each by a double set of lines with Charing-Cross, open cuttings, with tunnels under the streets, being used. A traveller may then book himself through without changing carriages, if mortal endurance prove great enough, from Dover or Brighton to Glasgow or Aberdeen. The present line from Charing-Cross to London Bridge is not more than three miles in length. Its expense, however, has been enormous, amounting to no less than £1,000 per yard. The bridge across the Thames is twice the width of any railway bridge in the kingdom, with a foot bridge of fourteen feet in width. Its total length is 1,360 feet, its width between the main girders is 50 feet, which, together with the footway, makes a width of 64 feet; and there is a clear headway above high-water mark of 25 feet. It is laid for four lines of rails, and is of such strength that with the lines fully loaded and the footway thronged there will be a strain of only four tons to the sectional inch at the top of the girder, and five tons at the bottom. The most remarkable feature in the bridge is that at least one-third of it is railway station. This arises from the fact that if the station, and the vast hotel built at its northern end, had been pushed back to the end of the bridge, they would have abutted upon the Strand; consequently at the northern end the bridge spreads out in a fan-like form to a width of nearly 200 feet. There are two arrival and two departure platforms, and the interior of the station is 450 feet long, 100 feet high, and 170 feet wide. The entrances for the continental and metropolitan traffic will be distinct. The Cannon-street branch will not be open for some months; the bridge across the river on that line will be in five spans: three of 135 feet and two of 125 feet. It will laid for five lines, and be 64 feet in width. That these vast undertakings will reward the enterprise of the shareholders seems certain, after the unprecedented success of the Victoria line, and the Metropolitan (Underground) railway. In fact, there is no doubt that with lines specially adapted for passenger traffic from point to point in the metropolis, returns can be obtained exceeding enormously the produce of the best country lines.

During the terrific gales of last week 352 lives were saved by the boats of the National Lifeboat Institution, and 110 lives were saved by the Ramsgate life-boat. The institution now has 125 boats at various points of the coast, at a cost of £50 a year for each boat. Since the first establishment of the institution nearly 14,000 lives have been saved. The society depends entirely on private charity.

Mr. John Pringle, Lord Nelson's coxswain on board the Victory, died at his residence, Newton Bushel, Devon, on Saturday last, at the age of 103 years and seven months. He was a Scotchman by birth, and joined the Royal Navy at the age of twenty-one. He was present at the battles of the Nile and Trafalgar, and many other celebrated engagements.

Much progress has been made in the scheme of providing a good education for the daughters of officers of Her Majesty's army who have fallen in war or by disease, and have left their families in straitened circumstances. This want in the naval service is supplied by the Royal Naval School at Richmond. The military institution is now so far advanced as to be in possession of a handsome building near Bath, formerly known as the Lansdowne Proprietary School. The edifice will accommodate 100 persons, and is surrounded by eight acres of ground. It is proposed that the daughters of officers of fairly competent means shall pay a small remunerative payment, the next grade in point of means to pay £12 a year, and a third class to receive a free education. The excellence of such an institution is self-evident; the only difficulty to be overcome is, of course, the lack of funds, but the committee look with confidence to the public for assistance.

By one and the same means the Londoners are being instructed and charmed in rural affairs, and the jovial farmers of England are tasting the pleasures of town. The Smithfield Cattle Club is holding its annual show at Islington Hall; the Londoners are gazing, in mingled delight and awe, at prodigies of carcase and fat, while the agriculturists are filling the theatres, music halls, supper rooms, and hotels. It would be difficult to strike the balance and declare whether the farmer, having harvested his crops, sown his wheat for 1864, and brought his oxen, sheep, and pigs to the perfection of Christmas meat, derives more pleasure from a little London dissipation in his own peculiar style, than does the true Londoner from fancying himself for three hours a judge of points, and an adept in the art of the mysterious "touch," never doubting his ability, equal only to his desire, to farm on his own account with the same marvellous results. Certainly this year the Show is a success, so far as the exhibition is concerned. The silver cup of £40, for the best steer or ox in the hall, was won by a Hereford, the property of Mr. Heath, of Lindham Hall, Norwich; while the cup for the best heifer or cow was won by a Shorthorn exhibited by Mr. Swaisland, of Crayford, Kent. The Herefords, Devons, and Shorthorns are extremely good, and the Scotch classes show an extraordinary amount of excellence. Two peculiarly fine crosses were exhibited, one with the Devon and Shorthorn, and another with a Shorthorn and Galloway. Altogether there are 240 head of cattle. In sheep, the number of Leicesters is small, and the quality good; Lord Berners, Colonel Lowther, and Mr. Foljambe being the most successful. Lord Walsingham and the Duke of Richmond have the principal honours in the Southdowns. In pigs, the gold medal is awarded to Major-General the Hon. A. N. Hood, of Cumberland Lodge, Windsor, who was also successful in Devon and Hereford cattle. The stock exhibited by him was reared on the model farm of the late Prince Consort, and of course from the breeds there cultivated by his Royal Highness. It must be observed that all the animals exhibited are supposed to be immediately ready for the butcher, and that in awarding the prizes the judges are bound to look not to the mere accumulation of fat and consequent weight of meat, but to a symmetrical development of all the flesh-bearing parts of the animal. This principle being understood, it follows that form and shape are the first and main requisites to success; these being attained, the process of putting on flesh is a natural consequence, provided that there be correct judgment and experience in preserving the health of the animal. As might be expected, the prizes are awarded in classes, not merely of breeds, but also with respect to age and sex, the higher orders of cattle being divided each into four classes, with three prizes to each class; while two, or even a single class, is sufficient for the more uncommon breeds. The same rules obtain with respect to the sheep and pigs. In point of value the prizes range between £40 and £5. There is also a fine exhibition in machinery and roots. Messrs. Howard, of Bedford, and Mr. Fowler, of Leeds, are especially great in the steam cultivating apparatus, exhibiting at Islington the systems of machinery which have made the former famous on the Continent, in India, and Egypt, and the latter in New Zealand, the Cape, Barbadoes, and Demerara. So, too, the stand of Ransomes and Simms, of Ipswich, displays that wonderful variety of engines, ploughs, crushers, corn-screens, and every other agricultural and domestic implement which has won them fame even in the heart of the Russian empire.

In seeds, Mr. Gibbs showed some mangold of beautiful quality, which gave fifty-eight tons per acre on the Royal Shore farm.

The Show was visited on the first day by the Prince of Wales, the Crown Prince of Prussia, and the Duke of Brabant. On the first public day there were 30,000 visitors; indeed, so far as the number of visitors is concerned, the crush is always disagreeably great.

The President of the Club for the present year is Lord Walsingham, and the Duke of Richmond is Vice-President. Lord Tredegar is the President-elect for next year.

In the account which appeared in our columns of the race for the Cambridgeshire stakes at Newmarket it was stated that Lord Stamford attributed the defeat of his mare Limosina to treachery, and in fact believed that she had been poisoned; a belief or rather a suspicion which at that time we held and still hold to be unfounded. Acting on that idea his lordship at once proclaimed that his whole stud should be sold by auction; and it was given out that his lordship was so disgusted with the practices to which his turf experience had opened his eyes that he could no longer endure to be connected with the sport, and would wash his hands of the whole affair at once and for ever. Shrewd people, however, who were well acquainted with Newmarket and Lord Stamford, and who know how impossible it is for any one who has engaged deeply in racing to relinquish the sport entirely, simply because the vacancy in employment and amusement caused by such abandonment cannot be filled up, prophesied that the sale would be held, that the greater portion of the horses would be sold, and that a few of the young and choice animals would find their way back to his lordship, who would commence again on a smaller scale and with the assistance of a different trainer. How far such prophesies will be realised remains to be seen; at any rate the sale has taken place, and is deserving of a few remarks as being unprecedented in the history of racing. Sixty-seven horses were brought to the hammer last week by Messrs. Tattersall, and realised the enormous sum of 28,000 guineas. Their engagements alone amounted to £18,000, and the horses were to be sold "without reserve." They had in their veins the best blood in the world, boasting such sires as the immortal Orlando, Newminster, Stockwell, Rataplan, Leamington, Sweatmet, Voltigeur, the Flying Dutchman, the West Australian and the Cure; while among the dams the names of Elledale, Vivandière, Himalaya, the Arrow, Equation, and Mainbrace, the dam of Fisherman, shone conspicuously. Of the horses above two years of age, Oneasander by Newminster, aged three years, was sold for 1,000 guineas; Gemma, aged four years, for 750 guineas; and the now famous Limosina, the cansa doloris, for 500 guineas; while, by way of contrast, Cenopides, for whom Lord Stamford gave 1,100 guineas two years ago, went for 25 guineas. Coming next to the two year old colts and fillies, we find that Gowmsman, by Surplice, was sold for 625 guineas; Guardsman, by Orlando, for 850 guineas; Procella, by Leamington, for 650 guineas; Leicester, also by Leamington, for 960 guineas; and Acolyte, by Surplice, for 800 guineas. However, the wonder of wonders was Cambuscan, the winner of the July and the Chesterfield Stakes at Newmarket, and a good favourite for the "Two Thousand" and Derby of 1864, bred by Newminster out of The Arrow, who, after an exciting struggle between Lord William Powlett, the owner of Tim Whiffer, Captain White, and Lord Burleigh, fell to the last-named nobleman, the eldest son of the Marquis of Exeter, for 5,100 guineas. The yearlings excited even yet more ardent competition, and achieved even greater results. Venus, by Orlando, produced 580 guineas; Sloth, by Idle Boy, 520 guineas; Cassiope, by Voltigeur, 700 guineas; Lily Lye, sister to Saccharometer, 600 guineas; and Thalassius, by Stockwell, 700 guineas. These figures seem sufficiently enormous, but three more followed still more extravagant. Londoner, by Stockwell out of Skit, was sold for 1,000 guineas; Hydaspes, own brother to Imaus, being by Newminster out of Himalaya, for 1,350 guineas; and Archimedes, by Newminster out of Equation, the dam of Diophantus, for 3,000 guineas. Such were the prices obtained for the finest of the stud, and the figures afford some slight indication of the money which English sportsmen are ready to spend on the most popular and the most exciting of all amusements. It is now stated on authority that Lord Stamford has re-purchased Cambuscan, Archimedes, and the best and most highly-priced among the remainder, and that these will be trained at Newmarket by Mr. W. Butler, who trained the horses of the late Duke of Bedford. It must be carefully observed that all the horses were to be sold without reserve; and this fact, coupled with the names of some of the purchasers, such as Lord Burleigh, at once forbids us to suppose that these horses were bought by their purchasers as agents for his lordship, or otherwise than by a bond fide sale and purchase. We are therefore driven to suppose that his lordship has re-purchased at a considerable advance on the prices realised at the sale, and that the magnitude of his offers has overcome the desire of the purchasers to retain in their hands the valuable creatures acquired at so great a cost and trouble. However this may be, it seems that the seventeen best horses have found their way back to his lordship's hands, and that the remaining inferior fifty have ceased to fill his stable, at the enormous cost and with the unsatisfactory results which, in the nature of things, must follow from so overgrown a stud, even under the skilful management of such a man as his lordship's late trainer.

The great fight between King and Heenan came off this morning in Kent. The Yankee was beaten in thirty-five minutes.

THE CONTINENT.

M. FOULD'S anxiously expected report has appeared. It is dated the 1st December, and commences by announcing that the budget for 1865 is now under examination by the Council of State, and will soon be laid before the Corps Législatif. It will not differ materially from that voted for 1864. Including in the account the supplementary credit of 93,000,000 francs, asked for in the bill recently presented to the Corps Législatif, a large portion of the funds to meet which are in the Minister's hands, the total deficit of the year 1863 will be only 43,000,000 francs, and that for 1862 being 22,000,000 francs, the excess of expenditure over income for the two years is only 75,000,000 francs, or £3,000,000 sterling, although the extraordinary expenses of the war in Mexico have amounted to 210,000,000 francs, and those of the Eastern expedition to 60,000,000 francs, or 270,000,000 francs; £11,000,000 sterling in all. Of the 195,000,000 of extra expenditure which have thus been already provided for, more than half has been supplied by the surplus of ordinary revenue. As this result has been attained in spite of an expenditure in the two years of £10,000,000 sterling on public works, M. Fould with justice regards it as a proof of the elasticity of the French revenue. The Minister is further of opinion, that the receipts for 1864 will exceed his estimates, and supply the requisite resources for the maintenance of the Mexican expedition, if negotiation should not have before that time relieved France of that charge.

In spite, however, of this satisfactory situation, M. Fould proposes to raise a sum of 300,000,000 francs, or £12,000,000 sterling, by a loan. He is uneasy about the amount of the floating debt, although its sum is by no means so high as when he assumed the charge of French finances. The figures were then 1,050,000,000 of francs, or £42,000,000 sterling. The proceeds of the differences paid to the Government by the holders of the four and a-half per cent. rentes, which have been converted into three per cents—157,000,000 francs—reduced the amount of the debt to 896,000,000 francs, and adding to them the 75,000,000 for the deficits of the two years, the amount of the floating debt will stand at 971,000,000 francs, or nearly £39,000,000 sterling. M. Fould points out the inconvenience of a large floating debt, and proposes, as we have said, to reduce the sum by 300,000,000 francs. As more than 600,000,000 of the French floating debt consists of deposits made with the State by municipalities, of savings banks funds, caution moneys, and an advance free of interest from the Bank of France, the floating debt will thus be reduced to its lowest possible amount.

This measure of M. Fould is interpreted in favour of their own views, both by the prophets of war and of peace. On the one hand, it is said that M. Fould would never have come into the money-market at a time like the present merely to put the floating debt in a healthier condition; and that his object is, in reducing the floating debt to so small a sum, to provide himself with the means of raising 300,000,000 francs or so, quietly and gradually, so that the Emperor may have the sinews of war ready the moment he wants them. On the other hand, it is contended that France, in having recourse to a loan now, shows that she is not in a position to go to war, and that only some great necessity will drive her into such a dangerous course.

The Corps Législatif has concluded the verification of powers. In one of its last sittings the election of M. Boittelle, a brother of the Prefect of Police of Paris, for the Département du Nord, was annulled. Some curious revelations were given by the Marquis d'Havrincourt, one of the Emperor's chamberlains, who led the opposition to the proposal of the committee that the election should be validated. The sub-prefect did not show himself sufficiently active, and was compelled to take a holiday of fifteen days; licences hitherto steadily refused were given wholesale for cabanets, and the electors were promised that their sons should be exempted from the conscription. The election was annulled without a division.

The debate upon the Address will, it is expected, commence in the Senate this week, and in the Corps Législatif it will not be long delayed. The text of the address which will be proposed in the Senate has been published. It is, as addresses in reply to speeches from the throne invariably are, when there is no discord between the sovereign and the legislature, colourless and unimportant. In one of the debates upon a contested election M. Thiers rose to discuss the question of Government candidates (one of the representatives of the Government had quoted M. Thiers to show that, when a Minister under Louis Philippe, he had affirmed the necessity of Government candidates), but the general opinion of the Chamber; to which M. Thiers willingly yielded, was that the subject should be raised in the debate upon the Address.

The Emperor of Russia, in reply to the invitation to the Congress, says that the Emperor of the French has given expression to a thought which he has always entertained. All the acts of his, the Czar's reign, attest his desire to substitute relations of confidence and accord for the armed peace which weighs heavily on the people. He had taken the initiative of a considerable reduction of military forces; and it was only in the presence of eventualities which might have threatened the security and even the integrity of his states, that he departed from that path to which it is his most ardent desire to return. He should be happy if the proposition of Napoleon could conduct to a loyal understanding among the sovereigns; but he thinks it indispensable that the French Emperor should state precisely the questions which in his opinion must be the object of an understanding, and the basis upon which that understanding should be established. The letter is very courteous and conciliatory in its tone. The Queen of Spain has given an unconditional acceptance. Holland, it is said, is the only Power besides England which has given a refusal, and its refusal only consists in the assurance that it will take part in the Congress if all the other Powers invited do the same.

The Prussian Chamber of Deputies adopted by a very large majority, 231 to 63, the resolution proposed by its committee, "that the honour and interests of Germany require that all German States should protect the rights of the Duchies, recognise the hereditary Prince of Angustenburg as Duke of Slesvig Holstein, and give him effective support to make good his rights." The opposition was composed in nearly equal proportions of the ministerial supporters, who although in favour of active measures on behalf of Slesvig Holstein, wanted the House to pledge themselves to support the Government, and the extreme Liberals, who contented themselves with proposing that King Christian should not be recognised. The Democrats objected very vehemently to the policy of the majority, which would sacrifice, they said, the rights of Prussia. If the Ministry, following the expression of opinion given by the House, should go to war for the Duchies, it would be impossible for the majority to refuse them supplies, and equally impossible to offer any further opposition to the reorganisation of the army. Moreover, the Democrats were by no means disposed to champion the Prince of Augustenburg.

The speeches of the orators of the majority show that on this question the Germans have completely lost their reason, and we must say, show, too, that the Prussian Deputies are utterly unfit to possess political power. One of their leaders, Von Sybel, the historian, declared the treaty null because it was contracted "against public morality, against laws, against the will of the people." Another, Loëve, took his stand "upon the right of a people to freely dispose of itself." Why did he not propose to surrender Posen and West Prussia? The Poles were never consulted about Prussian rule. They would vote at once against it. And so the debate proceeded, the speakers pouring floods of sham liberality and absurd grandiloquence. Schultze Delitzsch described the policy of England as "brutal," and "took note that the free press of England falsified the facts." The truth being, as is most painfully apparent to every one who, having an intimate knowledge of the question, reads the German press, that those German journals have lied systematically upon the question, and that not a day has passed since Frederick died on which in almost every one of them some mis-statement, some deliberate falsification, has not appeared. But Schultze cannot read English newspapers; and he takes the assurances of Prussian newspapers, which, unable to reply to the English press, abuse it.

In the course of the discussion the son of the Chevalier von Bunsen, who, as Prussian Minister in London, signed the Treaty of 1852, made some very apocryphal revelations about the treaty; the most important being that, during the Russian war, an offer was made to Prussia by the Western Powers that, if she would join them against Russia, she might settle the question of the Duchies according to the German view. Herr von Bismarck at once described this statement as an error, as did subsequently Von der Heydt, but Von Bunsen repeated his assertion. We do not believe that there is the slightest truth in it. It must be remembered that this pretended offer was made more than a year at the least after the Treaty of London was signed; and however lightly German statesmen may regard treaties, the Governments of France and England would not have bought the unreliable aid of Prussia at such a dishonourable price.

The parliamentary career of Herr von der Heydt has been cut short on the ground that the Kreisblatt, the local official journal, had announced that he would renounce his Diet money—"compensation"—in favour of the district. The 85th article of the Constitution prohibits a member from renouncing his Diet money, and the promise was moreover deemed an attempt at corruption. Herr von der Heydt protested that he had no knowledge of the announcement; but all in vain, his election was annulled by a very large majority.

The Lower House of the Austrian Reichsrath has shown itself as enthusiastic about Slesvig Holstein as the Lower House of the Prussian Landtag. It has expressed itself dissatisfied—not by any formal vote, but by several vehement speeches—with the declaration of Count Rechberg on the subject. Count Rechberg admitted the validity of the London Treaty, but he pretends that the previous arrangements between Denmark and Germany form part of the London Treaty, and that if Denmark appeals to the Treaty she must fulfil these stipulations. We need hardly say that there is no ground for this contention, but Count Rechberg does not like to put himself directly against the tide of German feeling. Austria, he added, had urged immediate execution, and her troops were ready whenever required. He admitted that Lauenburg belonged incontestably to Denmark, and he declared finally that Austria was determined to act with Prussia to maintain right and treaties, and within the limits of right to act with all her power for the interests of Germany and the German race.

In reply to some criticisms of this declaration, the Count repeated that Austria considered the London Treaty only in so far binding as Denmark also fulfilled her engagements. He travelled in this speech beyond the Slesvig Holstein question. He observed that the object of Austria in the Polish question had been to preserve peace, whilst maintaining the integrity of the empire. He recognised the grandeur of the idea of a Congress, but thought a preliminary concert necessary, and asserted that the policy of Austria in Italy was the maintenance of peace and the establishment of friendly relations with Turin, but that those relations could not be established so long as the desire was not mutual.

There have been rumours that the Austrian ministry have been so much impressed by the debate in the Reichsrath, that they intended to resign as a body. This absurd canard has been formally contradicted. The Austrian Reichsrath has no doubt made itself an important power in the State, but it is not yet strong enough to make and unmake ministries.

The ferment in the other States of Germany on the Slesvig Holstein question shows a sign of abatement. Herr Samwer, a Holstein refugee, who has for a long time been one of the Ministers of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, and has now assumed the part of Foreign Minister of the Pretender—whilst Francke, a Slesvig refugee, also until now a minister of Duke Ernest, has undertaken the charge of the Interior—has addressed, through the Baden representative at the Diet, a note to the Danish Minister, summoning him to withdraw the Danish troops from the Duchies, and send the Slesvig Holstein troops back to the Duchies within fourteen days. This ridiculous letter was returned unopened.

The Pretender is wise enough to make his hay whilst the sun shines. He knows that the enthusiasm may soon decline—and is already raising a loan. That every patriotic German may have an opportunity of proving his zeal for the Duke and the Duchies, the bonds are for only twenty-five thalers each. Three pounds fifteen shillings! Who would not serve the cause of German nationality at so small a risk?

The German Diet is divided. Austria and Prussia have pressed for Federal Execution to establish the alleged constitutional rights of the Holsteiners and of the Diet—for the carrying out, in fact, of the measure already resolved upon. Bavaria, at the head of the smaller States, demanded that the Duchies should be occupied, with the view of holding them until the Diet shall determine who is their rightful sovereign. It is impossible to say from the telegram, which announces that "the Diet has passed, by a small majority, the resolution for Federal Execution in Holstein, reserving to itself the settlement of the question of the succession"—which of the two motions has been carried. Whilst this question was being debated the German newspapers and mob-orators, who wanted to have Prince Frederick installed at once, complained bitterly, and already declared that Germany is betrayed!

Meanwhile King Christian has taken a step which will add to the embarrassment of the Diet, and especially of the two great German Powers. He has, probably upon English representation, and to the great disgust of the Danes, who in their way are little less excited and intemperate than the Germans, revoked the ordinance of the 30th March, regulating the position of Holstein, to obtain the withdrawal of which was the object of the Execution already decreed. The pretence for Execution is thus taken away, unless, indeed, the new constitution for the Kingdom and Slesvig should be made one. In any case the Diet must deliberate afresh, unless it adopts the views of the smaller German States; but in doing so, and in occupying the Duchies with the avowed object of determining itself who is entitled to the succession, it would declare war against Denmark, and fairly enable her to demand the assistance of the Powers signatories of the treaties.

According to the Dagbladet of Copenhagen, the nobility and peasantry and the Legislative Assembly of the Duchy of Lauenburg held a meeting on Friday last, and passed a resolution declaring their intention to remain faithful to Denmark, and to recognise King Christian.

A very long document, professing to be a plan of the Polish revolution, sketched out and signed by Mieroslawski, so far back as March 1, 1861, has been published. It is said to have been found among the papers of Count Andrew Zamoyiski, to have been concealed in a quill, and to have been readable only by a strong magnifying glass. It is evidently a clumsy fabrication of the Russians. The plans of Mieroslawski would certainly not be sent to Zamoyiski; and the whole document is replete with absurdities. A Russian has built upon the Russian view of what the Poles have done a plan of what they intended to do.

The Austrian Government has suspended the publication of the Czas of Cracow for three months; and the Russian Government has sent the Times correspondent away from Warsaw. The cause of truth will not lose much by the former measure. The Czas published, not accounts of what really went on in Poland, but such accounts as might tell upon Europe. The Times correspondent, on the other hand, did—to the best of his means—justice to both sides.

The Greeks are justifying all the ill-fame they have so long enjoyed. They have resolved to cheat their creditors because nothing is to be got by recognising their obligations, and they are trying to cheat Great Britain. They knew very well that the destruction of the fortifications of Corfu was an indispensable condition—indispensable both in the interests of England and to obtain the consent of Austria of the cession of the Ionian islands—and they urged no objection to it. Now that England has taken all the necessary steps to get rid of the islands, and only keeps them at great inconvenience, they refuse to take them unless the fortifications are left; and the mob of Athens is, we are told, in a state of great excitement.

The Swedish Diet has been closed by a speech from the throne, in which the King said:—"Our interests are not yet immediately threatened, but they are connected with the maintenance of peace and the rights of nations in Europe. The Swedish nation feels deep sympathy and sorrow for the dangers which impend over the King and people of Denmark."

The Italian Chamber of Deputies has been discussing the condition of Sicily. The Government contends that all the measures complained of were absolutely necessary to re-establish public safety.

The discussion has not yet finished.

Mr. GEORGE M'HEWY has written to the Star denying that he is the author of the pamphlet entitled "A Familiar Epistle to Robert J. Walker," as reported by that journal.

EXTRAORDINARY REPENTANCE.

THE U.S. STEAMER KEARSAGE AND HER RECRUITS.

QUEENSTOWN, December 8.

SIR,—Considerable curiosity and excitement were caused here yesterday by the reappearance of the United States steamer Kearsage, outside the harbour, where she landed sixteen men, dressed in the blue uniform of the Federal navy:—"stowaways," as the officers of the ship, with genuine Yankee humour, call them. You will remember the depictions of Kennedy and Lynch, published in the London papers only a week since, and which exposed to the public the open and wholesale system of enlistment practised by the Kearsage during her late visit to this port, and you will agree with me that the present is one of the most extraordinary cases of frank confession and sudden repentance. Can it be that Earl Russell has given a friendly warning to Mr. Adams that the British people were not quite prepared to stand such tricks as those of the Kearsage at Queenstown, and that playing them too openly might embarrass him and injure the entente cordiale which he has made so many sacrifices of British self-respect to establish?

Yours, &c.,

QUI VIVÉ.

THE AMERICAN WAR AND THE SONDERBUND.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—Permit me to direct your attention to the subjoined paragraph cut from the last number of the Athenæum. It is a fair specimen of the sort of "argument" with which the advocates of the Federal cause edify their adherents; and among these advocates the Athenæum—grossly misrepresenting the whole body of literary men in this country, has long since placed itself, openly and unblushingly. Says this indiscreet friend of the Yankees:—

Colonel Fremantle is of opinion that the South will never again unite with the North, and that the Confederacy can never be subdued into peace and friendship. We need not follow him into these speculations. The same thing was said of the Swiss during their civil war: yet the Sonderbund was conquered, and you must look very curiously about Freiburg and Lucerne if you would find any traces of that terrible animosity now.

To compare the trifling and transient disturbances among the little cantons of Switzerland, in which not a pitched battle was fought, no fortified place actually attacked; in which one party was never seriously in earnest, since its leaders fled with the public funds in the moment of crisis; in which all the casualties on both sides did not exceed, if they reached, 500—to compare this tempest in a tea-pot with the great convulsions in America, is sufficiently absurd. There is only this resemblance: that both Switzerland and the United States are confederations. But the cantons forming the Sonderbund did not propose secession or withdrawal from the Helvetic Confederation; they simply resisted reforms of the Federal Constitution. Nor did the cantons arrayed against them treat them as rebels or as provinces, or refuse to exchange prisoners, or threaten them with forfeiture of their cantonal rights, or with confiscation or extermination. In the general orders of the armies led against the Sonderbund, the word "enemy," even, was never used. Had it been simply a question of military force against a determined people in their mountain fastnesses, the issue would probably have been a very different one for the Valley cantons.

You will perceive, then, that if there is any analogy between the two cases it tells terribly against the Athenæum's friends.

Yours, &c.,

HELVETIUS.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, November 24th.

There was quite an excitement here yesterday, caused by telegraphic reports from Washington that McCade's army was on the move to cross the Rapidan—baggage sent to the rear—provisions cooked for ten days—the march to commence this morning—men in the finest spirits—Lee retreating or certain to be driven back—and a triumphal march into Richmond. This morning, doubts are thrown on the whole story, whether for the purpose of mystifying or not, it is impossible to say, and we are left in uncertainty whether this is any thing more than one of the sensation stories which have been flying from time to time to and fro between Washington and Wall Street. The elaboration of the story and the positive minuteness of the contradiction lead one to suspect that there is a design connecting them together, and that if the friends of Secretary Chase are not making a raid upon somebody's stocks, or to get rid of their own, there is a real intention to make a demonstration against Lee in Virginia. But I am not persuaded that, in the present and prospective condition of the roads, there is any purpose to advance with a serious design against Richmond. Both generals in Virginia are suspected of manoeuvring merely to cover their the greater movements in East Tennessee. Grant has been reinforced by Sherman and holds Chattanooga against Bragg. The question of supplies is not yet settled, and this increased force of at least twenty thousand men does not lessen the difficulty. In spite of the constant reiteration of assurances that every thing is going on well, enough leaks out to show that the army is provisioned with great difficulty and that it is now on short rations, while the activity of the Confederate cavalry in the rear is a continual interruption to their single line of transportation. There have been several rumours of late that Grant would be compelled, and indeed that he had begun preparing, to fall back upon Nashville, but nothing certain has transpired. The Confederates are impressed with the belief that he must retreat, or come out of his entrenchments and give battle at a disadvantage, but that he will be decided in his plans by the result of the Confederate operations against Burnside's column, now commanded by General Foster, which is shut up in Knoxville in a very critical position. I judge his condition to be perilous, since among the paragraphs sent here from Washington for the press, there are assurances which sound melancholy, that Burnside (Foster) "still holds out," that he is confident of saving at least Knoxville, and the Government is "hopeful." The capture of Knoxville would compel the retreat of Grant, and the evacuation of East Tennessee and clearing out of Georgia and North Alabama.

Fort Sumter, which was "captured" by the Federals nearly two months ago, and has been "demolished" by an incessant bombardment by shot and shell, day and night, for week after week—still flies the Confederate flag in defiance. There are intimations that a combined attack by land and sea will not be long delayed. More shells have been thrown into the city, and the reason given why the bombardment by shelling has not been more vigorously prosecuted is that the big guns have proved defective.

The campaign in Western Louisiana is virtually abandoned, and the bulk of this force is withdrawn for service in another quarter, probably on the Rio Grande, to strengthen the army General Banks has just transported there to take Texas on the weak and undefended side. A corps has just been embarked at Brashear City, a place on the Louisiana coast of the Gulf, between New Orleans and the Saline, and will probably turn up at Point Isabel, at the mouth of the Rio Grande.

This expedition to Western Texas, and the occupation of Brownsville and the other places on the Texan side of the Rio Grande near its mouth by the forces of the United States, is the most important event of the week's news. Much mystery was attached to it before it sailed from New Orleans, and the impression was made that it was bound to the Sabine Pass; but it landed on the Rio Grande, and now confronts the risks of a hostile proximity to the French in Mexico, and is in its first days involved in a complicity with the Juarez Government, with which France is at war. The American forces had no sooner taken possession of Brownsville, opposite the Mexican town of Matamoras, than their presence created a popular excitement among the contending factions in Mexico, and within three or four days there was a Mexican pronunciamento, or revolution, of which the source was on the American side of the river. A counter-revolution, which also had its head in Brownsville, a further execution of "traitors," and all the other symptoms of revolutionary disorders which have been chronic in Mexico, and which have justified in the eyes of Europe the French intervention for the restoration of order and the preservation of society from disintegration. In the accounts which the Federal reports bring us of these events it is made to appear that these disorderly proceedings are held to be part of the incipient struggle with the French for the control of the river and the possession of Matamoras and the State of Tamaulipas, of which it is the capital. The contending factions are classed as French, or in the interests of the United States as against French; and the Government at Washington is involved at once in the conflict, which was anticipated to be inevitable, if it should send its forces to the frontier, where they would come directly in contact with the tumultuous passions which mark the internal strifes of Mexico, and where their own pride, and passions, and interests are on the side of the anarchists. What with the scarcely disguised preparations to keep the French out of Tamaulipas and support the Juarez faction, and the inevitable quarrels over the interruption of the commerce on the river, which is a main object of the expedition, in order to arrest the introduction thereby of supplies, &c., into the Confederate States by Mexican routes, the chances for immediate collision with the French are infinite. If Napoleon has the slightest wish to accept a cause for quarrel with the United States his opportunities will be plenty.

To meet all these contingencies, General Banks must have a larger force than he took with him; and, besides the assistance expected from the Department in Louisiana, he is said to have made a call upon the Secretary for War for large reinforcements. The Confederate force retired before him, and he has probably men enough to hold Brownsville and the lower Rio Grande, but not to advance far into the interior, where the Confederates may soon gather a considerable army to obstruct his progress. He will possibly wait for more men, and for the determination of his course from Washington, in respect to the French complications in which he has so soon entangled himself.

He has been taught to expect material co-operation from that part of Texas. It has been often said that the German settlements in Western Texas, having no slaves, and being imbued with the European ideas of the supremacy of governments, sympathise extensively with the North, and may be expected to join the Union army. Some disorderly manifestations may be looked for in that region, but they are not apprehended to any serious extent, from the German settlers. It is a wild country, and abounds with the wild class of people usually found on remote frontiers, where civilised settlements are scarce and law is feeble—outcasts, adventurers, smugglers and refugees from justice, ready to do any deed of violence for pay or gain or excitement. The Government of the United States pays high, and gives large license for plunder and liberal immunities for crime; and it may, therefore, and probably will, enlist on its side large numbers of these vagabonds, who may give trouble, and renew on the borders of Texas the licensed horrors of the Union rule in Kansas and Missouri; but there is no more doubt of the loyalty to the Confederacy of the great mass of the population of Texas, than of that of the people of South Carolina. A part of the State may be overrun, but the subjugation and retention is an utter impossibility.

The expedition to Texas has, however, other than military results, designed to be accomplished by military occupation of this particular region. It is a political coup d'état, and means more for the election of the next President than for the restoration of Union or the close of the war. Let me explain to you how the military occupation of a part of Texas is a material portion of a party programme for the election of a President.

By the Constitution of the United States it requires a majority of the electoral votes of all the States to effect a choice of President by electors in the first instance; failing the majority of electors, the President is chosen by the House of Representatives, each State casting one vote, and a majority of votes being necessary to effect an election.

Eleven States have declared themselves out of the Union, and made another government for themselves. The remaining States wage war upon them, on the ground that they could not constitutionally withdraw, but are still members of the Union, and may not renounce any duties or obligations as such.

There is therefore, this constitutional dilemma: if these States are still within the Union, they are to be counted as States, in the estimate of the majority required to make a presidential election valid, that is, a majority of the constitutional number of electoral votes in the thirty-five States, or at least eighteen States, in the House of Representatives. If they are excluded in the count, and a majority of the electoral votes in twenty-four States, or the votes of twelve States in the House of Representatives, is decided to be a constitutional majority, then the seceded States are constitutionally out of the Union.

The party dilemma is, that if the eleven States are ruled to be out of the Union for the purpose of an election, the Radicals may not have a majority of the remaining electoral votes, nor of the remaining States in the constitution of the Federal House of Representatives. It is their party interest that there should not be an effective majority of electoral votes as against them, in the first instance, and that there should be a majority of States in their favour in the House of Representatives. General Butler, who may be considered the exact exponent of the Radical party, expressed this idea in the following blunt way in one of his late electioneering addresses in Massachusetts.

"The rebel States must be regarded as destroyed, or it would be almost impossible to choose another President, for the reason that no candidate likely to be selected would receive such a support in the North as to give him a majority of the whole electoral college."

Here is the plan and the motive for it. The Administration cares little for votes in the electoral colleges, but wants new States in the House; and its policy this winter will be to hurry in the sparsely settled Western Territories, which are getting ready to apply for admission as States; and finds in the peculiar relations of Texas towards the Union a fund upon which it can draw for several new States, without compromising its position, that the old "rebel" States are extinguished. By the articles of agreement in the form of concurrent resolutions, accepted by Texas as an independent Republic, and the Government of the United States, in 1845, it was covenanted that Congress might, with the assent of the State, sub-divide the State into not more than four States, which shall be entitled to admission into the Union. It is just as easy to assume the consent of Texas to a subdivision, as it was to find that consent for division of Virginia already effected, or to pretermitt the question of assent altogether, on the ground that the sovereignty of Texas has been extinguished by rebellion, and that the United States only fulfil a compact of good faith in creating new States, with the preliminary condition that their organisation shall be strictly loyal to the authorities of the Union. The army is there to take care that the loyalty shall be personal as well as political, and by this coup it is already arranged in the programme of party, that there shall be at least three new States from Texas, if necessary, to secure the triumph of the party in power at the next presidential election.

You may ask, whether these monstrous abuses can be perpetrated under the forms of a Republic, and a minority be enabled by such audacious measures to fix itself in power, and there shall be no resistance or effectual obstruction. I can only answer that there is nothing in the aspects of the times or the temper of the people at the North to encourage the hope that there is any assignable limit to their submissiveness to anything which may be done by their leaders in this crusade for the destruction of the South.

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, December 8.

In obedience to the injunction of the giant in the fairy tale, "Belier, mon ami, commencez par le commencement," I begin this letter by referring to the end of my last. On reading it in print I became painfully aware that in speaking of Mr. Slingsby's "Familiar Epistle," I had not used the plain language of which he has so happy a mastery. I had drawn the wires of what I fancied irony so awkwardly thin, that to a careless reader it might almost seem to have a meaning which I never meant to convey, as no one could be suspected of envying Mr. Walker his dirty work.

The financial question primes all others this week. The loan is formally announced, but although the smallest sum anticipated, £12,000,000 sterling is all that is asked for, the manner of raising it not having been indicated, ample room is still left for conjecture. M. Fould's report puts the floating debt at £39,000,000 sterling, or thereabouts, while the Treasury, to cover this, possesses a sum of £25,000,000 and a quarter, in the caution money deposited at 5 per cent. by the holders of places and privileges, such as the receivers general, the agents de change, and the proprietors of newspapers. When the £12,000,000 of Treasury bonds with which it is now proposed to deal are paid off, or funded by the loan, there will only remain about a £1,000,000 and a half of floating debt to be provided for. It seems to be a dogma with French financiers, that when a debt has been consolidated it is as if it had never existed, it is regularised, and the resources of France are assuredly sufficient to authorise the increase of debt, especially when, as M. Fould says, it is a mere change of title, paper at a short date being exchanged for paper at no date at all. But while Treasury bonds, even at 5 per cent., their present rate, are liable to reimbursement, they present also this advantage, that the rate of interest may be reduced according to the state of the market, but when exchanged for a 3 per cent. rente at 66 or even 67, they represent a permanent interest of 5 per cent., or a money value at the price of the day of 109 for every 100. This is the most, not the least favourable view of the subject as regards the financial condition of the country, quite apart from the question whether the loan be obtained by public subscription, or as rumour says through the great banker. This concerns not the general public, those who pay the interest, but the subscribers who receive it, for there is upwards of a £1,000,000 to be gained on the transaction, and it matters little to the taxpayer whether this goes into the coffers of the Rue Lafite or into the purses of less wealthy individuals. There is a far more serious point of view from which the measure may be regarded. By thus "regularising the situation," the Treasury is enabled to create another floating debt of at least equal amount to that which it gets rid of, so that Government has every facility for meeting any sudden contingency. M. Fould, it is well known, is averse to war, but his term of office depends on pleasure, and he may only be levelling the ground to make it easy for a successor. There is no limit to the issue of Treasury bonds, and this remark has created sufficient uneasiness in financial circles to induce the France of last night to state that the extinction of this portion of the floating debt is the guarantee that there will be no corresponding reissue.

There is still a very general feeling of uneasiness in regard to the prospects of peace, and this naturally aggravates the financial difficulties which are thickening around us. The indignation against England on account of her refusal to enter the Congress has in no degree abated; Government and Opposition papers join alike in the cry. The Constitutionnel, in half menacing tone, dilates on the egotism of England, the Opinion accuses, not the Whig Government, but the aristocracy which tyrannises over the English people with this act of lese humanité wind ing up with what some persons would think a positive insult, a eulogy on the country of "Cobden and Bright."

The Italian journals, balked, as they fancy, of Rome and Venice, are equally indignant, and in their ignorance accuse England of seeking a war; for which the France of last evening rebukes them, for England is too much interested in the maintenance of peace not to accept even the Congress rather than risk its being broken. The Pays, no longer an organ of the Foreign-office since its change of management, but still under the same régime as the Constitutionnel, comes out still more petulantly than its colleagues. It has found out a new subject of recrimination against the perfidious one, in the raising the rate of the bank discount to 8 per cent. on the very day that M. Fould's report appeared, of course, with the intention of preventing the otherwise certain rise in the funds here.

The avidity with which the debates in the Legislative Assembly have been watched by all classes, although they have only been occupied with the verification of powers, is also regarded by many as a sign of national unrest. That this feeling is ungrounded or exaggerated I do not doubt; and I am more inclined to ascribe this unwonted interest to the love of scandal, than to any other motive. The author of the deeds which have been stigmatised by the Assembly as well as by public opinion, M. de Persigny, was dismissed months ago, and it may be noticed that the election of the brother of the Prefect of Paris was quashed, owing in great part to the exertions of one of the Emperor's chamberlains, M. d'Havrincourt. From this it would seem that the Emperor is not averse to a certain liberty of expression, and all I hear leads me to believe that the Government is less to blame than its agents, and the agents of the candidates for the pressure which has been exercised.

From Sunday's Patrie I copy an extract from a New Orleans correspondent of the 14th November. It confirms much that has already been said on the present attitude of the French Government towards the Cabinet of Mr. Lincoln. Speaking of the expedition to Texas as directed against the French occupation of Mexico, it says:—

"Nevertheless men of sense think this last motive childish, and doubt whether the Washington Cabinet entertains such an idea; for it seems now evident enough that, implicitly or explicitly, the French Government and President Lincoln have made mutual concessions—the one in abandoning the South as a prey to the North, without insisting on the intervention which it formerly proposed, and the other in giving up, or seeming to give up, for the present, the pretensions of the Monroe doctrine. This is so well understood that the Confederates trust now only in their own swords and their enduring to conquer their independence, which will be so much the more honourable when won."

Admiral Reynaud's successor on the American station is to be Admiral Roucière le Noury, an intimate of Prince Napoleon's. This may also be considered symptomatic of the policy of this Court.

The Spanish Government has a small dispute on the tupis with the United States, which it has offered to submit to the adjudication of the King of Belgium. It concerns the line of jurisdiction in the waters round Cuba. A cannon shot used to be interpreted three miles, but now that cannon carry further the Spaniards insist upon drawing the line, not from the shores of the mainland of Cuba, but from the islands and islets which surround it.

In the way of gossip, I may mention that the quarters of all the sovereigns expected at the Congress are said to have been marked out. The Emperor was to have stayed at St. Cloud. The Pope would have had the Tuileries all to himself, the Palace of the Council of State would have lodged the Queen of England, the Palais Bourbon the Emperor of Russia, and Austria would have been put up in the Luxembourg, of joyous memory. I may conclude with a trait of manners. Two gentlemen, both connected with the Paris press, had a difference some weeks ago, which, after long negotiations, resulted in a duel. (One was wounded; but the affair was not settled, and now that he is better, they are to begin again: and I read in a paper a few evenings ago the names in full, and the date of the intended encounter—this very day. Only the place and hour, and where tickets may be had, were not mentioned.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

No more convincing proof could be afforded of the strength of Southern feeling in these districts than by the fact that, even in Rochdale, while the Northern speeches of Messrs. Cobden and Bright were yet the topics of the day, a counter-meeting was held within the walls of the self-same building, to enable the misrepresented portion of the constituency to express its sympathy with the Confederate cause. For it would be a great mistake (in which Mr. Cobden has the best reasons for not sharing,) to think that the honourable gentleman's recent speech reflected the opinions of any considerable number of the inhabitants of Rochdale, over and above those who went to hear him. That no serious opposition was offered to his remarks upon American affairs is due principally, of course, to the respect felt for his high personal character, and partly to the consideration that the "public meeting" was nothing more or less than a repetition of the annual interview, cum privilegio, between Mr. Cobden and Mr. Cobden's political friends. As for Mr. Bright, instead of stealthily making a speech under Mr. Cobden's protection, he ought to have been boldly confronting his Birmingham constituents—with whom, by the way, now that he has got the better of his horror of "those vile guns," the bellicose Quaker ought to be signally popular.

To return, however, to Rochdale. The meeting was necessarily of a stormy character, and by how much it damaged, so far as the show of unanimity went, the Bright-cum-Cobden demonstration, by so much was it galling to those who sympathised with the North. The lecturer, who was supported on the platform by many of the leading members of the Southern Independence Association, was Mr. T. B. Kershaw, of Manchester.

After some preliminary remarks, the lecturer said: He disclaimed any connection with the party differences in the borough of Rochdale. Whether the people were Northerners or Southerners, he begged to say he had come amongst them that evening from his work as a cotton operative, to speak to cotton operatives upon a question in which every cotton operative was interested; and if he did not communicate to them more information upon the American war than they were hitherto possessed of, they were at liberty when he went away to call him an impostor. He had come to them to exchange ideas upon the American question, and as they were distinguished among Lancashire constituencies in having Mr. Cobden for their representative, he expected they would show their intelligence by listening to what he had to say. On the continent of America there was now raging, in its third year, a gigantic civil war, before which all the civil wars of history were dwarfed into comparative insignificance. During the two years and a-half which had last passed away this war had entailed the sacrifice of a million of men, had made 300,000 women widows, and a million of children orphans. (At this statement, the Northern faction called for three cheers for Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright; and without regard to the grotesque incongruity, or perhaps congruity, of the act, the cheers were given, followed by the counter cheers of the Southern portion of the meeting.) Such, continued the lecturer, were some of the effects of the war. (A voice: "What was the cause of the war?") They were told the other night that slavery—slavery—slavery, nothing but slavery,—was the cause of the war; but he had no hesitation in saying that that opinion was confined to Messrs. Bright and Cobden, and to those few Englishmen who had not studied the question. If slavery was the cause of the war why did it not take effect before 1860? The peculiar institution was established by England in 1620; why then had it taken 240 years to bear its natural fruit? The real cause of the war was to be found in the dissolution of the Union—the very Union whose dissolution had been threatened twenty times by the Northern party within the last seventy years. The lecturer then proceeded to quote from the report of the South Carolina Convention (25th December, 1860) in proof that, not slavery, but a long series of constitutional wrongs led to the secession of the Southern States. The right of self-government was set forth in the Declaration of Independence in language that could not be misunderstood. In 1777, when the confederation of the Colonies took place in accordance with the proposition of Benjamin Franklin, the Union was the bond, but the Constitution was the law under which that bond was to be preserved. It was the fundamental article of the Confederation that each State should be sovereign, free, and independent. To that declaration each State subscribed; and when in 1783 the United States were recognised by England, they were recognised as possessing each a sovereign and independent existence. A proof of their sovereignty and independence was not long in being supplied. Scarcely was the Union in being before a serious disagreement arose among certain of the States respecting the contracting of debts; and so early as 1786 the Northern States threatened to secede on that very account. When, at a subsequent period, a large number of amendments was incorporated with the Constitution—amendments which the Northern partisans overlooked when it answered their purpose to do so—the State of Virginia, in ratifying the amended Constitution, solemnly declared, in the name and on behalf of her people, that the powers granted to the Federal Government might be resumed by the people whenever those powers should be perverted to their injury. In 1861, those powers were so perverted, and therefore Virginia was no rebel in resuming her sovereign rights. After quoting the Honourable William Rawle upon this subject, the lecturer was interrupted with some reference to Daniel Webster. Daniel Webster (he rejoined) was often quoted by the Northern party and perhaps they would be surprised to hear that Daniel Webster could argue "two ways about"—one way, when he was in want of money, and the other way when he was not. In the year 1839, Daniel Webster, who was then accredited to England, was consulted by Baring Brothers as to the legal and constitutional power of the American States to contract loans at home and abroad. And what did Daniel Webster say? He was of opinion that the Legislature of each State had the requisite power, and he uttered the dictum which has been repeated hundreds of times since his day—"That every State was an independent sovereign community, except so far as certain powers which they might otherwise have exercised, had been conferred on the General Government established under the general Constitution." Adverting once more to the question of slavery, the lecturer remarked that it slavery was the sole subject of the war, the Southerners need only have remained in the Union, and they would have had slavery ten times blest to them. The Committee of Thirty-three offered to concede to the Southerners everything they asked for in reference to slavery. Did that look as if slavery was the sole subject of the war? Abraham Lincoln said almost as much on the very steps of the Capitol, and he scarcely stopped short of adding that if the Southerners would remain in the Union, they would find in him the best slave President that ever existed; and the same personage had since admitted that the most foolish act of his life was that of proclaiming the emancipation of the slaves. Yet in spite of all this, Mr. Cobden told them the other evening that it was all slavery—slavery—slavery. Not so Earl Russell, not so Mr. Gladstone, not so Lord Brougham, who united in the sentiment that the North was fighting for empire, and the South for independence. But if they must needs talk of slavery, he would ask who began slavery, who profited by it, and who continued it? The institution was established by the mother country, against the will of the then colonists; and when the mother country abolished it in her own possessions the Yankees perpetuated it in America. According to the testimony of Lord Lyons, the Northern States, at a very recent date, had eighty-three slave ships afloat. What right, then, had the North (or rather Mr. Bright and Mr. Cobden on behalf of the North) to taunt the South with slavery? But the inconsistency did not end here, for year after year we ourselves depended upon slave labour for sugar, cotton and rice, and at the same time we were abusing the institution with all the virtuous indignation we could muster for the purpose. But putting aside this spurious sentimentalism, he would ask what commercial interest had England in the success of the North? What had our trade with America amounted to during the first nine months of the present year? Simply £8,000,000 sterling, or at the rate of £12,000,000 per annum. And against that comparatively insignificant amount, what were they losing by the paralysis of the cotton trade? Supposing they were to realise in the forthcoming year all the cotton expected to arise from all parts of the world, £100,000,000 would have to be paid for what should cost but £25,000,000. Did they believe that the enormous difference of £75,000,000 could be lost to the capital of the country without causing a fearful derangement in its finances? For similar reasons, the question was peculiarly a working-man's question. During the two years and a half the war had been waged the cotton operatives had lost £10,000,000 in wages alone, and, according to Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright, there was the prospect before them of losing as much again; but there was this prospect also, that, when they had lost that amount twice over, the subjugation of the South would be as far off as ever. (The lecturer resumed his seat amid a mingled storm of groans, cheers, and counter cheers, the confusion lasting some minutes.)

The lecture was followed by a vigorous discussion, in the course of which, without putting forth much of his strength, Mr. Kershaw proved himself more than a match for his opponents. It was doubtless a bold stroke of policy on the part of the Southern Independence Association to attack the solitary stronghold of the Northern party in Lancashire—Rochdale; but the result showed that, even at Rochdale, and seemingly under the most disadvantageous circumstances of time as well as place, the Confederate cause is very well able to assert itself, despite the recent anathemas of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright.

The monster petition to Earl Russell, to which I referred some weeks ago, has been signed by 40,000 operatives, and will shortly be presented to his Lordship by a deputation of Lancashire weavers.

It is gratifying to find that the Southern movement here is commanding the attention of the London press. "The object," says the Press, "of the Southern Independence Association is widely to disseminate a series of papers showing that the right of secession is inherent in the Constitution of the States, and to hold meetings to petition Parliament to use such means as may lead to the conclusion of the war. It is believed that the recognition of the South by two or three of the great European Powers would produce this result. The large towns of the manufacturing districts are more easily moved to an authoritative expression of opinion than London is. De Quincy writes somewhere of the 'nation of London,' and the phrase is aptly chosen. London is a congeries of cities—a vast heterogeneous collection of different classes, whose pursuits and desires are widely separated. But the northern towns are homogeneous: the idea of trade is their one idea. Their inhabitants are bound together by an adamant chain, though its material is nothing but cotton. Already populous towns like Oldham and Ashton have spoken out in favour of the South; last week Preston followed them, and the war was carried by the indefatigable Mr. Spence as far as the city of Glasgow. The commencement of the session will see Parliament flooded with petitions from every town and from every mill throughout the north. A loud protest will arise against the faintest policy which declines to interfere while men of English blood are uselessly murdering each other by thousands, and while England's most important manufacture is thereby ruined.

It remains to be seen whether the voice of the North will have any effect upon the policy of the Government. It must, we should think, be rather galling to Lord Palmerston, among whose faults want of courage has never been numbered, to be pledged to a cowardly policy. Mr. Gladstone, who long since declared that "the South is a nation," and whose sympathies are entirely with the Confederates in their gallant struggle can scarcely feel satisfied with the Foreign Minister's proceedings. If the Cabinet cannot discover some mode of intervening to promote peace without giving reasonable cause of offence to either party, its members have little right to be called statesmen. The Whigs are on their trial in this matter."

THE CAUSES OF THE AMERICAN WAR.

BY A. T. BLEDSOE, LL.D., PROFESSOR OF MATHEMATICS, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

No. I.

No one with the least taste or talent for historical research could witness the great revolution which now rages in North America, without having his mind roused to consider the astounding phenomena continually forced on his view, or the causes by which those phenomena have been produced. No one with the least tincture of humanity in his nature could behold a war so stupendous in its proportions, and characterised by so many features of the most appalling atrocity, without wishing to comprehend the dreadful secret of its existence. We naturally seek to know why society, why a whole continent, is overwhelmed with such a frightful deluge of miseries.

Hence every great revolution like the present has had its writers as well as its warriors. The Rebellion of 1641 had its Harrington, its Hobbes, its Milton, and its "Vindicie contra Tyrannos," as well as various other writers and writings which sprang from that grand and terrific movement of the human mind. In like manner, the Revolution of 1688 produced a Sidney, a Locke, a Hoadley, a Gordon, and a Plato Redivivus; all of whom discuss some of the great questions pertaining to the social condition and destiny of man. Other convulsions of society have been attended by like phenomena. The French Revolution, as everyone knows, gave rise to an infinity of speculations and theories respecting the origin of society, the foundation and the forms of government, and the causes of revolutions; or, more properly speaking, all these great revolutions, and the works which accompanied them, were produced by the same causes.

It would, then, bespeak a most disgraceful dearth of all capacity for such inquiries in this age, if the American Revolution of 1861 should call forth no serious attempt to comprehend its origin, to explain its causes, and exhibit, in a clear light, the great lessons which it is so well calculated to teach for the guidance and instruction of all future times.

By many persons, indeed, the war which now desolates North America was seen afar off, its distant approaches were more or less distinctly felt, while its manifold causes, visibly at work in the bosom of society, were more or less profoundly meditated. On the nature and the operation of these causes the present writer had bestowed much research and reflection, and had even reduced to writing many of the results of his investigation, long before the war was inaugurated. No prophet was needed to predict its appearance. Never was the explosion of volcano more certainly announced by the uneasy motions and tremblings of the earth. Yet there were men, and that, too, in high places, who were blind to what was about to happen; and when the revolution burst in the midst of thirty millions of people, disclosing all the horrors of war, they knew not what to make of it nor how to explain its appearance. These were interested and blind partisans, who were either unable or unwilling to perceive that the causes which had raised them into power were sinking their country into ruins.

When the Southern States seceded, it was alleged by such persons that this was because they had failed to elect a President, or because they could not always hold the power of the General Government. But this entirely overlooks all the causes which, for many years, had been at work in the bosom of American society, and which finally produced a dissolution of the Union. We should not, however, be surprised at such an error. For it always happens, that a great revolution is ascribed, by those who do not like it or do not understand it, to some insignificant or unjustifiable cause, in order to render it contemptible in the eyes of mankind. The Reformation, for example, was at first attributed to the blind rage and jealousy of a monk because the sale of indulgences had been committed to a different order from his own. But that tremendous reaction by which the foundations of the earth were shaken and the society of Europe disturbed for nearly two centuries, can hardly be explained by the wrath of an obscure monk. This was indeed merely a contemporary slander. No historian of the present day, whether a friend or an enemy of that great event, would condescend to discuss such a supposed cause of the Reformation. "That great contest," says Moehler, in his work on Symbolism, "had its rise in the inmost and deepest centre of human history, as it turned upon the mode whereby fallen man can regain fellowship with Christ, and become a partaker of the fruits of redemption." Other celebrated authors, such as Balme, who have written eloquent and able works against the Reformation, have also traced its roots down into "the deepest centre of human history." The sale of indulgences was merely the occasion of that tremendous revolution; the cause must be sought in the fact, that the age was most profoundly in conflict with itself, the one half warring with the other half.

In like manner, the great revolution of the present day is the result of no superficial or transient cause. It is the outburst of an age at war with itself, precisely at that point, or rather on that continent, in which this conflict has become the most violent and terrific. It was, for at least twenty years, a war of races, and ideas, and interests, and passions, and words, before it became a war of deeds. History will show the truth of this statement, and for ever refute the poor cotemporary slander, born of the passions of the hour, that the Southern States withdrew from the Union merely because they had failed in a fair political contest for the Presidency, or because they could no longer have all things in their own way.

The authors of this accusation are, indeed, as inconsistent with themselves as they are superficial and unfair. They not only assign different causes for the war; but they vehemently deny on one side of the Atlantic what they as vehemently assert on the other. Thus, Mr. Lincoln, in his inaugural address, most solemnly declared that he had neither the disposition nor the power to interfere with slavery in the States; that the clause of the Constitution of the United States which enjoined the rendition of fugitive slaves was just as much a part of that instrument as any other; and that he was bound by his oath of office to see it faithfully executed. But while on one side of the Atlantic it has been denied that the war was waged for the extermination of slavery, and even admitted that such a thing could not be attempted without trampling under foot the Constitution and the oath of office, it is invariably vociferated on the other that it is a war against slavery. If this had been said in America, it would have been seen and felt that it is a war against the Constitution, and in direct violation of the President's oath of office. Hence this view of the war is reserved for the more ignorant parts of the population of Europe, who know nothing about the Constitution of the United States, and care nothing about the President's oath of office. But though the reasons, the motives, the causes assigned are in direct conflict, yet each is cunningly adapted to the meridian for which it is intended. It is some comfort to reflect, however, that such superficial and incoherent attempts to gull and deceive the civilised world cannot always prevail.

The truth is, if we weigh all the antecedents of any great revolution, if we consider all the influences which have brought it to pass, we shall find that the real causes are proportioned to the magnitude of the result. We shall certainly find, that the secession of the Southern States was not caused by the failure to elect a President or by the legitimate loss of political power. The real causes were far other and deeper than these. Springing from numerous sources, and all concurring in one tendency, the real causes swelled into a great torrent, by which the Government was gradually undermined, so that when the appointed hour came it furiously rushed to destruction.

Cæsar has often been censured, by a certain class of historians and schoolboys, for refusing to give freedom to Rome; and Washington has been as often praised for giving freedom to America. Both opinions are equally superficial and false. Cæsar and Washington were causes, it is true, as well as results; but still they were results rather than causes. The one was the product of a descending age, of which he was by no means the lowest type or shame; the other was the product of an ascending age, of which he was by far the highest type and glory. Washington, even if he had been so disposed, could no more have wrested from America the freedom towards which she had been struggling from the beginning of her career, than Cæsar could have withheld Rome from the despotism towards which, under the accumulated corruption of ages, she then gravitated with such fatal force. "It was necessary," says Montesquieu, in his "Grandeur et Decadence des Romains," "for the republic to perish; the only question was to know how and by whom it should fall."

Not otherwise has it been with the great republic of America. The causes under which it finally succumbed began, like those of the Roman republic, to operate in the moment of its existence, and only needed time to gain the ascendancy over the causes by which it was, for a brief period, elevated and rendered successful. States do not fall for trifles. Trifles may be the occasion of their fall, but the causes lie deeper, and are more powerful in their operation. These are not seen by superficial observers, or by blind partisans; but still they depress and ruin, as with the hand of fate. "There are general causes," says the author just quoted, "which, acting in each monarchy, either elevate, maintain, or precipitate it; all accidents are subjected to these causes, and if the hazard of a battle—that is to say, a particular cause—has ruined a state, there was a general cause, which furnished the reason why that state ought to perish by a single battle."* The battle of Hastings decided the fate of England. It was supposed, by her enemies, that the first battle of Manassas would decide the fate of the South: but the South was not ready for a Northern yoke.

The late Sir G. C. Lewis, in his work on "Methods of Observation and Reasoning in Politics," commends Mr. Alison's analysis of the manifold causes of the French Revolution, and very justly holds it up as a model for all inquiries of the same kind. For every such revolution, as he alleges, is produced by "a multitude of converging causes," all of which terminate in the one grand result. This is most truly and emphatically the case with respect to the tremendous explosion on the continent of North America. To ascribe that event, which is fraught with such deep significance for all the nations of the civilised world, to one or two particular causes, would be as superficial and narrow as unphilosophical and blind, as it would be to find a similar origin for the French Revolution itself. The causes of both revolutions are, in fact, most intimately allied in nature, and in both cases "their name is legion."

EARL RUSSELL'S NEUTRALITY.

(From the Morning Herald, December 4th.)

THE partisans of Earl Russell would fain persuade us that the part which he has taken in the promotion of hostile measures against the Confederate States, by interfering with their purchases in this country, under pretence of a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act, has been purely ministerial; that he has acted simply as an executive officer of the Queen, and not as a politician desiring, for personal or political reasons, to carry favour with the American Embassy, and to "make things pleasant" with the Federal Government. They would have us believe that he has an honest wish to be neutral and to enforce the neutrality of England; that he is influenced by no motives of servility towards the North or ill-will towards the South, but simply by a wish to maintain the rights of the Sovereign against usurpation on the part of her subjects or encroachment on the part of foreign agents, and to enforce the laws which restrain British subjects from lending aid and assistance in wars wherein Her Majesty is not engaged. Of course, it is difficult for any one to believe this story who has read Lord Russell's despatches—who has seen with what abject meekness he has tolerated the most outrageous acts of Federal officers; with what gross impertinence he has treated the remonstrances of Englishmen injured by those acts; how he has censored the Federal Legation, and by what rude and ungentlemanly discourtesies he has sought a quarrel with the Confederate Government. But let us give him the benefit of that rule of law which forbids the prosecution to call witnesses to the previous bad character of the prisoner, and judge him only by his conduct in the matter in hand—the enforcement of the Foreign Enlistment Act. Let us remember that he does not consider himself bound to enforce that Act; that he allowed its systematic violation by the agents of General Garibaldi, and submitted to its evasion by the agents of the Pope; that he never dreamt of putting it in force until solicited to do so for the benefit of Mr. Lincoln's Government, in a war of pure aggression against the sovereign States south of the Potomac. How has he proceeded since that solicitation was made? In the first place, how has he treated the Confederates? He caused the Alexandra to be seized on the deposition of certain witnesses. She was tried; it was shown on the trial—waiving all legal questions—that none of these witnesses were entitled to credit, and that some of them were egregious scoundrels, and the vessel was acquitted. How did the Government proceed? Did they release her, and apologise for acting on such flimsy pretences? Nothing of the sort. They entered on a deliberate course of delay and vexation; avowing their intention to carry the case from court to court, interposing every sort of delay in order to prevent the release of the vessel and impose expense on her owners; and this with the certainty before them that if every point of law were ruled in their favour, and a new trial granted, the character of their witnesses is such that no honest man would think of giving a verdict on their testimony. This is not all. With the result of the trial of the Alexandra, condemning all similar arrests for the future, Lord Russell has caused every other vessel against which informations have been laid to be seized; and not satisfied with this, he has added to the seizure every species of insult and menace he could offer to the builders; sending guards of marines on board, dismissing the workmen employed, and ordering a whole squadron of ships to watch, with fires banked up and with guns loaded, against the attempted escape of ships not yet ready for sea. And on what sort of evidence? On that of crimps, Confederate deserters, hired spies, and witnesses deliberately suborned to commit perjury by the agents of the Federal Government. For we find that in the case of the Pampero information against the suborners has actually been given by some of those with whom they had endeavoured to tamper; and no one doubts by what means the evidence which these men refused to give has been obtained from others. Such persons as those whose names have acquired publicity in connection with these cases do not come forward gratuitously to swear away their own characters as well as the property of others. If the Government do not take prompt measures to punish the offenders in the Pampero case, or if international courtesy exempt them from punishment, to demand their removal from England, then no one can pretend in future to believe in the honesty of its motives or the good faith of its "neutrality."

Again, how have the Government—that is to say, how has the noble lord at the head of the Foreign-office—dealt with the complaints preferred of Federal proceedings in violation of our law? These complaints have been frequent and notorious. Every one knows that the Federal navy is principally manned by British seamen; and Lord Russell himself, in an official despatch, has taken notice of the fact. Have any measures been taken to recall these men, now acting, according to the noble lord, in flagrant violation of the Queen's proclamation, or even to secure to them the right of withdrawing from a position which he declares to be unlawful? None whatever. Again, information was given that Federal recruiting agents were busy in Yorkshire. The Home Secretary—one of the closest allies of Lord Russell, and a Whig of the Whigs—took care to stifle the matter, and offer every possible discouragement to those who were endeavouring to have the law carried out; while at that very time English policemen were actively employed at Liverpool as spies in the service of the American Embassy. Recruiting for the Federal army has been going on in Ireland on the largest scale. Week after week a number of deluded subjects of the Queen are openly conveyed across the Atlantic, to assist in burning and plundering on Confederate soil, and finally to manure the fields of Virginia and Tennessee. Every effort has been made to induce the Government to put down this nefarious traffic; but the Government persists in giving it every facility, and has taken no steps whatever to interfere with it; accepting an evasive answer from Mr. Adams as conclusive disproof of a matter of public notoriety. Of course, while Government perseveres in such a policy, private individuals can do very little. Something, however, has been done. Positive and conclusive evidence of a legal nature has been obtained of a flagrant and glaring violation of British sovereignty; not by a secret agent, who might escape in time, and then be audaciously disavowed by Mr. Adams, but by the commander of a Federal man-of-war. Informations have been given before magistrates of the city of Cork of enlistments in Cork harbour by the captain of the Kearsage, the victims being Irish subjects of Her Majesty, and the informers eye-witnesses of the offence. The Kearsage is now, so far as our Government is concerned, in the same position in which the Alabama would have been had she sailed from Liverpool armed, equipped, and manned, ready for hostile operations. The former vessel was not, indeed, originally fitted out at Cork; but she there received an addition of force, and this, in the eye of the law, is precisely the same thing. It is the duty of the Foreign Secretary to take the strongest measures to bring the Federal Government to see and atone for its conduct in this matter: first, because at the request of that Government we have taken such stringent measures against those who are alleged to have contemplated similar proceedings on the other side; and, secondly, because, on account of a minor offence of the same kind, our ambassador was, not ten years ago, contemptuously dismissed by that Government.

If an outrage of this kind be allowed to pass with impunity, it will be the duty of Parliament to make strict inquiry into the motives which actuate the Administration in treating two Powers, which stand in the same relation to us, in so very different a spirit. We must know what are the influences under which such an extraordinary departure from honourable neutrality and sound policy has been systematically and persistently committed by Her Majesty's advisers. Are they moved by the threats of foreign or of domestic foes; by the blandishments of Mr. Seward or the eloquence of Mr. Foster; by dread of war with the North or of a rupture with the Radicals? Do they tremble for their country, or for their offices? Are they controlled by those "influential friends of the North" of whom Mr. Beecher boasts—the Duke of Argyll, Lord Granville, Mr. Cobden, and Mr. Bright? Or is that policy controlled by a yet lower influence; by an abject cowardice which dare not be impartial between the weak and the strong, and is as insensible to dishonour as sensitive to the very shadow of peril?

THE ALLEGED BREACH OF THE FOREIGN ENLISTMENT ACT.—The Federal sloop of war Kearsage, made her appearance off the harbour at an early hour yesterday morning, steaming up from the eastward, and having fallen in with a pilot-boat, she sent ashore fifteen of the men who had taken service on board at the time of her late visit to the port. The men were all in the uniform of the United States Navy, and each was allowed to bring away his clothes, packed in a haversack. They are said to have been sent to them by the commander of the Kearsage, on the pretence of their being stowaways, but such a pretext bears its own contradiction on the face of it. On landing the men were detained at the Custom-house, and were individually examined before the following officials:—Mr. Moore, Landing Surveyor, Cork Customs; Mr. Curgenven, R.N., Secretary to Admiral Sir Lewis T. Jones; Mr. Nicholas Seymour, Surveyor of Customs at Cork; Mr. Wickham, Acting Tide Surveyor; and Mr. Greaves, Sub-inspector of Constabulary. The general tenor of the men's statements appears to be that after they had been shipped at Queenstown the Kearsage proceeded to Brest; that there several of them had been given the option of taking service on board or leaving the ship; that they all consented to enter the United States service at 12 dols. per month; that they were then supplied with uniforms and assigned their respective posts on board; that they worked on board the ship up to her arrival off Queenstown yesterday morning, and that they were then, without any reason being assigned them, directed to pack up their clothes and were sent ashore. Their impression as to the cause of their dismissal was that it was to be attributed to some disagreement between the captain of the Kearsage and the admiral at this port. The statement of each was taken down in writing, and will probably be laid before Government. The landing of the men here after they had been only a few weeks on board (and all of them having been shipped here) is construed into an admission on the part of the commander of the Kearsage that he acted illegally in shipping them at all. The men are now at liberty and have returned to their friends in Queenstown, Ringaskiddy, and other parts of the harbour.—Cork Daily Herald, 8th inst.

THE FEDERAL SPY SYSTEM.—The following is one of the affidavits sworn before a justice of the peace by workmen in the employ of Messrs. J. and G. Thompson, shipbuilders, of Glasgow, in reference to the attempts made by the Yankee spies to suborn them to give evidence that might be used against the steamer Pampero.

AFFIDAVIT OF JOHN GILCHRIST.

"On the 17th day of October last Mr. Archibald Brodie, formerly carver and gilder, Buchanan-street, Glasgow, called at my house in Govan, proposing to sell carved trusses, &c. On the Tuesday following he called again about the trusses; but before he left he introduced the subject of the steamship Pampero, which he proposed that I should call on him at Balloch to inspect the trusses. I did not go to Balloch. On the evening of the 23rd of October last, on going home from work, I found him waiting for me at my house. After waiting some time, I accompanied him on leaving, when he proposed we should adjourn to a tavern in Govan. When there he again introduced the subject of the steamship Pampero, and informed me he was commissioned to offer me a handsome sum, and also to pay my passage to North America, and guarantee me an excellent situation there, if I would give certain information about the above steamer; stating, as the reason of his proposal for my emigrating, 'that a party in my position giving such information in such a way would not get a situation anywhere on the Clyde.' Before parting we arranged to meet in T. Hannah's, Gordon-street, Glasgow, to settle the matter. According to that arrangement, I proceeded to Hannah's on the succeeding Saturday evening, when I found Brodie waiting for me. He there proposed the following arrangement—viz., that if I objected to emigrate, a sufficient sum to render me independent of work ever afterwards would be paid me at once; also, that I would leave my employers immediately, and enter their service here at a larger salary than I was receiving (over and above the before-mentioned sum of money). I understood the nature of the work to be that I would require to watch the Pampero and report. He also stated they had workmen as spies in Messrs. Thomson's yard reporting to them. Before parting we arranged that I should write my decision on the subject to him, which I did, declining the offer. On the following Monday, at two o'clock, while proceeding home to my dinner, I was informed a gentleman wanted me in a tavern in Govan, and on going there I found Mr. Brodie waiting, with my letter in his hand. He then begged me to reconsider the matter; but having obtained sufficient information to put my employers on their guard against these parties, I did not wait to discuss the matter, but shortly declined the proposals. All which is true.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

If we can credit the Federal accounts, the South has sustained the most disastrous defeat of the war in the action near Chattanooga, and a great army is lost to the Confederacy. This would be terrible news, if true; but a careful consideration of the facts, even as they present themselves fresh from the supervision of the Washington authorities, materially reduces their importance, and raises grave doubts as to the degree of credence to be attached to them. It must be borne in mind that there has never yet been a Confederate victory which has not been at first interpreted in New York as a Federal triumph; nor a drawn battle, which, according to Federal testimony, has not resulted in the demoralisation and rout of the Southern soldiers. When Beauregard retreated from Corinth, General Pope announced the break up of his army and the capture of 10,000 of his men; when two days after their victory at Sharpsburg the Confederates crossed the Potomac, Lee's army was announced to be flying, a panic-stricken rabble, into Virginia. At Gettysburg it was the same story. There was the usual flourish of trumpets, the usual exultation, because Meade's army had escaped destruction; and for days the columns of the Federal press teemed with reported captures of guns and trains and prisoners, which in the course of a week were found to be absolute inventions. The public, therefore, will do well to suspend its judgment now, and wait until from Southern sources something definite is learned respecting the condition and position of Bragg's army. That Bragg has sustained a serious reverse, we fear cannot be doubted. That his army is flying, scattered, and in hopeless panic, we utterly disbelieve. And the Federals themselves furnish quite sufficient ground for our withholding belief in these extravagant statements.

According to the accounts from Washington, and we have as yet none other, the action between Bragg's and Grant's armies took place on the 23rd and 26th ult., very near to the scene of Bragg's and Rosecrans' encounter. On the 23rd the two armies held the ground they had occupied for the previous six weeks: the Confederates intrenched on the crest of Missionary Ridge and on Lookout Mountain, the Federals at no part of their line two miles distant, and here and there within shelling range of the Confederate batteries. But almost in proportion to the weakening of Bragg's line by the despatch of Longstreet's corps to Knoxville, had been the strengthening of Grant's position by the arrival of Sherman with two divisions of the Army of the Mississippi. His arrival must have brought up the Federal numbers to little less than 90,000 men, against which Bragg could not by any possibility muster more than 50,000. To add to the danger of an attack, the Federals under Hooker had gained a point whence they could secure the regular transport of supplies between Bridgeport and Chattanooga, so that within a very few days after reaching General Thomas, the Federal reinforcements were enabled to take the field. On the other hand, Bragg held a very strong position, which he had had plenty of time to intrench; so that the numerical superiority of the enemy may have been to some slight extent counterbalanced. It is tolerably certain that, prior to the 23rd, Bragg, fearing an attack, had determined on a retreat, and that Grant, having received intimation of his intended movement, resolved to anticipate him. Accordingly, Sherman's corps was moved from right to left, and extended so as to outflank the Confederate right on the east end of the Ridge; and on the morning of the 23rd a reconnaissance in force was executed by a division under General Frazer from the left centre, for the twofold purpose of ascertaining the strength of the Confederates in that quarter, and of occupying a slight eminence midway between the lines of the two armies, in order to protect the flank movement of General Sherman's corps. At the same time Hooker's corps closed up on the extreme right, and it was expected throughout both camps that a great battle was imminent on the morrow. Whether Bragg had moved away any considerable portion of his troops is doubtful; but it is believed that many of his guns of position were withdrawn previously to the engagement.

The 24th passed in comparative quiet, General Grant completing his dispositions for an attack along the whole line, and Bragg, in all probability, preparing for that most difficult of all operations, a retreat in the face of an attacking army. On the 25th, Sherman began the battle by attacking the Confederate right. His troops appear to have fought bravely, and were well led. But at twenty yards from the crest they broke under the terrible fire of the Confederates, and were driven back with heavy loss. Rallying on their supports and reinforced, they commenced the assault anew, but were again repulsed, the Confederates pursuing them to their reserves. But in his efforts to retain his right Bragg had been compelled to weaken his centre, and Grant, perceiving the chance, hurled two heavy divisions against it and pierced it. The main body pressed northward by the advancing Federals, and carrying with it the whole Confederate right, was finally driven eastward from the Ridge. In the meantime Hooker had attacked the Confederate left, with what success we can only guess. General Grant reports on the evening of the 24th that Lookout Point and the slopes had been carried; but on the 25th so far corrects himself as to write that Bragg retreated from Lookout Mountain only on the night of the 24th. On the 26th it was reported that Bragg's whole army was bivouacking on the south bank of Chickamauga creek, and General Grant claimed a complete victory. The Federal casualties are declared to be light: an obvious absurdity, considering Sherman's two repulses, the partial success of Hooker, the positions to be carried and the men who held them. But the Confederate losses in men and guns are, with the usual Yankee "bounce," placed at a very high figure. So far the affair is intelligible. Bragg's army had been attacked by a superior force, and after a days' hard fighting been driven from its ground. A day intervenes; there is no fresh engagement, and we learn with astonishment that without striking another blow, without even being struck, Bragg's army has turned tail; leaving artillery, stores, caissons, and muskets, and literally flying in regular Bull Run fashion, to Dalton, some thirty miles distant, destroying bridges and everything else in its headlong panic. Now it is possible that Bragg's army has retreated, and that, like a prudent general, he has made the best use of his start. But what is there in the Federal accounts of the battle of the 24th to justify this sudden break-up of his army, or to induce us to believe that it was too badly handled to be worthy the name of an army? Bragg, it must be remembered, is falling back into a friendly country, upon his supplies and his basis of operations. Every mile of Grant's advance increases the difficulties and dangers of the Federals, and separates them by a larger interval from Burnside. We hesitate, therefore, before we credit either the precipitate flight of Bragg's army, or the perilous movement of Grant's army, into the heart of Georgia. Far more probable is the despatch of Federal troops northward to the relief of Burnside. At the latest date, that general held out, and Longstreet had planted his batteries to command the town. The bad news from Chattanooga would undoubtedly hasten a solution one way or the other. A protracted siege would give time for Federal reinforcements to come up, and would lose East Tennessee to the Confederates. A successful assault would far more than balance the disaster at Chattanooga, and render the Federal tenure of Tennessee an uncertainty. Any mail may relieve us of this terrible suspense.

For the moment our attention is divided between East Tennessee and Virginia. In all probability, long ere this, the armies of Virginia and the Potomac have once more closed in deadly conflict; possibly another great engagement may have been added to the decisive battles of history. Meade's army had recrossed the Rapidan in three divisions, making for Orange Court-house. Lee had offered no opposition. But it was known that his army was close at hand, and that a battle would be fought. Heavy cannonading had been heard. Alarming rumours were in circulation in Washington and New York. It was reported that Lee had marched upon Meade's communications and destroyed his trains and that a great disaster had befallen the invading army. Official silence confirmed the worst alarms of the public, and gold sprang suddenly from 43½ to 47½. And so the curtain falls upon this terrible tragedy, to rise in a few hours perhaps, upon fresh fields of carnage and new horrors, and yet bring us no nearer to the concluding act.

Cotton still King.

SOME of our contemporaries are inclined to congratulate the country on its supposed convalescence from the effects of the cotton famine: rejoicing that Lancashire has passed through her worst trials, and that the general prosperity of the country has not been impaired by the heaviest disaster ever suffered by a principal branch of its industry. To us these jubulations seem, to say the least of it, altogether premature. We do not see any cause for rejoicing either in the actual or the prospective state of Lancashire. It is true that a certain number of mills have been opened—that at the end of October one-half of the operatives still remaining in Lancashire were working full time, one-fifth half time, and only about thirty per cent. were wholly unemployed. But before we congratulate ourselves on this situation we ought to go a little further into details. First, what is the condition of the employed? In ordinary times, no doubt, a factory hand in full work is very well off. Paid by the piece, at the ordinary rate, and employed in middling Orleans, he can make a very comfortable living; and the joint earnings of a family suffice, not merely for present well-being, but for considerable savings. But we must remember, first, that nearly everything which these men previously possessed had been swept away; their property sacrificed, their furniture sold, their clothing in pawn, their rents in arrears, their debt at the local shop swollen to the largest amount for which the shopkeeper could give credit, their last penny drawn out from the savings bank or co-operative store. They have had to begin the world again, as ruined men. Secondly, they are, in most cases, still paid at the old rates; but they do not earn the old wages. It is a very different task to spin a pound of yarn or weave a yard of cloth from Orleans and from Surat cotton. Even when the latter is at its best, its shortness of staple and general inferiority make it far less workable than American; and Surat now consists in great part of rubbish so dirty, worthless, and unworkable, that the spinners and weavers, when it is put into their hands, are ready to cry with vexation and despair. They cannot earn two-thirds of their former income, even by full work, on this detestable material. Those who have but half work have not, in ordinary times, more than a bare subsistence; and therefore, with Surat instead of Orleans, they can hardly keep the wolf from the doors. We need not say that the manufacturers are making no such profits as they used to make, and are thankful if, at the end of the year, they have not been losers. This is the case of those who are at work. The unemployed who depend on parochial or voluntary alms number 170,000; of whom 52,000 are wholly, and 38,000 partially, dependent on the relief committees; involving an expenditure of, we suppose, not less than £7,000 per week. Worst of all, their long dependence on charity, and the effects of despair—seeing that the fruits of thrift and forethought have been swept away, and that the most provident are now no better off than their neighbours—have fatally influenced the temper and character of the people. They have ceased to rely on themselves; they have lost that proud feeling of independence which was wont to distinguish them; they are becoming used to alms and idleness; and frequent complaints are preferred by employers that their operatives are as willing to depend on charity as to accept the scantily remunerated work which is all that can now be offered them.

Nor do we see any prospect of speedy improvement. Extravagantly sanguine estimates have been framed of next year's probable supply, which are not in the least likely to be realised. But the question of supply is at this moment secondary to the question of demand. Is there any reason to suppose that there will be a market for even half of what Lancashire could produce, at prices that will make production remunerative? We think not. In the first place, a great number of consumers of cotton goods cannot afford to pay such prices; and the decrease of demand from this cause alone will probably so contract the market as not to leave room for one-half of an ordinary year's production. Secondly, the risks are now so great that only speculative men dare incur them. Thirdly, the price of calico has now been raised so enormously, and its quality so much deteriorated, that it will probably, for many uses, be superseded by linen. Fourthly, the enhanced price of the raw material will of itself suffice to keep the smaller manufacturers out of the market. In former days, when cotton cost one-fourth of its present price, they had only just sufficient capital to work. For the last three years their capital has been wasting away, and they now find that the amount required to carry on their business—the floating capital demanded, irrespective of that sunk in buildings and machinery—is at least thrice as great as formerly. They are unable to go on. Their richer neighbours suffer, though in a lesser degree, from the same cause. And generally—since the floating capital of Lancashire has not increased, since the larger portion of it was always required for the purchase of cotton, and since the amount needed for that purpose is now at least quadrupled, it is quite plain that—unless the profits of the trade were such as to attract capital from other quarters, which they notoriously are not—its operations must be contracted from mere want of means to extend them to their former dimensions. Taking all these things into account, we see not the least reason to anticipate an increase of employment in Lancashire for many months to come; and we are not at all surprised to learn that during the last month there has been a considerable diminution; that the number employed at full time has decreased by some 17,000, and that of unemployed increased by 5,000.

Nor do we conceive that the country at large has escaped scatheless from the mischiefs wrought by the suspension of the supply on which its most important trade depended. A very large proportion of the income of the working-classes, and of the lower, middle-class, is spent in clothing, of which no inconsiderable part is of calico. That cotton clothing should have trebled, and all clothing greatly increased in price, is for this large part of the population a real and serious misfortune, and involves a considerable national loss. The distress of Lancashire, again, cannot but have affected injuriously the wages in all unskilled employment—already deplorably low. But, nevertheless, our contemporaries point exultingly to the Board of Trade tables, and seeing that the exports do not fall off, declare that the prosperity of the country is, on the whole, as great as ever. It would be sufficient, perhaps, to expose the utter futility of this assertion by pointing out that there is an actual increase in the value of cotton-yarn and cloth exported; so that, if this test were worth anything, we must pronounce the cotton trade to be as flourishing as ever. But we will look a little more closely into the matter.

Putting aside hardware, our chief exports during the ten months ending October 31st were cottons, woollens, and linens. The first furnished one-third of our total exports, and the two latter, together, about one-third of the remainder. It is, therefore, upon the value of these articles exported that the statement of our continued prosperity is based. Now, we must observe that the prosperity of the country is measured, not by the amount, but by the profit of its trade—by the wages and profits gained on the manufacture and sale of the things it exports, not by the total receipts from them. It is better for England to pay £20,000,000 for her raw material and receive £25,000,000 for her exported manufactures, than to pay £34,000,000 for the former and receive £36,000,000 for the latter. The value of our exported calico and cotton yarns consists principally of the value paid for their raw materials: and it is only the balance that represents any gain received by our workmen, manufacturers, or merchants. The fact really is, that while the nominal value of our exports has increased, the amount of goods exported has fallen off, and the profits received therefrom have fallen off in still greater proportion. If we wish to obtain, from a comparison of the present returns of the Board of Trade with those of previous years, a fair idea of our position, we must strike off at least two-thirds of the value of exported cottons, and 10 per cent. on that of woollens and linens, as due to causes which make the nation poorer and not richer. In very truth, instead of increasing, our actual exports seem to be falling off by something like 25 per cent.

And this is not all. We are now beginning to feel, in an unexpected direction, the pressure of the cotton famine. At first the almost total suppression of the trade of Lancashire increased the amount of capital in the market, and lowered the rate of interest. In the slang of the city "money was easy;" and accordingly, traders unaffected by the distresses of Lancashire, believed, readily enough, that the country was prosperous. The partial revival of the trade of Lancashire recalled thither all the capital that had been formerly employed therein; and withal a new circumstance, not duly considered by the moneyed world, began seriously to affect their markets. The enhanced price of cotton, being out of proportion to the reduction of supply, required a larger amount of capital to be employed in the import trade; and, from certain peculiarities in the condition of that trade, this absorption of capital took place in a way particularly alarming to the sensitiveness of the commercial community. Political economy tells us that a drain of bullion ought not to produce a greater effect than a drain of capital in any other form upon the rate of interest—that is, upon the price which one man is willing to pay for the use of another man's capital. It is clear that this price would naturally depend, not upon the amount of the currency, but on that of the loanable capital of the country. However this may be, there is no question that, under the Bank Act of 1844, which limits the operations of the great fountain of credit by the stock of bullion it possesses, any considerable withdrawal of the precious metals from this country has always an immediate and very restrictive effect upon trade, by raising, sometimes to an enormous height, the rate charged by the Bank, and therefore by other dealers, for discounting bills. Now a drain of bullion does not, except in very peculiar cases, arise from an increase of payments to one of the civilised countries with which we trade. Such debts are generally discharged in other ways. But when we suddenly incur a heavy debt to a semi-civilised country, where there is a strong love for the precious metals, and an absence of those extensive commercial relations which enable us to set off our credit with one commercial country against our debt to another, we have generally to pay in gold and silver. And this has happened now. It is not merely that we pay more for cotton than we used to pay; it is that formerly we paid the price of our cotton to a civilised people, with whom we settled in a regular mercantile way, partly through their large consumption of our exports, and partly through their indebtedness to our debtors elsewhere; whereas now we are dealing with Orientals, who have few transactions with Europe, who will not increase their purchases from us, and who insist on being paid in cash. Hence the drain of bullion for the East; and hence the rapid rise in the rate of discount from 3 to 5, 6, and 8 per cent; a rise which has greatly hampered and still more greatly alarmed all commercial men, but the necessity of which was clear beyond doubt. The whole of the inconvenience thus entailed on English trade and industry is directly traceable to the interruption of the supply of cotton from the Southern States of America.

In conclusion, we may point out two further effects of this last result of that interruption which have escaped most observers—one actual and the other prospective. A rise in the rate of discount affects the price of all securities; but, for obvious reasons, it affects chiefly those of a "speculative" character, which may require the man who trades in them to hold for a considerable time in order to realise at a profit, and which consequently may oblige him to borrow large sums of money. The Confederate Cotton Loan is certainly classed, on the Stock Exchange, among such securities; and the serious and rapid fall it has sustained is as much attributable to the general state of the money market as to the alarm occasioned by recent news from America. On the other hand, the financial condition of Europe threatens the moneyed community of the Northern States with serious perils. Hitherto, whenever the rate of discount in London has been as high as at present, the cause has been manifest in a deficiency of the harvest, and the consequent necessity of importing a vast quantity of corn. Whatever inconvenience the North, as a trading country, might sustain from the dearthness of capital in Europe was more than counterbalanced by her gains, as a corn-growing country, from the high price of bread-stuffs. Now, for the first time, capital is dear and corn is cheap; the rate of discount is 8, and will soon be 10, per cent., while the price of wheat is lower than it has been for many years. Under these circumstances, it is highly probable that the news of the enhanced value of money in London will create something like a panic in New York—a panic which may prove fatal to the stability of Mr. Chase's flimsy financial edifice. And thus, not improbably, we may "see the engineer hoist with his own petard," and retribution wrought upon the authors of so much mischief and misery, not by the hand of man, but simply by that reaction of their own misdeeds, which is the chosen instrument of Providence for the chastisement of evildoers.

The Cessation of Military Exchanges.

AMONG the amenities introduced by Christianity and chivalry into the practice of modern warfare, one of the most important relates to the exchange of prisoners. No such usage seems to have obtained in ancient times, save in an irregular manner and in exceptional instances. The rule of war before the ages of chivalry was one of simple and unmitigated savagery, extending not unfrequently to absolute extermination. This was natural enough where the object was not the redress of a wrong, but the destruction of a foe; where the end sought was not the submission of an enemy to reasonable terms of peace, but either the conquest of a great part of his dominions or his absolute reduction to a state of vassalage. Warriors who did not hesitate to slaughter the men and enslave the women and children of a captured town were not likely to give any other option to prisoners of war than between death and slavery. And there seems to have been no great disposition on the part of warlike nations to redeem the captives taken from them; who were deemed to have forfeited their manhood and tarnished their honour by submission to the enemy. The strict military code of Sparta forbade alike retreat and surrender; and the capitulation of Sphacteria, which would have been considered by any modern nation a matter of simple duty to save a useless effusion of blood, was regarded with horror at Sparta, and surprise throughout Greece. The austere virtue of Roman conservatives long cherished a similar distrust of men who had once given up their swords—

Hoc caverat mens provida Reguli
Dissentientis conditionibus
Fœdis, et exemplo trahenti
Perniciem veniens in ævum,
Si non periret immiserabilis
Captiva pubes.

Christian civilization has introduced a milder code. It is no longer held that soldiers disgrace themselves by surrendering when defence has clearly become hopeless, and further resistance can only end in purposeless slaughter. And in the same spirit the refusal of quarter, except under extraordinary circumstances, has come to be regarded as utterly inadmissible in a war between Christian nations. Similar feelings have introduced the rule of exchange of prisoners. To detain the enemy's soldiers in captivity for the mere purpose of making them suffer, while keeping at the same time an equal number of its own troops in the enemy's prisons, is held, in a Christian government, an unpardonable outrage on civilisation. The violation of this rule is scandalous, even in domestic strife, when once insurrection has acquired the proportions and permanence of civil war. In the rebellion against Charles I. both parties at first exchanged prisoners or released them on parole; and it was not until the rebels felt that victory had declared on their side that they gave vent to the malignity of the Puritan nature by murdering their captives. In the war of 1745, Charles Edward refused to hold his prisoners even as hostages for the safety of his partisans; and the manner in which this generosity was requited in the civil war, history has stigmatized as a crime. England did not refuse to exchange prisoners with her revolted Colonies, and that the French republicans did so in La Vendée was justly held to cast an additional stain even on the infamous reputation of that horde of assassins. At the outbreak of the present war in America the North manifested a disposition to refuse exchanges, until compelled to give way by the execrations of Europe and by the captures effected at Manassas. This was in perfect accordance with the character of the war on which it had entered and the spirit by which it was actuated. No modern nation ever before deliberately set itself to conquer and reduce to vassalage eleven sovereign States, or deliberately proposed, as the means of conquest, the gradual exhaustion of the whole male population of the enemy's country on the field of battle. It is right and natural that, in a war undertaken and waged on heathen principles, Christian precedents and civilised usages should be set aside; that the hostile territory should be wasted by fire and sword; that women should be outraged, old men and children murdered, houses fired over the head of their owners, slaves incited to rebellion and murder, and to every crime of which the lowest races of mankind are capable, when drunk with blood and lust. It is quite natural that a people waging such war in such fashion should begin by threatening to hang their prisoners; should be frightened out of this diabolical intent by finding that they were likely to lose more prisoners than they could take; should then agree to exchange; should take every opportunity, despite that arrangement, of murdering their captives in cold blood—as Butler, and McNeil, and Burnside have done; and, finally, the moment they found, or imagined, a preponderance of prisoners in their favour, should without plea or excuse have immediately suspended the exchange, and take advantage of its suspension to inflict every insult and mortification that vulgar spite—the spite of a cowardly and malignant race—can devise upon the bravest and most distinguished of their captives. There is nothing in all this of which other barbarians have not been guilty; and nothing, therefore, which was not to be expected from the subjects of Abraham Lincoln.

Their advocates in this country, however, have now and then the grace to be ashamed of them; and desperate efforts are made either to conceal or to palliate their brutal excesses, sometimes by an impudent denial of notorious facts, and sometimes by counter-charges against the Confederates of acts supposed to provoke and justify the atrocities committed by the Yankees. When we remember what has been the invariable practice of the Southern Government, generals, and soldiery, as recorded by every reliable witness, we know how to estimate the probability of these stories. It is in evidence that, in two invasions of Northern territory, the Southern army has never retaliated the outrages inflicted on Virginia, Louisiana, Tennessee, and Mississippi. No wanton ravage has ever been committed; no Northern home has suffered the fate of Mr. Mason's pleasant and hospitable dwelling; no Northern town has shared the doom of Jackson and Darien; no Federal captives have been shot in cold blood; no Northern woman has been insulted; no vengeance for the horrible scenes of Beckham's Landing has been taken on Northern soil. While the Yankees have robbed and murdered in the manner of Sepoys, the Southerners have behaved with even more than the forbearance displayed by English troops in European warfare. The discipline enforced by Lee and Johnston is as strict as that maintained by the Iron Duke, under provocations which, thank God, England has never suffered. And yet some Federal organs have had the impudence to maintain that the cessation of the exchange of prisoners is due to the conduct of the Confederates.

The fact, as proved to demonstration by the published correspondence, is, that this cessation was the act of the Federal Government; and that the Confederate Commissioner has done his utmost to reopen the exchange on the basis laid down by the orders of the War Department of the United States, but has received a peremptory refusal: also, that this refusal was not given until the Federal Government conceived that it had everything to gain by the interruption, inasmuch as it found itself in possession of an unprecedented number of Southern prisoners, and believed that the maintenance of its captives was a heavy burden on the resources of the Confederacy.

It has been pretended that the refusal of the South to exchange coloured prisoners was the reason for the rupture of the arrangement previously concluded by the North. If this were so, the Federal Government would still remain without excuse. When the arrangement was made, it was never contemplated that it should include runaway slaves; nor is it in accordance with the laws of war that men of this sort should be entitled to the privileges of soldiers. The North has, in the first place, no right so to extend a military compact as to make it cover a class of cases not originally included in it, and which, as is admitted on all hands, no Southern negotiator ever dreamt of including. Secondly, these so-called negro soldiers are not soldiers at all, or employed as such; in point of fact, they are simply labourers in the Northern camp, bandits and murderers out of it. In point of law, they are, by the law of the States in which they are found, slaves; by the law of nations, traitors; by no law or pretence of law are they either citizens or soldiers. If the Southerners choose to shoot them whenever they take them they are fully justified in doing so, for these wretched creatures are exactly in the position of deserters. It is not for their seducers to take advantage of their own wrong, and plead on their own behalf the compulsion employed and the utter incapacity of their victims to understand the nature of their acts or the risks they incurred. These things constitute the negro's claim to the mercy of his captors, but they give him no status and no rights under the laws of war. By those laws he is a criminal deserving of death, and the proposal that he shall be exchanged is an outrageous insult and an impudent mockery. But it happens that the refusal to exchange fugitive slaves has nothing whatever to do with the interruption of the exchanges. It is brought in merely by an after-thought, as a convenient excuse. Not a word about it occurred in the original correspondence; and President Lincoln himself informed a petitioner on the subject that the exchanges should not be stopped on this ground—that runaway slaves and their officers knew the risk they were running, and must take their chance.

We regret exceedingly that the system of exchanging prisoners too sick or too severely wounded safely to endure the fatigues of transportation is allowed to go on. But the fault lies entirely with the North, which persists in sending such prisoners across the lines. Some exchange must be made; and as the Confederates can hardly be asked to exchange convalescent for incurable invalids, we do not know how they can do otherwise than return in kind the horrible courtesies of the enemy.

Charges and counter-charges of maltreatment of prisoners are made on both sides. Without entering into details, we call the attention of our readers to a few principal facts on this subject. First.—It is proved by the unexceptionable testimony of Colonel Fremantle and a host of concurrent witnesses, that Yankee prisoners are never insulted or reviled in the South, either by the army or by the people: while it is notorious that the Confederate prisoners have on more than one occasion been actually mobbed by the Northern rabble, and with difficulty rescued by their military guard. Second.—The prisoners at Richmond are lodged in the tobacco-warehouses of that city—the best accommodation that it affords, being necessarily weather-tight, and, by the nature of their ordinary contents, free from vermin. Third.—They are, according to abundant evidence, quite as well tended when sick or wounded, both by Southern doctors and by Southern ladies, as the Confederate soldiers; and this at a time when the North declares medicines contraband of war. Fourth.—It is notorious that Confederate prisoners in Northern hospitals have been treated with the most cruel neglect, and on some occasions brutally insulted by women, the wives of Northern officers, even in their last moments. Fifth.—The prisoners at Richmond are as well fed as Confederate soldiers, as well as the supplies available will allow; and it has been confessed by Northern newspapers that the assertion put forward by the Federal Government, that it had been refused permission to send rations to them, was an utter and unmitigated falsehood; the only thing refused being permission to send Federal spies in charge of those rations. Sixth.—No personal constraint or ill-usage has been put on any Yankee officers prisoners in the South. Southern officers in the North, on the contrary, have been subjected to the foulest outrages. General Morgan, one of the most brilliant officers in the Confederacy—the Garibaldi of America—is at this moment confined as a felon, having been taken prisoner during an invasion of Ohio. The United States Government being called to account for this atrocity, replied that General Morgan was thus treated in retaliation for the similar usage of one Colonel Straight, captured by the Confederates. It was answered that Colonel Straight was in no way treated differently from any other prisoner of war; whereupon the Federal authorities withdrew their former answer, admitting it to be a lie, and declared that General Morgan was not in their custody, but in that of the State of Ohio! We waive all comment on this story; it is in itself a sufficient comment on the allegations of the Federal advocates, and a complete answer to all their complaints as to the treatment of Yankee prisoners in the Confederate States.

The Negro's Place in Nature.

THE very able, learned, and truly philosophic paper lately read by Dr. Hunt before the Anthropological Society, and which was published in the last two numbers of THE INDEX, cannot fail to command the critical attention of the scientific world, and the consequent discussion thereon will, it is to be hoped, do much towards solving the problem on which it treats. But it will be unfortunate if only those who are professed anthropologists should give heed to this valuable contribution to a hitherto greatly neglected, but highly important, subject. In the investigation of the negro's place in nature the statesman, the philanthropist, and the Christian are not less interested than the philosopher. The truism that nothing has been created in vain, is especially applicable to man, the noblest work of the Creator. In the same country and among the same race there are diversities of gifts, and the general welfare of the community is best advanced, not by vainly striving to bring about an equality, but by each class occupying itself in the sphere of usefulness for which it is especially adapted. And this principle appertains to all the different races that inhabit the earth. The golden rule for the individual, for the nation, for all the peoples of the globe, is, that happiness and progress depend upon the right man being in the right place. Dr. Hunt justly deprecates the misery that has arisen from ignorance and neglect of this law, and from this cause the negro has suffered more than any other race. Instead, then, of using the negro as a political shuttlecock; it is the bounden duty of all those who desire to promote his welfare to first find out his proper place in nature, and then to employ all legitimate means to see that he is where he should be.

But this inquiry cannot be prosecuted with any measure of success unless we are actuated by the motive that evidently prompted Dr. Hunt—an earnest, single desire to discover the truth. So long as the beam of prejudice is in the eye we cannot discern the truth, be it ever so palpable and manifest to the unclouded vision. We are never tired of reciting the marvellous progress of physical science since the days of Bacon. To what do we owe the mighty revolution? To what do we owe the wonders of modern chemistry, and the steam-engine, and the electric telegraph? To men of science becoming teachable instead of continuing dogmatic, and instead of seeking for facts to support pet theories, that they discarded all theories that were not based upon ascertained facts. If we adopt the like course with respect to moral and social science, the results will be equally satisfactory. In proof of this we may adduce the essay we are considering. Dr. Hunt's facts, taken separately, are sometimes antagonistic to favourite theories, but yet the impartial conclusions derived from the whole of them are evidently true and useful, and so far from distressing are eminently calculated to comfort and reassure the philanthropist.

The leading facts about the negro are few in number, but they are sufficient to enable us to discern clearly his place in nature. The anatomist points out the differences between the conformation of the negro and the white races, and tells us that the brain of the negro is of smaller capacity. This class of evidence, though very important, is principally useful as an explanation of other phenomena. If anatomists had been silent we should still have known that the negro is inferior to the white man, though we should not have been aware of the immediate organic cause. If the negro race had been equal or nearly equal to other races, it would, like them, have had an independent history; but the negro has no history. When we trace his existence out of Africa in all ages we find him occupying a servile position, and at home his existence has been a blank. The negroes have never done anything in literature or science, not even to the extent of inventing a grammar. How is this? The negro has increased and multiplied as fast as other races and has had the same extraneous advantages. There is no other explanation than that the negro is indubitably inferior in intellect.

The next fact which we have to look at is the condition of the race in Africa. It is utterly impossible to exaggerate the savage barbarity and the utter degradation of the negro at home. Upon this point we have ample and concurrent testimony. Slavery of the most hideous kind prevails; human sacrifices are the rule, not the exception, and there is an almost inconceivable depth of immorality. All the accounts we have from numerous and intelligent travellers are truly horrible. And moreover, the numerous efforts that have been made to civilise and Christianise the negro in Africa have proved disastrous failures. It is, of course, not to be inferred from this that we should cease our endeavours, but the fact assists us in arriving at a conclusion as to the negro's place in nature.

What in modern times has been the condition of the negro abroad? In the West Indies the experiment has been tried of giving the negro full independence, and the result has been that a garden has become a wilderness, because the negro, except under compulsion, will not labour. In the Confederate States the negro race has been in subordination to the white race, and the result is, that it has made wonderful progress—that the savage has become a docile labourer, and that the heathen has become a Christian.

What, then, is the conclusion from these facts? Not, perhaps, that the negro should remain in perpetual slavery, but surely that the guidance and the intellect and the will of the white man are indispensable to him.

The negro is far from being devoid of good qualities. In the Confederate States we see that the domestic virtues may be instilled into him, and that he, like the rest of mankind, is capable of receiving and profiting by the Christian religion. If any better kind of subordination can be devised than the de facto, not the theoretical, system of slavery which exists in the South, by all means let that plan be propounded. But it must be apparent to the philanthropist and the Christian that the best condition of life in which the negro has until now been placed is that in which he is found in the Confederate States. Let it be distinctly understood that we are not engaged in defending or even in treating of slavery in the abstract. It would be illogical for us to assert from the above premises that the peculiar institution of the South is the only system that meets the requirements of the negro. What we do say is, that for the negro to be happy and useful he must be in immediate subordination to a superior race. And it is right that we should remark that we do not pretend to speculate as to the future of the negro. We take him as he is. So wonderful has been the progress of the coloured race under the mild, humane, and Christian rule of the Southerners, it has so greatly improved physically and morally, it has become so Christianised, and all in the space of half a century, that, supposing that the negro does not become the victim of New England cupidity, there is a fair prospect, not of the coloured race becoming the equal of the white race, but of so improving as to make the very mildest form of subordination sufficient.

One of the prejudices that makes the reception of the truth about the negro very difficult is, that—intellectual and social equality are indispensable to happiness, and, therefore, to admit that the negro must always be in subordination to the white race is to condemn him to perpetual unhappiness. There never was a prejudice more unfounded. Is the child under proper control less happy than the urchin of the streets of London who is free from all control? Or to take a more general illustration. It will be conceded that women are less intellectual than men, and that physically, politically, and even socially, they are subordinate to the sex which is physically and intellectually stronger. But are women, therefore, unhappy? Would women be happier if the Yankee notion of the equality of the sexes was carried out? On the contrary, society would suffer from women being taken from their proper sphere of subordination, and women would be less happy. We are not, of course, instituting any comparison between women and negroes, but only showing that intellectual inferiority, and consequent physical, political, and social subordination, are not incompatible with happiness, which does not consist in equality, but in each one performing the part adapted to his or her capacity.

Illustrations are however hardly necessary, because we have the negro in the Confederate States in subordination to the white race, and we can see how he fares under such circumstances. In Africa, as we have already observed, the negro is a savage and a heathen, and in a state of inconceivable degradation. In the West Indies he is idle and dissolute. In the Southern States he is, so every traveller avers, industrious, thriving and Christianised; there is not on the face of the earth a class of labourers so happy. All his wants are supplied, and he enjoys the comforts of religion. What more can the Christian or the philanthropist desire for him? Do we want the negro to continue as he is in Africa, a savage and a heathen? Do we want him to be as he is in the West Indies, a curse and an encumbrance? The philanthropist and the Christian must reply that it is better that he should be as he is in the Southern States, blest and a blessing. We may admit then, whether we are or are not emancipationists, fully and without hesitation, the conclusions that are suggested by Dr. Hunt's painstaking and clever essay. The negro's place in nature is in subordination to the white race; but let us be glad, that subordination, the result of intellectual inferiority, does not preclude happiness in this world, and thank God that no intellectual qualification is necessary for eternal Salvation.

LIEUT.-COL. FREMANTLE ON THE SOUTH.*

WITH his eyes open, and without hunting for queer sights and listening for queer stories to make matter for a book, Colonel Fremantle passed three months in the Confederate States. What he saw—he tells very little of what he heard—he jotted down, as occasion served, in a diary, and this diary he has published without any dressing, and with very few comments and opinions of his own. Colonel Fremantle is, so far as the transatlantic struggle is concerned, a representative Englishman. When the war broke out he was neutral, with a slight bias in favour of the North, because of the Southern institution of slavery; but as the war went on he became disgusted with the conduct of the Northerners, and felt an earnest sympathy with the gallantry and determination of the Southerners. His visit to the Confederate States has fully confirmed his favourable impression of the people who are now, at great odds and without a friend in the world—we mean a friend who renders any practical aid—fighting right nobly the battle of national independence. We warn the Federal Government to do what they can to perfect the blockade. If the South were open to travellers, if other people could readily perform the journey accomplished by Colonel Fremantle, and the Confederate States could be seen as they are, we venture to say that the moral sympathy for the Confederates would become so strong, and the detestation of Federal duplicity would become so intense, that it would be considered infamous, as it is now considered unmanly and ungentlemanly, to side with the North, and not to cordially wish the South success. Thousands, however, will read the impartial testimony of Colonel Fremantle, and none but Northern hirelings can do so without their hearts paying a tribute of admiration to the nation that is now being tried in the furnace of affliction, and which scornfully refuses to purchase immunity from suffering by surrendering the liberties bequeathed to them by and purchased by the blood of their English forefathers. It is not so much republican institutions that are on trial, as whether the freedom of the English race is stout enough to repel the assaults of mercenary hordes, led by men who, under the guidance of a sham fanaticism, are striving to found a despotism which will not fail to reward their zeal with the spoils of the vanquished.

Colonel Fremantle arrived at Brownsville on the 2nd of April, and after passing a few days between that town and Matamoras, he set out on his journey through Texas on the 13th of the month. He travelled in a four-wheeled carriage covered with a canvas roof, and drawn by four mules. His companions were Mr. McCarthy, a merchant, and a Hebrew merchant. His driver, Sargent, is an eccentric character, but not more so than the assistant mule-driver called the "Judge," and who really was a magistrate in his own district. Sargent and the Judge were a little too fond of strong liquors to be pleasant servitors, and embraced every opportunity of getting drunk and quarrelling. Mule travelling over bad roads is slow and monotonous work. From morning to night the driver was swearing profusely at the animals, except when he was beating them, but neither oaths nor whip increased their speed. The Judge rode in front on a sorry nag, for the purpose of encouraging the mules, but the device was not very effective. Mr. Sargent is, however, a patriot after his kind, and over and over again expressed his regret that he had not the opportunity of driving Uncle Abe. Our author says: "His idea of perfect happiness seems to be to have Messrs. Lincoln and Seward in the shafts." And so far as hatred of the North and devotion to the South are concerned, Mr. Sargent was a rough type of all the persons Colonel Fremantle encountered in Texas. In the whole of the vast wild region of Texas there was no Union sentiment to be found, except, perhaps, in Brownsville, which being a border town, was to some extent infected by intercourse with the dregs of Mexican society. At San Antonio Colonel Fremantle parted with the mule conveyance. Mr. Sargent and the Judge got drunk on the occasion, and the former told a story of how he cruelly treated a refractory negro girl, much to the disgust of the colonel's companions. On this our author remarks "Mr. Sargent is a Northerner by birth, and is without any of the kind feeling which is nearly always felt by Southerners for negroes." The negroes are aware of this, and dread nothing so much as passing under the dominion of a Yankee immigrant. In this journal we had lately occasion to narrate from a Northern official report, how infamously the Federal contractors were treating the negroes they had seized on some model plantations, of which they had military possession, in Louisiana. Colonel Fremantle noticed the good feeling subsisting between the negroes and their masters; and that the Southerners talked to him freely about their peculiar institution, and wished him to see as much of it as he could, so that he might learn from observation how grossly the Northerners have slandered them. He took advantage of these offers. When in Mississippi, he says:—

"I asked Mr. Harrold to take me over the quarters of his slaves, which he did immediately. The huts were comfortable and very clean; the negroes seemed fond of their master, but he told me they were suffering dreadfully from the effects of the war—he had so much difficulty in providing them with clothes and shoes. I saw an old woman in one of the huts, who had been suffering from an incurable disease for thirteen years, and was utterly useless. She was evidently well cared for, and was treated with affection and care. At all events, she must have benefited largely by the 'peculiar institution.' I have often told these planters that I thought the word 'slave' was the most repulsive part of the institution, and I have always observed they invariably shirk using it themselves. They speak of their servant, their boy, or their negroes, but never of their slaves. They address a negro as boy or girl, or uncle or aunty."

The colonel was told that "A man who is known to ill-treat his negroes is hated by all the rest of the community." Now, ill-treating a negro does not mean whipping him after the manner of a Legree, or, indeed, whipping him at all, but that he is not treated with tender consideration and paternal kindness. To ill-treat negroes in the way represented by Northern slanderers is an offence unknown in the South, and not to care for all the negro's wants, not to use them kindly, not to be solicitous to promote their happiness, are offences of rare occurrence, which are punished by the bitter contempt of the community.

Our author considers the Texans good soldiers, and he tells a curious anecdote about them. He says:—"At the outbreak of the war it was found very difficult to raise infantry in Texas, as no Texan walks a yard if he can help it. Many mounted regiments were therefore organised and afterwards dismounted." We believe that this case is unique, which is not so with an incident which occurred in Alabama, where it is reported a gentleman raised a troop of dragoons, and was obliged to embody them in the infantry because horses were not forthcoming on which to mount them. Whilst Colonel Fremantle was in Brownsville he was unpleasantly impressed with a case of lynching, though it must be confessed the victim deserved the gallows; but, as our author saw more of the people, he found that this kind of rude justice was confined to the borders, that he was as safe as he would have been in London; and that in the event of a quarrel it would have been a point of honour to defend the stranger. He found that the roughness of the Texan clothed hearty good-nature; he found that the Southerners, though ready to resent an insult, regarded it as a crime to give one without just cause, and he also remarked that, though it is the fashion to carry arms and to settle a quarrel by a duel, quarrels were very rare, and duels very infrequent. Duelling, no doubt, is a check upon malconduct.

On the 11th of May, Colonel Fremantle reached Louisiana, being thus nearly a month in passing through Texas. To overrun such a country will require a larger army than General Banks has at his command; and considering the animosity of the Texans, its subjugation and military occupation are simply impossible. With some difficulty our author crossed the Mississippi, and as soon as he was over heard that the Federals were in possession of Jackson, and shortly afterwards that they had evacuated the place, which he then determined to visit. He proceeded by railway till within nine miles of the town, where the railway track was torn up, and he had to go on foot the rest of the distance; a boy on horseback carrying his saddlebags. He had not been long in the place when he was arrested by a Mr. Smythe, who could not understand why a British officer should choose to visit Jackson under such circumstances, and he was taken to the Bowmont Hotel to be examined by some citizens who had just been plundered by the enemy. They thought he was "mighty young" for a lieutenant-colonel, and evidently made up their minds he was a spy. "Every thing," says our author, "now looked very threatening, and it became evident to me that nothing would relieve the minds of these men as a hanging match. I looked in vain for some one to take my part, and I could not even get any person to examine my papers." At this crisis, an Irishman, named Dr. Russell, came in, examined his papers, and pronounced them genuine. Even this did not satisfy the citizens, and an officer—Captain Yerger—was sent for, who at once released him from his unpleasant situation. The citizens were then satisfied, and "insisted on shaking hands, and 'liquoring up' in horrible whisky"—except Smythe, who would not relent, and who still believed our author was a spy. Federal partisans have sought to discredit Southern accounts of Northern outrages in Jackson, we will therefore cite the testimony of Colonel Fremantle, who was an eyewitness:—

"Jackson, the capital of the State of Mississippi, is a place of great importance. Four railroads meet here, and have been destroyed in each direction for a distance of from three to five miles. All the numerous factories have been burnt down by the enemy, who were of course justified in doing so; but during the short space of thirty-six hours, in which General Grant occupied the city, his troops had wantonly pillaged nearly all the private houses. They had gutted all the stores, and destroyed what they could not carry away. All this must have been done under the very eyes of General Grant, whose name was in the book of the Bowmont House Hotel. I saw the ruins of the Roman Catholic church, the priest's house, and the principal hotel, which were still smoking, together with many other buildings which could in no way be identified with the Confederate Government. The whole town was a miserable wreck, and presented a deplorable aspect. Nothing could exceed the intense hatred and fury with which its excited citizens speak of the outrages they have undergone—for their desire for a bloody revenge, and of their hope that the Black Flag might be raised."

When our author reached the head-quarters of General J. E. Johnston, Vicksburg was closely invested by Grant with 75,000 men, and the Confederate commander had but 11,000 men, hardly any cavalry, and only sixteen pieces of cannon. This accounts for what newspaper critics call Johnston's inactivity. Colonel Fremantle, foreseeing that nothing would be done against Vicksburg, continued his journey, stopping at every camp in his way, and having at all times facilities afforded him for observing the condition of military affairs and the morale of the troops. A lieutenant-colonel of the Coldstream Guards is, we may be sure, somewhat hypercritical with respect to drill and discipline, and we are, therefore, surprised at the few faults our author finds with the Confederate army, which, though baptised in blood, is still a new army. He condemns the practice of straggling, and ascribes it to the officers not halting their men frequently enough and halting them for too long a time. He found some troops that were reviewed before him could not be put through the manual, that is to say, they had only been taught those evolutions which are of service to them in the present war. He also says that in his opinion the Confederates have reaped so few advantages from their numerous victories, because, when the battle was gained, the Confederate soldiers thought their task was over, and became to some extent disorganised. We are happy to have the colonel's word that this fault is being mended. From the views our author gives us of the mode of life among the Confederate officers, it appears that distinction of rank does not imply much difference in comfort, and that luxuries are unknown. The private and general fare very much alike. For instance, General Johnston and his staff had one fork between them, and this was politely placed at the service of the guest. And the officers have their full share of the dangers as well as of the hardships of the campaign. They literally lead their men into action, and their influence greatly depends upon the manifestation of unflinching pluck. Colonel Grenfell, an Englishman in the Confederate army, says, "every atom of authority has to be purchased by a drop of your blood." Yet the Confederate soldiers are not only distinguished by their physical endurance and their dauntless courage. Everywhere the colonel saw evidences of deep-felt and unostentatious piety. In a word, he found the Confederate army was, in the highest and best sense, an army of patriots. Nor can we be surprised at the spirit of the troops when we learn how self-sacrificing are the people. General Polk relates that a woman in humble circumstances lost three sons in battle, and that she had only one left, a boy of sixteen. Under these circumstances he went to comfort her. The bereaved mother replied to his condolences by observing, "As soon as I can get a few things together you shall have Harry too." When General Polk told this affecting story tears came into his eyes, and he asked, "How can you subdue such a nation as this?" The book before us abounds with evidences of long-suffering and heroic determination. Our author says that the wounded are not discharged but only get leave of absence, and that the women hurry them back to the field as soon as possible; that the wounded and maimed are not exempted from labour, and that he saw a man who had had both hands blown off, with a curry-comb and brush fitted into his stumps, engaged in grooming artillery horses with considerable skill; that he met boys of sixteen who "were minus arms and legs, of which deficiencies they evidently were very vain." He tells us that "the obedience of the soldiers and their forbearance in success, their discipline under disaster, their patience under suffering, under hardships, or when wounded, and their boundless devotion to their country under all circumstances, are beyond all praise." As for the patriotism manifested by the women of the South, no words can do it justice. No wonder the colonel should believe in the future of the Confederate States. There is no lack in the South, he tells us, of military stores. The Southerners, unlike the Northerners, are ready to fight, and the natural increase of the population will, says our author, in the opinion of Confederates, enable them "to keep their armies recruited up to their present strength for several years; and if the worst comes to the worst they can always fall back upon their negroes as a last resort; but I do not think they contemplate such a necessity as likely to arise for a considerable time." Upon this question Colonel Fremantle says:—

"The more I think of all that I have seen in the Confederate States of the devotion of the whole population, the more I feel inclined to say with General Polk—How can you subjugate such a people as this? and even supposing that their extermination were a feasible plan, as some Northerners have suggested, I never can believe that in the nineteenth century the civilised world will be condemned to witness the destruction of such a gallant race."

Our author bears emphatic witness to the perfect civil freedom that prevails in the midst of war. Colonel Grenfell, already referred to, is a pet with the army, but that did not save him from a sharp and even harsh civil prosecution. Our author notes, "I find it is a great mistake to suppose that the press is gagged in the South, as I constantly see the most violent attacks upon the President, upon the different generals and their measures, * * * Most certainly the civil law is not overruled by the military, except in cases of the strongest emergency. The press is allowed unlimited freedom and even license."

The colonel gives a pleasant account of his visit to Richmond, where he was courteously received by Mr. Benjamin and the President. Mr. Davis expressed great commiseration with the sufferings of his fellow-countrymen:—

"When I spoke to him of the wretched scenes I had witnessed in his own State (Mississippi), and of the miserable, almost desperate, situation in which I had found so many unfortunate women, who had been left behind by their male relations, and when I alluded in admiration to the quiet, calm, uncomplaining manner in which they bore their sufferings and their grief, he said, with much feeling, that he always considered silent despair the most painful description of misery to witness, in the same way that he thought mute insanity was the most awful form of madness."

In reference to the oft-refuted charge of Federal prisoners being ill-treated, our author says, "notwithstanding the exasperation with which every Southerner speaks of a Yankee, and all the talk about the black flag and no quarter, yet I never saw a Federal prisoner ill-treated or insulted in any way, although I have travelled hundreds of miles in their company." Upon this subject the President remarked to Colonel Fremantle, that although there had been a black-flag-and-no-quarter agitation, "I have yet to hear of Confederate soldiers putting men to death who have thrown down their arms and held up their hands."

Upon the narrative of the campaign in Pennsylvania and the battle of Gettysburg we do not comment, as it was noticed by us when it appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, but it will be read with renewed zest in this present volume.

We pity the Northern critic who is ordered to cut this book up. Indeed, it cannot be done effectively, though an effort must be made, because it is a book that will increase the sympathy for the South, and, if it were possible, add to the contempt felt for the North by all that is respectable and honest in Europe. When a distinguished English officer says he saw so and so, the bare denial of a thousand Federal partisans will be of no avail; and yet, what Lieutenant-Colonel Fremantle saw is honourable to the Confederates, and is full of promise of ultimate triumph. Nor can the partisan critic fall back upon the style of the book. He is denied this poor consolation, for it is written in excellent English. The description of the journey through Texas would not discredit the pen of a Dickens, so far as the lifelike humour is concerned; and the description of Gettysburg has already been pronounced one of the most graphic accounts of an American battle hitherto published. Although Colonel Fremantle's narrative is one of the best and truest books that have appeared on the war, and while it will gratify the people of the Confederate States, and show them that the sympathies of Englishmen must not be judged by the actions of our Government, it will, we are sure, be heartily welcomed by our countrymen as a worthy exposition of their sentiments.

THE "DAILY NEWS" AND YANKEE LYING.—As probably the most disgraceful case of impertinence and wilful falsehood that has ever occurred in English journalism, we put on record the following paragraph from the Daily News of to-day:—

We have received from Mr. BERESFORD HOPE the Constitution of the Southern Independence Association:

It is unnecessary to inform our readers that the names, in the connection in which they are used, are wholly supposititious. The Daily News publishes elsewhere the "Constitution of the Southern Independence Association," "received from Mr. Beresford Hope," and the remark by which it introduces its gratuitous invention is, therefore, more than the insinuation of a lie: it is the lie direct.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

RICHMOND, November 7.

It is absolutely impossible for anybody, however well acquainted with the geography of the country, to form a correct idea of what is passing in the neighbourhood of Chattanooga from the telegrams, always vague, often absurd and contradictory, which we receive daily from that quarter. Heavy fighting took place in Lookout Valley on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday of last week, the 28th, 29th and 30th of October, with what actual results, between what particular corps, under what plan of battle, we are but very poorly advised. As far as can be gathered from the confused accounts that have been published in Confederate journals, and a careful comparison of these with the statements of Yankee correspondents, the res gesta were after the manner following, to wit:—On the night of Monday, the 26th ultimo, the enemy sent a strong force two miles or more down the river, to a point at which there had been a ferry, where they landed; and finding the Confederate pickets, both videttes and infantry, asleep, quietly made them prisoners, and proceeded to occupy a hill near by. A single sentry, "faithful found among the faithless," fired his gun, and roused a regiment, which quickly formed ranks and fought the Yankees for a short time, till overpowered, and then fell back. A bridge was immediately thrown across the river at the deserted ferry, and there poured over regiment after regiment of Yankees, cavalry, infantry, and artillery, and before the light of Tuesday morning was strong enough to enable our men on Lookout Mountain to descry the country below them with distinctness, the opposing hillside was covered with earthworks and almost bristled with batteries. It is said that General Bragg at first supposed that this energetic movement of the enemy was made to cover the retreat of the main body of the army from Chattanooga, but they did not permit him to remain long under this delusion. A column from the command of Fighting Joe Hooker was marched up the river-side from Bridgeport, and a second bridge was constructed near Shell Mound, twelve or fifteen miles distant from Chattanooga. Meanwhile an attack was ordered on the enemy to dislodge them from their position assumed on the night of the 26th, and if possible regain the ferry. The attack was made with great gallantry by the brigade of General Jenkins on the 29th, and was for the time successful, but large reinforcements continually arriving from the main body of Thomas, our troops were at last driven back. A pouring rain, which set in on Thursday, and continued without intermission for forty-eight hours, would seem to have put a stop to the fighting; and with the rain all intelligence from our army abated. The Tennessee river was in flood, and the Plavii Hyades might be accepted as welcome allies of Longstreet; but although the enemy's bridges were swept away, and they must have suffered other considerable damage from the storm, we hear that they still maintained their foothold on the Southern bank, and the only cheerful news is that our troops were in excellent condition notwithstanding their drenching, and desired nothing better than to engage the Yankees again in the open field. It is undeniable that the enemy's advantage in these operations has been great and decided. We need say nothing of the casualties in the skirmishes which took place. We may suppose, indeed, that their loss in killed and wounded largely exceeded our own, though the reverse is probably the fact. It remains that the Yankees have undisputed possession of the river on both sides, from Bridgeport to the ferry, and are no longer dependent, as heretofore, upon the railroad for their supplies. Their troops now rejoice in full rations. They can convey subsistence by water to a point within two-and-a-half miles of Chattanooga. If it pleases Grant so to do, he may winter in that city without further foreboding about his commissariat. The great end for which the battle of Chickamauga was fought—the expulsion of the Yankees from Tennessee—has therefore been lost for a considerable time to come. Indeed, it is believed that Bragg will be compelled speedily to fall back upon Rome, in Northern Georgia, and the Richmond reader takes up his newspaper in the morning with the uncomfortable misgiving that he will find in the telegraphic column the tidings that this retrograde movement has been commenced. The advance of the enemy in powerful columns will be mute without loss of time to take Atlanta, and the great battle of the River of Death will have to be fought over again on another field.

This is, indeed, discouraging—the more so, as the feeling is strong, both with the army and the people, that had not Bragg been in the chief command, the army of Moscares would have been driven out of Tennessee before another general had arrived at head-quarters. It matters little whether this conviction is well or ill founded. That it is deep-rooted and abiding is enough almost to paralyse the usefulness of General Bragg in the future. Nor can it be concealed that the popular heart is profoundly moved against President Davis for his persistent retention of General Bragg at the head of the Army of Tennessee. The people of the Confederate States greatly admire and respect their chief magistrate, as has been shown in the spontaneous expressions of good feeling which have attended his recent journeyings from point to point in the South-west. They know him to be pure, able, fearless incorruptible, and they rejoice that he stands before the world in strong and effective contrast to the coarse creature who rules at Washington, and tempers his despotism, not with epigrams, but with the ribaldry of the flatboatman. It is with great reluctance that they are compelled to regard his firmness in friendship as verging upon obstinacy. Not to yield to popular clamour is one thing; utterly to disregard the unanimous sentiment of a great people is quite another. I confess I write with some restraint on this matter, which is handled by the acute and vigorous journalists of the opposition press with a freedom that sufficiently proves the unrestricted license of printing in the Confederate States, and closely resembles the lively manner in which Peter Plymley of old celebrated the personal worth and domestic virtues of Mr. Percival and Mr. Canning; but, as a veracious correspondent, I cannot but record the growing dissatisfaction of the people with the President's course as connected with General Bragg, and I am very confident that this feeling will be made manifest at an early period of the approaching session of Congress.

The bombardment of Sumter goes on with unabated wrath and expenditure of ammunition. At the expiration of the war we shall probably have iron enough among the ruins of the dismantled fortification to re-lay all the railroads in the Southern States and sheathe with armour all the new vessels of war of the Confederate navy. The latest telegram gives us the pleasing information that the cannonade has reduced the walls of Sumter to a condition in which every new shot that strikes but adds to the strength of the work, and increases our ability to hold it. The sight of the Confederate flag high above the debris, still unfolding its pure field to the sea-breeze, and flaunting that battle cross which has become an object of terror to the Yankees on the land, is galling to the hosts that swarm on Morris Island; and the letter-writers from the fleet describe with admirable minuteness the appearance of the streets of Charleston and the provoking composure with which the citizens saunter along the Battery Promenade and look into the open throats of Gilmore's guns. They still declare that Charleston shall become "a mass of fire-scorched and crumbling ruins," and their threats may possibly be carried out to the letter, but as the siege is protracted, the spirit of the defenders of the place rises higher and higher, and the lofty words of President Davis, in response to the speech of welcome made by Mayor Macbeth, met with an enthusiastic response in the breasts of the Charlestonians. The indications now are that the destruction of the city by the Yankees will be attempted during next week, when the "Swamp Angel" and the monster parrots and all the tremendous ordnance of Gregg and Wagner will be opened with "such a bombardment" (so the Yankees boast) "as the wars of the world have not yet paralleled." Wonderful Yankees! They have the greatest "Rebellion" to manage that the world has yet seen; they have accumulated the largest debt that ever nation yet assumed to pay, and the collapse of their Republic, which is not distant, will enable them to brag of the most magnificent "burst-up" that the indignant muse of history has yet been called upon to record. If bigness constituted greatness, if size were synonymous with strength, if multitude meant the same thing with might, then would they be the most extraordinary people on the face of the earth, except, perhaps, the Chinese.

The army of General Lee remains on the line of the Rapidan, and nothing has been done since the date of my last letter on either side to indicate an approaching general engagement. There is an evident pressure on Meade to attempt the reduction of Richmond within the "ninety days," and should he make no movement, he may possibly be removed from the command. Rumours have obtained of the landing of a large force at Newport News, and of the appearance of the Yankees in dark masses on the hills of Stafford, opposite Fredericksburg; but it is not probable that the enemy will soon try either of these different roads again; and any demonstration they may make in either quarter will be a feint to cover the serious design elsewhere. The great battle for Richmond may yet be fought in the Peninsula, and I have long been of opinion that this will be the ground of the enemy's final effort for the capital—but not yet. If troops are landing in force at Newport News, which is by no means certain, I shall expect an attack on Weldon, North Carolina; if flocks of blue-birds cover the Stafford heights, from which Burnside with an opera-glass saw his legions mown down last year, it means an advance upon the position of General Lee; a little time will show.

There is something like a panic just now in Richmond, in connection with the matter of food. Flour is offered for sale in very small quantities, and brings $120 a barrel. The belief gains strength every day that the stock on hand is nearly exhausted, and that the high price is due in chief to stint in the article. I cannot think so. Defective railway transportation and the Government impressments of produce have brought down the supply of flour on sale or storage in Richmond to a minimum never before reached, but I am confident that there is grain enough in the country, nay, even in Virginia, to avert famine, and that a judicious policy on the part of the authorities will bring it into town. The steady depreciation of the currency must not be left out of the account in regarding this enormous price for flour. Property of all kinds, real and personal, necessities and luxuries, all that we eat, drink and wear, can be produced only by paying largely of Mr. Memminger's issues. A piano-forte last week sold for $3000; a lady's bonnet for $800; brandy brings $200 the gallon, and the like measure of oysters $12. You will recollect Sidney Smith's sad reflection at Combe Florey (I believe) that he was twelve miles from a lemon; our case is even more distressing; the lemons are here in abundance, but he who would have punch must pay $5 a-piece for them.

There is a "sensational" account in the local columns of the daily papers of a plot, happily discovered in time, among the Yankee prisoners, to rise upon the guard on Belle-Isle, night before last, arm themselves and take the city, liberating the officers from the Libby Prison, and inviting the General at Fortress Monroe to walk in and occupy the seat of the Confederate Government. One of the sentries overheard a conversation among the prisoners, in which vague threats were thrown out of an intended revolt, and doubly efficient measures were very properly taken to prevent such a thing on the night in question; but the talk of the prisoners was probably an idle menace. At all events Richmond is not to be taken by these "interesting captives."

The President was expected home last night by the regular train from the South, and a large multitude, with military escort and music, assembled at the Southern Depot (as we call the railway station) to greet him; but his Excellency did not arrive, and soldiers and citizens dispersed in disappointment. He will probably reach town this evening by special train from Wilmington.

The weather is very charming—we are under the soft sway of the Indian summer—and all nature is beautiful in its radiance.

THE MARYLAND ELECTIONS.

(From the Richmond Examiner, November 11.)

SOMEONE has defined the French monarchy to have been a despotism tempered by epigrams. It is unfortunate that as much cannot be said for the arbitrary Power which arrays itself complacently in the robes of republicanism upon the other side of the Potomac. Occasionally, it is true, a covert sarcasm or a serious diatribe is indulged in by Opposition journals; but the satire lacks the raciness only to be drawn from an atmosphere untainted by the dread of punishment, and the invective generally smacks of the passion which is born of personal disappointment. The sharp edge of mocking ridicule, and the point of scornful wit, and the eloquence of intellectual indignation, are wanting. The country is not yet sufficiently habituated to willing slavery to have acquired that stoical philosophy peculiar to absolute governments, in which prudent submission is blended with dexterous ratiocination, and the sting of oppression mitigated by the palliative of the suppressed yet visible contempt which belongs to "light philosophy."

Had not the sense of the ridiculous yielded in that people to the imperious voice of self-interest, or been stifled by the fear of their rulers, we cannot imagine that they would gravely chronicle the result of the recent elections in Maryland, and intone the song of triumph upon that "Union" victory. Cicero said he could never understand how two soothsayers could look upon each other without laughing. Is it possible to understand how Lincoln, Seward, Bradford, and their allies can congratulate each other on the victory in Maryland without a quiet grin? There must certainly be a roguish twinkle of the eye, an expression of that placid happiness with which Fagin witnessed the skilful performance of the Artful Dodger, and hailed the improvement of Oliver in the noble art of picking pockets.

The election is heralded throughout the land as a triumph of the glorious cause of the Union. Not a smile is observed upon the face of the press, and a superficial observer is puzzled. He thinks, perhaps, the people have no appreciation of a joke. This is an entire mistake. They possess that highest style of humour which delights in the most grotesque ideas with redoubled gravity of countenance. Even now they chuckle at the astonishment of the outer world while observing the great change of sentiment in Maryland, or else they scream with private laughter when the old fogies of Europe, taking it seriously, descend upon the tyranny which forces an expression of popular will.

The Yankees may enjoy this triumph at the expense of Europe, but they need not flatter themselves that the people of the South are to be hoodwinked in that way. We can appreciate a joke even if we do not admire the spirit that gives it birth. Practical jests, according to Macaulay, are indications of a bad heart. We are inclined to that opinion; and even if we laugh at the absurdity of a mock election it is because we are disgusted at the tyranny which requires it. The absurdity of an election, in a State where the whole Legislature was imprisoned on the suspicion that it was going to oppose the Government, strikes forcibly on the attention. The exquisite humour of proclaiming universal suffrage and guaranteeing freedom of opinion by the use of the ballot, and at the same time imposing a preliminary test-oath of loyalty, is thoroughly appreciated, yet we think of those who are unfortunately doomed to look upon the reverse of the medal, and we cannot fully yield ourselves to "laughter, shaking both his sides." Lincoln, the American Æsop, might surely concoct a story, with a moral to it, on this peculiar exhibition of American liberty. For the present, however, political reasons will restrict its circulation to a few chosen friends. The world in general must wait for his posthumous memoirs in order to enjoy it.

FEDERAL KIDNAPPING IN CANADA.

Our usually quiet village was on Saturday morning last thrown into an unusual state of excitement, consequent upon the disappearance of an American by the name of Joseph Lackey, who had been for the past three or four months in the employ of Mr. Thomas B. Carpenter, proprietor of the International Hotel in this village. From the rumours now in circulation, it appears that Lackey had deserted from the Federal army of the United States, was captured, court-martialled, and sentenced to be shot, and that while waiting the execution of his sentence he again made his escape. Rumour further says, that a reward of $1,000 is offered for his apprehension by the Federal authorities. During the morning of Saturday it was ascertained that Mr. Carpenter had received a letter in reference to Lackey, of which the following is an exact copy:—"Thomas Carpenter, Esq.: Dear sir,—Will you do me the favour to say to Mr. Joseph Lackey that I will be at your place on Friday afternoon, and I want him to be there to take a trip with me into the French country to do some business? And if he is out of town when you get this, you will please send after him and have him there ready, without fail, and oblige, respectfully yours, (signed) H. P. Duclos." The letter, as you will see, is without date, and was received by Mr. Carpenter on the 12th inst. On the following day Mr. H. P. Duclos, of St. Albans, Vermont, came to Mr. Carpenter's office. Quite late in the afternoon of the same day, Mr. Duclos took Mr. Lackey into his wagon, and saying he had to go by Seaton's (namely, of Abercorn, Sutton,) as he, Duclos, had some business with Mr. Seaton, the Collector of Customs of that village, they went to Sutton. Subsequently, in the afternoon of Saturday, information was received here that Lackey was then in Sutton, with Duclos and others from Vermont, who, it was thought, meant to run Lackey across the Line after dark—that they were evidently filling their victim with liquor preparatory to starting, in order to throw him off his guard, that, once across, they might pocket the reward. Immediately after a few friends of order and justice assembled in council; whereupon it was agreed that no time should be lost in going to Lackey's rescue. Accordingly, four or five persons started for Abercorn, and upon their arrival found Lackey in the wagon of Duclos, starting for the Province Line, distant about eighty rods, under the impression that he was going to Dunham. Duclos told Lackey at different times they were two and a half miles from the Line, and there was no danger. As the party from Freleighsburg came up, Lackey, on request of two of them, got out of the wagon in which he then was, crossed the field some thirty or forty rods, came into the road, met the other wagon, into which he got, and returned to Freleighsburg. There is no doubt that the intention of those seeking to kidnap Lackey was to have him drive across the Line himself, and they would follow, and make the arrest after the crossing, in the place of rendezvous, where Duclos, McGowan, and four or five others, all from Vermont, and who evidently had a joint interest in the capture, were enjoying themselves over the bottle, and, as it were, revelling in anticipations to be realised from the price of the blood of their fellow-man. The chagrin of these Vermont men can be more easily imagined than described upon finding their victim had been rescued from them, and many and anxious were their inquiries as to what Lackey could have done that his rescuers should have come out to his aid. Yesterday morning, about 8 A.M., Mr. John McGowan and his companion, name unknown, passed through our village, evidently upon a reconnoitering expedition, and upon inquiring "What was up?" "What was going on?" and receiving a rather emphatic warning to decamp, acting on the advice, lost no time in finding the south side of 45°. No doubt, had the nefarious scheme of Messrs. Duclos and Co. been successful, poor Lackey would now be in the custody of the Federal authorities, and his kidnappers revelling in the fruit of the spoil. As it is, we trust that the foregoing sketch of their failure may be to them a warning—such an one as may prevent them making a similar attempt on this side of the Line.

It is reported that the Governor of Maryland will refuse to grant commissions to the newly elected Congress-men.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, DEC. 9.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

LAST week we appeared to be in the midst of a panic. Now there seems some prospect of getting through without difficulty. The Bank went from 6 to 7, and then to 8 per cent., in a few days, and it was feared before this the committee would have carried the price to 9, if not 10 per cent. The intermediate figure of 8 seems to have been sufficient to have arrested the progress of the large exports of specie contemplated to India and Brazil; and although it is not at present certain whether a further rise may not take place, the aspect for the moment is less discouraging. The cotton famine is at the bottom of this business, and notwithstanding speculation has been partially repressed by the high value of money, and the apprehension that increased terms would be enforced, we are not so sure that the quotations of the staple itself will be much better. We have also had a mania for public companies, which has absorbed a considerable proportion of floating capital, and until the effect of this is ascertained in the spring, we may be considered to be surrounded by peril. Occasional failures we shall have among the mercantile classes, and no trade, however legitimately it may be conducted, can stand the pressure of an 8 or 9 per cent. rate; while at present, it must be confessed, the advantage is all on the side of the Bank, and none on that of the public. This afternoon the latest and best feature was the disposition of the discount houses to negotiate paper more freely—even six months bills were taken at 8 per cent, the Bank minimum; yesterday or the day before they would not have been touched under 9 or 10 per cent. No faith will be put in an ameliorated condition of things until the Bank directors shall have been enabled to lower the rate themselves.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

A small amount of gold has found its way into the Bank this week, the total being £33,500; but against this there has been withdrawn for transmission abroad £324,000. To-day there has been nothing withdrawn from, neither has there been anything sent into, the Bank. The arrivals of specie this week have also been comparatively trifling, the total being £144,391, all of which was from New York, with the exception of £2,600 from Alexandria. Bar silver has been in great demand for Bombay, and there have also been increased inquiries for silver for the mail of the 12th inst., which raised the price to 61½; but a relapse has since taken place, in consequence of the increased rate of discount, and the silver by the last East India packet has been taken at 61½. Mexican dollars have further declined, and some small parcels have been disposed of at 5s. 2d., and the tendency of the market is downward. Telegraphic advices from Australia announce the transmission since the last mail of 94,500 ounces of gold, valued at £378,000. The Monarch is still out at sea, with £247,500 on board.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Although the state of business in the English Stock Market has been of a rather more quiet character than for some time past, the unsettled state of the money market has had a prejudicial effect upon dealings, and prevented the rise in quotations which would otherwise undoubtedly have taken place. Still, the tendency is towards improvement; but the advance on the week has been only about ¼ per cent., consols closing this evening at 90½ to ¾ ex. div. for money, and 91½ ex. div. for the account. Exchequer Bills have further declined, and are now quoted 12s. to 7s. dis. The foreign Stock Market has been comparatively quiet, the dealers, in the present state of affairs, appearing to operate with more caution. Prices on the whole have been better maintained, perhaps, than might have been expected under the circumstances, but still the tendency has been unfavourable. The chief fall has been in Mexican, which are 2½ per cent. lower; but Greek and Spanish have declined only about ¼. After business hours this evening, a generally better feeling prevailed in all departments, with a tendency to more buoyancy in prices. Greek closed at 25½ to 26; Mexican, 33 to 33½; Spanish Passives, 32½ to 33½; ditto Certificates, 13 to 13½; Turkish (1854), 88½ to 89½; and ditto (1862), 69 to 70.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

There has been rather more animation exhibited in the market for American Government and Railway Securities, owing to the recently reported successes on the part of the Federal army, but notwithstanding prices do not show any improvement; on the contrary, quotations in some instances are lower, and still show a declining tendency. The transactions have been as follows:—Virginia State Six per Cent., 34. Atlantic and Great Western (New York Section), 78, 79, 79½ and 70. Do. do. (Pennsylvania Section), 77½, 77½, 77½, 76½, 77½, 77½, 77, 77 and 77½. Erie, $100 shares, all paid, 62, 63½ and 64½. Do. Seven per Cents., third mortgage, 64½. Illinois Central Six per Cents., 83. Do. do., $100 shares, 890 paid, 24, 25, 24 and 23½ dis. Do. do., all paid, 70, 69 and 70. Pennsylvania Central Bonds, second mortgage, 87½ and 87.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

There has been a rather extensive business transacted during the week in British Railway Securities, but the tightness of the money market has effectually prevented any material rally in prices. Some few descriptions continue steady at the prices of this day week, but in many instances there has been a decline. In Edinburgh and Glasgow and Great Northern the fall has been 1 per cent., and in Bristol and Exeter, Great Western, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, London, Chatham, and Dover, and North British, ½ per cent.; but in Brighton the drop has been fully 3 per cent. On the other hand, however, London and North-Western show an improvement of 1 per cent., and Midland ¾ per cent. In foreign Railway Shares business has been extremely quiet, and the variations in prices have been immaterial. For shares in British Possessions only a limited demand has existed, but quotations have been maintained with uniform steadiness.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this Security has been very heavy all the week, the war news being, so far as is yet known, unfavourable to the Southern cause in the South-west. This, combined with a continuance of dear money, has brought pressing sellers into the market, and a steady decline is the result. The latest quotation was yesterday, 35; numerous purchases to-day have produced a firmer tone, and now close at 28 to 40.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSION.

The suspension was announced on Tuesday afternoon of Mr. W. N. de Mattos, of Leadenhall-street, engaged in the coal export trade; but it is stated that recently engagements had been formed in the shipping trade, which have proved unprofitable. The liabilities are estimated at nearly £500,000, and it is feared that the assets will not turn out very favourable. This afternoon the following circular was issued:—

“27, Leadenhall-street, London, December 9, 1863.

“It is with feelings of deep respect that I have to announce to you that I have been compelled to suspend payment. I have called in the services of Messrs. Coleman, Turquand, Youngs and Co., by whom a statement of my affairs will be forthwith prepared and submitted to my creditors. In the meantime, soliciting your forbearance, I am, your obedient servant,
“W. N. DE MATTOS.”

BANK MEETINGS.

A special meeting of the shareholders of the London Bank of Scotland has just been held, for the purpose of considering the advisability of obtaining Parliamentary power to issue bank notes in Scotland. The chair was taken by Sir John Hay, Bart., M.P., and it was stated by the directors that the advantages to be derived from the possession of such power were exceedingly great. It was, in fact, a privilege possessed and exercised by nearly every existing Scotch bank, and which entered largely into all banking transactions carried on in that country; and after careful deliberation the board had come to the conclusion that it would be of the utmost importance to the interests of the bank, and that it would be desirable that measures should be taken with the least possible delay for obtaining the necessary authorisation for this purpose, either by Parliamentary sanction or through the medium of arrangements with some bank already established in Scotland. The chairman stated that the bank had commenced business on the 2nd of November last in London and Scotland; the commercial classes of the North had very liberally accorded their support to the institution, and the directors accordingly entertain sanguine expectations of success. The necessary resolutions were carried, authorising the directors to apply for power for the bank to issue its own notes in Scotland.—At a general meeting of the proprietors of the Bank of British North America, held at the offices, St. Helen's-place, Bishopsgate-street, Mr. Robert Carter in the chair, the report of the directors submitted to the shareholders stated that the business of the bank had in some degree recovered from the depression noticed at the last meeting, although it was still injuriously affected by the civil war in the United States. By the failures which had recently occurred in Canada, the bank would sustain some loss. The branches in Victoria and Vancouver had been satisfactory in their progress and the profits realised; and after providing for the losses on the Canadian failures, the directors would be enabled to declare, out of the estimated net profits of the year, the usual half-yearly dividend at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, free of income-tax. The report was adopted, and the dividend recommended declared. The meeting was then made special, and Messrs. Henry Boggs and A. H. Philpotts were elected directors in the place of Mr. H. Barnwell, deceased, and Mr. William Chapman, who had retired.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting of the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, the report of the directors was unanimously adopted, and a dividend equal to 7 per cent., free of income-tax, was declared. The chairman (Mr. A. Anderson) drew the attention of the shareholders to an improvement of about £70,000 in the revenue, and to a considerable decrease in the expenditure. The improvement in the revenue, it was true, arose from temporary causes, more particularly the demand for specie for India, and the demand for Indian cotton in this country—a state of things which could not be expected to continue in the same degree after the termination of the American war. The new trade with Japan had not been overlooked by the board; a vessel had been despatched there, and the Company's principal agent in that part of the world was making arrangements for establishing a regular communication in connection with the line to China.—At the half yearly meeting of the Aerated Bread Company a dividend at the rate of 12½ per cent. per annum, was declared. £426 was placed to the reserve fund, and a balance of £739 was carried to the current account. It was stated by the chairman that the result of the half-year's business having been so satisfactory, the directors propose extending the operations of the Company as originally contemplated.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

A prospectus has been issued of the Guildhall Hotel Company, with a capital of £50,000, in shares of £10 each. The object is to purchase and extend the Guildhall Hotel, King-street, but the terms are not stated. A prospectus has been issued of the Llanrhidian Bituminous Colliery Company, with a capital of £100,000, in 20,000 shares of £5 each, a dividend of 7½ per cent. being guaranteed for the first twelve months. The mineral rights of the property have been secured and are held at low royalties for long periods. The object of the Company is to develop and extend the working of the mine; and a tabular statement shows that a profit of £33 per day can be realised upon the opening out of the colliery. The prospectus has also been issued of the Darren Consolidated Silver and Lead Mining Company. The object of the undertaking is to acquire and extend the operations of those rich mineral properties situate in the county of Cardigan, about six miles from the port of Aberystwith. The proposed capital is £30,000, in 15,000 shares of £2 each. The General Floating Dock Company (Limited) is another undertaking just brought forward, the object being the construction of Floating Docks—chiefly in France; but also elsewhere—upon the principle invented and patented by Mr. Couran, the well-known ship-builder, so as to profit by the exclusive privileges and concessions conferred upon that gentleman's firm. It is proposed to commence by constructing a dock capable of accommodating vessels of the largest size at the important port of Bordeaux, whilst the Company are also earnestly invited to avail themselves of the openings offered to them at Nantes, Marseilles, and other noteworthy places. The proposed capital is £200,000, in 20,000 shares of £10 each, with power to increase. The first issue will be £120,000, in 12,000 shares. Deposit on application £1 per share; and £1 on allotment.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The markets for nearly all classes of produce have been extremely dull since our last, from the influence of dear money. Purchases, as a rule, are kept within the narrowest limits possible. As usually is the case under the circumstances, prices have a drooping tendency; but it is only in exceptional cases that sales are in the smallest degree pressed, and any serious or general decline is by this means prevented. The cotton trade is without activity, but the downward movement in prices noticed last week has not made any further progress. The American provision trade has not undergone much change. Transactions continue upon a limited scale for the most part, at about previous rates. The grain markets have lost their recent buoyancy, and wheat must be quoted 1s. lower, for any but the choicest qualities. Flour is 6d. per barrel lower. The trade has been larger buyers of American refined petroleum, and the price has improved 1d. to 1½d. per gallon; closing this afternoon at 1s. 11½d. to 2s. Crude is quoted £17 10s. to £17 15s. per tun. Lined oil is still depressed by sales on the part of speculative holders; 35s. 9d., 36s., were the last quotations. To-day fish oils are very dull; American sperm offering at £17 per tun. Turpentine has varied between 63s. and 64s. per cwt., for French; in American there has not been any business to establish quotations. The tallow market has shown renewed depression; but this afternoon there was a rally, and the decline was pretty well recovered, leaving current rates much about the same as last week. Lute has given way 20s. per ton, and the demand is only very moderate at the reduction. There is a fair amount of business passing in tobacco at the recent decline. The sugar market is dull and unsettled. After an almost entire cessation of dealings for several days a transaction or two took place on Friday, at 38s. for clayed Manilla of old import, being a loss of about 3s. 6d. from the highest point. To-day business has been at 39s. 6d. for new import, showing a fair recovery of 1s. per cwt. In metals there is less doing, but quotations are in most cases well sustained. Scotch pig iron, after touching 66s., fell to 63s. 9d., and closes at 64s. 3d., with rather a good demand. Spelter is firm at £18 15s. to £18 17s. 6d. Lead, at £20 10s. to £20 15s., is dearer, and straits tin very steady, at £113 10s. cash.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Dec. 9.

Business in the cotton market has not been particularly brisk during the past week, the late rise in the rate of discount having had an additional depressing tendency, and sales could only be effected at a further reduction in prices. The supplies on the whole, have been very fair for almost every description, but neither buyers nor sellers seem disposed to press business. The sales during the week have amounted to only 23,000 bales, of which 9,200 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 2,491,690 bales, against 2,526,030 bales to the same period last year. The total imports this year, so far, have reached 1,558,338, and to the corresponding date in 1862, 1,114,448 bales. There have been exported this year 441,224 bales, and to the same period last year, 405,139 bales. Taken for consumption this year 1,257,200 bales, and in 1862, 1,084,200 bales. In the present year there have been taken on speculation 737,440 bales, and down to the like period last year 1,001,100 bales. At present the computed stocks are 249,260 bales, and at the same time in 1862 they were 254,050 bales. The fluctuation in prices during the past week has been rather considerable; at one time East Indian was at least 3d. per lb. lower, Egyptian 2d., and American and Brazil from 1d. to 1½d. per lb. There is, however, now a rather better feeling, and prices have somewhat recovered. The latest quotations were American of various descriptions, from 26½d. to 27d., according to quality; Pernambuco, 28d.; Maranhau, 28d. to 28½d.; Egyptian, 26½d. to 29d.; Smyrna, 20d. to 23d.; and Surats from 16d. to 24½d. Egyptians for December shipment have been done at 26½d; for January, 25½d., to 26½d.; for February, 25½d., and for April, 26½d.

MANCHESTER, December 8.

The advance in the Bank rate of discount on Monday last to 7 per cent., and again on Thursday to 8 per cent., brought business to a standstill for the moment, and caused timid dealers to submit lower offers in the hope of attracting buyers.

On Friday there was great irregularity in quotations for home trade yarns. The disparity in some cases being as much as 4d. per lb. between one seller and another, for the same class of yarn.

Cloth, although affected by dearer money, is not so weakly held as yarn is.

To-day, Tuesday, has been an exceedingly quiet market day. The fear that we shall yet see a further rise in the Bank rate is making buyers cautious and dealers anxious to sell. The Bombay telegraphic news up to the 16th November, notwithstanding its being to a certain extent of a cheering character, has produced little effect here, as it is pretty generally believed to be in response to our highest prices, and that the next advices from India will be of a different character.

TO THE PEOPLE OF GALLANT

OLD ENGLAND. Awake! awake! Arise from your lethargy, and shake off the dew-drops that glitter on your garments, and look well to the signs of the times. Events fraught with the most momentous questions, involving no less a consideration than our liberties, are threatening to overwhelm us at this moment. For two years and a half a most wicked and foolish war has been waged against the Confederate States of America, which war has received its chief support from this country, in violation of every law, human and Divine, the Queen's Proclamation, and against the dearest interests of this country. Strange and incomprehensible as it may seem, the Federal States, each and every one, without the slightest hindrance or objection from the English Government, has received every appliance of war, even to Greek fire, from us. During this very period a neutralizing neutrality has been practised with impunity, our friends, natural allies, and kinsmen, have been slandered, abused, and libelled beyond any civilised people on earth, in addition to the most flagrant and foul duplicity and partiality, shielded and armoured-plated with the cry of neutrality, in opposition to the sympathies of all true-hearted Christians, have been practised against them. When urged to do justice to the South, the reply has always been "Neutrality!" while, at the same time the Government of the Federal States has really been aided in every possible way. We do not know that there has been an understanding between the Cabinets of England and Washington, and should be loth to believe it, —and think, on the contrary, that the voice and true feeling of the country has only to be firmly made known, to induce a different course, but we do know that their actions have to a great degree been harmonious with regard to the Confederate States: both agreeing to an inefficient blockade, and therefore both opposed to any supplies going over from this country, both opposed to Recognition, and seemingly both agreed in allowing the capture of English vessels, even when bound to a neutral port. The Yankees have blockaded the Southern ports at great expense, but England at a much greater sacrifice her commercial interests to a fear of War with the North. The so-called "neutrality" practised against the South has been their greatest shield, and inflicted a deeper wound than if England had sent an army of one hundred thousand men, to aid the Northern States to subjugate and starve out their Southern brethren. How strange and inexplicable has been our conduct towards the combatants!—the Confederate States having declared their ports open to us and their readiness to exchange cotton for manufactures, and in every case shown a continued desire for the most cordial relations with us, which hitherto we have refused. The Federal Government, on the contrary, has threatened, menaced, and insulted us almost continually, and openly declared that as soon as the South is conquered, they would declare war with us and take "Canada." President JEFFERSON DAVIS has stretched out the right hand of friendship to us with an olive branch, and we have given a serpent. President LINCOLN has approached us in a most hostile and warlike manner, with a drawn sword in one hand and an ignited thunderbolt charged with Greek fire in the other. Yet we give the "Canada" the better for cordial hand of fellowship, and maintain the most friendly relations with him in his ignominious crusade of fire and sword on this fairest portion of the earth. The sooner that support is withdrawn from the Washington Government, and the independence of the Confederate States of America recognised by us, the better for England's future prosperity, happiness, and character. Let us, therefore, co-operate in the common interest of humanity and justice in procuring the Recognition of a brave and suffering people. We are morally bound to finally decide what position we will occupy in regard to the great American war. From fear of offence to the North, we have acted as if the South ought not to be considered as having a right to existence: nay, we have, during this entire unprecedented struggle, given succour and support to the North, and remain her friendly ally. The time has arrived when we must decide whether in our opinion the North is right, or whether the South is not, or whether the South ought to have her independence. The "London Confederate States Commercial League" firmly believes that a large majority of the freemen of this great nation are anxious to grasp the lion-hearted South in their arms, and welcome her into the family of nations. If the high character, bravery, honour, and heroic defence of their country entitle men to be free, then surely they merit our consideration. Who will be first to welcome them to the honours so richly merited? We invite all those that are in "favour of the Recognition of the Independence of the Confederate States of America," to unite with us in adopting the best means to accomplish that end. The importance of concert of action among the friends of this movement is earnestly urged by the "London Confederate States Commercial League," who are anxious to communicate with other associations, clubs, and friends as to the best means of a General Demonstration throughout the Empire.

Office open daily from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., at 7, St. Mildred's-parish, Poultry, E.C. Meetings every Wednesday at one o'clock, p.m., at the above place.

CHARLES STEWART (S.C.).

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. Coutts and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

GENERAL MEADE'S last and very brief campaign has come to a disastrous conclusion, and loud is the outcry against the luckless commander. All the excuses put forth by the Government and his friends are treated with contempt. The truth is too plain to be concealed. Meade, obeying instructions from Washington, pressed forward only to learn that the reports about the weakness of General Lee were false. His forces under General French were repulsed with loss, and his cavalry has been severely handled. His head-quarters near Culpepper were burnt by General Mosby, and his ammunition wagons in his rear were captured. No wonder Meade was tired of playing the game of "On to Richmond!" and that he retreated to the north of the Rappahannock. It is asserted that he has now given up active operations, and instead of trying to capture the Confederate capital, will go into winter-quarters near Washington. This policy may be necessary, but it cannot fail to seriously damage the Government. It is currently supposed that General Meade will not long be in command, and that he will be replaced by General Sedgwick. If the war lasts much longer, pretty nearly every general in the Federal service will have the honour of commanding the Army of the Potomac.

Just as we anticipated, General Grant's victory at Chattanooga turns out to be a much less important affair than was announced, and there was not the least pretence for asserting that the army of General Bragg was routed. We are still without Southern accounts, but a Northern official report contradicts the story of the capture of 10,000 Confederates, and reduces the number of guns that was taken to thirty. The only result of the affair is, that so many were killed and so many wounded; and seeing that the Confederate commander had made every preparation for withdrawal, seeing that the Federal attack was twice repulsed, it is more than probable that the statement which, according to the telegraphic news, is made by the Southern press, is true, that the Federal loss was comparatively greater than that of the Confederates. General Johnston is reported to have reached Dalton with his forces.

Meantime we have the intelligence of an important battle fought at Ringgold, Georgia. This was not a skirmish but a regular engagement, and the Northern accounts show that it was a Northern defeat, and fully explain why General Grant declined to pursue the Confederates and retreated with all convenient speed to Chattanooga. The loss of the Federals must have been enormous. The division under Osterhaus stood its ground for some time under a terrific fire, and was then obliged to retire. Colonel Creighton, leading Canby's brigade, and Lieut.-Colonel Crane were killed. The 7th Ohio came out of action under the command of a lieutenant, all the rest of its officers being hors de combat. At one time the Federal right was turned. At length Grant brought up heavy reinforcements, and the Confederates retired—that is, continued their march without further molestation from the enemy. We shall be glad to get Southern accounts of this battle, in which General Bragg seems to have displayed excellent generalship, and the Confederates great pluck and endurance.

It is said that General Bragg has been superseded by General Hardee, and that offensive operations will be immediately resumed. If this change in command has taken place it will no doubt be acceptable to the Confederate forces, with whom General Hardee is a favourite. What are the reasons that have at length induced President Davis to consent to the removal of General Bragg we know not, but in his retirement he will carry with him the respect of his countrymen. His patriotic devotion and his high courage are unquestionable; he has rendered his country good service, and the victory at Chickamauga will always be associated with his name.

In the absence of news from Knoxville, we have plenty of Federal rumours. On the 30th ult. it was reported in New York that General Longstreet had raised the siege and had started for Dalton. A few days later it was announced that he had made an attack and had been repulsed. These statements are about equally credible. The latter may be true, but in the absence of further intelligence it is no more reliable than any other Federal announcement. It is also reported that General Longstreet has been reinforced by two divisions.

We beg to call particular attention to an important letter with which we have been favoured from the Hon. J. C. McRae, the Financial Agent of the Confederate Government in Europe. Mr. McRae replies to the various insinuations that the enemies of the Confederate Cotton Loan have thrown out to shake the confidence of the holders. He shows that the Confederate Government is able and willing to redeem its obligations, and that every proper and necessary facility is afforded to the bond-holders to obtain cotton. Mr. McRae remarks that the receipts of American cotton at Liverpool from the 1st of January last to the 1st of August amounted to 100,000 bales, and since the 1st of August to about 50,000 bales; which proves that cotton under the Loan can be brought out, if the bondholders desire it.

In connection with the facilities for obtaining American cotton, a letter from Charleston on "The Blockade of the South," which we reprint from the Morning Herald, is worthy of attention. In the first ten months of the present year no less than 133 cargoes have arrived in steamers at the two ports of Charleston and Wilmington. On the 19th ult, thirteen vessels ran the blockade of Wilmington.

The Charleston correspondent comments severely on England and France continuing to recognise such an ineffective blockade, after asking the Confederate Government to adopt the principles of the Treaty of Paris, and which the Confederate Government consented to do.

The Rev. Ward Beecher addressed a crowded audience at the Academy of Music, at New York, on his experiences in England, where he says he was "a missionary and colporteur among the heathen," and that his province was to inculcate "representative American ideas." Mr. Beecher dwelt at great length upon the freedom, happiness, and prosperity of the United States, and expressed his conviction that the prosperity of the Union would have such an influence upon this side of the Atlantic as that "just as sure as there is a Providence or a God, it will compel Europe from end to end to reform or revolutionise." After a great deal more of such talk, Mr. Beecher observed that he had heard Lord Brougham's speech at Edinburgh, "for among the other trials which Providence submitted him to was that of listening to his address." We have no doubt it must have been very painful to Mr. Beecher to have been compelled to listen to words of soberness and truth.

We elsewhere publish three letters from our Richmond correspondent. The one of the 14th November narrates some of the reverses that have lately been sustained by the Confederate army, but our correspondent is wrong in supposing that his letter will be considered gloomy. The persistent fabrications of the North as to Southern exhaustion render his communication triumphant by comparison, and particularly as it arrives at the moment when the telegraph brings us intelligence of Meade's disaster and retreat. The spirit of the Southern people is all that could be desired.

The other letters of our correspondent are of an earlier date, but we cannot say their news has been altogether anticipated, and they will be read with interest.

President Lincoln is ill with the small-pox. He has a robust constitution, and, therefore, no doubt is felt about his speedy recovery. His message to Congress is on its way to Europe, and it is needless to speculate on its tone. The New York Herald says:—

It is understood that the President's message will be intensely radical in character; so much so as to settle the question of the Republican nomination for the Presidency. The President regards the slavery question as practically closed, and that the legislation of the country should treat it as a thing that is passing away for ever, leaving only the debris of a broken down institution to be disposed of. He will urge that now is the time to make a final disposition of this great political curse upon the nation, while the war shall be prosecuted most vigorously for the preservation of the national life and the integrity of the Union.

General Gilmore has abandoned the attack upon Sumter, and is throwing twenty shells per diem into Charleston. This moderation will effect a considerable saving of Federal ammunition.

The escape of General Morgan and of Captains Bennet, Sheldon, Haines, Hackersmith, and Magee, was managed very cleverly; the only tools they had being small pocket knives. They left the following note behind them:—

Castle Merion, Cell No. 20, November 27, 1863.

To Captain Merion, Warden of the Penitentiary,—
Commencement, November 4th, 1863: Conclusion, November 20th, 1863. Number of hours of labour per day, three. Tools, two small knives.

La Patience est amère mais son fruit est doux.
Translation: Patience is bitter, but its fruit is sweet.

By order of my six honourable Confederates.

J. HENRY HAINES,
Captain Confederate States Army.

The anniversary of Polish independence has been celebrated at the Cooper Institute, New York. The principal speaker declared that Poland and Ireland were equally oppressed, and another speaker presented to the meeting a black flag, which he explained to be symbolical of "Irish independence or death."

The following passage from a letter of the London correspondent of the New York Tribune, shows how identical are the opinions and sentiments of Mr. Bright and the Yankees:—

The masses of English poverty are too stolid, too ignorant, and too utterly helpless to get out of their misery. They scarcely know that there is such a country as America. Where it is, and how to get there, is quite beyond their comprehension. Nothing can be done with them or for them. One in every six in London dies in hospital, prison, or poor-house. I think the proportion is quite as large in the country. There are millions of Englishmen who have no resource but the workhouse. While they can work, they may get enough for a bare subsistence, but if sick they go to "the house," they die in "the house," and the parish authorities

"Rattle his bones
Over the stones
He's only a pauper that nobody owns."

As the South cannot be conquered, the Northerners are again asking the Southern people to submit. The New York Herald says, by so doing "they may still rescue from capture or destruction cotton to the extent of four or five hundred millions of dollars in value, and a remnant of their institution of slavery equal at least to four or five hundred millions more."

General Hurlburt, commanding in Tennessee and Kentucky, has issued an order impressing into the Federal military service all the able-bodied men in his department. It is very easy to issue such an order, but the General forgets that the hare must be caught before it can be cooked.

Mr. C. G. Gunther, a Peace Democrat, has been elected Mayor of New York.

The Conservative Union National Committee, at a meeting held in Cincinnati, nominated General McClellan for the next Presidency.

There has been an advance in the price of gold in New York. On the 5th of December it was quoted at 51½ premium.

ENGLAND.

Of the two great fights of the week, the most remarkable, that between Mr. Cobden and the Times, is treated at some length in another part of our columns by a correspondent. Mr. Cobden, of Yankee proclivities, like Mr. Heenan has been terribly cut up, but not by precisely the same process. Mr. Heenan was punished by his opponent whilst Mr. Cobden has been permitted to knock himself into a mummy in a vain effort to damage the Times. Mr. Delane, the editor of that journal, has accepted Mr. Cobden's personal challenge, and in so doing administered a rebuke with which no one with a spark of gentlemanly feeling can fail to sympathise. We have heard a great deal about the immorality of the prize ring, and of the roughness and the coarseness of the characters that constitute it, but we hope it is not so bad as to permit the use of such vulgar abuse as that which Mr. Cobden has been guilty of. The Times has made a calculation that the member for Rochdale has indulged in his two letters in no less than fifty offensive epithets. Only scolding fish-fags will envy the honourable member's fluency in such language.

The fight between Heenan and King was from all accounts very unscientific, but those who are fond of tracing analogies may discover in it a good deal of national character. The Yankee was boastful and confident of triumph; the Englishman was nervous, and only anxious to use every means in his power to secure victory. The Yankee tried to win the fight by a dodge, that of wrestling; the Englishman relied on hard blows. The fight was over in thirty-five minutes; King was the victor, and everybody was surprised how little he had suffered and how terribly Heenan had been cut up. There has been, as usual, an outcry against the prize-ring, but it is certain, from the eagerness with which the accounts of the battle were read and commented on, that many persons who protest against it are delighted to hear all about the fight. If our Foreign Secretary had been out of doors last Thursday evening he would have undoubtedly changed his opinion that the majority of his countrymen side with the Federals. People of all sorts and conditions were pleased at King's victory, not that they disliked Heenan personally or liked King, but merely because Heenan is a Yankee. Rather a strange feature in the affair was the preparations made to insure a comfortable start for those who went to witness the encounter. Prize-fighting is unlawful and fights are continually being stopped by the intervention of the police, the constables acting under the authority of a warrant granted by a magistrate whose jurisdiction extends to the place where the fight is going on. Now last Thursday morning there were a hundred of the metropolitan police at the London bridge station to facilitate and protect the departure of the combatants and their friends, well knowing, of course, that the object of the excursion was an evasion and infraction of the law. We suppose that in Scotland-yard it is held perfectly right to be an accessory before the fact in the perpetration of an offence.

In our last number we directed attention to an error in the speech of the Marquis of Hartington, in which his lordship ascribed to Mr. Cobden a statement made by Mr. Seward. Mr. Cobden has written a letter which is so full of his intense and grotesque egotism that we reproduce it:—

Midhurst, 9th Dec., 1863.

MY LORD.—You will, perhaps, be good enough to take an early opportunity of correcting publicly, your recent—I had almost said address—perversion of the remarks which fell from my mouth in American affairs at Rochdale. While with my pen in hand, permit me to add, that, with better opportunities than your lordship of studying the system of popular education and the state of society in the New England States,

I did not recognise much greater accuracy in what you stated to the Haslingden meeting on those subjects than in what you said of myself.

I have, &c.,

R. COBDEN.

Whether Mr. Cobden knows more about American affairs than the Marquis of Hartington is a matter of opinion, and we are under the impression that he does not know so much. We do not dispute that he has had better opportunities for observation, but a man blinded by prejudices cannot use such opportunities. Of course, Mr. Cobden could not write half-a-dozen lines to a gentleman without being abusive, therefore he imputes the error of the Marquis to design and calls it a reckless perversion. This is really intolerable, for nothing can be more natural than that an Englishman should confound the utterances of Messrs. Cobden and Seward and of Messrs. Bright and Sumner: their sentiments being so completely identical. They equally profess intense love for the Union, and equally find fault with English institutions and everything that is English. There was nothing in the speeches of Messrs. Cobden and Bright at Rochdale that Messrs. Seward and Sumner might not have said without inconsistency.

Mr. Justice Wightman died suddenly on Thursday last whilst on circuit. The deceased was in his 80th year, but no one seeing him on the bench would have supposed him to have been so old. It is, however, not surprising that our judges retain to extreme old age their physical strength and mental faculties. Only men with iron constitutions can stand the wear and tear of professional life that must in this country be the prelude to a judgeship. No one on the bench was more esteemed by the bar than Mr. Justice Wightman.

His successor is Mr. Sergeant Shee: an appointment which meets with very general and cordial approval. It was supposed, and not without reason, that the learned gentleman's religion, he being a Roman Catholic, was a bar to his advancement. We are glad that the supposition was erroneous, and that in this free and protestant country theological opinions are not made the test of fitness for the public service. Mr. Shee is the first Roman Catholic that has for centuries sat on the bench.

A contemporary, the Western Morning News, gives an account of the legal patronage of Lord Palmerston's Government since 1855. There have been three lord chancellors, eleven new common law judges, two judges of the divorce court, four attorneys and six solicitor-generals. Lord Palmerston's administration has had abundant opportunities of recompensing its legal supporters, but it is fair to add that its legal appointments have met with the approval of the public and the profession, and that some of them—such as that of Baron Bramwell, who was never in Parliament and took no part in politics—have been made irrespective of party.

A telegram has been received at the India Office announcing the death of Lord Elgin on the 20th November, at Dhurumsalla. Although the melancholy intelligence was expected it nevertheless was received with sincere regret.

A horrible murder was committed in Lambeth on Sunday; the unhappy victim being a woman named Maria Green. She was murdered by Samuel Wright, a brick-layer by trade, with whom she cohabited, by cutting her throat. Wright was arrested immediately and before the woman expired she charged him with the crime. It happens that the Sessions of the Central Criminal Court are on, and Wright was brought up yesterday, pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to be hanged. Thus in three days after committing the murder the perpetrator is sentenced to death. We believe this is the most extraordinary case of speedy justice on record. Generally such speed would be dangerous, but when the guilt is so clear, quick punishment may prove a salutary example.

George Victor Townley, who sometime since barbarously murdered Miss Goodwin, a young woman to whom he had been affianced, has been tried, found guilty, and condemned to death. A defence was set up that he was insane, and it was sought to prove the plea of insanity by producing evidence of the prisoner's general moral derangement. Dr. Forbes Winslow, who had twice seen the prisoner since his incarceration, was of opinion that he is insane. Baron Martin, the presiding judge, demolished this plea by telling the jury that assuming "that the prisoner's mind was diseased on the 21st of August, yet, if he knew the act he did would probably cause death, and that what he was doing was against the law of God and the subject of legal punishment, he is responsible for his act."

On Saturday last the Minotaur, the largest of our iron-clad fleet, was launched at Blackwall. She is 6802 tons burthen, her engines 1350 horse-power and she has five iron masts. Her iron plating is 5½ inches, backed by 9 inches of teak. At her lowest trim her portsills will never be less than nine feet from the water; that is, more than three feet higher out than the vessels of the La Gloire class.

Mr. Baron Pigott has distinguished his accession to the bench by a little ebullition of temper which is not exactly dignified. When his lordship arrived in Exeter it was nearly dark, and therefore the authorities—that is, the Dean and Chapter—refused to have service in the cathedral, despite the intimation of the learned judge that he wanted to get through that part of his duties on the evening of his arrival. Addressing the grand jury, he said,—"I must apologise for some delay occasioned this morning. We might have attended the cathedral last evening, but the arrangements I made seem to have been set aside by some authorities in the town, merely because they would not go to the expense of half-a-crown in putting candles in the chandeliers. This would have saved half a day, but we shall get through the business, I dare say, by sitting rather late." It was not to save candles that the canons did not obey the behest of his lordship, but they properly refused to permit the crowd which follows a judge of assize on his entrance into a town, to go into the cathedral when it was in darkness, and when to light up the nave was impossible. To speak of the chapter as "some authorities of the town," was disrespectful to that learned body, and the charge of meanness was ridiculous as well as insulting. Nothing can exceed the respect with which our judges are treated on circuit by all classes of the community, and it is rare, indeed, that they are not courteous and considerate in return. The learned Baron spoke hastily, we presume, and we daresay regrets it.

Mr. Layard, M.P. for Southwark, addressed his constituents on Thursday last, and considering his position, that is, the representative of a radical constituency in office, he got through his task pretty well. He said he was in favour of an extension of the franchise; but stoutly denied the assertions of Messrs. Cobden and Bright as to the comparative misery and ignorance of the working classes of this country; he not being so illogical as Mr. Bright, who always accompanies an appeal for an extended franchise with strenuous declarations of the unfitness of the people, by reason of their degradation and ignorance, to exercise it. The honourable gentleman referred to some attacks that had been made upon him by Mr. Goldwin Smith, of Oxford, who, he said, had "prostituted the chair of history, by mingling in the dirty arena of party strife." He defended the proceedings at Kagosima; but his arguments do not convince us that the partial destruction of that town was justifiable. He said very little about America, and what he did say was not very convincing. He observed that the Government "were blamed for not recognising the South and for stopping the steam-rams. Ought he not to infer from that that their opponents would pursue the opposite course and plunge the country into war with the United States?" Whether the Government is or is not justified in stopping the steam-rams, is a question to be decided by a court of law; but people do complain of the partiality of Earl Russell in being ready, upon the most flimsy evidence, to take proceedings against the possible violation of the law in favour of the Confederates, whilst he evinces great apathy respecting Federal violations of the law. Mr. Layard complacently concludes, that to recognise the Confederate States would involve war with the North. We do not agree with him, but, on the contrary, think that step would be much more likely to consolidate and ensure peace.

A dispute has arisen which engages the attention of all those who desire the welfare of the Church of England. The Rev. Dr. Stanley has been appointed Dean of Westminster, and the Rev. Dr. Wordsworth, one of the canons residentiary of Westminster Abbey, has issued a protest in reference to his admission. Dr. Wordsworth, whilst professing personal regard for Dr. Stanley and a sincere admiration for his talents, feels it his duty to call attention to certain passages in Dr. Stanley's published works, which tend to discredit the inspiration of the Old Testament. In conclusion, Dr. Wordsworth thus states the forms and ceremonies attendant on the admission of a Dean. He says:—

He is first introduced into the Jerusalem Chamber, and he there pledges himself by his own hand to the use of the Book of Common Prayer, and declares by his own signature that he "acknowledges all and every of the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion to be agreeable to the Word of God," and he signs with his own hand a declaration that he does "willingly and from his heart" subscribe to those Articles, and "to all things contained in them." (Dr. Stanley, I believe, has recently published a pamphlet advocating the abolition of some of these subscriptions. He will pardon me, I hope, for saying that his own case proves the need of retaining them.) He is then conducted into the Abbey church, and there, on the threshold of the choir, in the presence of Almighty God, he takes a solemn oath that he will regard the authority of Holy Scripture as paramount to human opinions; that he will take his rule of life and doctrine from the Word of God, and will consider all other things as merely human which cannot be proved from God's Word, and that he will govern according to the statutes of the said Church of Westminster, which impose severe penalties on those of its members who are charged and convicted of erroneous and unsound doctrine. Nor is this all. He is admitted into his office on the condition that within a certain time after his admission he shall "openly, publicly, and solemnly read the morning and evening prayers on some Lord's day" in the church of Westminster, and there in the presence of the assembled congregation make the following declaration:—"I, A. B., do hereby declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in and by the book intitled 'The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the Use of the Church of England.'" If Dr. Stanley is admitted to the place of Dean in this Church, it will be upon these terms. He will make these subscriptions with his own hand. He will bind himself by that solemn oath to which I have referred. He will be subject to the laws and statutes of the ancient foundation. He will make these public declarations in the presence of Almighty God and of His people. There may be—I fear there are—some passages in his writings which, to many minds at least, seem to be at variance with some of these solemn engagements. Many extracts have been made from them and published by others to the world which appear to be scarcely reconcilable with the received doctrines of the Church of England in her Articles and her Book of Common Prayer. But Christian charity "believeth all things and hopeth all things." He is doubtless aware of the solemn engagements by which he is about to bind himself before his admission. He cannot be ignorant of the solemn profession of faith which he will be required to make. He will be received in the church of Westminster on the faith of those engagements and professions. He will not be received on the ground of his own writings, but he will be admitted on his publicly declared assent and consent to the formularies, and on his subscription to the Articles, of the Church of England; and that assent and consent may, we would fain believe, be charitably construed into a public retraction and recantation of whatever in his writings can be shown by fair and reasonable demonstration to be at variance with those formularies and Articles of the Church. I publish these statements and remarks in order that all may know, who desire to do so, what the terms and conditions are under which a person is admitted to the office of Dean in this Church. The member of the Chapter who admits him is enjoined by the statutes to instal him in his seat in the church with these words:—"Take thou this chief seat, in order that thou mayest promote the glory of God by thy authority and example, and that thou mayest diligently take heed to edify the body of Christ in this church, which that thou mayest effectually perform, may the Lord give thee the grace of the Holy Spirit. Amen." In this prayer, when offered up in Dr. Stanley's behalf, none will join more heartily than the writer of these lines.

A most horrible story of the ill-treatment of a lunatic has just been brought to light in a letter to the Times, by Mr. Sydney Hodges, of Falmouth. He writes:—

For some years past rumours have been current that the brother of a mason named Porter, living in comfortable circumstances, had been kept for many years in close confinement in a small room at the back of the premises in which Porter and his family reside. Heartrending cries and howls have been repeatedly heard by the neighbours, especially on cold winter nights; but, although the sympathy of many was aroused, no one deemed it his duty to inquire into the circumstances of the case, not dreaming, probably, of the horrors that were to be revealed. Rather more than a year ago Dr. Byrne, a well-known medical practitioner from the county of Durham, now residing in this town, was compelled to seek the warm climate of Flushing for his health, and incidentally heard these rumours. Not satisfied to allow the matter to remain uninvestigated, he collected all the evidence he could, and was so satisfied that the case was one demanding a strict inquiry that, with a most praiseworthy decision, he communicated the facts to the Home Secretary, who at once appointed him special commissioner, and sent down two other commissioners, who, in company with Dr. Byrne, went to Porter's house on Thursday last and demanded admission to his brother. Porter himself was absent, but, after some little parley with the other inmates, Dr. Byrne, who had obtained some insight into the plan of the premises, led the way through the house across a yard and up a flight of steps, where, concealed from view around a corner, they found a door, which admitted them to the den in which the lunatic was confined. The sight which met their gaze was too revolting to be described with all its horrid details. The place consisted of four bare, wet, plaster walls, with a small window on one side, and the door by which they had entered; a doorway opposite, formerly communicating with the house, was plastered up, so as to cut off all communication, except by the flight of steps at the back. In one corner of the room was a wretched truckle bedstead, with cross pieces of wood, rotten with filth, about six inches wide and the same distance apart. On these bare boards was crouched a being more resembling a baboon than a man, drawn and cramped, from long exposure and suffering, out of all form of humanity, stark naked, and with only two old rotten bags for a coverlet. I have said like a baboon, from the peculiar form into which the limbs were drawn; the knees almost touched the chin, and were pressed close down upon the chest, I imagine for warmth; the feet close together and bent down one over the other, also, I imagine, for warmth; the hands clinched and brought up close to the chin; the arms closely pressed against the sides. The knee and hip joints were ankylosed; the elbow joints were also stiffening. The floor and the walls were one mass of accumulated filth, the floor rotten with it, the stench horrible; and there are other circumstances of the case too dreadful for publication. For upwards of twenty years the tender mercies of his nearest relatives have consigned him to this living tomb—not a rag to lie upon, not even a wisp of straw; nothing but the naked board, and the two old bags to cover him.

Any comment on the foregoing is needless; but we are sorry to add that it appears it is not an isolated case of such inhumanity. Since the above statement was published, about six days ago, several other instances of the maltreatment of lunatics have been brought forward. No doubt, when Parliament meets, a stringent measure will be passed for the punishment of atrocities that shame our boasted civilisation and are a disgrace to the community.

THE CONTINENT.

THE division in the German Diet upon the question of Execution or Occupation was a very close one. Austria and Prussia had proposed that, without prejudice to the views entertained by some of the members of the Diet upon the succession question, the Execution already ordered should be carried out. The committee of the Diet of which the Bavarian minister was the reporter had recommended that the Diet should take possession of the two Duchies, to hold them until it had itself decided to whom they rightfully belonged. The first question discussed in the sitting of the Diet was, whether a vote should be taken upon the Austro-Prussian or the Committee's proposition first; and, in spite of the efforts of the ministers of Bavaria and Baden, it was resolved that the Austro-Prussian motion should be put to the vote. In the vote, the numbers were at first equal; seven votes—those of Austria, Prussia, Hanover, Electoral Hesse, the 15th, 16th, and 17th Curie, composed respectively for the 15th, of Oldenburg, Anhalt, and Schwarzburg; for the 16th of Liechtenstein, the two Reusses, Schwarzburg, Lippe, Waldeck, and Hesse-Homburg; and for the 17th of the Free Towns—were given for the Austro-Prussian proposition. The votes of these Curie were decided by majorities within themselves; Oldenburg, in the 15th, having been out-voted; Waldeck and the younger Reuss in the 16th, whilst in the 17th it is said Hamburg and Lubeck were for Execution, Bremen and Frankfurt for occupation; but Lubeck having this year the representation in the Diet, the vote was given for Execution.

For the occupation, the votes of Bavaria, Baden, Wurtemberg, the Grand Duchy of Hesse, the Kingdom of Saxony, the Saxon Duchies, and the 13th Curie—Brunswick and Nassau combined—were given. The Mecklenburg representative had at first declined to vote, on the ground that he had no instructions, but he changed his mind and gave the Execution a majority, to which the Grand Duchy of Hesse and the Saxon States ultimately acceded, preferring Execution to no steps at all.

This triumph of the Austro-Prussian resolution was brought about by the pressure which these Governments exercised upon some of the smaller courts. An identical note addressed by the two Powers to all the courts put in a strong light the dangers of the course advocated by Saxony, Baden, and Bavaria. It pointed out that the two great Powers could not, whether under the name of intervention or occupation, oppose the Treaty of London with arms so long as they recognise its validity. They had made the recognition of King Christian conditional; but they entertained the most serious hesitation about exposing Germany and themselves, without urgent necessity, to the eventuality of a war, whose dimensions would be incalculable, but the results and dangers of which would especially fall upon the two great German Powers. They reminded the Confederation that if it wished to preserve its position in Europe, it must regulate it, in European questions, from a European and political point of view. The note further observed, that the Governments are not asked to give up their opinions on the succession question; these might be distinctly reserved.

This appeal, as the voting shows, was successful with the minor States. The resolution of the Diet has, however, occasioned much discontent. The partisans of Austria and Prussia accuse, the one the Austrian, the other the Prussian Government, of betraying Germany, and in one or two of the petty chambers indignant resolutions have been passed. In Wurtemberg, for instance, which is bound by the treaty, this dissatisfaction has found expression in a series of resolutions expressing deep regret at the resolution of the Bund, and a protest against the adherence of Austria and Prussia to the London protocol. The same thing has taken place in Saxony, which was also a party to the treaty. It would have been deemed impossible a few months ago that such scandalous bad faith could be thus solemnly and unanimously advocated in the German Legislatures.

The Governments charged with the Execution are taking active measures to execute the commission. They have summoned the Danish Government to withdraw its troops from the Duchies within seven days. Austria and Prussia will not only supply a reserve, which is to consist of 45,000 men, but will take part, each with 5,000 men, in the Execution, thus making the army of Execution 22,000 strong. The Saxons, it is said, will be the first troops to enter the Duchies, and it is rumoured that the whole force will be placed under the command of Prince Frederick Charles, the nephew of the King of Prussia, and one of the leading spirits of the Prussian reactionary party. The Diet, in its sitting of Monday, agreed upon the instructions to the civil commissioners who are to administer the Duchies in its name, and voted 17,000,000 thalers, about £2,500,000 sterling, towards the expenses of the Execution—a sum which will be raised from the States, members of the Confederation, according to a scale based mainly upon the amount of their population in the Federal limits.

The Hanoverian soldiers, who have been waiting for the orders to march, have been committing great excesses; all, as the fervid Slesvig-Holsteiners assure us, arising out of their intense anxiety to be led against the Danes.

The Prussian Government has asked the Chamber of Deputies for authority to contract a loan of 12,000,000 thalers—£1,800,000—to provide for the expenditure which the Execution may occasion. It appears to be certain, however, that it will not obtain the money. The Liberal majority of the House is in favour of an open rupture of the Treaty of London and war with Denmark, and unless the Minister will adopt its policy it will refuse him the money. The majority intend to address the King an explanation of its refusal, and to dictate to his Majesty the course he is to take. The draft which has been proposed, after declaring that in the hands of the present Ministry the means demanded of the House would not be applied in the interest of the Crown or the country, solicits the King to withdraw from the London protocol, to recognise the Prince of Augustenburg as Duke of Slesvig-Holstein; and further, to use his endeavours that the Diet may render the Prince effectual assistance in every possession of his hereditary dominions. Can the King resist the temptation thus put in his way? He has only to break faith with Europe and his people will yield all the points so long in dispute.

The Government and the House are upon very bad terms. In the discussion upon the budget, an item of 31,000 thalers asked for the secret press fund, was struck out. The great reason actuating the majority being apparently this—that the newspapers supported with these funds will be devoted to attacking them. The refusal is not, however, a matter of much importance to the Government: it will appropriate the money all the same.

Count Eulenburg, the Minister of the Interior, signified himself in this debate by a remarkable display of ignorance. He said, "How is it that the English press has for years taken so hostile an attitude towards Germany? Because the Danish Government has for years had sufficient money to secure the English newspapers for its interest. If the Prussian Government had the same means at its disposition as the Danish Government has, general opinion in England would be quite different." The Prussian Government did once try to buy the English press for its views. Its agents contrived to get articles inserted in a daily paper, the conductors of which opened their columns to any one who would pay them; but the paper had not the slightest influence, and the only use the Prussian minister could make of it was to publish a translation of the articles in the Government newspaper of Berlin, as a proof of the great esteem felt in England for the Manteuffel régime.

Rumours are still current of a Ministerial crisis in Austria; but the cause is now found in the illness of Herr von Schmerling. It has been said that this able minister, whose maintainers in office it is much to be desired for the sake of the development of the new Austrian institutions, had tendered his resignation; but we are glad to see that this rumour is so actively contradicted.

The project of a World Exhibition in Vienna in 1866 has been definitively abandoned.

The Municipal Council of Vienna received a severe rebuff from the Emperor upon its presentation of an address in favour of Slesvig-Holstein. The Emperor, who also showed his dissatisfaction by his manner, told the deputation that he should conscientiously fulfil his duties as a German Federal Prince and labor with all his strength for the preservation of the constitutional rights of the Duchies; but that it would be better for the council, instead of busying itself with questions of higher politics or subjects which do not belong to its sphere of action, to devote itself to municipal affairs. This rebuke, some of the recent proceedings of the council have, it is said, well earned.

The Pretender has addressed from Gotha a very ridiculous proclamation to the Slesvig-Holsteiners, in which he assures them that he is busying himself with the creation of a Slesvig-Holstein army, and declares that the rights of legitimacy, the privileges of the Duchies, National claims, and the demands of humanity, are all united in his person; and assures everybody that when the Duchies are under his sway they will be for Germany and Europe a guarantee of peace and order.

Lord Wodehouse, who has been sent on an extraordinary mission to the new King of Denmark, has passed round by Berlin on his way to Copenhagen. He has seen Herr von Bismarck and the King. Two other extraordinary ministers, General Fleury, on the part of the Emperor of the French, and M. Ewers from the Czar, will meet him there.

We hope that these ministers, instead of urging upon the King of Denmark further concessions, which will only discontent his people without satisfying Germany, will be able to give him an assurance of the resolve of their courts to protect him.

The Danish newspapers have made the startling announcement that Sweden has retired from her alliance with Denmark, on the ground that as the quarrel now turns upon the London Treaty, Sweden must act with the other Powers. It is difficult to credit this story, which, if true, shows that Sweden must be plotting against the integrity of Denmark, although the speech of the King of Sweden, in which he deprecates drawing the sword for Denmark, seems to give it some corroboration. It is certainly more credible than this despatch published subsequently by a Copenhagen journal. "Twenty-two thousand Swedes are arming. The King accompanies them in person." If the Swedes are arming they will not come in quite such a hasty manner. The summons of the Powers charged with the Execution would, it is supposed, reach Copenhagen on the 13th. In that case, if no fresh delay intervene, the German troops would enter Holstein on the 24th. It is not yet known what course the Danish Government will take. The concentration of troops in Holstein looks like resistance; on the other hand it is not probable that it would defy, single-handed, the strength of Germany, and it is doubtful whether it can obtain aid to resist Execution.

More replies to the Emperor's invitation to the Congress have been published. The answer of the Emperor of Austria was accompanied by a despatch in which the necessity of a previous settlement of the programme was strongly urged. The Pope expressed the hope that the principles of justice, now trodden under feet, would be recognised and violated rights re-established—i.e., that his Holiness would get his provinces back from Piedmont—and further, that in Catholic countries the real pre-eminence which belongs naturally to the Catholic religion as the only true one, would be re-established. The King of Denmark accepts the proposal without reserve and with great delight, and is profuse in his professions of friendship. The King of Italy also accepts without reserve. The other answers are not worth special notice.

The bill for the new loan has been laid before the Corps Législatif, and the discussion upon the Address has commenced in the Senate. The Marquis de Boisvieux made a remarkable speech, attacking the entourage of the Emperor, denouncing the Mexican expedition, protesting against war for Poland, and, as usual, abusing England. The effect of the speech seems to have been great.

M. de la Guéronnière criticised the conduct of the Administration in the elections, and protested against the restrictions upon the liberty of the press. M. Rouher, the Minister of State, stated, in reply, that if the liberty, so ardently demanded were given, "the edifice would soon crumble beneath the blows" of the old political parties; and protested against the assertion of the Marquis de Boissy that "ill-omened and pestiferous persons surround the Emperor."

M. Pelletau, the Opposition candidate for the seat for Paris, which he had to vacate for a formal error, has been returned by a large majority over M. Picard, the candidate of the Government. An Opposition candidate has also been returned for Dijon.

The Italian Chamber of Deputies concluded the debate on Sicily by this resolution, carried by 206 to 52 votes. "The Chamber, approving the conduct of the Government, passes to the order of the day." The finance minister, Minghetti, has made a financial statement, which, although it was received with great applause, seems to have been, as far as telegraphic summary will show, a very unsatisfactory one. We must reserve our judgment, however, until we get the whole of the figures.

The Warsaw police are very active, and seem now to have everything their own way. They are closing shops, and, as usual, arresting wholesale. Their labours do not seem, however, to be now interrupted by assassination. The decrees of the National Government are no longer executed.

The Madrid newspapers have resolved not to appear in the gallery, or to publish any reports of the proceedings of the Congress, or any comments upon them, except the official summary, until certain measures derogatory to their dignity have been revoked by the President.

INDIA.

LORD ELGIN died on the 20th November.

The expedition despatched against the Sitana fanatics on the Punjab frontier finds that it has a difficult work to accomplish. All the Hill tribes have, it is said, risen against British rule, and a serious engagement took place on the 20th November. The rebels were the assailants. They attacked the British position with much determination, and, although repulsed, inflicted a serious loss upon the British. Two officers were killed, and five, including Sir Neville Chamberlain, the general in command of the expedition, wounded; 128 British and native rank and file were killed and wounded. The repulse seems to have seriously daunted the natives.

CHINA AND JAPAN.

BURGEVINE and the other foreigners whose adoption of the rebel cause at one time occasioned some uneasiness, have been induced by promises of pardon to abandon it. The fact is rather creditable to the rebels. It would seem to show that they do not give their partisans those opportunities of profit and plunder, by which the imperialists have purchased the service of these English, French, and American mercenaries. Major Gordon, late an officer in the English army, who now commands the Chinese, is besieging Soochow with artillery lent him by the British general; and Captain Sherard Osborne, another British officer, who has accepted the pay of the Chinese Government, will soon co-operate with a fleet of gun-boats.

From Japan there is a strange story about a meeting of the Daimios, at which it was decided by 65 to 47 votes, that there were no grounds for declaring war against the foreigners. Where reporters present? Has the division list been published? The tales should have been made complete. We ought to have had the speeches and the names of the voters. One would have looked with some curiosity to see on which side Satsuma's vote was recorded.

NEW ZEALAND.

The last mail brings the intelligence of several small but severe fights with the natives, who, although thoroughly beaten in every encounter, inflicted heavy losses upon the troops and settlers, and fought with the utmost pluck and pertinacity. General Cameron is concentrating his forces for an attack upon the main position of the Maories, and it is hoped that if a signal defeat is then inflicted upon them they will be dispirited and begin to ask for peace.

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, December 15.

THE Times remarks very truly that the answers of England and Austria to the invitation to a Congress differ only in style, as the three energetic monosyllables of the pot-house differ from the well-bred "I beg your pardon" of the drawing-room. The effect produced on ears so well-bred as those of France is such as might have been foreseen, and the desire of the whole nation being very sincerely for peace, it is good policy to insist on the selfishness of the country which in such plain (in French, brutal) language refuses to help in maintaining it. The warmest admirers of the present English Administration must regret that the Foreign Minister, who is so little strong in action, should be still less suave in manner. He may do no immediate harm, thanks to the impulsive wisdom which rules French destinies, but he keeps up the the acrid irritation which, if it be extinguished in the mouths of all but Cabinet Ministers on your side of the Channel, is ever ready to blaze out here.

For a month or two the disappointment which the frustration of this plan has occasioned will vent itself in public and private in abuse of England. As yet, at all events, no warlike feeling has been roused. The address proposed to the Senate for adoption is studiously pacific, and it is understood that at a meeting of the Liberal members of the Assembly it was resolved to offer no amendment which should point to war. The tone of the Assembly's address will be as peaceful as that of the Senate; but a bad feeling towards England has been very gratuitously produced, for the Congress was not aimed against her, and that cordial understanding which was the best guarantee of European peace, has again, as it was a year ago, on the subject of mediation, been interrupted with little cause.

The Continental press seems to be again turning its attention to the American war. Even that of Italy, abandoning at last "questions of sacristy," has lately shown itself alyce to the world-wide importance of the struggle. It is a hopeful and unhopd-for sign of vitality in the Italian Liberal press, that it studies a question so full of instruction for us all in so fair a spirit. Of several articles which have appeared in the last ten days, I enclose you one, in the hope that you will find room for it, from the Discussione, a Liberal paper, whose motto is "Unity and Independence." It is by far the most remarkable article I have ever seen on the subject in a continental newspaper, as it deals with it in a thoroughly constitutional spirit. If it tells us nothing new about America, it gives us news, and very cheering news, of Italy.

Nor is the French press altogether silent. I have before this called your attention to a weekly paper, the Mémorial Diplomatique, whose connection with the Foreign-offices of Paris and Vienna must be now known to all your readers. This week's number contains four columns of review of Mr. Walker's "Familiar Epistle." I mean the epistle which must be by this time familiar to him, the opening paragraphs of which I translate. Like the bishop's apology for the Bible, of which George III. said he had never supposed that it needed one, they are an admirable apology for the epistle to the Walkers. The reviewer, like a skilful playwright, reveals in the last paragraph the secret of its authorship—a secret which, as in all plays, must have already made itself evident to whoever read it.

"Of all the arms which the Northerners employ to kill the young Confederate branch which has fallen away from them, and in which all the sap of the old Union tree seems to have taken refuge, calumny is that which they have used with most success.

"If during the three years that one of the most important political revolutions and one of the greatest wars of our times have lasted, no political or military leader of eminence has appeared on the side of the Northerners, they have at all events produced numerous and brilliant masters in the difficult, if little honourable art, of the Basilisks.

"Had McDowell, McClellan, Pope, Burnside, and Hooker, gained all the battles they have lost, they would have done less for the Federal cause than it has derived from the thousands of knowing calumnies which the press of the North daily puts into circulation, and which the partisans of the Federal Government propagate with such zeal. In Europe, it is chiefly in England and France that the zeal of their calumny-mongers has done good service to the Union. By false representations cleverly made, by perfidious insinuations casually put forth, these agents have managed to deceive a part of the public opinion of Europe by persuading it that in the American conflict the North represents justice, right, and, above all, Democracy.

"Had the South not had these calumnies to fight down it would have been long since victorious. Europe, enlightened as to the real objects of the North, would have given the Confederates that sympathy which has been wanting to them till now, and strong in the moral force which this encouragement would have given them, they would long since have secured their independence and proved to the world that the only republicans in America are to be found in the South.

"But calumny is like the hundred-headed Hydra of fable. As fast as one is cut off another springs up, and the Southerners, who have a hundred, a thousand times, destroyed those directed against them, are still condemned to recommence the ungrateful task, and still they do not lose patience.

"Once again it is undertaken, and this time with greater talent and cleverness than ever. A Southern patriot, but a friend of truth, who seeks to hide his name under the pseudonym of Jonathan Slingsby, but who can hide neither his wit nor his pungent causticity, has just published in London a remarkable pamphlet, in which the principal calumnies directed against the South and its leaders are taken up one after another, and refuted with an abundance of proofs and an energy of language which leave henceforward little chance of success to those who may seek to revive them.

"We hope that we are not indiscreet in announcing that this odd "Jonathan Slingsby" is the transparent mask which covers one of the most distinguished Southerners in Paris; one who, by the untiring activity he displays in attacking the calumnies and lies aimed at his country and his fellow-citizens, has rendered the most effective services to the Confederate States. It is easy to guess the real name of this witty and caustic writer."

The first masked ball at the opera took place on Saturday night. Those who were there found it, as usual, very dull, which will not prevent their returning. It is an ever new deception, but not without its use. One of the small newspapers which have of late had such success here, gives curious statistics of the movements of money these balls give rise to. That of Saturday night gave a receipt, money taken at the door and for refreshments, of £1,215, and calculates the money spent in this way, and for masks, dominoes, and hire of dresses, &c., at £5,800 for each ball. Fourteen are given in the season, making a total expenditure in this one kind of amusement of nearly £80,000.

The first debate on the Address in the Senate took place on Monday. It must have been very amusing for the privileged hearers (the Senate debates with closed doors), for even in the dry leaves of the Moniteur it stands out in lively contrast with the usual dullness of that grave official. The eccentric Anglo-phobe, the Marquis de Boissy, furnished the entertainment, aided by occasional interruptions from the President and various members of the august body. Each interruption, whether by one or many senators, only served to strengthen the antæan verve of the speaker, who told his colleagues some hard truths on many subjects. He laid before them, if not new, at least seldom expressed, opinions of the Poles, to whom he conceded only the merit of having fought almost as bravely as Frenchmen. Some one said "Quite as bravely." "No," said the Marquis, "not quite; for I will never allow that foreigners, whoever they be, can equal us in anything whatever."

The dialogue went on with this style of sparring till the President, seeing perhaps that he and others were getting the worst of it, rebuked one M. Vincent, for interrupting, with this naïve remark:—"You think you are embarrassing M. de Boissy by interrupting, by not doing so you would probably embarrass him more." After a well-earned rest of ten minutes the speaker continued, calling attention to the ambiguous phrase in which England's rejection of the Congress is noticed. In hardy language, he blames the servility of the flatterers who surround the Emperor. He ends by saying that he had no intention of making an Opposition speech: he had done so, and on his honour he was sorry for it. "I have but one object, it is to serve my country and the Emperor in rising to tell him the truth. This will serve him better than flatteries—better than if I came impudently lying to him and said:—"Yes! the policy of your Government is dear to France, the policy of your Government is approved by the country, the Emperor has grown in the affections of his people. I do not say so, and I shall not say so." These are but a few of the flowers of eloquence with which this speech is thickly strewn. No wonder M. de Boissy was interrupted. It says something for the French Senate that he was able to make himself heard; but he is, as you see, very amusing, and, although so hard a hitter, he is a general favourite.

M. Pelletau, the Liberal member for Paris, who was ousted in consequence of an informality in his election, has been re-elected by an immense majority. The Government candidate had far fewer votes than at the general election, which seems to contradict the report that great pressure had been brought to bear upon the electors.

The expectations of a great relaxation, if not entire liberty, in the régime of the press, raised by M. de Girardin's visit to Compiègne and the well-known opinions of the Duc de Morny, seem doomed to disappointment. Nothing has been done in this matter, and as it is well known that the condition of the press is a topic on which a large minority will vote with the Opposition in the debates on the Address in the Legislative Assembly, nothing will now be done. The strongest argument for the proposed concessions was the disarming the Opposition on the subject on which it is most unanimous. The Bill for the new loan has been introduced; but, notwithstanding this, there are rumours of a further one being in contemplation. I mention, without giving much credit, for the moment at least, to the rumour.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE

(From our Special Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, December 16.

AN important meeting of delegates from the several Southern Societies in these districts was held last evening at the Clarence, for the purpose of conferring with the Executive Committee of the Central Association and with each other, as to the best means of bringing the influence of public feeling to bear upon Her Majesty's Government, with a view to the recognition of the Confederate States. The attendance of representatives was numerous, and the greatest interest was manifested throughout the proceedings. Manchester was represented by Mr. W. R. Callender (Vice-Chairman of the Central Committee), and by Messrs. Pooley, J. H. Clarke, T. Briggs, Rev. Geo. Huntington, Rev. W. Whitelegge, Messrs. Armstrong, Stutter, Neild, Crowther, Sten-house, Parker, Hough, W. Potter, Bromley, &c. Mr. Mortimer Collins, the Secretary of the Association, was also present. The districts were severally represented by the following gentlemen: Stockport—Messrs. Constantine and Leigh; Rochdale—Mr. Thos. Staley; Bradford—Mr. J. Leach; Hyde—Messrs. Wild and Fletcher; Glossop—Mr. C. Schofield; Oldham—Messrs. Whittaker, Steeple, and Counsellor Harrop; Delf and Saddleworth—Mr. Lees, J.P.; Macclesfield—Messrs. Cheetham and Bridge; Heywood—Mr. Fairbrother; Middleton—Mr. Woolstencroft; Alderley (Chorley)—Mr. J. Beesley, &c., &c.

Mr. W. R. Callender presided.

The Chairman, after referring to the practical uses of a gathering of that description, and having briefly reviewed the successful labours of the association he had the honour to be identified with, remarked that the field of their operations was a wide one, while the time they had at their disposal was brief, and should therefore be made the most of. The object of the Southern Independence Association was expressed in the title of that society. They sought to assist, by the legitimate exercise of their moral influence, the Southern States of America in their struggle for independence. They did not ask one another which side was to blame in having led to this fearful war; whether the North precipitated hostilities by a breach of faith and the warlike occupation of Southern territory, or whether the South was in fault in firing the shot at Fort Sumter. Nor did they ask themselves under what circumstances the disruption of the Republic had its origin,—whether slavery was the cause of it, or whether it arose through a series of constitutional wrongs on the part of the Federal Government. Nor need they concern themselves as to one another's motives in uniting under the title of the Southern Independence Association. Whether they acted for political feeling, or from religious feeling, or from a national feeling in regard to what they considered the best interests of their own country, or whether from a dislike of the principles and conduct of the Union and Emancipation Society. Nor was it their business to fix upon the proper time or the proper mode for the British Government to take action between the contending parties. That was a matter of which Her Majesty's Ministers were the constituted and responsible judges, and it was not doubted that they would be held strictly to account as the custodians of the national honour. The chief object, as he apprehended, of their Association was to counteract the designs and correct the misstatements of the partisans of the North, and to give a denial to Earl Russell's assertion as to the tendency of English feeling. They would leave it to the Government to select the time and opportunity for the recognition of the South, but they would also take measures to assure Her Majesty's Ministers that when the time did come, they would only be expressing the wishes of the majority of the people of this country by receiving the Confederacy as a member of the family of nations. Englishmen were opposed to the continuance of the war on many grounds. As philanthropists, they could not but regret the untold horrors that were enacting on that unhappy continent. As a free people, they regretted the continuance of a state of things under which free institutions had given way—which had led to the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, and the ultimate issue of which might be a military despotism. As political economists, they were opposed to the drawing away of hundreds of thousands of people from the development of the material interests of the country, to the prosecution of a devastating war. As friends of the negro, they desired that the struggle should cease, not, however, by a reconstruction of the Union under which slavery had thriven, but by separation of the States, which, he believed, would infallibly tend to the abolition of slavery. And lastly, they wished for peace for the sake of their own people, who were suffering so grievously from the evils of cotton famine—evils, he believed, which could be remedied in no other way than by the Southern States obtaining their independence. The subjugation of the South he believed to be impossible, and the reconstruction of the Union by a compromise he believed to be equally impossible and undesirable.

Mr. Mortimer Collins addressed the meeting. He reviewed the recent events of the war, and heavily discounted the reported Federal successes at Chattanooga. He also spoke warmly of the depth and heartiness of Confederate sympathy in England, and after reporting upon the successful efforts of the Association in giving expression to the real feeling in the manufacturing districts, he concluded by inviting the delegates to a discussion of the various matters that would be brought before them in committee.

The meeting accordingly resolved itself into committee, and a variety of important suggestions were considered and adopted.

But while the Southern Independence Association is thus concentrating its forces at home, it must not be supposed that its energies are chiefly confined to this city, or even to the county palatine of Lancaster. The most populous of the manufacturing towns in Cheshire have long since made common cause with us. Yorkshire is showing symptoms of actively following suit, and Mr. Forster will soon learn that he represents Bradford with as considerable "a difference" as Mr. Cobden represents Rochdale. In the Potteries, too, the movement is spreading with unqualified success, and preparations are on foot for hoisting the Confederate flag (Mr. Bright notwithstanding) in the "hardware" metropolis of the midland counties. But the most signal triumph gained by the Association outside of Lancashire was achieved last week in the county town of Leicester, on the occasion of a lecture being delivered there by a gentleman (Mr. J. H. Smith) who has himself stood in the battle between North and South, and whose denunciation of the barbarities of Federal warfare produced a thrilling effect upon his hearers. A clique of Unionists did their utmost to interrupt the unwelcome narrative, but without avail.

At the conclusion of the lecture the following resolution was moved, but rejected by an overwhelming majority:—

"That the object of Mr. Smith's lectures being to organise English opinion on behalf of Southern Independence, this meeting entirely dissents from such a movement (loud and general cries of 'No, no,') as being utterly subversive of that judicious neutrality which has hitherto been observed by the English Government." (A voice: "They'll get their independence without the opinion of this meeting.")—Cheers.

The Northern party then attempted to raise the question of slavery, but the meeting indignantly repudiated this as a false issue, at the same time, however, recording its opinion upon that portion of the subject in the following terms:—

"That in the opinion of this meeting the system of slavery in the United States of America is at variance with the principles of humanity and justice, and that its extinction will be best promoted by the separation of the Southern States from the Northern States—a conclusion which will be conducive to the material prosperity of America and England, and the peace of the world at large."

In supporting that resolution, the Rev. W. Woods (Independent Minister) said that in these days of War Christianity he felt he was not out of place in standing upon a political platform in the interests of peace. With regard to slavery, he quite agreed with a previous speaker, who told them, while arguing on the side of the North, that slavery could not long exist if the area over which it existed were limited. He fully believed that; and, because he believed it, he would draw a line of demarcation between the Slave States and the Free States, and he would utter with a voice that should reach to the extremity of the Southern States, that every slave who crossed that line should be free. He maintained that such a line ought to be laid down, and the shield of American liberty thrown over the whole, instead of over a few of the States that had slaves in them. Some four or five Slave States were at this moment under the protection of President Lincoln. (Disapprobation from the Northerners.) If there were a single slave in those States which Abraham Lincoln protected, all he could say was that those who permitted him to do it, and insisted that he should do it, were not true to the principles of republicanism. Whilst he believed Abraham Lincoln to be an "honest man," he did not believe in Abraham Lincoln's government. He was not prepared as a man and a philanthropist—he was not prepared as a Christian—to support a bloody and cruel war for the liberation of the slave.

The proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the lecturer and with the most cordial expressions of sympathy with the Confederate cause.

To-morrow evening (Thursday) an open meeting of the inhabitants of the important manufacturing town of Burnley is to be convened by his worship the Mayor, to take into consideration the policy of the English Government in regard to the war. Burnley, like Stockport, Oldham, Ashton, Preston, &c., is suffering acutely from the cotton famine. Apropos of Stockport, the Southerners in that town were so delighted with the speech recently delivered there by Mr. Spence, that they have had it reprinted, and copies of it, in simple wooden frames, are now hanging on the walls of many an humble dwelling in this locality.

MR. COBDEN AND THE TIMES.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—During the Corn-law agitation Mr. Cobden translated into platform vernacular important truths, enunciated by political economists and statisticians in less popular language, and by so doing he rendered a valuable service, for which he has been very liberally rewarded. The success of the honourable gentleman induced him and others to believe that he could originate as well as translate, and credit was given to him for being a master of common sense and the art of logic. Mr. Cobden's repeated failures have considerably shaken his reputation, and now he comes forward and in a most frank manner shows that he has no more claim to be ranked as a logician than Zadkiel was to be entitled a prophet. Allow me, sir, to put his confession in a readable form, for the amusement and instruction of your subscribers on both sides of the Atlantic.

Mr. Cobden is indignant with the Times because that journal charged Mr. Bright with proposing that the lands of the rich should be divided among the poor. What Mr. Bright did say was:—"But with laws such as we have, which are intended to bring vast tracts of land into the possession of one man, that one man may exercise great political power; that system is the curse of the country, and dooms the agricultural labourer to perpetual poverty and degradation." Seeing that land is perpetually changing owners in this country, that estates are constantly offered in the market, that there is no law to prevent any man, having the money, from buying land, and as Mr. Bright wants our laws altered, so that vast tracts of land may not be in one man's possession, and that the agricultural labourer may not consequently be in poverty and degradation, I submit that the construction of the Times was perfectly fair, and that, either consciously or unconsciously, Mr. Bright did propose or advocate a division among the poor of the lands of the rich. Mr. Cobden thinks differently; but instead of explaining the grounds of his opinion, he addressed an insolent, coarse, and foolish letter to the Times, which the editor of that paper refused to publish, but was so courteous as to write to Mr. Cobden a letter stating why his communication was rejected. Mr. Cobden was not to be baulked, but sent his letter to the other papers. The English press did not disgrace itself by printing it, but it found its way into the Anglo-Yankee press—to wit, the Daily News and the Morning Star.

You will perceive, sir, that the professed object of Mr. Cobden's letter was to vindicate his friend from the charge of demagoguism, and yet he writes "to say that it is a foul libel for which the writer is amenable to the law, were beside the question, because the object of the calumny would scorn any other court of appeal than that of public opinion." Can more arrant demagoguism be conceived? Here we are told, on the authority of Mr. Cobden, a self-constituted teacher of the people, that Mr. Bright, another self-constituted teacher of the people, scorns such protection as the laws of his country afford, and prefers an appeal to public opinion. This is certainly an odd defence.

Mr. Cobden, in very common billingsgate, falls foul of the Times and observes, "The writers are, I believe, betrayed into this tone mainly by their reliance on the shield of an impenetrable secrecy." In the next paragraph of his letter we read, "They who associate in the higher political circles of the metropolis, know that the chief editor and the manager of the Times, while still maintaining a strict incognito towards the public, drop the mask with very sufficient reasons in the presence of those powerful chiefs who are at once the dispensers of social distinction and (on which I might have something to say) of the patronage of the Government. We all know the man whose fortune is derived from the Times. We know its manager; its only avowed and responsible editor." What does Mr. Cobden mean? He objects to secrecy, and he objects to the secret being divulged. The Times is censured because it maintains an impenetrable secrecy. The Times is exceedingly naughty because it reveals its personality to the people whom it attacks. Mr. Cobden threatens to summon "the responsible editor, manager, or proprietor to the bar of public opinion, and hold him up to the obloquy that awaits the traducer and calumniator in every other walk of political life;" and yet he admits that the editor, manager, and proprietor are known personally to the higher political circles, including Messrs. Cobden and Bright, and is very wroth at the circumstance. He knows, and Mr. Bright knows, who is responsible for the remark of which he complains in the Times; he says that that person does not seek concealment from Mr. Bright and the rest of those who constitute the higher political circles; and yet he asks, "Will he deny that if he were to meet Mr. Bright in the club, or in the House of Commons, with the knowledge that his secret was divulged, he would cover with conscious inferiority before the man he stabbed in the dark?" Mr. Cobden's logic amounts to this, that the Times reveals its personality to the leading politicians of the metropolis, including Messrs. Cobden and Bright; therefore the Times is encouraged to stab leading politicians, including Mr. Bright, in the dark.

So much for Mr. Cobden's logic; and now for his political morality. It is evident, I suppose, that the editors, managers, and proprietors of papers cannot avoid going into society, and that it would be impossible to conceal their identity. What they are bound to do, according to the etiquette of English journalism, is, to abstain from publicly declaring their connection with their papers; and the private society in which they mix is bound by common courtesy, and by honour, not to make public the incognito that is revealed to it. Mr. Cobden threatened to divulge the names of the proprietor, the manager, and the editor of the Times, thus violating a rule of social intercourse and taking a paltry, ungentlemanly, and unmanly advantage of the frank association maintained amongst the higher political circles of the metropolis. Now, sir, this is a public scandal. Nothing has so tended to prevent English party warfare degenerating into hate and faction as the friendly intercourse of the members of different parties in private life. The Earl of Derby and Lord Palmerston, Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Disraeli, are thrown together and converse together, but any one of them would as soon think of cutting off his right hand as abusing this mutual confidence. Mr. Cobden, so far as the editor of the Times is concerned, has carried out his threat, and no gentleman in Europe, nay, no person with a spark of manhood in his composition, will not denounce the act.

But Mr. Cobden is not only illogical, and a violator of the laws of society, but he is thoroughly impotent. The secret he threatens to reveal is generally known. As it happens, the names of the manager and the editor of the Times have been published, and are perfectly familiar to the public. The gentleman referred to as the proprietor—whether he is or is not the proprietor I am not aware—is known throughout the world as the son of the man who made the Times what it is, and to whose memory every English journalist and every friend of journalism pays respect. Mr. Cobden writes, "We all know the man whose fortune is derived from the Times." Pray, sir, can you tell me of any fortune more fairly acquired? By wonderful enterprise, by hard work, and by honest independence, the late proprietor of the Times made his fortune. He made his money by commerce, not by receiving special rewards for public services. Does Mr. Cobden forget the anecdote of a splendid present being sent to that proprietor from a foreign potentate, and after being admired by the family returned to the donor? Does Mr. Cobden forget that the Times, in his day, rendered a great and costly service to the commercial community, and instead of accepting the money collected as a recompense and testimonial, would receive nothing but a tablet, and that the rest of the money was employed to found some scholarships? Surely, sir, to make a fortune by commerce, and to refuse such rewards, is quite as honourable as working for a cause and then sending round the hat, or at all events accepting a fortune from the generous munificence of the public.

Mr. Cobden says, the Times "never enters my house except by the merest accident." Now, I happen to know that Mr. Bright never receives the Times into his house—that like myself, he is not in the habit of seeing it, except at the club during the session." Then, sir, would it not be well for the Times to cease giving full reports, or any reports, of the speeches of Messrs. Cobden and Bright? Why should that journal go to the expense of verbatim and prompt reports? The public does not care about wading through columns of Messrs. Cobden and Bright's talk, and we have the word of Mr. Cobden that neither he nor Mr. Bright considers the Times worth reading. How curious, by the way, that Mr. Cobden should be so enraged about the remark of a journal which he holds in such contempt.

And please, sir, to enlighten me on this point. Is Mr. Cobden the public censor of the press, and can he make journals insert what he likes? He writes: "In about sixty days, at the utmost, Parliament will be in session, and it will then be in the power of those whom he maligns and refuses a hearing (if they should be so disposed) to make the columns of his own paper the vehicle for a searching, detailed, and complete exposure of what I venture to call a flagrant public abuse." Suppose the Times refused to publish the speeches of the members for Rochdale and Birmingham, could Mr. Cobden imprison the proprietor, editor, and manager, or even cause those gentlemen to be publicly executed?

Mr. Cobden writes that he is "tending to the conviction that here are three conditions only necessary to the success of any great project of reform; namely, a good cause, persevering advocates, and the hostility of the Times." I do not agree with him, but of this I am certain, that the advocacy of any cause, good or bad, by Messrs. Cobden and Bright, is sure to damn it. Whenever Mr. Bright comes out strong upon the question of peace, his constituents are in good spirits, for then that war is probable and that they may soon expect large orders for small arms. What made a Reform Bill unpopular? The advocacy of Messrs. Cobden and Bright. Be assured, sir, that the cause you uphold—that of the Confederate States—has practically few better friends than Messrs. Cobden and Bright; for everybody feels that they are sure to be on the wrong side, and that what they oppose deserves to prosper, and will ultimately triumph. However, Mr. Cobden will henceforth do little for friend or foe. He thought to injure the Times (a journal which gives plenty of opportunities for well-merited censures), but instead of so doing he has made himself ridiculous and contemptible.

I am, sir, yours, &c.,

London, December 15th.

E. Q. V.

CHARLES THE BOLD.*

OF the many extraordinary specimens of book-making that have come under our notice, the two ponderous volumes which constitute the first instalment of Mr. Kirk's Charles the Bold bear the palm. It is common enough for novelists to make much of scanty materials, and to be so diffuse that it demands wonderful patience and skill to discover their stories amidst masses of verbiage. But hitherto historians have been tolerably exempt from this fault, and for the very sufficient reason that the difficulty they have to encounter is a superabundance of matter relevant to their subjects. We cannot, however, apply any ordinary canon of criticism to Mr. Kirk's curious patch-work, in which the adventures of his nominal hero are only used to stitch together incongruous essays and common-place moral reflections. If Mr. Kirk's work had been called "The History of Charles the Bold and of Louis the XI., together with the Biographies of their Predecessors, with a Sketch of the War of the Roses in England, to which is added the Author's Reflections on Things in General," the title page would have given the reader a better, but still inadequate, conception of the multifarious contents of the book. The early life of Charles, including extracts from original documents, only occupies six pages, whilst about fifty pages are given to the War of the Roses, and in which nothing is related that is not familiar to every village schoolboy. Mr. Kirk's excuse for giving us this dose of English history is, that Charles of Burgundy sided with one party and Louis XI. with the other. We are only surprised that he did not begin with the invasion of Britain by Julius Cæsar, and explain to the benighted world by what changes it came to pass that this country fell under the dominion of the Normans. Was not Normandy a province over which Louis reigned, and which Charles endeavoured to wrest from his rival? Very often our author, with no better reason, introduces a chapter from history quite foreign to his subject. But still worse than his historical wanderings are his reflections and his moral deductions. Sometimes they are so obvious that they could not by any possibility fail to suggest themselves to the most casual reader without any prompting. Many of our author's little sermons are true and good, in their way, but then they are very trite. Here and there we are favoured with a little piece of morality, or a small contribution to what Mr. Kirk no doubt thinks is the philosophy of history, which is neither obvious nor trite; but then it is sure to be at variance with anything like a reasonable commentary on the narrative. As for Mr. Kirk's style, we can only say that it is much more fitted for the paragraphing of a country paper than for history. Instead of being terse, it is rambling in the extreme. Mr. Kirk tries to say as little as he can in as many words as possible. One extract will prove the justness of this criticism. During the War of the Public Weal Louis found it necessary to leave Paris in order that he might in person look after his Norman levies. After being told that there was a strong party in Paris in favour of the confederates, who were leagued against the King, it is plain enough that Louis would not, except under compulsion and very reluctantly, leave his capital. Yet this reluctance is explained in the following roundabout passage, which, as far as we can discover, serves no other purpose than to inform all whom it may concern that Mr. Kirk has read Shakspeare's play of the "Merchant of Venice," as well as a popular history of England:—

Yet the King is loath to go,—"right loth," as Shylock to leave his daughter and his money-bags while maskers are abroad, albeit he has given orders that his "house's ears" be stopped. He fears that, when his back is turned, Jessica will "clamber up to the casements;" that the prowler's steps will be quickened by beckoning and signals from within.

It is not without regret that we feel ourselves compelled to speak in these terms of a work which, with all its faults, evinces industry and a certain amount of talent. When, however, a writer comes before us as an historian, and claims to rank with some of the greatest minds that have ever adorned the republic of letters, justice must not be blinded by sympathy with disappointed vanity. Besides, with a work of such pretensions the author has little to hope or fear from criticism. Friendly puffs cannot save it from oblivion if it has no merit, nor can undeserved censure injure it if it has merit. After all, it is the reader, not the reviewer, who determines the fate of a book; for the reviewer ceases to have power whenever he ceases to be representative. We doubt not that, if Mr. Kirk had contented himself with writing a one volume biography of Charles the Bold, he would have produced an acceptable and an agreeable narrative, and that if he were to delete from the work he has published all the extraneous episodes and reflections, the residue would be deserving of praise and not of censure. Mr. Kirk is evidently painstaking, scrupulously conscientious, writes with a noble purpose, and is inspired by a high toned morality. If he has not the gift of writing history it is a pity that his energies and time should be wasted in vain efforts to do so. If, on the contrary, he has that rare talent, it is a kindness to point the errors of judgment which render it useless.

No subject could be selected that offers greater advantages to an author than the history of Charles the Bold. The stage is crowded with well-defined and remarkable characters, and, in theatrical parlance, every supernumerary would, but from association with still more eminent personages, be the observed of all observers. There are the intriguing Croys; there is the ambitious Saint-Pol, scheming for place and pay; there is the king's brother, whom Louis uses as a chess-player does a pawn; there is Philip the Good, in his last days perpetrating the savage crime of destroying the town of Dinant, because some of the citizens had indulged in a sorry jest. One by one the vassals of the king of France play an important part in the drama. Now the Roman Church, still a mighty temporal power, appears; and anon Warwick the king-maker flits across the scene. Now we see Margaret and her son supplicating the protection of Louis, and shortly afterwards we behold Edward pleading for aid at the feet of Charles. And there are characters, such as Margaret and Isabella, which arouse a more tender interest. But our attention is fixed upon the two men who are the leaders in the great struggle. Much alike, and yet very unlike, are Charles and Louis. Both are ambitious, both are cruel and revengeful, and neither one nor the other deserves the admiration of posterity. But Louis the Astute was a cunning villain, who loved hypocrisy for hypocrisy's sake; to whom perjury was no offence; who would grovel in the dust and lick the shoes of those he hated; who was every inch a coward, both physically and morally; who feared himself even more than his victims feared him, and who was accursed as well as a curse. Now Charles the Bold, the remorseless destroyer of the innocent, the tyrant who mocked the victims of his wrath with a show of justice, was very different to his creeping, cringing rival. He was not a hypocrite; he did not delight in perjury; and at the worst crisis of his fortunes he never betrayed any trepidation, but demeaned himself as a prince.

And then the deeds, as well as the men, are a splendid theme for the historian. The age of chivalry had not passed away, though its days were numbered, and jousts and tournaments are mingled with actual warfare. The complications of the drama are manifold, and the interest never flags. Now it is the confederated vassals against the king, then it is Burgundy against all France; now England is the ally of Louis, and after awhile England is on the side of Charles. At one time Louis seems utterly crushed, and in the grasp of his powerful adversary; but just when we expect that his ruin will be consummated we find all is changed, and that the king is triumphant and Charles in jeopardy. So engrossed are we with the story, that we almost forget for what a splendid prize each was contending: Louis to be king indeed of France, and Charles to be the independent ruler over domains which would have made him the most puissant prince in Europe.

Mr. Kirk treats the contest between Charles and Louis as the great and final trial between feudalism and royalty. Strange it is that he should have fallen into such an error. He tells us over and over again that the Dukes of Burgundy were only nominally vassals; that Philip the Good had more than once refused the title of king; and he points out how Louis was compelled to tremble before his vassal Charles the Bold. It is just such hasty, erroneous conclusions as these that render the lessons of history useless, and that make us gain no more from the records of the past than a knowledge of names and dates, and an acquaintance with some stirring adventures. The feudal system was a necessity. In the times in which it flourished, the only means by which a monarch could govern a large territory was by dividing his power. It was natural that the king should be jealous of his vassal, and that the vassal should strive to be as independent as possible. This chronic conflict between the immediate lords of the soil and the lord paramount was the germ of national and social freedom, and prevented Europe from degenerating into abject submission to a few irresponsible potentates. In England it was the feudal barons who obtained for us our first charter of freedom; and, happily for this country, the feudal lords were severally too weak to become independent, and it was only by union and the formation of great parties that they were enabled to hold the sovereign in check. On the Continent, it was somewhat different: there some vassals attained sufficient power to set up for themselves. The Dukes of Burgundy, for example, owed allegiance to more than one throne, and held their dominions by a tenure that was for all practical purposes thoroughly kingly. They became sovereign in everything, excepting name, and their co-vassals followed their example as far as they could. They ceased to be vassals, and the feudal confederacy against which the power of the king of France could not prevail was destroyed, and in place of it there were a number of petty sovereigns, each jealous of the other. Louis XI. took advantage of the barrier of feudalism being broken down. The ducal throne of Burgundy was the greatest that had been erected on the ruins of the feudal system, and therefore the most envied, so that Louis found little difficulty in forming alliances, against it. The King of France did not conquer feudalism, but obtained power because feudalism had ceased to exist, except in name and empty form.

LITERARY NOTES.

MORE than once of late, when we had thought that some question had been argued to an end, and that nothing remained but to "divide" public opinion on the subject, and abide by the vote, a contemporary whose thoughtful and practical tone commands our respect—except for its agricultural articles, which are neither thoughtful, practical, nor fair, and for its literary criticisms, which are pervaded by a spirit of fanatical Abolitionism—has suddenly thrown a wholly new light upon the question, often decisive of its character, and always obliging us to reconsider it with the greatest care. This is always done by showing some practical consequence involved in the decision, rather than by going over again the theoretical argument. We certainly imagined that the topic of anonymous writing was exhausted; that as Mr. Cobden had nothing but abuse to offer on his side, so the press had none but state truisms to allege in reply. The Economist, however, has taken up a new view of the subject, and has treated it with its usual clearness and force. The rule of anonymity, it observes, is necessary to maintain the rights and secure the interests of the proprietors of journals. If the law were to require that every article should be signed, the public would become used, not, as now, to like a particular journal, but to admire a special writer; and that writer would have it in his power, by his secession, to ruin the journal with which he had been connected. His successor might write quite as well; but he would not have the advantage of a popular reputation, and he would have no readers. Thus a law of this kind would virtually transfer the control of nearly all our journals from proprietors to writers. It would be an edict of confiscation against the former; it would emancipate the latter from a very wholesome control; as they are very bad men of business, it would not, probably, in the long run, prove advantageous to their pecuniary interests; and it would exercise a deleterious effect on the character of journalism in England. At present, that character is eminently conservative—using the term in a social and political, not in a party sense; all newspapers that have any circulation or influence—that are good properties—are controlled by men having the instincts of a propertied class, averse to confusion, dreading radical changes, and abhorring socialism. The removal of this check on the vagaries and extravagances of writers, leaving each free to indulge his own crochets to the uttermost in his own name, would be disastrous alike to the character of the press and to the interests of the public. Our contemporary, in calling attention to this view of the question, has rendered a service to the literary world at large—to authors, editors, and owners of literary property—which ought not to pass unacknowledged.

"Legends of the Lintel and the Ley,"* is a readable fireside book, containing a number of tales, more or less founded in fact, connected by passages of local description, well and quietly written. It is not exceedingly interesting, nor does it give promise of the highest order of talent; but it has a very pleasing, gentlemanly style, and a tone thoroughly suited to the nature of the work. Altogether, it is a much better book than many works of greater pretension.

The Western Coast of Africa, perhaps, the last region in which any one would travel for pleasure's sake: but the gentleman who prefers his title as Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society † to his own favourably known name contrives to make it pleasant to his fellow-travellers on paper. Gifted with a profound contempt for conventional opinions, which now and then, perhaps, seduces him into the opposite errors, and with a very unusual degree of moral courage, he speaks his mind on all subjects with a frankness which will frighten away not a few readers of weak nerves, and ensure him the honour of being heartily anathematised by Exeter Hall. The King of Dahomey and his horrible customs only provoked the remark—which will not be the less fiercely resented that it is literally true—that his Majesty "has no more power to abolish human sacrifices than the Prince of Wales to forbid morning service." And the writer is daring enough to think that, apart from some of its remoter consequences, the slave trade is not that unmitigated injury to the African race that it is supposed to be. The negro is a slave everywhere, and perhaps it is as well to be the slave of a Christian gentleman as of a heathen savage. The F.R.G.S. is likely to meet with less mercy than Dr. Colenso at the hands of the May meetings; and with less honour than he deserves from those who, thinking very much as he does, lack the courage which emboldens him to say what he thinks in the very plainest terms.

No one needs to be told that essays by Sir E. Bulwer Lytton contain many striking passages, or that they are extremely egotistical, and possess rather the appearance than the reality of depth and earnestness; or that they contain a frequent reference to the Useful and the Beautiful, always spelt with capital letters; or, in short, that they are marked by most of the peculiarities which abound in those philosophical disquisitions with which the great novelist interlards his fictions. "Caxtoniana" ‡ will never be one of his most popular works. Sir Edward is too clever and too industrious to commit an egregious failure in any walk of literature. Everything that comes from his pen is sure to have great merits, and to be marked by a strong and honest individuality; sure, also, to have had great pains bestowed upon it, and to contain some new thought, or fact, or fancy, which will dwell in the remembrance of the reader. Above all, it is certain to have the charm which high scholarship and refined taste lend to the writings of one who is at once an original genius and an accomplished gentleman. Nevertheless, these essays will add nothing to their writer's fame. Some of them are very clever; one or two of them are gems of humour and good sense; all of them are readable and deserve to be read. But it is clear to every reader that the author's forte does not lie in essay writing. If we may, without offence, whisper a secret into the ear of an author for whom we entertain the highest admiration, and whom we like even more than we admire him, we would tell Sir Edward that we, and every one we know, invariably skip those parts of his novels which are in the nature of essays. We don't learn anything from them, and they make us yawn horribly. We may give two reasons for our opinion that the author of the Caxtons can add nothing to his fame by Caxtoniana. First, he is not, though he tries to be, a philosophical thinker; what he means for philosophy is a mixture of metaphysics and sentiment, and when sifted and sounded is found to consist, like a cloud, of nothing but vapour, without any bottom whatsoever. Secondly, the charm of an essay lies in its style; and Sir Edward's style is his weakest point. We don't mean to say that it is bad, that it is in any degree comparable to that horrible jargon which sickens us in the works of Dickens, or has anything in common with the dialect of sensation novelists or magazine-mongers. Between the Bradtons and Salas, the Kingsleys and Yateses, and Sir Edward, there raves a gulf like that between the New York Herald and the Quarterly Review, the Telegraph and the Times. But for all that Sir Edward's style is one of his drawbacks; and greatly improved as it is since the days of "Pelham," it is not such as to lend charms to an essay. Indeed, we have no one living who can write a really good essay, unless it be Mr. Thackeray; and we confess ourselves unable to relish the terribly strong flavour of stychnine which pervades that author's most genial performances. Nevertheless, we need not say that we have read Caxtoniana with much pleasure, and that we expect all our readers to do the like. For the benefit of those, however, who may be too late to get hold of it this week at Mudie's or Hookham's, we extract the following very characteristic and very remarkable passage from an essay on the Clairvoyance of the Imagination:—

"Nothing is more frequent among novelists, even third-rate and fourth-rate, than 'to see through other organs than their eyes.' Clairvoyance is the badge of all their tribe. They can describe scenes they have never witnessed, more faithfully than the native who has lived amid those scenes from his cradle.

"I could cite many indisputable proofs of this phenomenon amongst my brethren in the masonry of fiction; but as I here contend that the gift, so far from being a rare attribute of genius, is shared, in a greater or lesser degree by all who concentrate imagination on particular objects, I abstain from a reference that would not convey the homage of a compliment but the affront of a disparagement. And, therefore, neither in self-conceit nor in self-depreciation, but just as a chemist who suggests a theory naturally adds to his suggestion the statement of his own experiments, I offer my personal evidence in favour of the doctrine I advance—viz., that there is nothing so rare as to excite our incredulous wonder in the faculty of seeing 'through other organs than the eyes.' I have had sometimes to describe minutely scenes which, at the time of describing, I had never witnessed. I visited those scenes later. I then examined them, with a natural apprehension that I must have committed some notable mistake, to be carefully corrected in any subsequent edition of the work in which such descriptions had been temerarily adventured. In no single instance could I ever find, after the most rigid scrutiny, that the clairvoyance of imagination had deceived me. I found nothing in the scenery I witnessed to induce me to retouch an outline or a colouring in the scenery I had imagined. I am not sure, indeed, that I could not describe the things I imagine more exactly than the things I habitually see. I am not sure that I could not give a more truthful picture of the Nile, which I have never beheld except in my dreams, than I could of the little lake at the bottom of my own park, on the banks of which I loitered on my school-boy holidays, and (could I but hallow their turf as Christian burial-ground) would desire to choose my grave."

The Ring of Amasis* has afforded us one of the severest literary disappointments we ever sustained. We had hoped that in a romance of the mystical sort Owen Meredith would have shown himself capable of rivaling "Zanoni," and this work falls below the level of "A Strange Story." It is incoherent, purposeless, unconnected; very horrible, no doubt, and capable in some passages of exciting an interest of the most painful character; but thoroughly unsatisfactory and unworthy of the author's really remarkable genius. We feel it almost as a personal wrong that the poet whom we have read with so much pleasure should have failed so signally and completely in a work peculiarly congenial to his talents, and in which we had expected to take so much delight. The failure is total and unquestionable, and we can only hope that it may be retrieved by some future work, to which the author shall give more care, and in which he shall restrain within due bounds his dislike to painstaking elaboration, and his passion for unintelligible rhapsody.

Dr. Doran's two enormous volumes† of dramatic anecdotes and biographies defy the attempts of a busy man to read them, or even to glance through them. But if they find favour, as they deserve to do, with the many women and few men who are not busy, they will probably fulfil their author's purpose, and will certainly satisfy the publisher's most sanguine aspirations. After all, better 1200 pages of large print than half that quantity of the diminutive type in fashion at present, to the sore annoyance of rational readers and the no small profit of opticians and oculists.

Dr. Wordsworth's Journal‡ in Italy is tinged throughout with a tone of prejudice which destroys much of the value of the author's observations on the state and prospects of religion in that country. It is written, however, in a much more gentlemanly and Christian tone than usually characterises Protestant works on Popery; and we recommend it to all who wish to see how a Protestant, who desires to remember that he is a gentleman, ought to write of Catholicism.

Miss Braddon is publishing novels so fast that we cannot pretend to remember their titles, much less their characters and several histories. John Marchmont's Legacy* is one of her best; not more sensational than Aurora Floyd, with circumstances and actors not more unnatural than is necessary to the sensational character of the novel; and, in fact, much more readable than many infinitely better works.

The Last of the Cavaliers,† now published in a cheap form, is, in our humble judgment, an historical romance of first-rate excellence. John Grahame of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, is the hero of the tale; and in the manner in which his history is interwoven with that of the humble and unhistorical personages whose loves and sorrows are its chief theme the author has displayed very remarkable skill and tact. Among the works of the followers of Scott this is the only one we have read which seems not wholly unworthy of the master, and we commend it to our readers with the greater freedom that we have not the least idea to whose hand we owe the pleasure that, on a second and even a third perusal, we still find in its pages.

THE "MARGARET AND JESSIE."—Our readers will recollect the gross outrage that was some months ago committed by a Federal cruiser on a vessel in British waters. This flagrant violation of neutral rights has been again brought under our notice by an able article in the Morning Herald, founded upon the official correspondence. Our contemporary gives the following history of the affair, which we reproduce as being a faithful version of a matter which loudly demands investigation and reparation:—"The Confederate steamer Margaret and Jessie left Charleston on the 27th of May, laden with a cargo of cotton, and having on board sixteen passengers, for Nassau. She had succeeded in running the blockade, but when about twenty-five miles from Nassau it was found that she was being chased by a steamer, upon which she was immediately headed for the land. The steamer was unable to decrease the distance between them, till the Margaret and Jessie had arrived within four or five miles of the Island of Eleuthera, one of the Bahama group, when the steamer opened fire upon her. However, she managed to continue her course without receiving material damage, until she had run within three or four hundred yards of the land, which was as near as she could get to it. She then, keeping within that distance of the shore, took a westerly course, and was followed pari passu by the steamer, which was compelled by her draught of water to remain at a distance of about a thousand yards from the land. This appears to have continued for something like an hour and a half, when the crew of the Margaret and Jessie were actually able to converse with people on the shore. During the whole of this time the steamer kept turning round, and delivering continuous broadsides alternately from each side at her unarmed victim. Most of the shot and shell passed over their object, and some of both buried themselves in the soil of the island. One of the witnesses speaks to the fact of a shot having entered the roof of her house, and others to the splintered trees and to the panic which these missiles caused to the inhabitants of the town of James Cestern, making them fly from their dwellings to the sea side of the adjoining hills. Others, too, who were fishing on the other coast of the island, which was there only two miles in breadth, depose that some shot came right over the island, and splashed into the sea beside them. This evidence affords conclusive proof of the proximity of the attacking steamer to the opposite coast. At last the Margaret and Jessie—when still within 300 yards of the shore, and, therefore, when within the maritime territorial jurisdiction of Her Majesty—was struck by a shell from the steamer, which reduced her to a sinking condition. Upon this—and, according to one of the witnesses, within eight minutes of this shell having struck the Margaret and Jessie, thus showing how near the two vessels were to each other—a boat pulled off from the steamer within speaking distance, and the persons in the boat declared that she was the United States ship Savannah. This turned out to be untrue, as her name was afterwards ascertained and admitted to be the Rhode Island—a false assertion which could have had no other object than to put the authorities upon the wrong scent as to the perpetrator of this flagrant violation of the sovereignty of a neutral state, and which also proves that the officers of the attacking vessel were conscious of the illegality of their proceedings. If additional proof of this is required, it is to be found in the fact that there was no attempt made by the Rhode Island to board the sinking ship, which would certainly have been done if she had been considered to be a lawful prize. The Margaret and Jessie was then abandoned by her crew. She soon afterwards settled in the water, but was subsequently raised and given up to the wreckers, and part of her cargo was saved. The total damages thus caused by salvage, by loss on cargo and on freight, and by the cost of repairs, were estimated at 69,138l. 6s. 9d., which is the amount claimed as compensation. The foregoing story is authenticated by the evidence, duly taken before a notary public, of the crew and passengers, and of several of the inhabitants of the island, who witnessed what took place, and whose testimony can hardly be other than disinterested, and therefore unimpeachable,

THE BLOCKADE OF THE SOTUH.

(From the Morning Herald, December 16.)

CHARLESTON, S. C., August 1, 1862.

In July, 1861, the British (Mr. Bunch) and French (Mr. Belligny) consuls here, received instructions from their Governments to ask the Confederate Government to adopt the principles of the Treaty of Paris of the 16th April, 1856, so far as the same referred to the maritime rights of neutrals and to the establishment of blockades.

This was agreed to by the Confederate Government, and an Act in accordance passed by their Congress, and approved by President Davis, 13th August, 1861. Their assent to the first Article, in relation to privateering, not being asked.

The stipulations of the Treaty of Paris are as follows:—"Article No. 1.—Privateering is, and remains, abolished. "Article No. 2.—The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.

"Article No. 3.—Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag.

"Article No. 4.—Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy."

* John Marchmont's Legacy. By the Author of "Lady Audley's Secret." London: Tinsley Brothers. 1863.
† The Last of the Cavaliers.

The parties then remained mutually bound to observe and enforce the second, third, and fourth Articles of the treaty.

The word "really," used in the 4th Article, must mean that the condition thus explained should be interpreted in the strictest manner, both as to the letter and to the spirit—or else the word means nothing at all.

Appended herewith are lists of the arrivals of steamers with cargoes from foreign ports, at Charleston (43) and Wilmington (49) from commencement of the present year, that is, for seven months; there were also numerous arrivals of small sailing vessels, of which we have no memorandum. The arrivals at the other ports in the Confederacy we have not here the means of furnishing.

Now, how can England acknowledge the blockade of these two ports of Charleston and Wilmington to be effective, with the fourth clause of the treaty before them in one hand, and these long lists of "access to the coast of the enemy" in the other?

The Confederates say that England, in acknowledging this blockade to be effective, dishonours her signature treacherously, inasmuch as she disclaims the obligation entailed on her by her signature, after she had asked and obtained the Confederate Government to adopt the treaty, thereby securing to herself the advantages accorded to neutrals under the second and third clauses; whilst she treacherously declines carrying out the fourth clause, the honest enforcement of which was the inducement to the Confederacy for granting the concessions asked for, and contained in the second and third clauses. (See Consul Bunch's Despatch to Lord Lyons, dated Charleston, August 16, 1861.)

And the Confederates further say, that the conduct of England in the matter is most unjust, inasmuch as by her thus shirking fulfilment of her written obligation a serious advantage is secured to the Northern Government.

In hope of calling the attention of the British public to this particular point this statement is laid before them, from which they can clearly understand the responsibility of England in the matter, and see how that responsibility is evaded by her present Government.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HORTZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, LONDON E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—

At Liverpool, to Mr. BISHOP, G. Commercial-buildings, 17, Water-st.
At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq., Manchester Southern Club Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER and MÜLLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4, Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), C. W. WHITE, Esq.

Tennessee and Virginia.

It is characteristic of the stubbornness of the American people, whether North or South, that since this cruel war began there has been no long uninterrupted series of triumphs for either army to boast of. Possibly a great military genius, like the first Napoleon, might have found opportunities for following up blow by blow, converting defeat into a rout, and a rout into an irretrievable disaster. But as yet, from some cause or other, possibly from a variety of causes of which no European commander could have any experience, the greatest battle of this war has proved comparatively resultless—a few thousand men killed and wounded, a crest of hills won or lost, a retreat of twenty miles upon a strong position; then a month or two of rest; and the bloody game is renewed, and year after year, when winter puts an end to the operations in the field, one is puzzled to know what progress has been made, save that here and there Federal garrisons are ensconced behind fortifications on Confederate soil within range of their gunboats, and that on one or two points Federal armies have conquered the ground on which they are encamped. The last battle at Chattanooga is no exception to the rule. As the truth becomes known the magnificence of the vision presented to the mental gaze of the New Yorkers is sadly blurred and dimmed; and the latest victory of General Grant, which was to have put an end to the war in the South-West, turns out to be another of those indecisive conflicts which have made the whole strategy of the war appear rather a matter of brute force and lucky accident, rather than of skill and settled design. We cannot deny General Grant's success. He has undoubtedly driven the enemy away from his front; and he has perhaps secured Chattanooga for the winter. But this is all, and it is very little to have accomplished with an army of 90,000 men. It is now known that the victory was only partial. Instead of Bragg's whole force having been driven pêle mêle from the field, a portion of it, the right wing, held its ground during the whole of the last day's fight, after repulsing repeated attacks. A graphic correspondence in the New York Herald describes three separate assaults on the Confederate right, the two last delivered with increased numbers and with redoubled fury—and as many failures; and still, until nightfall, that position was held. Only when the attack had ceased was the order for evacuation given. This at once disposes of the rout and demoralisation of Bragg's army. But the latest accounts tell us more than this. They have left no doubt that Grant had sufficient reasons for discontinuing the campaign in Georgia, and that General Hooker's corps has had bitter experience of the prowess of a "demoralised" army. We now learn for the first time that Hooker fought a battle on the 27th, in which two Ohio regiments suffered severely. What the extent of their sufferings was it is impossible as yet to say; but that Hooker was roughly handled is obvious from the fact that immediately afterwards he evacuated Ringgold, after burning every large building, and we quite expect to hear from Southern sources that he has sustained a severe check. In the meantime it is satisfactory to know that Bragg's losses in the late encounters have been more than made up by the arrival of reinforcements under General Joe Johnston, near Dalton, and that the Confederate army is preparing to resume the offensive, under Bragg's successor, General Hardee. We confess to view with regret the suspension of General Bragg, but we do not see how it was to be avoided. We doubt neither his ability nor his patriotism. He has displayed both too frequently to admit of suspicion of the one or denial of the other. But he is unlucky; and ill-luck is perhaps the gravest charge that can be made against a general. Moreover he has lost the confidence of the soldiers whom he commands and of the officers who fight under him, and President Davis had no alternative but to follow the universal opinion and appoint a successor. It is difficult, thousands of miles away, and in comparative ignorance of the disposition and organisation of the forces under his command, to form a just estimate of Bragg's strategy for the last two months. But it would certainly seem that the Confederate army was kept idle before Chattanooga for weeks, when there was a fair opportunity of driving General Thomas from Chattanooga, or of overwhelming General Burnside at Knoxville; and that when General Longstreet marched off against Burnside, the army before Chattanooga was dangerously weakened, considering the constant accessions of strength that were reaching the Federal camp. Whether Bragg is to be held responsible for these tactics we know not; but prima facie, they betoken a sad want of that energy and rapidity which the Confederates needed to enable them to meet the superior resources of the invader.

The news from Knoxville continues conflicting. On the 20th Burnside still held his ground, and an assault by Longstreet on the 29th had been repulsed, according to Federal accounts, with considerable loss. But there is no authority for the report that the siege was abandoned, and Longstreet retreating. On the contrary, the Confederate General had been reinforced by two divisions, under Bushrod and Johnson, and was not only able to maintain his threatening position before Knoxville, but to despatch troops to intercept General Foster, and the reinforcements coming from Cumberland Gap. An engagement had taken place two miles from the Gap, in which the Federal cavalry had been repulsed; and it was tolerably certain that Longstreet had nothing to fear except from the approach of Sherman's division from the South. How far the roads between Missionary Ridge and Knoxville were practicable, what obstacles the Confederates could place in the way, we have to learn. But we have as yet no news of the Federals having reached Cleveland, and between Cleveland and Chattanooga there are a hundred miles of hilly country to traverse—no easy task for an army exposed to the attacks of a superior force of cavalry, and compelled to carry with it all its supplies. Add to this, that the advance of the Confederates from Dalton will give General Grant work for all the troops he commands; and it is not difficult to see that Burnside's position is still critical. If the Confederates can prevent the entrance of supplies a week or two beyond the latest date of the news from Knoxville, we might still expect to see East Tennessee re-won to the Confederacy, and all the advantages of Grant's success neutralised.

Meade's campaign is pronounced a failure by the Washington Star, and well it may be; for with an army double the strength of that opposed to him, he has simply emulated the fame of the king of France, who—

"With twenty thousand men, Marched up the hill, and then marched down again."

A gleam of success at starting, when the Confederate outposts on the Rappahannock were overwhelmed and captured, and since that nothing but tedious marching and disastrous repulse. For it can no longer be concealed that Meade has suffered a repulse. In the first place, his cavalry were driven through Raccoon Ford by Fitzhugh Lee; in the second, his whole army was brought to a standstill before Lee's strong position in Mine Run Valley, and, although the secret has been hitherto well kept, there is little reason to doubt that General Warren had better reasons than a mere estimate of the enemy's strength for retiring so suddenly from the attack which was the whole object of Meade's movement. The Federals have now in their turn retreated: and it is reported that, with a wholesome dread of Lee's capabilities of annoyance, they are once more in full cry for Washington. It is significant that the Confederate cavalry has regained its old ascendancy. One day we hear of General Mosby's beating up and firing Meade's head-quarters; the next day Rosser falls upon his rear, and "gobbles up" ammunition wagons and horses. Plainly the vicinity of the Rapidan is not safe for the Federals, and they do wisely to put some miles between their baffled general and the defenders of Richmond. The Virginia campaign is, then, at an end, leaving matters very much as they were twelve months ago: the Southern capital still safe, and Lee's army still gloriously defiant of the invader. But the fights of Fredericksburg, and Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg, have weakened the Northern army by some 70,000 or 80,000 of its best troops, and the road to Richmond is harder to travel than ever.

The State of Affairs
North and South.

Two men are suffering from fever. One looks pale and sickly, his pulse is not nearly so strong as it was in the time of health, he is somewhat restless but not violent, he is perhaps needlessly dispirited but he is not delirious, his face is never puckered with laughter, and his voice is subdued and like unto the voice of suffering. Now look at the other patient. On his cheek is a hectic flush, and his eyes gleam with unwonted brightness. His voice is sonorous, and ever and anon he rises from his couch and performs some gymnastics that even in health would be hard tests of strength. Far from desponding, he rejoices in his sickness. Fever, he shouts, will not hurt him, but do him good. In so many days he predicts he will be convalescent, and infinitely stronger from the malady, whilst his fellow-patient will surely die. Any inexperienced person seeing these two men would conclude that the first we have described was in extreme danger, and that the other had ample reasons for his exulting confidence. But the physician would think differently. He would know that over the man apparently strong, fever had obtained the mastery, and that the man seemingly weaker was keeping fever in subjection. He would be aware that the hectic flush, the bright eye, and all the appearances of health in sickness, were but the livery in which insidious and triumphant disease dressed up its victim for the embrace of death; whilst the pallor, the sadness and the other signs of suffering, were the symptoms and the sure promises of future health.

Now what is true of individuals is often applicable to nations, and it seems to us that the foregoing amply illustrates the state of affairs North and South.

The Northern press teems with articles which represent in glowing terms the condition of the country as one of unprecedented prosperity. Mr. Seward lately declared that every State was stronger and every citizen richer in consequence of the war. The Rev. Ward Beecher at a meeting in New York was greeted with vehement applause when he said, "no wonder the advocates of absolutism take sides against us, for just as sure as prophecy or fate, the continued example of this people in their prosperity under their Governments and under their American ideas—just as sure as there is a Providence or a God, it will compel Europe from end to end either to reform or to revolutionise;" and he added, that the reason of the war was "because it was necessary for God to teach them one lesson more: that a self-governed, free and religious people could go through a revolution and come out of it stronger than when they went into it." Perhaps Northern editors, the Federal Secretary of State, and the accredited agitator of New England do not believe what they say, but unless they were certain that such statements were acceptable to, and to some extent credited by the people, they would not dare to give them utterance. And are there not evidences on every side of Northern prosperity? New York, once the centre of a vast commerce, has become the centre—not indeed of fashion—but of display. Costly equipages, rich dresses, and glittering jewels abound. Men with colossal fortunes are met with at every turn. Business has so increased that the day is not long enough for its transaction, and an "Evening Exchange" has been established. And it is not alone in New York that the growth of wealth has been so rapid. Other cities and towns are rejoicing in new-born riches, that have come to them they know not how. What of that? They have their heart's desire, and since ignorance is blissful, they choose to be ignorant.

It must then in fairness be admitted that there is some apparent excuse for the delusion with which the Northerners are so enchanted. When war broke out they heard from Europe dismal forebodings of its attendant miseries. War was to bring in its train, scarcity, poverty, and oppressive taxation. At the unsheathing of the sword commerce was to dwindle and national insolvency was to ensue. Idle stories! Instead of scarcity and poverty, the land is smiling with plenty. Instead of oppressive taxation, the Government has filled the pockets of the people with money. So far from commerce dwindling, it has wonderfully increased. Railways never paid such large dividends, manufacturers were never so busy, store-keepers were never so thriving, and working-men never received such high wages. Let European financiers blush to find how little they know about the science they profess. Paper—at all events that which passes through Mr. Chase's presses—is an excellent and sufficient substitute for gold. Well, are we Europeans wrong? Is the prosperity of the North real, or is it, like the hectic flush upon the cheek of the sick man, only the herald of approaching dissolution? If, indeed, the vaunted prosperity of the North is not illusive, then Mr. Beecher only uttered a truth in profane language when he said, "As sure as there is a Providence or a God, it" (the example of the United States) "will compel Europe, from end to end, either to reform or to revolutionise." We shall have to get rid of our old-fashioned ideas, and instead of "Peace and Plenty" inscribe upon our banners "War and Prosperity." New England has called for an anti-slavery Bible, and we must learn to clamour for a religion that is opposed to peace. We must henceforth regard as the enemies of our race those who counsel peace, and hold those to be benefactors of mankind who are for war. Is war such an unmixed blessing? Let us glance at the state of affairs in the South.

Very different is the picture. War has not visited the Confederate States disguised as a blessing, but it has come with those horrors that have been associated with it in all ages and in all countries. In a word, the South is in the normal condition of a warring and blockaded country. The precious metals, although not exported, have disappeared from circulation, and the paper currency, though the people are patriotic, and freely offer up their lives in defence of their national independence, has become so inflated that internal commerce is seriously crippled. Despite an abundant harvest, here and there there is a deficient supply, and although the Government employs a large amount of labour, the demand for labour is not excessive. It is highly probable that the Confederate Congress will devise means for decreasing the inflation of the currency, and thereby to some extent revive commerce and diminish the sufferings of the people. But we have no hope that the South will, nay, we have no wish, that it should in time of warfare be like unto a nation enjoying the fruits of peace.

How are we to account for the prosperity of the North and for the adversity of the South? The Federals have had the opportunity of selling their produce and of changing their gold for necessities or luxuries. They started solvent, and they have not scrupled to accumulate an enormous debt without making adequate provision even for the payment of interest. But beyond these, they have no special advantages, and are even in some respects less favourably situated than the Confederates. They are not invaded; but then it is more costly to carry on war in an enemy's country than at home. In the North, every soldier put in the field takes away a labourer who would otherwise be a producer of the necessities of life, whilst in the South the war makes no demand upon the tillers of the soil; and inasmuch as it discourages the cultivation of cotton, it adds to the number of those who can turn their attention to the cultivation of food. It might, then, be very fairly supposed that the South is better able than the North to carry on a long war. And so it is, for Northern prosperity is a huge sham, and Southern adversity but a natural and transitory incident of warfare.

Yes, in spite of Yankee boasting, the experience of the world and the teachings of Christianity are true. However necessary, however lawful, however fraught with future benefit, war, whilst it is being waged, is a curse and not a blessing. By withdrawing a million of men from peaceful avocations; by piling up a colossal national debt; by substituting for the worship of the metallic dollar the worship of the paper dollar, the citizens of the North are not richer, but poorer. And if we look a little deeply into the matter—if we read carefully the speeches of Mr. Seward and Mr. Beecher, and the articles in the Northern papers—we find that there is a skeleton at the feast, and that the Federals, from the dizzy height of their fictitious prosperity, see yawning beneath them the gulf of ruin. Ceaseless is the clamour for the continuation of the war, and rather than have peace they are content to sacrifice liberty and every vestige of self-respect. They bear patiently, although they discern clearly, the shortcomings of their Government, and they support that Government zealously because they believe that whilst it remains in power peace is impossible. And why is this longing for a continued war? Not from martial ardour, for the Yankees will not fight, and have to pay a high price for mercenaries. Not from a passion for military glory, for the successful Wall-street gambler is thought as much of as the successful general; and, indeed, Federal officers are far from being the lions of society. No; the clamour for war, for war without end, were that possible, arises from the consciousness that peace will inevitably plunge the nation into financial ruin, and inaugurate an era of anarchy. The ruin must come, but it may last the war out, and the war may drag on for a year or two longer. On the other hand, the South earnestly desires peace, for then her condition, now at the worst, will immediately improve. The precious metals will come forth from their hiding-places, and the currency will be restored to its normal condition. From the open ports will be shipped the long-stored produce to yearning markets. It may be that a large quantity of cotton will be spoiled and burnt; but so much the more valuable will be the residue. Thus it is that the South fights for peace, and the North strives to prolong the war; but the end must come. And this nearly concerns Europe, and particularly this country; for when the North is, consequent upon peace, in the throes of anarchy and ruin there will be an outcry for another war to bring about another period of fictitious prosperity. Who then will be the chosen antagonist?

Extra-Parliamentary Utterances.

Such is the title given by the Times to those speeches of supererogation wherewith it has of late years become the fashion to diversify the autumn amusements of our hardworked legislators. Like most political innovations, the fashion had its origin in ideas not very consistent with the constitutional theory or practice of our ancestors; but it serves, nevertheless, some useful purposes. It gratifies the restless vanity of metropolitan boroughs, whose members are allowed, on condition of making a yearly appearance at the bar of public opinion, to exercise their functions during the session without the constant supervision of a standing committee from the local vestry. It is better to have to flatter the publicans of Marylebone once a year than to be bullied, lectured, and instructed by them once a week—which is probably the alternative. In the manufacturing districts, a more serious purpose is served by this new practice. The artisans of Lancashire and the West-Riding really think on political questions, if not wisely or soberly, yet with much earnestness and a certain degree of logical consistency, and it is well that they should, by this species of formal intercourse with their representatives, be reminded of the fact, which such men as Bright and Cobden constantly ignore,—that they really enjoy a certain influence in the State, and have their fair share, if not more, in influencing the counsels of Parliament. To members generally, the necessity of annually flattering their constituents and praising themselves is an unmitigated bore. But there are exceptions to this rule. The great demagogue, who is made to feel his own insignificance in an assembly of gentlemen met to do business, where an orator who is neither a gentleman nor a man of business can exercise little or no power, finds himself at home before an excited audience of half-educated labourers, who don't mind his talking nonsense, and are unable to detect the untruthfulness of his statements and the impracticability of his proposals. The little demagogue, who has perhaps scrambled into Parliament by the aid of a long purse, and escaped the judgment of an election committee "by the skin of his teeth"—who has fancied himself a statesman because his sister had married a stump-orator, until he found that he could never catch Mr. Speaker's eye on any occasion more important than the third reading of a railway bill, and that when he got on his legs his colleagues went to dinner—rejoices to have a platform to himself, whereon to vent the suppressed speeches of a whole session, and the gall and venom wherewith disappointment and envy have filled his spirit.

The man who feels that his gift lies rather in talk than work, but who has been condemned by a subordinate official position to make very few speeches, and those few of a cautious and business-like character, is delighted to throw off his fetters and speak where there is no chief to check him and no watchful adversary ready to seize on every unguarded word. Better to speak to Southwark than sit silent in St. Stephens. And those who have the good fortune to represent a constituency of the better class, if they don't exactly enjoy the task of vacation speaking, at least have no great reason to complain of it. They are not called upon to stand forth upon a platform, in a big, ugly building, to address an audience assembled expressly to hear and to criticise them. They meet their friends, neighbours, and supporters in a friendly way—generally at the annual show of the chief agricultural society of the neighbourhood, or on the anniversary of some local charity—and they do not arise to deliver themselves of a carefully-prepared speech until their hearers have been put in good humour by prime beef and sound liquor, and have manifested their good-will by drinking their member's health. Under such circumstances a man may say as much or as little as he likes. He is not only permitted, but expected, to avoid all topics likely to provoke dissent; and all that is required of him is to be cordial and clear, whether in abuse of his adversaries or in praise of his friends. A few good-humoured sarcasms and a good deal of sound sense, with a popular commonplace for conclusion, will make an excellent and effective "extra-parliamentary" utterance for an orator who has the happiness not to represent an overgrown borough or a "great commercial constituency."

Three typical men—a rabid Radical, an official Liberal, and a Conservative of the younger and more moderate school—have each indulged us with an account of their views upon some of the chief questions of the day; and if none of them gave expression to anything very striking or very important; we may find something in each speech which is illustrative of the position of political parties. Mr. Leatham aptly uttered the views of that little school of English Yankees to which he belongs by marriage and by choice. He is personally, as they are politically, a disappointed man. He happens to be the brother-in-law of Mr. Bright; and as this is his sole connection with politics or public men of course he makes the most of it, and attaches himself to the standard of his distinguished and desperate relative. Not having any original ideas or any personal merit of his own, he has made it his study to present as servile a copy of that agitator as is possible with the materials which nature has bestowed upon him. Eloquence, even in vituperation, is beyond his reach; his oratory could never have induced even Huddersfield to send him to Parliament; but he was fortunate enough to escape a conviction for bribery, and having won his seat, he has a right by custom to be heard once a year in the town-hall of his constituency and in the columns of the Times upon things in general and his own virtues in particular. If he cannot imitate his prototype in anything else, he can adopt his views, imitate his temper, and mimic his tone; and he has done this with such success that we must pronounce him, next to Mr. Peter Taylor, the loudest scold out of Billingsgate. He might, we think, outtail a cabman to whom he had paid sixpence for driving him 1,700 yards; and, pen in hand, he might produce an article worthy of insertion in the New York Herald. Concerning the matter of his speech we need not say much. Four-fifths of it consisted of the usual froth and falsehood about the American war, every word of which has been said before, at least a hundred times, by journals and orators quite as clever and as veracious as Mr. Leatham, and need not be answered over again because he chooses to repeat it. Of course he railed at Lord Palmerston; first, because the noble lord is eighty years old; next, because he has laughed Reform out of existence and Radicals into contempt; and thirdly, at least so we construe his rambling utterances, because he has not invited Mr. Bright to take charge of the War-office, nor shown any disposition to honour that gentleman's connections. The history of the Premier's relations with the Radicals is very simple. They blustered and brawled so loudly in 1858 that he was for a moment deluded into the idea that their support was necessary to him; and he offered them a fair price for it. They helped him into power, but neglected to seal the bargain by striking while the iron was hot; and in the meantime Lord Palmerston had found them out. If the country did not want Cobden in the Cabinet neither did he; if the nation did not care for universal suffrage, he was not going to force it down their throats. So he quietly dropped their acquaintance; and left them to discover their own impotence by the ludicrous result of their efforts to undo their own work. Thwarted in their policy, disappointed in their personal ambition, seeing the few men of capacity in their ranks judiciously silenced by minor official appointments; above all, conscious that the contempt with which they are treated in Parliament is merely the reflection of the regard in which they are held by the country, aware that all is over with them, and that neither caution nor bluster will any longer avail them, they give free vent to their feelings, and astonish the public by the fury of their vituperation, and the bitterness of their personal hatred towards the only man who could at this epoch maintain even the semblance of a Liberal Government. They do not even care to remember that they can do Lord Palmerston no greater service than by abusing him as the enemy of Progress—that is, of Yankee ideas. In a word, they are desperate; and every utterance of theirs, in or out of Parliament, betrays their conviction that they are doomed to hopeless exclusion from office and influence. They talk as English politicians never talk when they have any practical object, however remote, in view; they scold as even women never scold, except when they are quite aware that scolding is the only consolation left them in the face of irremediable defeat. A few words from Mr. Cave—the Conservative colleague of Mr. Fitzgerald in the representation of Horsham—aptly explain the present feeling of the American faction in the House of Commons:—

There were the troublesome members, who expected something from fishing in troubled waters, and did not like the affairs of the country to go on smoothly if by that means their power over the masses seemed likely to be diminished. (Hear, hear.) It reminded him of the story told of an English condottiere—Sir John Hawkwood. A monk who was afraid of him began by saying "Pax vobiscum." (Peace be with you.) The reply of Sir John was, "The devil take your blessing; don't you know I live by fighting?" (Laughter.) Something of this kind might be said of some of the speeches which had been delivered in the north of England. When the country was at peace and in prosperity, they said, "What is that to us? We don't want that; we want some stirring points to be brought forward, and to see the people thoroughly discontented."

Mr. Layard's speech at Southwark was clever and characteristic; chiefly devoted, as was natural, to a defence of the foreign policy of the Administration. But there was one remark on domestic matters which deserves remembrance, as showing the fund of good sense which underlies all the official insincerity and political unsoundness of the discoverer of Nineveh. Mr. Cobden had stated that the lower classes in England are less educated than in any other civilised country—a statement which we believe to be of that class which the honourable gentleman is wont to denounce as "outrages, libels, calumnies, gross, corrupt, and gratuitous falsehoods;" that is to say, not strictly and accurately true. But it has some show of truth; and deserved the quiet and perfectly correct criticism of Mr. Layard—that our comparative want of education is a consequence of our greater zeal for liberty. Abroad, the State—an abstraction known to Englishmen, thank Heaven, only in the dialect of political theorists, but which elsewhere has assumed, in the reverence and in the hopes of men, almost the place of Providence—provides an education after its own pattern and enforces it on all alike; allowing none either to be ignorant, or to be educated after another fashion. But we, who don't understand equality and who dote on liberty, must forego whatever advantages may be found in a system as subversive of the latter as it is favourable to the development of the former; nor, whatever Mr. Bright may urge in favour of a democratic despotism, are Englishmen likely to exchange the right to be ignorant or educated in their own fashion for the right to be educated, will they nill they, at the pleasure as well as at the expense of the Government.

In their views on most foreign questions it would seem that Mr. Layard, Lord Russell's parliamentary sub., and Mr. Fitzgerald, Lord Derby's Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, are much of one mind. The latter speaks out frankly about Slesvig Holstein, which difficult and dangerous ground is prudently shirked by his rival; but upon this subject, as upon that of Poland, he speaks only to commend what he supposes to be the policy of the Government. It is curious to notice what are the points selected by either speaker to justify their political antagonism. Mr. Layard is apologetic on the subject of Reform, parliamentary and ecclesiastical; but rests the claim of the Government to public confidence on the ground that it has seized the steam-rails and kept the peace with the United States, and on the assumption that the Conservatives would have done neither. It is scarcely necessary to remark on this that in dealing with a people like the Yankees the policy of conciliation is the policy most certain, eventually, to "plunge us into war." On the other hand, Mr. Fitzgerald reserves what he has to say on the American question for the House of Commons; but has a word or two to say on the domestic policy of the two great parties. He quotes, with smiling malice, the saying of a Tory friend:—

A friend of mine in Sussex said the other day, "I should be sorry to see Earl Russell and some of his friends removed from office, because I am certain that so long as they remain there we shall hear nothing of the question of reform." But this is very like what has happened in our immediate neighbourhood. There was a very enterprising man, who used to keep every keeper on the qui vive; no preserve was quiet. The whole country was in commotion on account of this man, who was called Little Barker. My friend said he believed it would be the same with Earl Russell and his friends as it was with Little Barker, and he added, "A friend of mine sent for Little Barker and said, 'I will make you my keeper,' and from that day to this the whole country has been quiet, our preserves have been at rest, our keepers have been able to sleep in their beds, and we have enjoyed peace and tranquillity. It is the same with these gentlemen as with Little Barker, and they will remain quiet as long as they are our keepers."

This feeling is very prevalent, both in Parliament and in the country, and the Little Barker of Downing-street owes more than he would willingly acknowledge to a general desire to keep him out of mischief. But if, now that he has ceased to poach in the preserves, he takes to robbing the hen-roost; if he forges his master's name to insolent letters to the neighbours; if he is found to be always on the lookout for a quarrel, and always ready to sneak out of it, to the great discredit and discomfort of the household, it may possibly be found better to discharge him at once, especially as his old associates will hardly join him again, and his power for mischief as a poacher will probably be insignificant, in comparison with that which he exercises as a confidential, though by no means trusted, servant.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

LETTER FROM HON. C. J. McRAE.

(To the Editor of THE INDEX.)

SIR,—Taking advantage of its present depressed condition, the enemies of the Confederate Cotton Loan have thrown out various insinuations intended to shake the confidence of the holders. I shall be obliged to you for so much of your space as will enable me to reply to some of the objections raised.

In the first place, doubts have been expressed whether the Confederate Government owned the quantity of cotton requisite to redeem its bonds. This is sufficiently disposed of by the following extract from a despatch received by me from the Hon. C. G. Memminger, the Secretary of the Confederate Treasury, dated Richmond, 15th of September. For obvious reasons, I leave two blanks.

Your recommendation that you be permitted to make such cotton as may be asked for under the Erlanger Loan deliverable in ——— or ———, is approved. The greater part of our cotton is in those two States, and it would be more convenient for us to make delivery in them. At present we have a sufficient quantity of cotton to meet all our engagements. The enemy, thus far, have captured about 20,000 (twenty thousand) bales, and we have been obliged to burn about as much more. But as our stock reaches over 400,000 (four hundred thousand) bales, our capacity to pay has not been seriously impaired.

Secondly, there are those who have not scrupled to say that the Confederate Government, if not actually placing obstacles in the way of the redemption of the bonds, has refused to the holders reasonable facilities for obtaining the cotton. So far from this being the truth, an arrangement has been made to relieve the holders from the risk attending the transmission of their bonds through the blockade. The bonds may be deposited with the Commissioners of the Confederate Government in London or Paris, who will give certificates of deposit in quadruplicate, and these certificates have the same validity when presented at the Treasury Department in Richmond as the original bonds themselves. It is true, the Government has declined a proposition to give up to such claimants the one-third freight room which it reserves in private vessels clearing from its ports. This is for the obvious reason that a stipulation which is justifiable only on grounds of state necessity, and on these grounds is cheerfully submitted to, would become intolerable if the sacrifices exacted from one party were turned to the profit of other parties instead of the State. I do not hesitate, however, to say that bondholders, exporting the cotton in their own vessels, will be exempted from the condition imposed on other exporters, and I have strongly recommended this to the Treasury. I can further state, with perfect assurance, that every facility for bringing the cotton to the seaport, which does not actually interfere with the necessities of military transportation, will be everywhere accorded by the military and civil officers of the Government to such claimants. The great interest which the Government must naturally feel in sustaining its credit in Europe is an abundant guarantee for this assurance.

You will observe, therefore, that the only reason why cotton in redemption of bonds has not heretofore come to European markets, is because the holders of the bonds have not made the effort. Up to a recent period the impression was prevalent among them that the war would not be of much longer duration, in which case it was sound policy not to convert the bonds. The Loan was, in this point of view, simply a seven per cent. sterling stock, based on the national faith, and fluctuating with the vicissitudes of the war. Its cotton basis could only come into play when it was apparent that the struggle would be protracted. Up to this time only about £18,000 (eighteen thousand pounds) have been deposited for conversion, and the certificates were not sent forward until 1st November last, so that sufficient time has not yet elapsed to bring out the cotton. That the blockade will not seriously obstruct this transaction, on the largest scale on which it may be undertaken, is amply proved by the statistics of the Liverpool Cotton Market, from which it appears that the receipts of American cotton at that port from the 1st January last to the 1st August, amounted in round numbers to 100,000 bales, and since the 1st August to about 50,000 bales. It is plain that to be equally successful in bringing out cotton under the Loan, depends solely on the will of the bondholders.

A third objection is made against the Loan, which, though not actually true, has yet greater force than the preceding. It is said that cotton may be purchased at the present rate of exchange cheaper in the Confederacy with sterling than with the bonds of the Loan. In reply to this I have to state, that it is now under the consideration of the Government at Richmond, to prohibit altogether the exportation of cotton, except such as is pledged by its obligations. I have every reason to believe that this necessary and salutary measure will promptly be adopted. The total of such obligations, other than those of the Seven per cent. Cotton Loan, does not reach £200,000.

I remain, very respectfully,

C. J. McRAE,

Financial Agent of the Confed. Gov. in Europe.

48, Avenue Gabriel, Paris,

December 15th.

At a recent meeting of the Danish Reichsrath, the Ministry proposed that the salary of the Minister at Washington should be increased. The Finance Committee proposed, as an amendment, that the increase should be smaller than that suggested by the Government; and, during the debate, Mr. A. Hage stated, as a reason for adopting the amendment of the Committee, that a Minister might soon be required at the Confederate as well as at the Federal capital. Ultimately the proposal of the Committee was adopted.

THE CAUSES OF THE AMERICAN WAR.

BY A. T. BLEDSOE, LL.D., PROFESSOR OF MATHEMATICS, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

THE causes of the first American war for Independence may, it has been said, be found in "a preamble." This is not true, unless, indeed, contrary to the meaning of its authors, the assertion be understood to refer to that great preamble to American institutions called "The Declaration of Independence." Nor is it true that the rebellion in question sprang, as is usually believed, solely from the power of taxation claimed by the Parliament of Great Britain. The Philippic of Dr. Johnson against the Colonies contains, at least in its title, only the simple truth that "Taxation is no tyranny." But although taxation is not necessarily tyranny, it may be imposed in a way or under circumstances, which would render it the most insufferable oppression. Hamilton,* and Burke,† and Webster,‡ have shown that "American taxation" by the British Parliament was attempted under circumstances which would have made it a galling tyranny. Especially have Hamilton and Burke shown that Parliament had already imposed so many burdens and restrictions on the commerce of the Colonies for the exclusive advantage of the mother country, that to superadd taxation thereto would be an intolerable grievance. "Our British masters," says Hamilton, had shown that "the power of legislating for us, and of raising a revenue upon the articles of our commerce, would be a sufficient degree of slavery, without the power of taxing us against our consent." If such taxation were legal, says Burke, if such a principle were once established, then the "Government might rob a nation of its whole property."

Every revolution in the British Government, says Burke, has turned on the question of taxation. Hence, reasoning from the past, he predicted that the colonies would rebel if they were taxed. Nor was he mistaken. For, true to the traditions and the character of their ancestors, the Anglo-Americans refused to submit to taxation which they regarded as illegal and oppressive.

But scarcely had the battle of Independence been fought and won, than the North began to lay unjust, illegal, and still more oppressive burdens of taxation on the people of the South. In vain had the Constitution, the fundamental law of the land, expressly declared that taxation should be equal. One portion of the South, or less than one-fourth of the whole people of the Union, were made to pay at least three-fourths of all the taxes levied by the Federal Government. A senator,§ by no means friendly to the South, and bitterly hostile to Calhoun and his school of politics, declared, in his place in the Senate, that "Virginia, the two Carolinas, and Georgia defrayed three-fourths of the annual expense of the Federal Government; and of this great sum, annually furnished by them, nothing, or next to nothing, is returned to them in the shape of Government expenditures. That expenditure, he continues, "flows northwardly in one uniform, uninterrupted, and perennial stream. Federal legislation does all this." Yes, Federal legislation did all this; and the great wonder is that all this was so long endured. Federal legislation crippled and impoverished the South, whilst it built up, fortified, and enriched the North. The bleak North smiled beneath its patronage; the fertile South withered beneath its power. In the one section, magnificent cities sprang up, as if by magic, under its influence; in the other, every branch of industry was discouraged and every source of wealth was drained. In all this, the North, or the Yankee race, was only true to the traditions and the character of their progenitors. For, as their history proves, they fled from England to America with two supreme objects in view: first, to escape from persecution, and, secondly, to enjoy the sweet privilege of persecuting. So, in like manner, they threw off the authority of the British Government, first, to escape the burden of unjust, illegal, and oppressive taxation, and, secondly, to enjoy the advantage of imposing that burden upon others. Inconsistent in all things, except in a total disregard of equal justice and fair-dealing, they pursued their own selfish interest regardless of consequences, and at all times insisted that their own arbitrary will should be the supreme law of the land. And not satisfied with having grown rich and waxed fat at the expense of the South, they contrived to fill the civilized world with their own contempt of the people on whom they had so unscrupulously practised all this systematic wrong.

Why, it may well be asked, did the South so long and so patiently endure all this outrage and wrong? Were they a weak and pusillanimous people? Such was, indeed, the belief of the North, and for that very reason they persisted in their career of meanness, rapacity, and insolence. They boasted, forsooth, that the South dare not secede, and if it should, it would be subjugated, or else blotted from existence, in less than ninety days. The world echoed the North, and the Times echoed the world.

But Edmund Burke understood the South, ay, the slave-holding South, far better than either the world or the world's great organ—the Times. It was precisely in relation to this question of taxation, that Edmund Burke pronounced the celebrated and oft-quoted opinion, that the spirit of liberty ran higher in the slave-holding States of the South than in the more boastful North. Why, then, did she so long and so patiently submit to be unequally taxed by the Yankees, after she had cast from her that hated badge of British oppression? The answer is easy. She loved the Union, and, hollow though it was and heartless, she loved it far too well. That was one source of her patient and long-suffering submission to the proud dictation of the North.

Again, the great leader in whom she had confidence, Henry Clay, recommended this scheme of plunder to her under the captivating guise of the great "American system;" that is to say, it was designed to protect American manufactures and interests against the competition of Great Britain and free-trade. But its real home effect was to rob the South and to enrich the North. To this effect, however, the great Southern leader paid the less attention, because it bore but lightly on his own State, Kentucky, and because he had his eye fixed on that splendid and dazzling prize—the Presidency. The great Southern leaders, with one or two exceptions, bowed at the shrine of power; while, as Theodore Parker has so often and so well said, the great Yankee nation worshipped at the shrine of "the almighty dollar." Hence it was that, by a sort of unacknowledged compromise, or tacit arrangement, the great Southern leaders poured wealth into the lap of the North, and the North raised the great Southern leaders to the supreme seat of power.

But this game was destined to have an end. It is evident that it could last no longer than the South, by means of its equality in the Senate, held a check on the rapacity of the North. Hence, when this equality was destroyed by the great increase in the number of Northern States, this interchange of kind offices ceased. The love of money, on the one hand, and the love of power on the other, then ceased to cement the Union, and hold its two great hostile sections together. The Presidential power then became an apple of discord, rather than a bond of union and peace. For the North, having all power in its own hands, determined to dispense with all inconvenient compromises, and to take possession of all departments of the Federal Government, by which means it could quicken "the perennial stream" of wealth from the South into her own bosom. The South then showed that she was not deficient in the spirit of liberty or of heroic self-sacrifice in the cause of independence. On the contrary, she evinced the spirit of her sires, and threw off that tremendous burden of taxation, which was far more unjust, illegal, and oppressive than any ever imposed by the government of Great Britain on the Colonies.

Such was one great cause of the Secession of the Southern States, or, as the North is pleased to call it, of their "rebellion." The first rebellion was headed by Washington and Adams; the second is headed by Davis and Lee. If the first was not infamous, the second is glorious.

But if we would reach the greatest of all the great causes of the Revolution of 1776, we must regard it as a providential event. The world was then ready for the birth of a new empire, and consequently all minor causes were subordinated to the inevitable course of nature. The decree of dismemberment was written in heaven before it was enacted on earth. Even Englishmen, however earnestly they may have struggled to put "that cup of bitterness and humiliation" from their lips, as it is called by Mr. Gladstone, were soon led to regard it as having been administered by the hand of a wise and beneficent Providence. If George III. and his advisers had more wisely interpreted the signs of the times, they might have assisted at the birth of the new empire, and helped to give it a grander and more glorious destiny. As it was, however, the very first principles and laws of its being were warped and perverted and marred by the violent passions of war. Hence it was doomed to perish, and to furnish a striking illustration of the profound saying of Aristotle, that constitutions of government which spring from revolutions are seldom fitted to endure.

Thanks to the long-continued smile of a favouring Providence, the fruit of independence was ripe in 1776, and only awaited the influence of tempestuous times to fall from the parent stem. These times were furnished by the folly of George III. We say folly, because it tended so directly to defeat the object he had in view. But although the folly of an earthly king, it fulfilled the design of a wisdom infinitely higher than his own. In the reign of George II., the proposition to tax the Colonies had been made, and at once set aside as an experiment too dangerous to be tried. But when the danger became far more imminent, it ceased to be seen by the ruling power, and the rash experiment was blindly made. The Colonies were taxed, and the Revolution began. The wisdom of Chatham and Burke failed to open the eyes of the King. The earnest entreaties of the Colonies were despised by him and trampled under foot with imperial scorn, until remonstrance became resistance; and then resistance was denounced and treated by him as rebellion, until, under the havoc of war, the glorious rebellion became a successful revolution. Thus was accomplished the greatest event of the eighteenth century, except perhaps the French Revolution.

Of all the human agents, of all the blind instruments, that contributed to that great event, none was more conspicuous than the King of Great Britain himself. Every measure he adopted to defeat it only contributed to its existence. Every step he took to accomplish his own blind purpose only helped to fulfil the beneficent design of Providence. The "Plundering Act" itself, as it was called, by which "thirteen colonies were thrown out of the royal protection," was so far from awing them into submission, that it was hailed by them as "the Act of their Independence," or as the royal permission to take care of themselves. The very heathen could say that "Fortune casts a mist before people's eyes when she would not have them oppose her designs."

In like manner, it will hereafter be seen by the Americans themselves, that it was an ordinance of heaven, a decree of nature, that the "Model Republic" should be dismembered. Mr. Lincoln declares that the people of America, of thirty-three Sovereign States, are destined to be one, because the territory is one. But has he never seen the map of Europe? Has he never read, nor heard, nor thought, nor dreamed of the many separate and distinct nationalities on its one territory? Has he never learned, in all the profound lessons of his wisdom has he never learned that something besides land is necessary to unite sovereign States in one, and that something besides oceans may separate them?

The simple truth is, that a Republic stretching from the Atlantic on the east to the Pacific on the west, from the eternal snows of the north to the perpetual summers of the south, and including in its own bosom thirty-three vast Republics, is of all political schemes the most wild and visionary. This "Model Republic," this monstrous Republic, was, in fact, doomed to perish, and Mr. Lincoln, with his silly notion about the "one territory," is one of the chosen instruments for its destruction. He may wage war, like George III.; but, after all, it will be found that he has only helped to fulfil the very decree of nature, against which he has so madly contended, and, in spite of himself, assisted at the birth of a new empire. Indeed, among the blind agents who have appeared on the theatre of history, Mr. Lincoln and his advisers deserve a conspicuous place. One portion of the Southern States they found out of the Union, and by their blind, false, and cruel measures to force them back, they drove the other out forever. They found the South a divided, and, under God, they made them a united people. How blindly soever some may have clung to the old Union, the long-cherished object of their insane idolatry, the sharp, incisive, and unconstitutional measures of these men cut the last tie that bound them to it, and they were free. Every step they took to preserve the Union, and awe the South into submission only promoted disunion, and extorted from free-born men a second "Declaration of Independence." The proclamation calling for 75,000 men, the very act intended to keep Virginia, and North Carolina, and Tennessee in the hollow union of a heartless compact, and to compel them to put forth the bloody hand of coercion against their sister States, was indignantly hailed by them as the act of their Independence, as the decree of their deliverance from the most odious and vulgar despotism of the modern world. Though blind himself, Mr. Lincoln has, indeed, opened the eyes of more men, and scattered more chronic delusions to the winds, than any other one man in America or in the world. If, indeed, he had been raised to power with the express design of putting infinite contempt on the doctrine of universal suffrage, he could not have been more admirably adapted to the purpose. The whole history of America had, it is true, demonstrated the grotesque absurdities of that monstrous doctrine; but still this crowning event, this final act in the grand drama of political folly, was needed to reveal its hidden mysteries to an astonished world.

"If there were a nation of gods," says Rousseau, "they might be governed by a democracy; but so perfect a government will not agree with men."* How true! and yet how false! How true that a democracy, or the "Model Republic" of America, is fit only for a nation of gods, and not for a nation of Yankees! But it will not do to say with Rousseau, or according to a very prevalent fashion in America, that such a government is too perfect for men, and that its failure was due, not to its own fault, but to the fault of those for whom it was made. For government is not an end, but a means; and the very first condition of a good one is, that it should be adapted to the people for whom it is intended. If it be framed for men, and yet be "so perfect and so beautiful" as to be fit only "for gods," this is the fault of the government itself, and of those by whom it was constructed. Ten thousand times since the words were first uttered by Mr. Justice McKean in the ratifying Convention of Pennsylvania, the Government of the late Union has been pronounced "the most perfect ever seen;" and never has this sentiment been more frequently or more passionately uttered, than by the Black Republicans of the North under whose iron rule it has sunk into hopeless ruins. Even at the South, we sometimes hear the lingering echoes of this departed nonsense, that the late Government was "perfect in theory," but "bad in practice," because it was "too good for men." But if "the best Government ever seen" be so constructed as to fall into the worst hands ever known, while the best men are sternly excluded from office, does not this prove that its perfection is ideal only, and its imperfection real? Does not this prove, in other words, that it is as false in theory as it is foul in practice? If, indeed, men are created only to dream, and to dote with childish fondness on their idle dreams, then may we be expected to admire those very beautiful schemes of government which "are free in theory," while they are "despotisms in practice." But if we are made for higher ends, for nobler objects, and if governments are designed to protect us in the pursuit of virtue and happiness, then we hope to be excused if we refuse our admiration to the very fine theory of any government, however beautiful and free upon paper, under whose actual operation we may happen to be ground to powder.

LETTERS FROM RICHMOND.

RICHMOND, November 14.

SHALL we renew that dolorous story of the capture of Hoke's and Hays's brigades, of which you have read such wonderful accounts in the New York papers? Shall we recite how they were gobbled up by Meade's army, taken "intirely," and none ever permitted to recross the Rappahannock? Truth to say, it was a sorrowful affair enough, but not so bad, by any means, as those Sir John Mandevilles of off the Northern press would have you believe. We know very well what was our loss and how the matter came about, but the guare is less understood here than the quomodo. Some 1,100 or thereabouts of the very best troops in the army of General Lee were carried off by the Yankees, belonging to the brigades of Hoke and Hays as aforesaid, of Early's division. They had been sent across the river at the point where the railway bridge of the Orange and Alexandria Railway had formerly stood; Hays's brigade, to act as a picket guard, on Friday, the 6th instant, and Hoke's, as a support, on the following day, in the afternoon. It would seem that no videttes had been thrown out in the country beyond them, and when the enemy appeared on Saturday, extending his lines in the form of a half-moon so as to envelope our forces altogether, his right and left wings resting on the river above and below, it was in the nature of a surprise. Hays's brigade, which consisted principally of Louisiana troops, occupied a redoubt, which was part of a line of earthworks thrown up by the enemy last summer when he held the railway, and which commanded the Pontoon bridge, constituting their means of communication with the main body of Lee's army. Hoke's brigade crossed the river under a heavy fire of artillery, for the Yankee batteries had already opened furiously upon the Louisianians, and took position within the redoubt which the enemy was preparing to assault in triple lines of attack. We had but four pieces of artillery to oppose the numerous and well-posted batteries of the enemy, but the fire from the latter was returned with spirit until dusk gathered over the landscape. Then came the shock of the assault. It was met with admirable resolution, and the enemy's first line was torn to pieces and scattered in terrible disorder. But the second and third lines coming rapidly forward, the parapet was gained, and a hand-to-hand fight took place, in which the overpowering numbers of the assailants gained for them the mastery. Our brave fellows fought to the last with desperation, using their muskets as clubs. On our right, Colonel Godwin, commanding Hoke's brigade in the absence of the general, maintained the struggle, on the immediate brink of the river, for some little time after the redoubt had been carried, but was at last compelled to yield. The possession of the redoubt giving the Yankees the entire command of the Pontoon bridge, there was no other means of escape left to our men, but swimming the river, in which manner, perhaps, one-third of the original number reached the opposite bank in safety. Some were crowned in the attempt. All the rest, that had not fallen in the defence of the earthwork, became prisoners. The loss of the enemy in killed and wounded was severe, equalling probably our own in killed, wounded and prisoners.

I give you without comment the leading facts of the disaster. It only remains to be said that at midnight on Saturday General Lee commenced falling back, that the next day he formed line of battle beyond Culpepper Court-house, expecting confidently a forward movement of the whole Yankee army; but (although the Yankees had driven off the guard at Kelly's Ford, and compelled General Rodes to withdraw with a loss of 200 men in killed, wounded, and missing,) they did not come on, being apparently satisfied with their success of the evening previous. The menaces of Meade, and the blustering articles of the Yankee news papers have, probably, been meant only to prevent General Lee from sending off any more troops to reinforce Bragg, but while the enemy may really design no more active operations in that quarter, fearing to hazard another general engagement, General Lee may compel one at any moment. Such is the status of the campaign in northern Virginia at this particular juncture.

From Chattanooga we hear nothing of immediate importance, except that Longstreet's corps is in motion, and will probably engage some portion of Grant's army very speedily. The enemy was moving from right to left the day before yesterday, a step rendered necessary, perhaps, by the movement of Longstreet, or else made as a diversion to cover an attack upon Lookout Mountain, or yet again, for reinforcing Burnside. Time will develop its meaning. Meanwhile much gunpowder is wasted in interchange of cannon shot between our own and the enemy's heavy batteries posted on opposing heights. A correspondent of the Dispatch, writing from headquarters near Chattanooga, under date of the 5th, satisfactorily disposes of the persistent falsehoods of the Yankees, as to the overwhelming force of the Confederates at the battle of Chickamauga, by placing over against the 40,000 men which were under General Bragg, the following detailed estimate from official sources of the numbers commanded by Rosecrans:—

McCook's Corps, three divisions, (Sherman's Davis's and R. R. Johnson's) .. .. .	18,000
Thomas's Corps, four divisions, (Rousseau's, Negley's Brannan's and Reynolds's) .. .. .	25,000
Crittenden's Corps, three divisions, (Palmer's Van Cleve's, and Wood's) .. .. .	18,000
Granger's Reserve Corps, three divisions, (Morgan's Steadman's, and Granger's) .. .. .	15,000
	77,000

This is exclusive of Stanley's corps of cavalry, composed of three divisions. Some small detachments from this large force, says the Dispatch's correspondent, were on duty in the rear—say 12,000 in all, leaving 65,000 fighting men on the Yankee side who were actually present and engaged in the battle.

Affairs have not gone on as prosperously as we could wish in Western Virginia. On Saturday, the 7th instant, an obstinate and bloody combat was fought, about twenty-five miles north of Lewisburg, in the county of Greenbrier, between the Confederates under General Echols, numbering about 2,000 men, and the Yankees under General Averill, numbering not less than 7,000. This great disparity of force made it necessary for General Echols to retreat, after a fight of two hours, leaving his killed and wounded in the enemy's hands. His loss was severe. At the last accounts General Echols was at Union, in the county of Monroe. The Yankees, turning in the direction of Covington, after the fight, were met two miles from that place by General Imboden, who was pressing forward to the relief of Echols, with a small force, consisting in part of the Home Guards of Rockbridge and the cadets of the Virginia Military Institute. Fire was immediately opened by Imboden upon the enemy's advance, which fell back; whereupon, not having strength enough to justify a pursuit of the Yankees, he also retreated upon Buffalo Gap, ten miles beyond Staunton, in the county of Augusta, blockading the road as he went. Imboden himself was slightly wounded in the skirmish, and is now in Staunton. Averill is reported as having since made his appearance in the county of Highland.

On the other hand, the Confederates have had a very gratifying success in Tennessee. On Saturday, the 7th inst., the brigades of Jones and Gilmer attacked the Yankees near Morristown, and, after a very short encounter, in which our loss was trifling, captured 850 prisoners, 1,000 horses, 60 wagons, and four pieces of artillery.

The bombardment of Sumter has been renewed with considerable activity within two days past, after an interval of comparative quiet, in which the Yankees were repairing damages to their fleet and allowing their guns to cool. The firing is now carried on chiefly at night, with the brilliant illumination of the harbour by calcium lights, but the damage is not greater than it has been heretofore. The enemy evidently wearies of the innocent expenditure of ammunition, and unless some great advantage is speedily gained, they will probably defer the reduction of Charleston till some more convenient season. The statistics of the cannonade are something extraordinary, and make a "big thing," delightful for the Yankee, in his pride of numbers, to contemplate.

The blockade of Wilmington is becoming more stringent, though it is far from being as yet effectual. Four fine steamers have been lost to us within four weeks: the Venus, mentioned in a former letter; the Margaret and Jessie, which was captured and carried into New York harbour; the Cornubia, which got ashore in trying to run the gauntlet of the fleet; and the Robert E. Lee, which was burned to prevent her falling into the enemy's hands. We have no precise intelligence of the latter misfortune, and know nothing as to the fate of the passengers and crew. The loss of the steamers is of less moment to us than the loss of their cargoes, just now, at the beginning of winter, when the army is in sore want of clothing and supplies, with which the steamers were laden.

My letter, you will have perceived, is not a cheering one, and is little more than a record of reverses and disasters. But there is no despondency among our people. They have ceased to look abroad for help; they receive with composure the intelligence that the Emperor of France has ordered the seizure of rams supposed to be building for us in French dockyards; they are not dispirited by temporary successes of the Yankee arms in the field, nor is their philosophy borrowed from Wilkins Macawber, hopeful that "something will turn up." They do look forward with the deepest interest to the action of Congress on the question of the currency, in the buoyant conviction that when the evils that now afflict our monetary affairs have been even partially remedied, all will yet go well, and never despairing of the ultimate triumph of their cause under the ordering of Providence.

Further correspondence between the commissioners for the exchange of prisoners under the cartel, Judge Ould and General Meredith, is published. It is so strikingly demonstrative of the bad faith, shuffling, and prevarication of the Yankee authorities, that even the more respectable journals of the North, such as the New York World, comment upon it in terms of censure as regards their own part in the controversy. Meanwhile the number of prisoners in Richmond increases daily. This morning's report of the commandant of the Libby prison shows the following as the figures:—Prisoners of war, 12,747; citizen prisoners, 3; Yankee deserters, 3; negroes, 22; total, 12,775. Of these, 953 are commissioned officers of various grades, from brigadier-general down to third lieutenant. As by a concerted plan, the Yankee presses are making a dismal howling over the horrible sufferings and inhuman treatment of these unfortunate patriots. The commandant of the Libby prison, they say, is a monster of cruelty. This monster is a young man of three-and-twenty or thereabouts, of the slenderest frame and most amiable disposition. The prison itself is a sty of filth. Undoubtedly it is not so clean as the Star and Garter at Richmond, in Surrey; but when we consider what dirt, moral and material, 953 Yankees create within its walls, we have only to commiserate the officer whose business it is to keep it in order. I know some of these 953 officers are gentlemen of strict habits of personal cleanliness, but the great majority are of a different sort. Moreover, say the Northern papers, the prisoners are actually compelled to drink the James river water! Yes; compelled to drink the same water which is carried through the President's house, and drunk by, all and single, the 100,000 inhabitants of Richmond. Cruel, indeed! Shall we call on the maids to serve these dainty Democrats, these thirsty souls, with the pure lymph from Bandusia? Or shall we give them of the fermentation of the Widow Clicquot? Or might a compromise on the triple X please all parties? Seriously, this howl over the cruelty of the Confederates is absurd, and will deceive nobody at home or abroad.

A few local items will conclude my letter. The President reached Richmond, on his return from the South-West, at a late hour on the night of Saturday, the 7th instant, in a special train from Wilmington. The lateness of his arrival, and the fact that it was not known by our citizens that he would certainly come, prevented a public reception.

The Common council of the city have made an appropriation of $60,000 to purchase a house for the family of General Lee. The sum is inconsiderable for the purpose at the present value of Confederate money, but $30,000 more has already been subscribed by private individuals, and the aggregate will suffice to procure a comfortable if not an elegant mansion.

The weather has been exceedingly capricious of late. Four days ago the mercury fell to 28 deg. Fahrenheit; to-day it is as mild as May, and scarcely less beautiful seems the autumnal than the vernal landscape.

The army of General Lee is again on this side of the Rappahannock. The rumour which prevailed at the time of my last writing with regard to a battle at Manassas was wholly without foundation. The retreat of Meade, facilitated by a railway and conducted in a right line, was so rapid, that the pursuit, which was of necessity by circuitous routes, proved unsuccessful, and the enemy escaped without being forced into a general engagement. The last conflict which has taken place between any considerable numbers in Northern Virginia, occurred on the 19th instant at Buckland Mills, on the borders of Prince William and Fauquier, where Stuart attacked Kilpatrick's cavalry in front, at the same moment that Fitz Lee assailed them in the rear, capturing 200 prisoners, with horse, arms and equipments, and eight wagons. Kilpatrick had been sent out to intercept Stuart, but our dashing leader frustrated his amiable intentions. It is believed that the retreat of Meade terminates the campaign in that quarter for the winter months. Meade is supposed to occupy Centreville and the region roundabout, and to be reconstructing the old earthworks there with a view to hybernation. Cavalry fights are likely enough to occur from time to time upon the debatable ground between the two great armies, but operations on a large scale are most probably at an end for the present.

In the immediate neighbourhood of the Potomac General Imboden has been doing good service after his usual fashion. On Sunday, the 18th instant, he made a sudden descent upon the Yankees at Charlestown, in Jefferson county, eight miles south-west of Harper's Ferry and succeeded in carrying off 434 prisoners, though he was hotly pursued by a superior force of the enemy as far as Berryville, in the county of Clarke, twelve miles distant.

A similar success has been achieved in Tennessee by the cavalry of Major General Stevenson. On the 20th instant the brigades of Morrison and Dibbord attacked the enemy at Philadelphia on the line of the railroad connecting Knoxville with Chattanooga, and put them to rout, pursuing them six or eight miles to Loudon and taking six pieces of artillery, ten ambulances, fifty wagons laden with stores, a large number of horses and mules, and 700 prisoners. This movement of General Stevenson's command was made very seasonably, inasmuch as it necessitated the immediate withdrawal of a force of 8,000 men, which was advancing by way of Abingdon upon the salt-works of South-Western Virginia. The capture and destruction of these works has long been an object heartily cherished by the Yankees. They are well aware that the saline waters of Smyth and Washington counties furnish all the States of the Confederacy on this side the Mississippi with salt, and that no dependence can be placed upon any other supply. North and South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama have erected buildings on the spot, under contracts with the proprietors of the land, sunk wells to draw up the water which is subterranean, flowing in a copious stream thirty feet below the surface, and set up furnaces for the production of the salt by boiling and evaporation. Eight thousand bushels are produced daily. The capacities of transportation of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad, greatly reduced as they have been by wear and tear of rails, engines, and rolling-stock since the commencement of the war, are taxed to their utmost to carry off the salt to the places of distribution in the several States. You may well suppose, therefore, that the news of an advance of the enemy in force upon the salt-works aroused the whole population of the surrounding country for their defence. Six hundred men promptly volunteered in Lynchburg, and moved with all haste to the scene. Four hundred and fifty more were sent from Petersburg. Five companies were under arms in this city—companies composed wholly of non-conscripts, from the mercantile, mechanical, and professional classes—and waited forty-eight hours for summons by telegraph to take a special train for the theatre of expected war. Happily, the success of Stevenson's cavalry in Eastern Tennessee compelled the enemy to retire, and it is not likely that any further attempt will be made, at least for months to come, to interfere with our salt manufacture.

There is no doubt, however, that it is the purpose of the enemy to hold as large a portion of Eastern Tennessee as possible. Of the troops withdrawn from the Army of the Potomac under General Meade, the greater part were sent to Knoxville, where Burnside is said to be still in command

Their object in this is two-fold—to cut off the supplies which the Confederates have heretofore drawn steadily from that fertile region, and to protect the left flank of Rosecrans by heavy columns, distributed along the railroad above and below Knoxville, within convenient supporting distances of each other, as they are endeavouring to protect his right flank by large masses of troops at Bridgeport and Stevenson, in north-eastern Alabama. And having accomplished this, they will probably make another invasion, should we remain inactive, in far greater force than before, by simultaneous movements from Knoxville, Chattanooga, and Bridgeport, into Northern Georgia, with the hope of reaching and occupying permanently the town of Atlanta, one of the most important points of the Confederacy. Such is the idea of the enemy's future intentions entertained by the most intelligent observers of the situation of affairs, and more particularly suggested in the Army Correspondence of Colonel Alexander from Lookout Mountain, published in the Savannah Republican.

What preparations are making at the head-quarters of General Bragg to thwart these schemes, we are not advised. Nothing has reached us from that point of late but the inspiring address of President Davis to the troops, issued just before taking leave of them, which of course goes not beyond the offer of his cordial thanks to them in the name of the country for their gallantry and devotion upon the plains of Chickamauga. A few days afterwards, however, at Selma, Alabama, where he was greeted upon his arrival by a large multitude of citizens with the heartiest enthusiasm, the President made, as reported in the telegrams of the Associated Press, a very significant statement, which indicates a change in the directing mind of the Western Army, and the formation of a project of active offensive warfare. Appealing to the non-conscripts of Northern Alabama to rally to the points of local defence in moments of peril, he said: "In this way most effective aid can be given to the gallant Wheeler and others, who are carrying out the plans of the noble Longstreet, under the supervision of the heroic Bragg." If the President be correctly reported, it seems reasonable that to Longstreet has been confided the future direction of affairs in the West, and we may therefore attach a considerable importance to the assurance which reaches us unofficially from Lookout Mountain, that momentous events are on the wing. If it shall appear that Longstreet is truly the chief director of military operations, and nothing decisive should be accomplished, the country will feel a lively confidence that their hopes were impracticable.

Comparative quiet still rests over the waters and sawhills around Charleston. At intervals the batteries of Beauregard and Gilmore break the silence of the Bay, but the great bombardment, for which such immense preparations have been made, is not yet begun. A reconnoitering party in barges was discovered approaching Sumter about midnight of the 20th inst., and driven away with grape-shot. Yankee officers may be seen on horseback riding about Morris Island, inspecting the works from day to day, and the finishing strokes are supposed to have been given to Gregg and Wagner. But the Greek fire still hangs fire. Perhaps Parrott might have opened upon the city on this very day but for a heavy north-easter which prevails, and which must make Morris Island about as uncomfortable as almost any other point along the Atlantic coast. It is not impossible that it may be submerged. The Yankee letter-writers say that the ocean gains upon them daily, and a heavy blow may at any moment put them under water.

Day before yesterday we were enlightened by a telegram from the eccentric, incomprehensible, and I fear demented operator at Jackson, Mississippi, announcing, upon the authority of statements made by refugees and other irresponsible persons, that General Dick Taylor, the ubiquitous, had gained a tremendous victory over Banks in Louisiana, capturing the redoubtable Yankee commander, his whole staff, and fifteen regiments of Federal troops, white and black. Apart from our past melancholy experience of the telegraphic tricks of this Jackson lunatic during the siege of Vicksburg, we should never be deluded into credence of any such wild story as the capture of Banks. With very excellent capacities for locomotion by nature, this great hero was educated, under Stonewall Jackson in the Valley of Virginia, to fly with a celerity that will save him from the capturing hands of any Confederate general however rapid in pursuit, and if he escapes the fevers of his campaign, will go back to Massachusetts a happy and uninjured Banks, to tell of "moving accidents by flood and field," and shine on trainin' days before the bewildered eyes of the Boston militia.

The Legislature of Virginia still remains in session. During the week the Senate has had a vote upon the Bill affixing a maximum of price to all articles of prime necessity as a cure for the evils of high prices arising out of the depreciation of the currency. Happily for Richmond, the Senate had the good sense to defeat the Bill by a majority of twenty-four to sixteen. If the Bill had passed both Houses and become law, it is demonstrable that we should have been driven very near starvation before Christmas. The growers of grain and producers of other provisions would not have sent an ounce of their bacon or a gill of their wheat to Richmond, to be paid for at the arbitrary standard of the Virginia Legislature. With regard to the inflation and consequent ruinous depreciation of the Confederate currency, a scheme has been reported from the Finance Committee of the House of Delegates which has attracted a large share of public attention and is thought by some to promise great relief to the country should it be carried into practical effect. The scheme is very similar to that suggested by ex-Governor Morehead, of North Carolina, in his recent letter on the finances addressed to President Davis. Both these projects assume that the circulation is in excess of the actual demands of the country for commercial purposes by 400,000,000 dollars. Both propose to reduce the currency to this extent by loans to the Government on the part of the States, corporations and private individuals, wherein they resemble somewhat the Credit Mobilier of France, for which loans the Secretary of the Treasury, cancelling the notes thus paid in, is to issue stock of the Confederate States which shall not be subject to taxation. The striking difference between the two schemes is, that Governor Morehead does not contemplate the negotiation of the loan until the whole amount of 400,000,000 shall have been raised in 4,000 shares of $100,000 each; whereas the Finance Committee would commence with the States subscription for 15,000,000 of the stock, relying for the residue on the co-operation of the other States of the Confederacy and the patriotism of the people at large. The scheme of the Finance Committee is the work of the Hon. William H. Macfarland, President of the Farmers' Bank of Virginia; a gentleman whose financial ability has been abundantly proved in his successful administration of the affairs of that large banking establishment for many years past.

A correspondence is published this morning between Commissioners Ould and Meredith on the subject of the treatment to which General John Morgan and the officers of his command have been subjected by the Federal authorities. The systematic bad faith of the enemy is strikingly shown in this correspondence. Meredith commences by informing Ould that Morgan and his officers will be placed in close confinement for Straight and his command, and ends by declaring that the Penitentiary outrages were unauthorised by the United States Government. He gives no assurance that they will be released from close confinement or treated hereafter as prisoners of war. Appended to the letters of the Commissioners is a letter from Lieutenant-Colonel Alston, one of Morgan's officers, who was paroled and exchanged, giving an account of the most infamous violation of his plighted word of honour on the part of Lieutenant-Colonel Hanson, who was captured at Lebanon, Kentucky, and paroled, at his own earnest request, on his promise that if his Government did not recognise his parole, he would report within the Confederate lines, and who, a few days afterwards, made prisoners of a small party of Confederate troops and treated them with the greatest indignity. But to what end expose the perfidy of the Yankees? Who cares? What good purpose is subserved by the demonstration?

We have the unpleasant intelligence of the total loss of the blockade-running steamer Venus, from Nassau to Wilmington, run ashore to escape the Federal fleet at the mouth of the Cape Fear River on the night of Tuesday, the 20th instant. The Venus was laden with a valuable cargo of Quartermaster's stores and had made a very quick run of seventy hours from Nassau, when just as she was abreast of a large Yankee vessel of war, which had not discovered her, some traitor of the crew rang the steamer's bell, giving the alarm to the enemy. Instantly a fire was opened by the Yankees in the direction of the sound, with such fatal success that at the first shot three men were killed on the deck of the Venus. Two other shots successively struck the steamer and it became necessary to beach her. She was then bearded and burned by the enemy. Twenty-two of the crew and passengers made their escape to shore in the launches of the Venus; twenty-eight were taken prisoners. The wretch who betrayed the steamer was doubtless among the latter, and has obtained his reward.

The barbarities of the Federal army go on unchecked, and every day affords some fresh illustration of their wanton ferocity and cruelty. During the recent occupation of Culpepper by General Meade, the citizens suffered a degree of oppression to which the tyranny of Pope itself was mild. Twenty-five hundred negroes were carried off by them. The whole country was lighted up by them on their retreat with the glare of burning dwellings, and the progress of Lee's army in the pursuit was over desolated fields and the ashes of scarce extinguished conflagrations. But it has been reserved for Colonel Spears of the 11th Pennsylvania Cavalry to write his name higher on the roll of infamy than any Federal minion other than Turellin, Butler, Milroy, and McNeil. Captain Beale, of the Confederate navy, with twelve men, recently made a most successful dash upon the small craft of the Yankees in the waters of Chesapeake Bay, and so excited the apprehensions of the enemy that ever so many gunboats were sent up the creeks and rivers to cut off his return, while several regiments of horse and foot scoured the Peninsula in search of the "pirates." Colonel Spears with his regiment overran the county of Mathews from Gloucester Point, visiting every house and committing all manner of depredations. An aged citizen, by name Sands Smith, who had been threatened by the Yankees on a previous visit, was chased by a party of Spears' dismounted men into the woods, where, at bay, he shot and killed one of his pursuers. Overpowered by numbers he was seized, pinioned, and dragged by a rope attached to his feet, through his own yard, in sight of his daughters, and subsequently put to death in the most cruel manner. He was forced to ride under a tree, with a rope around his neck, one end of which was fastened to a limb above, and the horse was driven from beneath him. The fall did not occasion death, and while in the agonies of strangulation, the unhappy man was despatched by a fusillade. The body was then buried near the tree, with the feet sticking out of the ground, and on a board driven in close at hand, the murderers left this disgusting inscription:—

"Warning to d——n bushwhackers. Every d——n man we catch with arms in the woods, we will hang so high that the birds will build nests in them. So take warning, such will be your fate, you d——n cowards. Here lies the body of an old bushwhacker."

I respectfully commend this official atrocity of a Yankee colonel to the notice of Mr. John Bright, and beg to nominate Colonel Spears, of the 11th Pennsylvania Cavalry as a member of the Peace Society.

Dr. William B. Racker, the traitor of Western Virginia, charged with the crime of murder as well as treason, escaped a few nights ago from Pittsylvania county gaol, and is yet at large.

There is little local news. The proprietors of the largest gambling hells are selling out their luxurious furniture, silver, statuettes, Bohemian ware, chandeliers, &c., to close business under the recent act of the Virginian Legislature for the suppression of gaming. The Yankee prisoners now in town amount to upwards of 12,000.

RICHMOND, October 31.

The action of the Ministry in seizing the steamers said to be in course of construction for the Confederate Government at Mr. Laird's shipyard created no surprise here, for the extraordinary speech of Earl Russell at Blairgowrie had prepared the public mind for this extraordinary measure of caution. We may say nothing of the violation of neutrality. It may seem to a mind like Earl Russell's entirely proper that the Yankees shall have all they want in the way of munitions of war, while the Confederates may get nothing, and the Irishman's one-sided reciprocity may appear to Ministers the fair thing. All this can be passed over. But to see the Premier of the proud realm of England lowering her dignity to the behests of Seward, and conforming the course of the first Power on earth to the wishes of the bragging Yankee, is a humiliation which every honest Englishman must deplore in bitterness of soul. How changed is the port of England from what it was, less than two years ago, when the insult to her flag, in the case of the Trent, roused the indignation of the island, from Cornwall to Caithness! England afraid of the dis-United States! The lion slinking away from the crippled and beleaguered eagle, that has neither a whole wing, nor a perfect talon, nor a dangerous beak! I know little of the politics of the United Kingdom, but I have greatly misapprehended the character of the British people if they are not indignant at the timorous policy of their Premier. The rifleman who organised themselves by the hundred thousand all over England into volunteer corps at the bare possibility of a French invasion, will not tamely see the pride of their country humbled to the dust at the remote prospect of an American war; and the spirit, not less than the political taste of the Englishmen, will prefer the lyrics of Tennyson, who strikes the high note of preparation for battle, to the thrum-thrum of Tupper, who tunes his little lute for peace. How differently would Pitt have carried himself under the menaces of the Yankee, and with what imperial disdain would he not have said to Seward—contempsi Cataline gladios—I have scorned the bayonets of Napoleon, I am not frightened by yours. Earl Russell does not seem likely, in the decline of life, to enhance the respectability of his long political career; and his course with regard to the Confederate States is but the counterpart of his tergiversation in the Vienna conference. History is constantly repeating itself in individuals as in events. How appropriate, as applied to the new Earl, seems the language addressed by Junius to his great-grandfather!

"You are indeed a very considerable man. The highest rank, a splendid fortune, and the name, glorious till it was yours, were sufficient to have supported you with meaner abilities than you possess. From the first, you derived a constitutional claim to respect; from the second, a natural extensive authority; the last created a partial expectation of hereditary virtues. The use you have made of these uncommon advantages might have been more honourable to yourself, but could not be more instructive to mankind. We may trace it in the veneration of your country, the choice of your friends, and in the accomplishment of every sanguine hope which the public might have conceived from the illustrious name of Russell."

The removal of Rosecrans from the command of the Yankee army at Chattanooga will excite little astonishment in Europe, though he was unquestionably the best general the Yankees have had in the field since the opening of the war. It was necessary to punish somebody for the disaster at Chickamauga, and the commander-in-chief was too convenient a subject for sacrifice to be passed over. So Rosecrans, the military leader, has gone to join Scott, McDowell, McClellan, Pope, Hooker, Fremont, Shields, Burnside in the shades. Burnside and Fighting Joe have, indeed, been summoned back from the limbo to which they were consigned, to take subordinate positions in the service, and it is likely enough that Rosecrans, after undergoing a six weeks disgrace, may be ordered to the command of an army corps, under the all-conquering Ulysses S. Grant, or a brigade under his immediate successor, George H. Thomas. But ugly charges are made against Rosecrans. As Mr. Kinglake, in his "History of the Crimean War," has demonstrated that the French Emperor is deficient in personal courage, it is, perhaps, not so remarkable that the Yankees should discover the late commander of their Army in the West to be a coward. Again, his removal is said to be a repetition of the sorrowful case of Michael Cassio. Rosecrans was drunk in Chattanooga, while Chickamauga was a fighting—drunk without hilarity, having embruted himself, not with whisky, to the festive sound of the "canakin clink," but with opium, as if in deference to the Chinese war policy of his Government. The most charitable reason assigned for his supersedeance is, that his devotion as a member of the Roman Catholic Church is excessive, to the detriment of his usefulness as a commander, and that he spent in aves and paternosters time that had been more profitably devoted to watching the movements of Bragg and Longstreet; in short, that his vigils, though unintermitted, were not of the right sort, and that he was better fitted to the position of his worthy brother, the worthy bishop of Cincinnati, who voted the other day for the first time in twenty-five years, in order that he might swell the Government majority against Vallandigham. Any one of these reasons might be considered sufficient to justify Lincoln in superseding him, but none of them was wanting. The Yankees stand ready to applaud the act in their generous loyalty to Old Abe. If instead of cutting off Rosecrans' official head, the Federal President had made a journey to Chattanooga to crown it with laurel, they would have cried out with one voice, "Bully for Rosecrans!"

It is a noteworthy circumstance, as if to make the contrast between Abraham Lincoln and Jefferson Davis as complete and striking as possible, that while the former removes his generals upon the very slightest provocation, the latter keeps his favorites in power, despite of all disasters to their commands and all popular clamour for a change. "Oh, what is love made for," says Mr. Davis, "if 'tis not the same, thro' grief and thro' danger, thro' glory and shame?" The fidelity of Mr. Moore's lovers was not more steadfast through his delightful anapaests than Mr. Davis's in the troubled current of our national affairs; he would not remove Lovell from New Orleans nor Pemberton from Vicksburg, and he is resolute in retaining Bragg at the head of the army of Tennessee. The telegraph deceived us, it would seem, in indicating that Longstreet was hereafter to direct the military operations in that quarter. All the generals, with one or two exceptions, who served under Bragg at Chickamauga, united in a memorial to the President that a change should be made in the supreme command. General Bragg himself besought His Excellency to be transferred to some other field of usefulness, but in vain; Mr. Davis would not hearken to it, and Bragg remains a monument on Lookout Mountain of Executive fondness and firmness. Let us hope that the President's superior sagacity may be fully established in the future conduct of the Western campaign.

After some weeks of inactivity there are signs of work in the neighbourhood of Chattanooga. Day before yesterday the enemy threw a division across the river at Brown's Ferry, three miles below the town, which at once occupied and commenced fortifying Raccoon Mountain, at the same time that a heavy continuous fire of shells was opened upon the Confederate camps on the western side of Lookout Mountain, and kept up throughout the day. A skirmish had taken place between the division of General Jenkins and a body of the enemy, in which we captured a few wagons and prisoners; and the Yankees were in force on the west bank of Lookout Creek, confronting Longstreet's troops, who held the east bank. This is the situation of affairs on our left wing, from which heavy fighting may be expected at any moment.

All is quiet on the Rapidan, and likely to remain so. On Monday last, the 26th inst., a fight took place at Bealton station, on the Orange and Alexandria Railroad, in which Stuart's cavalry and a portion of General Edward Johnson's division engaged a considerable body of Yankee horse, from the commands of Buford and Fitzpatrick, and, after a sharp contest, repulsed them. Our cavalry were engaged in tearing up the track of the railroad and removing the iron, when they were attacked by superior numbers. General Johnson at once sent up a supporting force with artillery. The result was the flight of the enemy, leaving about a hundred prisoners in our hands. Our loss was eight killed and sixty wounded. All the iron that had been torn up—several car loads—was brought off, and our cavalry proceeded with the demolition of the road. Combats like this between comparatively small numbers may occur from week to week, as long as Meade and Lee continue to maintain their present respective positions, but at this moment there appears little probability that a general engagement will soon be fought. Rumours of an advance on Richmond from Fredericksburg and from West Point on York River have been in circulation during the week, and the New York papers still talk of an "overwhelming demonstration in an unexpected quarter;" but Richmond is as little in their thoughts as Washington is in ours.

Their thoughts are chiefly bent on Charleston. Their pride and purse are so deeply involved in the reduction or destruction of Charleston that they regard all other matters as unimportant in the comparison, while Beauregard holds out defiantly against fleet and battery in Charleston harbour. The bombardment of Sumter has been resumed with unprecedented fury. During the twenty-four hours ending on Thursday, the 29th, at sunset, 1,215 shots, of all calibres, from 15-inch mortars to 300-pounder Parrotts, were hurled at the fort's sea-wall, and yesterday the fire was renewed, with an equal expenditure of projectiles, principally at the north-eastern angle; but the battering is said to have made the ruined pile of brick and mortar only more compact, and the injury to the garrison did not extend beyond the wounding of seven men belonging to the 12th Georgia regiment. Some shells had previously been thrown into the city, charged with the famous Greek fire, but they did not explode. A few were picked up and examined, others fell into cisterns of water. It is now believed that the capacity for mischief of their monster guns will be much diminished by their aptitude for explosion. Several have already burst within their works on Morris Island, and a rifled piece of long range has been blown into fragments in the turret of one of the monitors, thus rendering it unfit for further service in the siege.

You have received and duly pondered the Proclamation of Lincoln calling for 300,000 additional volunteers, to be mustered into service before the 5th of January next. Lincoln may call, like Owen Glendower, but the response in this matter is as problematical as that of the spirits of the vasty deep. The volunteers will certainly not come in the desired numbers, and then there will be a second draft, which will hardly be more successful than the first. Notwithstanding all which, the men will be raised. Congress will pass a law authorising Lincoln to seize upon all the soldiers whose enlistment shall expire next spring, and throw them back into their old regiments again. The possession of absolute and irresponsible power will enable the Yankee Government to muster its myrmidons for the war to the last syllable of Black Republican rule. Had the elections gone against Lincoln in Ohio and Pennsylvania, there might have been a hope of a break down in the Yankee army; as it is, the ranks will pretty surely be filled up as soon as they are thinned out by the expiration of enlistments.

The honourable position of Attorney-General in the Confederate Cabinet, made vacant by the election of the Hon. Thomas H. Watts as Governor of Alabama, was offered by President Davis to Hon. Gustavus A. Henry, one of the Senators from the State of Tennessee, and declined by that gentleman; it has been subsequently tendered to Charles J. Jenkins, of Georgia, President of the Supreme Court of Appeals of that State, who has not as yet decided upon his course in the matter. Judge Jenkins is a man of the highest character and ability, and his acceptance of the office would add much strength to the Administration.

Virginia has lost a valuable public servant in the sudden death of General Charles Dimmock, chief of ordnance in the State military organisation, which sad event took place at midnight of the 27th instant. The General was an décoré of West Point, where he was graduated in 1821, had served several years in the United States army, and afterwards filled many positions of usefulness and respectability; the last of which threw upon him all the labour of preparing the Virginia troops for the field upon the breaking out of the war. His funeral obsequies, which were conducted on the 29th instant, were as imposing as the shabby appearance of our troops would admit of, and abundantly testified the high esteem in which the deceased was held by all classes of our citizens.

The further exchange of prisoners of war has been indefinitely postponed. The belief gains ground that the refusal of the Yankee Government to carry on the exchange is based upon a deliberate calculation of the double hardship that will thus be forced upon us, in the temporary loss of a large number of excellent troops, and the maintenance, during a period of great stint, of a yet larger number of Yankee captives.

John Minor Botts, whose arrest by General Stuart and parole to appear in Richmond I mentioned in a previous letter, has been set at liberty by General Lee. In justice to him I ought to mention that his personal friends here deny that he ever entertained General Meade and staff at dinner, or attended a sword presentation at Federal head-quarters, and allege that on the contrary he has been exceedingly hospitable to Confederate officers, and that his house is at this moment given up to our wounded soldiers.

The weather has been unusually cold for the season for several days past. On the morning of the 27th instant the mercury stood at the freezing point.

P.S.—Since the foregoing was written, a telegram informs us that the sea-wall of Sumter fell in to-day, burying thirteen men beneath the ruins. The bombardment was maintained with redoubled energy, but the injury to the fort is not regarded as serious.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, Dec. 16.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

The money market, generally speaking, is suffering from the sensitiveness usually manifested at the termination of the year. Though the late pressure and high rates have not produced any disasters of consequence, still the rise, rapid and sudden as it was, has entailed inconvenience, the effects of which may hereafter become visible. If it had not been for the confidence so generally apparent, and the exertions used to ward off unnecessary excitement, the result might have proved most serious. As it is, the panic has come and gone without stimulating anything like the ordinary amount of fear experienced in 1847-48 and 1857-58, and so much the better has it turned out for all those interested in trade and finance. Nevertheless there are yet symptoms which it is desirable to note and which must not be neglected, seeing that we have men to pass through between the end of this month and February. Gold will still be sent away to India, Brazil, and Egypt, the heavy railway deposits have to be provided for, and there remains to be witnessed the final culmination of the late speculations in stocks and shares. We may, or we may not have found the highest rate of discount, but while refraining from uttering a prediction on this point, we cannot believe that any great reduction will yet take place in the terms for general accommodation, and therefore the closer business relations are narrowed the better. About 7½ to 8 per cent. constitutes the average of the quotations among the brokers, and the demand at the full figure is limited at the Bank.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion movements at the Bank of England this week have been of a far more satisfactory character than for some time past; the gold sent in having reached £347,000, whilst the withdrawals have been only £30,000. The arrivals of specie have also been large, amounting to £708,980, of which £152,300 is from New York; £236,000 from Port Phillip, and £319,800 from the West Indies. There has been a good demand for bar silver for transmission to India, and prices have been well maintained. A large portion of the Mexican dollars brought by the previous West India steamer, has been disposed of for China at 61d. per ounce, being a decline of 1d. from the last price, and of 2½d. from the rate obtained for those brought by the earlier steamers. The amount of dollars shipped to China by the last few mails has been very small, and the low rates of exchange lately received, coupled with the interruption in the trade with Japan, have prevented any inquiry except at a reduction. The only gold-ships known to be now at sea from Melbourne are the Minarch with £247,000, and the Prince of Wales with £142,000. The former has been out ninety-nine days, and the latter sixty-six days. The Transatlantic, from Sydney, is also announced as bringing 15,000 sovereigns.

BIDDINGS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 40,000,000 rupees in Bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were—to Calcutta, 21,000,000 rupees; to Bombay, 17,000,000 rupees; and to Madras, 2,000,000. The minimum price declared was as before, 1s. 11½d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1s. 11½d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 124 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 1s. 11½d., will receive about 9 per cent.; on Bombay, at 2s. 0½d. will receive in full, and nothing will be allotted below that rate, and on Madras at 1s. 11½d. will receive about 60 per cent.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English stock market in the earlier part of the week exhibited considerable buoyancy, and prices showed a general improvement; but within the last day or two there has been much less animation, caused chiefly by the Bank of France again showing a considerable falling off in the stock of bullion, and the probability in consequence thereof of the Bank of England being under the necessity of making a further advance in the minimum rate of discount. The dealers are, therefore, operating with more caution, hence the full rise exhibited in prices has been entirely lost. Consols closed this evening at 90½ to ½ ex. div. for money, and 91 ex. div. for the account, which is the same as on this day week. Exchequer Bills are slightly easier, being at present 11s. to 6s. dis. There was at one time considerable animation in the Foreign stock market, and prices were in the ascendant; but with the decline in Consols came a relapse, and prices descended as quickly as they had risen. But, notwithstanding, as compared with this day week, the changes are quite unimportant. Mexican show an improvement of about ¼ per cent.; Spanish a decline of ½ per cent.; whilst Greek and Turkish descriptions are without alteration. The closing quotations this evening were—Greek, 25½ to 26; Mexican, 33½ to 33½; Spanish Passives, 32½ to 32½; Ditto Certificates, 12½ to 13; Turkish (1854) 89 to 89½; and Ditto (1852) 70 to 70½.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The dealings in American government and railway securities have been rather more animated during the past week than for some time previous, but still the transactions have not been equal to the usual average. Prices, however, generally exhibit an improving tendency. The transactions have been as follows:—United States Six per Cents, 65; Virginia State Six per Cents, 32½; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 80½, 80½, and 80; Do. do, Pennsylvania Section, 77½, 78, 80, 78, 80, 79, 80, and 80½; Erie $100 Shares, all paid, 66, 62, and 63; Do. Seven per Cent Preference, 60; Illinois Central Six per Cents, 82½, 83, and 84; Do. do, Seven per Cents, 72; Do. do, $100 Shares, $90 paid, 23½, 23½, 25½, and 26 dis.; Do. do, all paid, 70, 69½, 69, and 70; Panama Railway Second Mortgage, 105, 106, and 105½.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

The market for English railway shares has been moderately active during the week, and for most of the leading descriptions prices have improved. Within the last day or two, however, business has been rather restricted, the dealers being chiefly occupied with the half-monthly settlement. The market closed this evening with less firmness, being in sympathy with the other departments. As compared with last week, however, there has been an improvement of 1 per cent. in Bristol and Exeter. Great Northern, London and Brighton and London and North-Western, of ½ per cent. in Chatham and Dover; Metropolitan, North-Eastern, (Berwick), and do. (York); and of ½ per cent. in North-Eastern (Leeds). On the other hand, there has been a decline of ½ per cent. in Great Eastern, and of ½ per cent. in Great Western, and Lancashire, and Yorkshire. In foreign railway shares, business has been more quiet, without any material alteration in quotations, and for shares in British Possessions the market has been anything but active; but nevertheless prices continue to be well sustained.

THE OTTOMAN BANK.

At a meeting of the Directors of the Ottoman Bank, in liquidation, held to-day, it was decided to pay £4 upon each old, and 8s. upon each new share of paid up capital, on account of the reserve fund, and profits up to the closing of the business of the Bank, and a circular to the above effect will forthwith be sent to the shareholders.

THE HEREFORDSHIRE BANKING COMPANY.

A first dividend is now in course of payment, by the official manager of the Herefordshire Banking Company, under the winding-up order in Chancery.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The stock has not undergone any material change since last week; the price has varied between 35 and 40—but on the whole little doing. The closing quotation is 35 to 37.

SUSPENSION OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

A failure has just been announced at the Stock Exchange of an extensive dealer in Foreign Securities. He had a very large account open in Confederate Stock, Mexican and other speculative securities, and its not being anticipated that he was in an embarrassed position, he was enabled to sustain full credit to the last moment. It is stated that, there is a prospect of a fair dividend.

BANK MEETING.

An extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the London and Birmingham Bank has just been held, at the Company's head offices in Cheapside, for the purpose of altering the articles of association, so as to enable the company to hold half-yearly meetings, and to make up the accounts to the 30th June and the 31st December. The proposition was agreed to, and the chairman made a statement as to the progress of the bank down to the present time, and which was of a highly satisfactory character.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the half-yearly meeting of the Ceylon Company, the accounts showed that the amount of profits resulting from the operations of the half-year might be estimated at £7,550, out of which the directors declared an interim dividend at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum on the capital paid on the 30th September, free of income tax. The dividend would absorb £4,593. The report was unanimously adopted.—At the first ordinary meeting of the South African Mortgage and Investment Company an interim dividend was declared out of the actual profits of the company at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum for the six months ending the 30th September.—At the ordinary general meeting to-day of the shareholders of the Crystal Palace Company, Mr. Farquhar in the chair, a report was read showing that the result of the years' working was a balance in favour of revenue of £42,674; and after paying all preference charges and interest, there remained £20,218 to be divided amongst the shareholders. Out of this a dividend of 2s. per share was recommended, after paying of which there would remain a balance of £164. An amendment to reduce the dividend to 1s. 6d. was moved, but ultimately withdrawn, and the recommendation of the directors adopted.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

There have not been any great fluctuations in these markets since our last. In most departments business is dull, partly in consequence of the advanced period of the season, and partly from monetary influences. There is not, however, any perceptible anxiety to realise stocks, which, although ample, are, by satisfactory deliveries for both consumption and export, in many cases somewhat diminished. The cotton trade has remained inactive, and prices have tended in buyers' favour, without being seriously depressed. American provisions meet a limited demand but are not pressed for sale upon easier terms. On the contrary, fine butters maintain their price rather firmly. The grain markets are still declining, in the face of very moderate supplies either of home or foreign produce. Wheat must again be called 's. per quarter cheaper. The recent advance in petroleum has not been fully sustained, refined having sold at 1s. 10½d. to 1s. 11d. per gallon, and crude at £16 10s. per ton. To-day the market was firmer on the American accounts of higher rates at ports of shipment.—Linsed oil has further receded 10s. to 15s. per ton, closing to-day at £35. Spermin oil is dull at £76 for American fishing. French turpentine has risen 6s. per cwt., 70s. having been paid to-day. In American we do not hear of business to fix quotations. The tallow market is firmer, but there is not much improvement in prices. It is reported that some large speculative purchases of jute have been made at a heavy decline. Tobacco has sold without essential change in prices. Sugar, at the close of last week, recovered to the highest point of the late advance, but is again flat, and some grocery, Madras, in public sale to-day went at 1s. to 2s. per cwt. decline. In drugs the principal feature is an advance of 10s. for camphor, which is now worth 45 10s. per cwt. Balsam, Peru, is dearer. Bengal turmeric has receded 2s. per cwt. There is a quiet demand for indigo at rather over the last quarterly sales' rates. Scotch Pig Iron has been largely dealt in, the price at one time touching £6 5s. 9d., but to-day it is fully 6l. lower. Spelter is firm at £18 17s. 6d. to £19. Lead also tends to higher prices, and generally the metal trade is rather active.

The following are the current prices of the principal articles of American commerce with this country, compared with the rates current at this time last year:—

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has been issued of the El-Chico Silver Mining and Reduction Company, Limited, with a capital of £75,000, in 15,000 shares of £5 each; but it is not intended to call up more than £3 per share. The object of the undertaking is the purchase of a silver mine in the rich district of El-Chico, in Mexico, and with it, and almost adjoining, the extensive reduction and smelting works called the San Pascual Hacienda de Beneficio, which has been worked for many years with great success. The directors have agreed to purchase those properties for the sum of £28,500, being considerably less than has been expended upon them. From a careful estimate of the value of the properties, the directors anticipate a net revenue of from £20,000 to £30,000 per annum when the works are brought into full operation.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Dec. 16.

The demand for cotton has been only on a moderate scale throughout the week, but as the apprehensions diminished of a further rise in the Bank-rate, prices have generally become rather firmer again. The sales this week have again been but moderate, the total amounting to 26,500 bales, of which 12,500 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have reached 2,523,910 bales, and to the same period in 1862 they were 2,592,210 bales. The total imports this year have been 1,585,250 bales, and to the same date last year 1,143,153 bales. There have been exported this year 448,480; to the same period in 1862, 412,074 bales. Taken for consumption this year 1,272,900 bales; to the same time last year 1,116,600 bales. Taken on speculation this year 742,600 bales, and to the same time in 1862 1,001,100 bales. Computed stocks at the present time 253,230 bales, and to the same period last year 253,420 bales. Egyptians have been in fair request, at an advance from the lowest sales of last week of ½d. to ¾d. per lb. Maccio must be quoted ½d. to ¾d. lower. Pernams and Maranhams ½d. to ¾d. per lb. lower. The better classes of East Indian are saleable at ½d. per lb. advance. Bengal and Seinde have been advanced ½d. per lb. The latest quotations were:—American descriptions, 26d. to 27d.; Surats, 16½d. to 24½; Egyptians, 27½d. to 28½d.; Smyrna, 22d. to 22½d.; and Maranhams, 28½d.

MANCHESTER, December 15.

The demand for yarns and goods during the past week has been of a very sluggish character, and the aggregate amount of business transacted is small. Telegraphic advices from Bombay, dated 28th November, and Calcutta, 27th ditto, came to hand on Saturday. At the former place shirtings were quoted from 2s. to 2s. 6d. per piece lower, with nothing doing. Cotton 70 rupees for Candy lower, and Exchange at 2s. 3½d. This great alteration from the tone of previous reports from that quarter, is owing to advices from here to the effect that the Bank of England had raised its rate of discount to 6 per cent., and gives us an idea of what the effect will be on that market when they receive intelligence of the advance in the Bank rate to 8 per cent., especially when we take into consideration the fact that the active business out there during the past few months has been to a large extent of a speculative character.

This great fall in the value of goods, combined with the rise in exchange, has put a stop on buying here, as far as shippers are concerned, and much lower prices would be taken in case of offers being made.

Now that we are on the downward turn many spinners and manufacturers are talking of closing their mills, which no doubt will have to be their recourse, in case of further adverse intelligence from India.

Yarns to day are quoted ½d. per lb. down below the price of a week ago; and goods, although nominally firm, have not been tested, owing to no offers having been made.

WM. H. TRAPMAN, Esq.,

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners, in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly 2,500 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political conviction, who sympathize with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walker Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY ROTZ, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6,

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. Courtts and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

AMERICA.

On the same day, the 7th December, the Confederate Congress met at Richmond and the Federal Congress at Washington. The respective capitals are about 100 miles apart, and this being remembered, and that the Confederate Legislature assembled from all parts of the country without hindrance, the Amnesty Proclamation of Mr. Lincoln must strike every one as one of the most ill-timed jokes ever perpetrated. We elsewhere reprint the text of the Confederate Message, and in this place we propose to give a brief summary of its contents.

President Davis commences with a review of the military situation. He deplores the reverses that befel the Confederate arms at Vicksburg and Port Hudson, the unsuccessful assault on Helena, and the retreat from Little Rock, Arkansas, which gave to the Federals the control of the important valley of which it is the key. The temporary despondency incident to these events soon passed away, and on the Mississippi and in the States beyond the Mississippi frequent defeats were inflicted on the enemy, and, by the activity of troops and bodies of partisans, the Mississippi River was practically closed to commerce. After glancing at the determined and successful defence of Charleston, which, the President says, "affords an inspiring example of our ability to repel the attacks even of the iron-clad fleet on which they (the Federals) chiefly rely," his Excellency gives an account of the campaign in Virginia, remarking that the punishment administered to the enemy at Gettysburg had disabled them from renewing the campaign for some time, and that since then every demonstration of an advance has been invariably followed by a precipitate retreat. President Davis testifies warmly to the gallantry of the commanders and the soldiers who have fought for their country, but he does not hesitate to rebuke those who have from some cause or other failed to oppose proper resistance to the invader. He says that Cumberland Gap was an important and easily defensible pass, and that the country was "painfully surprised" by the intelligence of its surrender "upon the summons of a force still believed to be inadequate to its reduction, and when reinforcements were within supporting distance, and had been ordered to the aid of the officer in command." The battle of Chickamauga is described as one of the most brilliant and decisive victories of the war, and compelled the Federals to shut themselves up within their lines at Chattanooga. The Northern army, being heavily reinforced, attacked the Confederates. The conflict was of long duration, and the Federal carnage very heavy; but for the first time Confederate soldiers gave way to panic, and, whilst the line was victorious, some troops inexplicably evacuated positions of great strength, and by their disorderly retreat compelled General Bragg to withdraw his forces to a position twenty or thirty miles in his rear. When the Message was delivered the result of General Longstreet's operations was not known, but information had been received of his withdrawal from Knoxville. The President concludes this part of his Message by reminding Congress that though the expectations confidently entertained at the commencement of the campaign have not been fully realised, yet the progress of the enemy has been checked, the losses in Tennessee and Arkansas are to some extent balanced by the successes in Louisiana and Texas, the Federals have exhausted themselves by vain efforts to capture Confederate ports, and on the Northern frontier have felt the pressure and dread the renewal of invasion. Such has been the indomitable courage and perseverance manifested by the people that, however obstinate and prodigal of money, life, and liberty may be the Federals "in the hope of enslaving us, the experience of mankind has too conclusively shown the superior endurance of those who fight for home, liberty, and independence to permit any doubt of the result."

President Davis gives an elaborate exposition of the foreign relations of the Confederacy. After observing that foreign Powers had left to England and France to take the initiative in all action touching the contest in America, he proceeds to show in what manner the British Government has maintained, or rather, violated, its neutral position.

1st. The British Government in May, 1861, informed the Federals that it had not "allowed any other than an intermediate position on the part of the Southern States," and that "the sympathies of Great Britain were rather with the North than with the South."

2nd. In June, 1861, the British Government interdicted the use of its ports "to armed ships, both of the United States and the so-called Confederate States, with their prizes;" and this neutral proceeding called forth an expression of satisfaction from Mr. Seward.

3rd. The United States Government complained of Earl Russell having interviews with Confederate Commissioners, and threatened to regard them "as hostile in spirit, and to require some corresponding action accordingly." Our Foreign Secretary did not resent this interference, but pacified Mr. Adams by the assurance that "he had no expectation of seeing them any more," and the discourtesy with which his lordship has treated the representative of the Confederate States enabled him to keep his promise.

4th. President Davis condemns the recognition of a paper blockade, despite the Treaty of Paris, to which we had invited and obtained the assent of the Confederate Government. Earl Russell has explicitly admitted the violation of the treaty, and has defended it on two grounds: that it would have been infamous to break the blockade because it would relieve the sufferings of Lancashire; to which President Davis rejoins, that he had never before heard of a Government considering it infamous to assert its rights because the invasion of those rights caused misery to its people. The other excuse for the violation of a solemn treaty and of the principles of international law urged by Earl Russell is, that Great Britain was guilty of the same offence in 1807, and therefore, in justice to the United States, we cannot complain of their illegal blockade in 1861. His Excellency remarks that the cases are not quite analogous, and that the offence of Great Britain was justified in her courts solely on the plea that our action was retaliatory; and he further protests against the disregard of the recognised principles of public law and of the existing compacts whenever our questionable conduct of former times can be cited as a precedent. To admit such a principle as that put forward by Earl Russell would make it impossible for us to make any valid treaties founded upon modern expositions of public law.

5th. Earl Russell has assured the United States that he will do everything which the law of nations permits to help them, and, if necessary, he will ask Parliament to sanction further measures.

In addition to these charges, all supported by unanswerable arguments, President Davis expresses his belief that the Emperor of the French, though not protesting against the paper blockade, has made a vain effort to induce the British Government to assent to a course of action more consonant with public law and justice. His Excellency dilates upon the partiality of the British Government in allowing the purchasing of arms by the Federal Government and the enlistment of soldiers in Ireland, whilst the law is strained and new laws proposed to prevent the Confederates purchasing vessels which are useless for belligerent purposes, unless hereafter armed and equipped outside the neutral jurisdiction of this country.

President Davis admits that the Confederates have no means of obtaining redress for this injustice. If they had, we may be sure Earl Russell would have given less cause for complaint. We doubt not, however, that the people of this country will not be unaffected by the charges so clearly established against Earl Russell. President Davis might declare the ports of the United States blockaded, and so retaliate for the paper blockade of the Southern ports, but this he does not recommend because it would be a violation of public law. Or the Confederate Government might withdraw its sanction to the Treaty of Paris, seeing that the consideration it was entitled to under that compact has not been accorded it; but President Davis deems it a higher policy to forego the right of retaliation rather "than to revoke our adhesion to principles that we approve."

Upon the subject of finance the Message is very full and lucid. At the time of secession it was not imagined that the North would attempt the conquest of the South, and when war was declared and it became necessary to make provision for the contest, it was proposed to borrow money, the interest to be paid in specie. This plan has been defeated by neutral Powers recognising a paper blockade. The currency is now three times greater than required by the commerce of the country, and the effects of this inflation are very serious and disastrous. The remedy suggested is taxation. For the details of the scheme Congress is referred to the Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which document has not yet reached Europe.

President Davis gives a very satisfactory account of the condition of the army, and every available means is to be adopted for the maintenance of its efficiency. In those departments where no fighting is involved negroes are to be employed. The formation of an invalid corps is recommended, so that those who are disabled from service in the field may still be available for the service of their country in other positions. The system of substitutes is to be abolished.

Accompanying the Message is the Report of the Secretary at War, which we have not yet received. The President refers to the infant navy of the Confederate States in terms that will be highly gratifying to the members of that service.

He next comments on the refusal of the Federals to continue the exchange of prisoners; with deep feeling he speaks of the terrible sufferings of the Confederates who are confined on Johnson's Island, exposed to all the rigours of a Northern climate, and where many of them must perish. In conclusion, the President denounces the barbarous mode of warfare of the Federals, and the inhumanity with which they treat the negro, as well as the white people, over whom they obtain power.

In this imperfect summary we have omitted even to name some of the topics that are treated by President Davis; but the Message itself is before our readers, and they will see that no summary, however elaborate, can do justice to one of the ablest State papers ever published, in which there is not a superfluous word, and which charms by its eloquence while the reason is convinced by its arguments.

We intend next week to publish the text of Mr. Lincoln's Message, and, therefore, a very short notice of it will be sufficient, especially as we have devoted some space in our leader columns to its consideration. The President announces friendly relations with foreign Powers, and that the British Government and the Emperor of the French have refused to permit the departure of new "hostile expeditions" from their ports. We suppose "hostile expeditions" means unarmed vessels, and has no reference to the armaments of war and the Irish recruits shipped from British to Federal ports. The Message declares that there will be no modification of the Emancipation Proclamation, and as usual with all Federal official documents, declares that the rebellion is nearly crushed, though, rather inconsistently, Congress is requested to rely upon military force for its suppression. With regard to the finances of the North, the Message informs us that the disbursements from July 1862 to July 1863 amounted to $895,796,630, and the receipts during the same period were $901,125,674. Of the receipts, $776,682,361 was derived from loans, leaving about 12 per cent. obtained from taxation. The Report of Mr. Chase, which accompanies the Message, we shall notice at a future opportunity. President Lincoln congratulates Congress on the success of his Emancipation Proclamation. He says that 100,000 negroes are now in the military service of the United States, half of them actually bearing arms, "thus giving the double advantage of taking so much labour from the insurgent cause, and supplying the places which otherwise must be filled with so many white men." Perhaps the negroes have not much stomach for fighting for a country in which Mr. Lincoln told them they were not welcome to live, and from which he advised them to depart.

Accompanying the Message of the Federal President is a Proclamation of Amnesty which we shall also publish in our next number. Every person of distinction in the Confederacy is excluded from the benefit of this decree. Mr. Lincoln says in effect to the people of the Confederate States, "If you will submit to my authority you shall not be treated worse than the most relentless Governments have treated conquered peoples." He has not been able to catch the hare, but he hopes to beguile it by promising to skin it alive if it will walk into his trap; or rather, he hopes by this offer to beguile his Democratic subjects; for he admits that Congress must not rely on the Amnesty but on the army. We do not remember any other instance of a Government offering mercy to a nation, and at the same time asking for more men and more money to help it to subdue that nation.

We are able to affirm the correctness of the report that the Federal Government has consented to allow a large quantity of tobacco stored in Richmond on account of the French Régie, to pass through the blockade. As it is the Federal and not the Confederate Government which proclaims a blockade, it is not presumed that the latter will interpose any obstacle. We have here a beautiful illustration of the effect produced on the authorities at Washington by the two lines of policy respectively pursued by France and England in reference to the South. The favours, and very important ones too, are all on the side of those who do not appear afraid of the Yankees. Contrast this with what happened at Mobile when the British Foreign-office was bullied into dismissing a consul for assisting, with the consent of the commander of the Federal blockading squadron, in shipping a small sum of money for interest due to English holders of a State debt incurred many years before the outbreak of the war.

The Cape mail brings us an account of an heroic action, as Mr. Welles would call it, on the part of the Federal navy, which will be peculiarly gratifying to the Northern people. The Vanderbilt has paid a visit to Angra Pequena, the Guano Islands, and destroyed or carried away a large quantity of coal stored on Penguin Island, which was two years ago annexed to Cape Colony. Then, within two miles of the shore, and consequently within the English or Portuguese jurisdiction, the Vanderbilt seized the British bark Saxon. The mate was shot by a Federal officer—a deed which, if the facts are as reported, is murder. The rest of the crew were put on board a coasting vessel and sent round to Table Bay. This occurrence will give Earl Russell another opportunity of showing how much dearer to him is the friendship of the Yankee Government than the honour of England.

The merchant steamer Chesapeake, whilst on a voyage from New York to Portland, was seized by sixteen Confederates who were passengers on board. The crew, excepting the captain and chief engineer, were landed at St. John's, New Brunswick, after which the Chesapeake proceeded in an easterly direction.

Mr. Lincoln, who says that the rebellion is nearly crushed, has recommended a general thanksgiving, on account of the siege of Knoxville being raised.

At a meeting of the Virginia Synod, the Rev. Dr. M. D. Hoge gave an account of his late visit to England. He stated that he applied to the British and Foreign Bible Society to purchase religious works, but the board, presided over by Lord Shaftesbury, refused to sell him any books, but made him a magnificent donation of Bibles and other books suitable for soldiers. An attempt was made by some members of the Board to clog the grant by conditions about distribution to the slaves; which to Dr. Hoge appeared to convey an offensive imputation. Being on this account rejected by him, the gift was then freed from all conditions. We may here state that Dr. Hoge is, like the rest of the Southern clergy, devoted to furthering the spiritual interests of the negroes, and esteems it a privilege to minister among them.

At a war meeting held in New York on the 3rd inst., General Sickles expressed his opinion that Mr. Seward would shortly be in a position to demand of the governments of Europe the revocation of the recognition of the Confederates as belligerents. It did not occur to this reputable individual that the governments of Europe could not do as he wished without at the same time refusing any longer to recognise the Northern blockade of Southern ports. It will, we think, be conceded that the Federals gain far more than the Confederates by the recognition of the latter as belligerents. General Sickles, to the great delight of his audience, intimated that Europe, and particularly England, were not instigated by any sense of justice, but solely from fear of the power of the Yankee nation. The aristocracy of Europe continued to wish for the prosperity of the South, but he added "You cannot have failed to remark that our victories and our iron-clads have made us lately a good many friends in Europe." We suppose General Sickles was not referring to the Army of the Potomac, in which he had a command; and so far as the iron-clads are concerned, they have not proved very formidable to the enemy and have an uncomfortable habit of going to the bottom. A letter from President Lincoln which was read to the meeting, suggested that honour was due to the citizen as well as to the soldier. "Honour to him—only less than to him who braves for the common good the storms of Heaven and the storms of battle." We suppose by "the storms of heaven," Mr. Lincoln means Virginia mud, and if so, we must say that his soldiers have manifested on all occasions a very marked indisposition to brave it.

The Liverpool Daily Post of Monday last, said:—"We consider ourselves in a position to state that Lord Lyons, in a despatch to Lord Russell, from Washington, announces that the war in America will be terminated within the next three months. The Confederates, being in the greatest extremities, will have speedily to propose an armistice. In our informant we have the fullest possible confidence. Possibly Mr. Lincoln's Proclamation has reference to the facts on which Lord Lyons grounded his conclusion." The Globe of Tuesday gives the following semi-official contradiction to the report:—"Some of our contemporaries reproduce, in a manner betokening their sense of its authenticity, the statement of a Liverpool journal, that 'Lord Lyons, in a despatch to Lord Russell from Washington, announces that the war in America will be terminated in three months,' and that 'the Confederates, being in the greatest extremities, will have speedily to propose an armistice.' We recommend our readers to receive such statements with reserve, and not too hastily to assume Lord Lyons's readiness to accept the ninety day's bills so often drawn by the more enthusiastic Federal sympathisers, and so often renewed at a heavy rate of interest."

The North has just found out that the South is not in a state of famine. The Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune announces that an abundant supply of provisions has reached Richmond and that all fears of scarcity have been removed. We need hardly remark, that in the Confederate capital there has not at any time been the slightest anxiety for food.

General Schenck has retired from the command of Baltimore, and has been succeeded by General Lockwood. The Federal Congress have not yet passed a vote of thanks to General Schenck for the gallantry he has displayed in his war upon the unarmed citizens and women and children of Baltimore.

The price of gold in New York has fluctuated considerably: on the 9th inst. it was at 48½ per cent. premium, on the 10th inst. it was quoted at 50½ per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

The war between Mr. Richard Cobden and the Times threatened at one time to be of as great duration and asperity as the war in America. We noticed last week all the effusions which had appeared up to the time of publication, since which period the readers of the Times have been favoured with a rejoinder from Mr. Cobden and a surrejoinder from Mr. J. T. Delane, followed again by two rebutters from Mr. Cobden and a surrebutter from Mr. J. T. Delane. Inasmuch, however, as a quarrel and a war require two parties to keep the game going, and inasmuch as Mr. Delane has now announced his intention to retire from the personal part of the controversy, we seem to see the end of the affair so far as the last-named gentleman is personally concerned. Whether Mr. Cobden will resume his offensive operations against the Times in its corporate capacity lies hidden as yet in the bosom of fate. Mr. Cobden's letter of 14th December, which was published in the Times on Friday last, really gave the world a shock from which it can scarcely yet have recovered. Mr. Cobden has probably been consulting some legal friend over his "port," for he has made the astounding and alarming discovery, that if it were proved that he and Mr. Bright had proposed a distribution of lands among the poor they would both have been liable to transportation for seven years under the 57th Geo. 3, c. 19. In case such a terrible fate does befall these gentlemen, let us hope that New York or Connecticut will consent to turn penal settlement for that especial purpose. After this statement Mr. Cobden tells us that he has as much self-possession in the presence of a public audience as in his private closet. If by self-possession he means self-control, we at once believe the statement, for few men could be found who, before a public audience, would give vent to such language as Mr. Cobden has written in the recesses of his closet. The only other interesting fact in Mr. Cobden's letter of 14th December is that the Times thwarted him in his negotiations for the French treaty, and that he has hated and fought and sought to ruin the Times ever since. That being so, for the life of us we cannot imagine how the Times can be guilty of such unpardonable impudence as prolonging its condemned existence. Of Mr. Cobden's two rebutters one is not lively, but the other, which reveals the discovery by him of a passage in a leader of the Times of 26th November, shows the man of peace again in fighting attitude, talking about libellous outrages on members of the House of Commons, and characterising his opponent's language as a mockery and an untruth. Mr. Delane is of course, tranquil in his answers, but to us he seems a little too ready to make explanations and concessions, and to abandon somewhat the vantage ground on which he stood. He has now retired to the privacy from which Mr. Cobden so insultingly and unjustifiably dragged him; but he may be assured that his conduct coram populo has not been to his prejudice.

The Court-martial on Colonel Crawley of the 6th Enniskillen Dragoons, which commenced its sittings about the middle of November, was brought to a close on Friday last. It will be remembered that the charges against Colonel Crawley were, first, that he had caused certain orders, under which Sergeant-Major Lilley of the 6th Enniskillen Dragoons was confined under arrest, to be carried into effect with undue severity; and second, that the Colonel at a court-martial had publicly declared that the acts in question were the acts of Adjutant Fitzsimon, whereas in fact they were the result of the express orders of the Colonel. Lieut-General Sir S. A. Wetherall, K.C.B., presided at the court-martial; the prosecutor was Colonel Sir A. Horsford, K.C.B., and the accused was assisted in his defence by Mr. Vernon Harcourt. Sergeant-Major Lilley had been placed in arrest pending a court-martial on one Paymaster Smales, which was held at Mhow, and he was placed in arrest by the order of General Farrell, on the ground that he was connected with a conspiracy against Colonel Crawley, having for its object the giving of certain evidence prejudicial to the Colonel at the Mhow court-martial. It will be remembered that the story, as it reached England, told of a close confinement for forty days, in an Indian summer, in a bungalow unfit for human habitation, both of the Sergeant-Major and his wife—of the perpetual presence of the sentry in the room occupied by the unhappy couple, and the death of the Sergeant-Major. Now, to get at the truth of the whole matter, we will look first at the defence of Colonel Crawley at the court-martial, and then at the reply of the prosecutor. The Colonel contends that he merely carried out the orders of General Farrell, confirmed by Sir W. Mansfield, and that the sufferings of the sergeant, other than what were inseparable from close arrest, were due to the blunder of Lieutenant Fitzsimon. Sir W. Mansfield, in a letter, had ordered the "arrest," pending the Mhow Court-martial, and the word "arrest" in this letter was held to be equivalent to the "close arrest under sentries" prescribed by General Farrell. The society of his wife was an indulgence to the Sergeant, and, unless because a man is married therefore he was free from discipline, other and farther concessions were impossible. Mrs. Lilley's last letter expressed no sense of injustice. The bungalow was sufficient for comfort and privacy. If the close arrest was injurious, a representation ought to have been made by the surgeons. He adhered to his statement, which was endorsed by the Commander-in-Chief in India, that drinking brandy had accelerated the death of the Sergeant-major. The prosecutor, in reply, contended that the orders of General Farrell and Sir W. Mansfield were not peremptory directions to keep Lilley under close arrest while the court-martial was sitting, but that a discretionary power was given to Colonel Crawley both as to the period of arrest and the persons with whom the Sergeant-major might hold communication. Then, inasmuch as Lilley was the Colonel's own sergeant, and a man of high character, severity was doubly wrong. Moreover, if Lilley had evidence to give against the Colonel and in favour of Smales at the trial at Mhow, then on every principle of equity and justice Lilley had a right to have access to Smales. Indeed, to do an act of supreme equity, the Colonel ought to have even disobeyed orders. Instead of that, he had converted a mere preventive measure into a punishment of great severity. Above all, he had extended Lilley's arrest for fifteen days after all Smales's witnesses had been called, and, therefore, after the only cause of arrest had ceased to exist. The question seems to us to turn mainly on the existence of a discretionary power in the Colonel to modify the orders of his superior officers. Was he a mere instrument or not? If he was, then he must be acquitted, and any blame would fall partly on the superior officers and partly on the Lieutenant. On the other hand, if he was not a mere instrument, were his acts high-handed acts of tyranny, taking revenge on a man whose evidence against him was an object of dread? The Court has decided in favour of Colonel Crawley, and fully and honourably acquitted him of both the charges.

A case involving points of law and points of science in ship-building, both for warlike and mercantile purposes, has occupied the attention of the Court of Queen's Bench for eight days. Mr. Lindsay, M.P., is plaintiff in the action, and the defendants are the underwriters with whom Mr. Lindsay effected an insurance of the ship Harbinger. This vessel, being of some 800 tons burden, had been originally built as a war-steamer in 1847-8, and had been purchased by the plaintiff in 1857. At that time she appears to have been in good preservation, and was at once employed in the China trade. She sailed from Calcutta on her last voyage in March, 1859, being then sound in her hull, but defective in her engines and woodwork. She was insured at that time for £15,000. On her way home she put in at Algoa Bay to coal and refit, and made thence two attempts to start, but was twice driven in by stress of weather. Previously to her run into Algoa Bay, she had sprung a leak, owing to a rivet falling out below the massive "sole plate" supporting the machinery, but this hole had been effectually plugged and secured. After she had put back for the second time into the Bay, she was examined by Mr. George Cook, chief engineer of H.M.S. Perseverance, and her captain thought it right to come to England and consult Mr. Lindsay. On his arrival, Mr. Lindsay made a claim on the underwriters for £4,000, and obtained that sum. During the absence of the captain, and particularly in October, 1859, heavy gales prevailed in Algoa Bay, but no apparent injury resulted from them. On the 27th December, after the return of the captain, a leak was discovered, the cause thereof being, as was supposed, a hole in the centre of one of the plates at the bottom of the vessel, described as abaft the engine-room—the second plate from the keelson. On the 3rd January, the captain wrote to Mr. Lindsay, and intimated his opinion that a total abandonment of the vessel would be necessary. Surveys were held by nautical men on the 16th January and 1st February, and Captain Simpson, harbour-master, from an impression that the plates might have been started in the gale, recommended that the vessel should be "hove down," i.e., turned on one side to examine her bottom. It did not appear that any of the surveyors recommended a total abandonment. The captain, however, finding that it would cost £3,000 to have her "hove down," gave notice of abandonment on the 3rd February, and on the 8th, having removed the engines, which were sent to England, advertised the hull for sale. The hull was sold for £200, the engines for £800, and the spars, &c., for a few hundreds more. Mr. Lindsay thereupon claimed the residue, nearly £14,000, of the underwriters; about twenty-six of them complied, and the remainder, about eighty in number, contested this action. It should be mentioned that Mr. Lindsay had written an answer to the captain's letter of 3rd January, had approved the course taken by the captain in rejecting a tender for "heaving down" the vessel in Algoa Bay at a cost of £3,000, had inferred from the hole a serious strain calculated to have seriously weakened the rivets and loosened the plates, and had concluded that the ship must be abandoned. He also approved the absence of any attempt to take the vessel to Simon's Bay, a three days' voyage. It was originally represented that the hole was under the "sole plate" in the engine-room, as stated in the log-book, and also that the hole was of a nature calculated to ruin the vessel; but this part of the case rather fell through, and was not relied on much by the counsel. The real stress of the case ultimately lay upon the extensive damage done generally to the rivets and plates by straining. The jury found that the ship was unseaworthy as to the hole in the plate and as to her rivets; and, while thinking that the hole might have been repaired, were doubtful as to the rivets; that "heaving down" was necessary, but that it was not practicable in Algoa Bay; that "heaving down" was practicable in Simon's Bay, but that she ought not to have been taken there without the consent of all parties. The jury also found that abandonment was not justified and that the sale was not necessary; but they also found that the injuries to the vessel arose "from the combined effects of wear-and-tear and sea damage." After these answers the jury was asked whether the amount paid into court, 7 per cent., was sufficient to make good the partial loss. On this point no verdict was obtained, and eventually the parties agreed each to pay their own costs, and the plaintiffs to have £4,500 out of £5,000 paid into court. The result, of course, was that the law points at issue were not determined, for it may easily be imagined that whatever the result before the jury might have been the case would have been prolonged through various stages until it had finally taken refuge in the House of Lords. But the case has another and a practical interest. The injury to the plate was said to have been caused by a blow from a piece of wreck, and such a view produces distrust in the safety of iron passenger ships and iron ships of war. It also seemed that a crack of a malignant nature in the iron plates ruined a vessel at sea, for the injury was supposed to be irreparable at sea. This view was on the whole refuted in the course of the trial. A theory was also involved that the rivets might be started by a strain, that the injury might be latent, and that the vessel might go out to sea and sink in an hour. All these theories, of course, are confined to iron ships and are therefore novel in regard to an inquiry of this nature. Indeed the second danger was not fully estimated at the trial; and the evidence was rather in favour of this alarming feature in iron ships, for Captain Simpson and Mr. Gladstone both declared that it would be clearly unsafe to run a ship out to sea with started rivets in order to test the existence of leakage. On the whole, the trial will be of much value in turning attention to these points in connection with the building and use of iron-plated vessels.

It is asserted that the Government employés at Sheerness who volunteered to fit out and equip the Rappahannock as a ship of war for the Confederate States have been discharged. It is understood also that the names of persons in the crews of the Alabama, Georgia, and Florida who belong to the Royal Naval Reserve, have been struck off the list, with the loss of all pay and pensions, and perpetual exclusion from the service.

Mr. Cobbett, M.P. for Oldham, in an address delivered last week at Royton, made some remarks with reference to the war in America. He said that his feelings were in favour of the South. He had read the speeches of Mr. Cobden and Mr. Bright at Rochdale, who looked upon the war as a movement for the abolition of slavery. He (Mr. Cobbett) knew something of America himself, and from all he had read, and from all he had gathered from personal observation, it appeared to him that to emancipate these 4,000,000 poor creatures of slaves in the South would be the most cruel thing which could be done to them. It was too much to expect the people of the Southern States to give up their property; for this country really considered slaves to be property when they paid the West India planters for giving up their slaves. It was idle to talk of the Northern people being enthusiasts in the cause of emancipation, when they knew that President Lincoln, in his Message to Congress in 1861, said distinctly, with regard to emancipation, that he not only did not think of emancipating the slaves, but that he doubted if he had the constitutional right to do so. He afterwards apologised for his emancipation proclamation by calling it a war measure. He issued the proclamation as a war measure in order that he might damage the property of the Southern people. When they remembered that the war was carried on by the North to exterminate both white and black rather than give up the Union, it became a question whether they ought to do anything in favour of the North; and, in his opinion, if they did anything, it ought to be in favour of the South."

We have news from the Cape of Good Hope that Bishop Colenso's trial commenced on the 17th November, in St. George's Cathedral, before the metropolitan and two suffragans, the Bishop of Graham's Town and the Bishop of the Orange Free State. The accusing clergy, the Dean of Cape Town and the Archdeacons of Graham's Town and George Town, supported the charges. Dr. Bleek appeared for Bishop Colenso and read a letter from the bishop denying the jurisdiction of the court, and also handed in a formal protest. An appeal will lie to the judicial committee of the Privy Council in case of the condemnation of Bishop Colenso.

Summonses to appear before the bench of magistrates for the county of Sussex were served last week on Tom King and John Heenan the combatants, and Sayers, Macdonald, Nolan, and others, the seconds and leading managers, in the great prize-fight which was fought at Wadhurst a short time since between King and Heenan. The case was fixed for Tuesday last, and the defendants were charged "with riotous assembling with divers other persons, and disturbing the peace of Her Majesty the Queen." The individuals so charged met at London Bridge station early on Tuesday, and proceeded by train to Rotherfield to appear before the bench. They were excessively jolly, and even Heenan was again well and in high spirits. At the hearing, evidence of the fight and of the presence of the accused was given, and the parties were bound over in sums of £50 each, with bail for £50 besides, to appear at the next quarter sessions to answer any indictment for misdemeanour that might be preferred against them.

THE CONTINENT.

THE Federal troops will meet with no resistance in Holstein or Lauenburg. Both Duchies will probably be entirely in their hands before the end of the week. An attempt will no doubt be made in Holstein to proclaim the Prince of Augustenburg Duke, as soon as the Danes retire, and the interval between their disappearance and the arrival of the Federal troops with the commissioners charged with the administration, may be used to establish some kind of provisional government, which Europe will be asked to consider as the choice of the people and to treat with accordingly. The ferment in Germany does not diminish. The smaller States, governments, and people, are quite beside themselves with the prospect of this first glorious achievement of German unity—the humiliation of little Denmark.

The Prussian House of Deputies passed their Address to the King by 207 to 107 votes. It is not yet known whether the King will receive the deputation charged to present it. It is presumed that he will not. His Majesty is said to be vacillating between that modified regard for the Treaty of London which may be said to be personified in Herr von Bismarck, and the cry of the military and radical parties, for once united, for war on behalf of the Augustenburgers. The temptation to take the Radicals at their word, and proceed to a war which, in whatever way it might ultimately turn out, must at least carry through his own pet projects, must be great. On the other hand, the danger of such a policy is also great, and the King, with all his faults, is an honest man, to whom the breach of a treaty must be a very disagreeable act.

The Prussian Government will probably adhere to its recent declarations. They are unsatisfactory enough. If Herr von Bismarck admits the obligations imposed by the Treaty of Succession, he makes those obligations conditional upon the performance by the Danish Government of measures which it never promised and cannot possibly consent to; and he has hinted plainly enough that the execution once carried out, he will bethink himself what pretexts he can find for repudiating the Treaty.

The Prussian Herrenhaus has also voted an address to the King. It is favourable to the policy of the Government, and criticises sharply the conduct of the Lower House in refusing the loan.

An assembly of delegates from different German States—members of the respective Parliaments—has assembled at Frankfurt to determine what the nation should do in the Slesvig-Holstein question. The members are of course enthusiastic for war.

The Austrian Government has addressed a circular despatch to its representatives at London, Paris, and St. Petersburg, defining its position in this question. After referring to the death of King Ferdinand and the excitement in Germany, it points out that Austria and Prussia find themselves in a difficult position to conciliate their duties towards Germany with those towards their co-signatories of the London Treaty. Both Governments hope, however, to arrive at a peaceful solution, for which, however, they require the support of the other Powers whose advice has weight at Copenhagen. Count Rechberg hopes that France, England, and Russia will be so far in accord with the attitude of Austria, as to energetically insist that with the London stipulations the engagements towards the Duchies shall be carefully fulfilled. The execution was already determined by the Bund against Denmark VII. The publication of the Constitution is in contradiction to the former engagements. If King Christian will fulfil them, Austria and Prussia will scrupulously observe their engagements; but if he tramples under foot the rights of the Duchies he deprives himself of all right to the observance of the stipulations favourable to him. The two Powers are ready now, as in 1851, to respect the principle of the integrity of the Danish monarchy.

The session of the Danish Rigsraad was closed on Monday by a message from the King, read by the President of the Ministry. It observed that the Constitution of the 18th November rested upon the same basis as the one already in existence, and that it would be no obstacle to the King's intention to give his Federal provinces the same freedom and independence. It proceeds (according to the telegraphic summary) thus:—

A desire to dismember the Danish monarchy has arisen in Germany. We hope, however, that Europe will nevertheless maintain our right to the hereditary succession. We have fulfilled every resolution of the Federal Diet concerning the Federal provinces. German troops have occupied Holstein and Lauenburg, although the latter has recently testified its satisfaction and loyalty to Denmark.

Although we do not recognise the execution on the part of the German Confederation as justifiable, we withdraw our troops to this side of the Eider, in order to avoid a collision.

The debate in the French Senate terminated by the adoption of the project of address presented by the Commission. It had been expected that Count Walewski and Prince Napoleon would speak, but the expectation was not fulfilled. The principal speakers, in addition to what we mentioned last week, were the Marquis de la Rochejaquelein and M. Dupin. Both protested very strongly against war for Poland. M. Dupin's speech was confined entirely to that topic, and was a masterpiece of epigrammatic oratory. He pointed out the difficulties of a crusade for Poland against Europe, and he protested against maiming France—against perilling France, the Empire, and the Emperor in such an effort. The Emperor received the address on Monday, and returned the following answer:—

Good is the sole motive of my actions. At home and abroad I desire the appeasement of passions, with concord and union. I direct all my wishes to the moment when the great questions which divide governments and peoples will be pacifically solved by European arbitration. This wish was that of the chief of my family when he wrote from St. Helena that "to fight in Europe is to make civil war." May not this great thought, an Utopia in the past, to-morrow become a reality? However this may be, it is always an honour to proclaim a principle tending to remove the prejudices of another age. Let us unite our efforts for this noble end, and let us only study obstacles to vanquish them, and incredulity to confound it.

The Moniteur publishes a circular, addressed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys, on the 8th of December, to the heads of the diplomatic missions of France in Europe.

It says: "A single Power, England, has refused the invitation to the Congress. In these circumstances we must express to the British Cabinet our great regret; to the sovereigns who have accepted it without condition, our gratitude, and give an explanation to those who have demanded information." It points out, by a reference to the Danish question, the utility of the Congress. "A Congress alone could reconcile the duties of sovereigns bound by convention and the legitimate aspirations of the people. The refusal of England has rendered impossible a general Congress; there remains a restricted Congress. Whilst the proposition was for a general Congress the Emperor could not concert with certain of the Powers plans to be submitted to others, and thus spoil deliberations which it was desired should be entered into without preconceived ideas and private engagements. But now the assembly, being incomplete, will not have the arbitral authority of a European Congress. We understand, therefore, that previous to meeting the sovereigns will charge their ministers for foreign affairs to come to an understanding upon the questions which are to be discussed, in order that the Congress may have more chance of arriving at a practical result."

By a strange mistake, some of our provincial contemporaries have credited to the Morning Herald, instead of the Daily News, the forged document published by the latter, and purporting to be a list of the officers of the Southern Independence Association of London. We beg to direct the attention of our country friends, who have fallen into this error, to the letters of Mr. Beresford Hope, W. G. E. Seymour, and Mr. H. Hotze, exposing the forgery, and to the subjoined disclaimer by the journal which published it.—

(Daily News, 12th December.)

Knowing from the unsought information of friends who favour the cause of the South, and who had been asked to join the Southern Independence Association, that it was in course of formation, when a document of the Association—a copy of its printed articles—reached this office, "with Mr. Beresford Hope's compliments," we had no reason to suspect the authenticity of the list of names which accompanied it. We had no curiosity to know the composition or proceedings of the Southern Independence Association, nor have we invited information on the subject. In publishing the list we imagined that we had not only Mr. Hope's authority, but were gratifying his desire. We shall certainly give Mr. Beresford Hope every facility for discovering the person who has abused his name.

PRESIDENT DAVIS'S MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the Confederate States.

The necessity for legislative action, arising out of the important events that have marked the interval since your adjournment, and my desire to have the aid of your counsel on other matters of grave public interest, render your presence at this time more than ordinarily welcome. Indeed, but for serious obstacles to convoking you in extraordinary Session, and the necessity for my own temporary absence from the seat of Government, I would have invited you to an earlier meeting than that fixed at the date of your adjournment.

Grave reverses befell our arms soon after your departure from Richmond. Early in July our strongholds at Vicksburg and Port Hudson, together with their entire garrisons, capitulated to the combined land and naval forces of the enemy. The important interior position of Jackson next fell into their temporary possession. Our unsuccessful assault on the post of Helena was followed, at a later period, by the invasion of Arkansas, and the retreat of our army from Little Rock gave to the enemy the control of the important valley in which it is situated.

The resolute spirit of the people soon rose superior to the temporary dependency naturally resulting from these reverses. The gallant troops, so ably commanded in the States beyond the Mississippi, inflicted repeated defeats on the invading armies in Louisiana and on the coast of Texas. Detachments of troops and active bodies of partisans kept up so effective a war on the Mississippi River as practically to destroy its value as an avenue of commerce.

The determined and successful defence of Charleston against the land and naval operations of the enemy afforded an inspiring example of our ability to repel the attacks even of the ironclad fleet on which they chiefly rely; while on the Northern frontier our success was still more marked.

The able commander who conducted the campaign in Virginia determined to meet the threatened advance on Richmond, for which the enemy had made long and costly preparations, by forcing their armies to cross the Potomac and fight in defence of their own capital and homes. Transferring the battle-field to their own soil, he succeeded in compelling their rapid retreat from Virginia, and in the hard-fought battle of Gettysburg inflicted such severity of punishment as disabled them from early renewal of the campaign as originally projected. Unfortunately, the communications on which our general relied for receiving his supplies of munitions were interrupted by extraordinary floods, which so swelled the Potomac as to render impassable the fords by which his advance had been made, and he was thus forced to a withdrawal, which was conducted with deliberation, after securing large trains of captured supplies, and with a constant but unaccepted tender of battle. On more than one occasion the enemy has since made demonstrations of a purpose to advance, invariably followed by a precipitate retreat to intrenched lines on the approach of our forces.

The effective check thus opposed to the advance of invaders at all points was such as to afford hope of their early expulsion from portions of the territory previously occupied by them, when the country was painfully surprised by the intelligence that the officer in command of the Cumberland Gap had surrendered that important and easily defensible pass without firing a shot, upon the summons of a force still believed to have been inadequate to its reduction, and when reinforcements were within supporting distance, and had been ordered to his aid. The entire garrison, including the commander, being still held prisoners by the enemy, I am unable to suggest any explanation of this disaster, which laid open Eastern Tennessee and South-Western Virginia to hostile operations, and broke the line of communication between the seat of Government and Middle Tennessee. This easy success of the enemy was followed by an advance of General Rosecrans into Georgia, and our army evacuated Chattanooga, and availed itself of the opportunity thus afforded of winning on the field of Chickamauga one of the most brilliant and decisive victories of the war. This signal defeat of General Rosecrans was followed by his retreat into Chattanooga, where his imperilled position had the immediate effect of relieving the pressure of the invasion at other points, forcing the concentration for his relief of large bodies of troops withdrawn from the armies in the Mississippi Valley and in Northern Virginia. The combined forces thus accumulated against us in Tennessee so greatly outnumbered our army as to encourage the enemy to attack. After a long and severe battle, in which great carnage was inflicted on him, some of our troops inexplicably abandoned positions of great strength, and by a disorderly retreat compelled the commander to withdraw the forces elsewhere successful, and finally to retire with his whole army to a position some twenty or thirty miles to the rear. It is believed that if the troops who yielded to the assault had fought with the valour which they had displayed on previous occasions, and which was manifested in this battle on the other parts of the line, the enemy would have been repulsed with very great slaughter, and our country would have escaped the misfortune, and the army the mortification, of the first defeat that has resulted from misconduct by the troops. In the meantime, the army of General Burnside was driven from all its field positions in Eastern Tennessee, and forced to retreat into his entrenchments at Knoxville, where, for some weeks, it was threatened with capture by the forces under General Longstreet. No information has reached me of the final result of the operations of our commander, though intelligence has arrived of his withdrawal from that place.

While, therefore, our success in driving the enemy from our soil has not equalled the expectations confidently entertained at the commencement of the campaign, his further progress has been checked. If we are forced to regret losses in Tennessee and Arkansas, we are not without ground for congratulation on successes in Louisiana and Texas. On the seacoast he is exhausted by vain efforts to capture our ports, while on the northern frontier he has in turn felt the pressure and dreads the renewal of invasion. The indomitable courage and perseverance of the people in the defence of their homes have been nobly attested by the unanimity with which the Legislatures of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia have recently given expression to the popular sentiment; and like manifestations may be anticipated from all the States. Whatever obstinacy may be displayed by the enemy in his desperate sacrifices of money, life, and liberty in the hope of enslaving us, the experience of mankind has too conclusively shown the superior endurance of those who fight for home, liberty, and independence to permit any doubt of the result.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

I regret to inform you that there has been no improvement in the state of our relations with foreign countries since my Message in January last. On the contrary, there has been a greater divergence in the conduct of European nations from that practical impartiality which alone deserves the name of neutrality, and their action, in some cases, has assumed a character positively unfriendly.

You have heretofore been informed that, by common understanding, the initiative in all action touching the contest on this continent had been left by foreign Powers to the two great maritime nations of Western Europe, and that the two Governments of these two nations had agreed to take no measures without previous concert. The result of these arrangements has therefore placed it in the power of either France or England to obstruct at pleasure the recognition to which the Confederacy is justly entitled, or even to prolong the continuance of hostilities on this side of the Atlantic, if the policy of either could be promoted by the postponement of peace. Each, too, thus became possessed of great influence in so shaping the general exercise of neutral rights in Europe as to render them subservient to the purpose of aiding one of the belligerents to the detriment of the other. I referred, at your last Session, to some of the leading points in the course pursued by professed neutrals, which betrayed a partisan leaning to the side of our enemies; but events have since occurred which induce me to renew the subject in greater detail than was then deemed necessary. In calling to your attention the action of these Governments I shall refer to the documents appended to President Lincoln's Messages, and to their own correspondence, as disclosing the true nature of their policy and the motives which guided it. To this course no exception can be taken, inasmuch as our attention has been invited to those sources of information by their official publication.

In May, 1861, the Government of Her Britannic Majesty informed our enemies that it had not "allowed any other than an intermediate position on the part of the Southern States," and assured them "that the sympathies of this country (Great Britain) were rather with the North than with the South."

On the 1st day of June, 1861, the British Government interdicted the use of its ports "to armed ships and privateers both of the United States and the so-called Confederate States," with their prizes. The Secretary of State of the United States fully appreciated the character and motive of this interdiction, when he observed to Lord Lyons, who communicated it, "that this measure, and that of the same character which had been adopted by France, would probably prove a death-blow to Southern privateering."

On June 12th, 1861, the United States' Minister in London informed Her Majesty's Secretary for Foreign Affairs that the fact of his having held interviews with the Commissioners of this Government had given "great dissatisfaction," and that a protraction of this relation would be viewed by the United States "as hostile in spirit, and to require some corresponding action accordingly." In response to this intimation, Her Majesty's Secretary assured the Minister that "he had no expectation of seeing them any more."

By proclamation, issued on the 19th and 27th of April, 1861, President Lincoln proclaimed the blockade of the entire coast of the Confederacy, extending from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, embracing, according to the returns of the United States coast survey, a coast line of 3549 statute miles, on which the number of rivers, bays, harbours, inlets, sounds, and passes is 189. The navy possessed by the United States for enforcing this blockade was stated in the reports communicated by President Lincoln to the Congress of the United States to consist of twenty-four vessels of all classes in commission, of which half were in distant seas. The absurdity of the pretension of such a blockade in the face of the authoritative declaration of the maritime rights of neutrals made at Paris in 1856 was so glaring, that the attempt was regarded as an experiment on the forbearance of neutral Powers, which they would promptly resist. This conclusion was justified by the facts that the Governments of France and Great Britain determined that it was necessary for their interests to obtain from both belligerents "securities concerning the proper treatment of neutrals." In the instructions "which confided the negotiation on this matter" to the British Consul in Charleston he was informed that "the most perfect accord on this question exists between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Emperor of the French," and these instructions were accompanied by a copy of the despatch of the British Foreign Office of the 18th of May, 1861, stating that there was no difference of opinion between Great Britain and the United States as to the validity of the principles enunciated in the Fourth Article of the Declaration of Paris in reference to blockades. Your predecessors of the Provisional Congress had, therefore, no difficulty in proclaiming, nor I in approving, the resolutions which abandoned in favour of Great Britain and France our rights to capture enemy's property when covered by the flags of those Powers. The "securities" desired by those Governments were understood by us to be required from both belligerents. Neutrals were exposed, on our part, to the exercise of belligerent right of capturing their vessels when conveying the property of our enemies. They were exposed, on the part of the United States, to interruption in their unquestioned right of trading with us by the declaration of the paper blockade above referred to. We have no reason to doubt the good faith of the proposal made to us, nor to expect that we were to be the only parties bound by its acceptance. It is true that the instructions of the neutral Powers informed their agents that it was "essential under present circumstances that they should act with great caution in order to avoid raising the question of the recognition of the new Confederation," and that the understanding on the subject did not assume, for that reason, the shape of a formal Convention. But it was not deemed just by us to decline the arrangement on this ground, as little more than ninety days had then elapsed since the arrival of our Commissioners in Europe, and neutral nations were fairly entitled to a reasonable delay in acting on a subject of so much importance, and which, from their point of view, presented difficulties that we, perhaps, did not fully appreciate. Certain it is that the action of this Government on the occasion, and its faithful performance of its own engagements, have been such as to entitle it to expect on the part of those who sought in their own interests a mutual understanding the most scrupulous adherence to their own promises. I feel constrained to inform you that in this expectation we have been disappointed, and that not only have the Governments which entered into these arrangements yielded to the prohibition against commerce with us which has been dictated by the United States, in defiance of the law of nations, but that this concession of their neutral rights to our detriment has on more than one occasion been claimed in intercourse with our enemies as an evidence of friendly feeling towards them. A few extracts from the correspondence of Her Majesty's Chief Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will suffice to show marked encouragement to the United States to persevere in its paper blockade, and unmistakable intimations that Her Majesty's Government would not contest its validity.

On the 21st of May, 1861, Earl Russell pointed out to the United States' Minister in London that "the blockade might, no doubt, be made effective, considering the small number of harbours on the Southern coast, even though the extent of 3000 miles were comprehended in the terms of that blockade."

On the 14th of January, 1862, Her Majesty's Minister in Washington communicated to his Government that, in the extenuation of the barbarous attempt to destroy the port of Charleston by sinking a stone fleet in the harbour, Mr. Seward had explained "that the Government of the United States had last spring, with a navy very little prepared for so extensive an operation, undertaken to blockade upwards of 3000 miles of coast. The Secretary of the Navy had reported that he could stop up the 'large bores' by means of his ships, but that he could not stop up the 'small ones.' It had been found necessary, therefore, to close some of the numerous small inlets by sinking vessels in the channel."

On the 6th of May, 1862, so far from claiming the right of British subjects as neutrals to trade with us as belligerents, and to disregard the blockade on the ground of this explicit confession by our enemy of his inability to render it effective, Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs claimed credit with the United States for friendly action in respecting it.

His lordship stated that the United States' Government, on the allegation of a rebellion pervading from nine to eleven States of the Union, "have now for more than twelve months endeavoured to maintain a blockade of 3000 miles of coast. This blockade, kept up irregularly, but, when enforced, enforced severely, has seriously injured the trade and manufactures of the United Kingdom. Thousands are now obliged to resort to the poor-rates for subsistence, owing to the blockade. Yet Her Majesty's Government have never sought to take advantage of the obvious imperfections of this blockade in order to declare it ineffective. They have, to the loss and detriment of the British nation, scrupulously observed the duties of Great Britain towards a friendly State."

Again, on September 22, 1862, the same noble earl asserted that the United States were "very far indeed" from being in "a condition to ask other nations to assume that every port of the coasts of the so-styled Confederate States is effectively blockaded."

When, in view of these facts—of the obligations of the British nation to adhere to the pledges made by their Government at Paris in 1856, and renewed to the Confederacy in 1861—and of these repeated and explicit avowals of the imperfections, irregularity, and inefficiency of the pretended blockade of the coast, I directed our Commissioner at London to call upon the British Government to redeem its promise and to withhold its aid and sanction from the flagrant violation of public law committed by our enemies, we were informed that Her Majesty's Government could not regard the blockade of the Southern ports as having been otherwise than "practically effective" in February, 1862, and that "the manner in which it has since been enforced gives to neutral Governments no excuse for asserting that the blockade has not been efficiently maintained." We were further informed, when we insisted that by the terms of our agreement no blockade was to be considered effective unless "sufficient really to prevent access to our coast," that the Declaration of Paris was, in truth, directed against blockades not sustained by any actual force, such as the occasional appearance of a man-of-war in the offing, or the like.

It was impossible that this mode of construing an agreement, so as to make its terms mean almost the reverse of what they plainly conveyed, could be considered otherwise than as a notification of the refusal of the British Government to remain bound by its agreement, or longer to respect those articles of the Declaration of Paris which had been repeatedly denounced by British statesmen, and had been characterised by Earl Russell as "very imprudent" and "most unsatisfactory."

If any doubt remained of the motives by which the British Ministry have been actuated in their conduct, it would be completely dissipated by the distinct avowals and explanations contained in the published speech recently made by Her Majesty's Secretary for Foreign Affairs. In commenting on the remonstrances of this Government against the countenance given to an ineffective blockade, the following language is used:—"It is said we have, contrary to the Declarations of Paris, contrary to international law, permitted the blockade of 3000 miles of American coast. It is quite true we did so, and the presumable cause of complaint is quite true, that although the blockade is kept up by a sufficient number of ships, yet these ships were sent into the United States' navy in a hurry, and are ill-fitted for the purpose, and did not keep up so completely and effectively as was required an effective blockade."

This unequivocal confession of violation both of agreement with us and of international law is defended on grounds the validity of which we submit with confidence to the candid judgment of mankind.

These grounds are thus stated:—"Still, looking at the law of nations, it was a blockade we, as a great belligerent Power, in former times should have acknowledged. We, ourselves, had a blockade of upwards of 2000 miles, and it did seem to me that we were bound, in justice to the Federal States of America, to acknowledge that blockade. But there was another reason which weighed with me. Our people were suffering severely for the want of that material which was the main staff of their industry, and it was a question of self-interest whether we should not break the blockade. But, in my opinion, the men of England would have been for ever infamous if, for the sake of their own interest, they had violated the law of nations and made war in conjunction with these slaveholding States of America against the Federal States."

In the second of these reasons our rights are not involved, although it may be permitted to observe that the conduct of Governments has not heretofore, to my knowledge, been guided by the principle that it is infamous to assert their rights whenever the invasion of those rights create severe suffering among their people, and injuriously effects great interests. But the intimation that relations with these States would be discreditable because they are slaveholding, would probably have been omitted if the official personage who has published it to the world had remembered that these States were, when colonies, made slaveholding by the direct exercise of the power of Great Britain, whose dependencies they were, and whose interests in the slave trade were then supposed to require that her colonies should be made slave-holding.

But the other ground stated is of a very grave character. It asserts that a violation of the law of nations by Great Britain in 1807, when that Government declared a paper blockade of 2000 miles of coast (a violation then defended by her courts and jurists on the sole ground that her action was retaliatory), affords a justification for a similar outrage on neutral rights by the United States in 1861, for which no palliation can be suggested; and that Great Britain "is bound, in justice to the Federal States," to make return for the war waged against her by the United States, in resistance of her illegal blockade in 1807, by an acquiescence in the Federal illegal blockade of 1861. The most alarming feature in this statement is its admission of a just claim on the part of the United States to require of Great Britain during this war a disregard of the recognised principles of modern public law and of her own compacts whenever any questionable conduct of Great Britain "in former times" can be cited as a precedent. It is not inconsistent with respect and admiration for the great people whose Government have given us this warning to suggest that their history, like that of mankind in general, offers exceptional instances of indefensible conduct "in former times;" and we may well deny the morality of violating recent engagements through deference to the evil precedents of the past.

After defending in the manner just stated the course of the British Government on the subject of the blockade, Her Majesty's Foreign Secretary takes care to leave no doubt of the further purpose of the British Government to prevent our purchase of vessels in Great Britain, while supplying our enemies with rifles and other munitions of war, and states the intention to apply to Parliament for the furtherance of this design. He gives to the United States the assurance that he will do in their favour not only "everything that the law of nations requires, everything that the present Foreign Enlistment Act requires," but that he will ask the sanction of Parliament "to further measures that Her Majesty's Ministers may still add." This language is so unmistakably an official exposition of the policy adopted by the British Government in relation to our affairs, that the duty imposed on me by the Constitution, of giving you from time to time "information of the state of the Confederacy" would not have been performed if I had failed to place it distinctly before you.

I refer you for fuller details on this whole subject to the correspondence of the State Department, which accompanies this message. The facts which I have briefly narrated are, I trust, sufficient to enable you to appreciate the true nature of the neutrality professed in this war. It is not in my power to apprise you to what extent the Government of France shares the views so unreservedly avowed by that of Great Britain, no published correspondence of the French Government on the subject having been received. No public protest nor opposition, however, has been made by his Imperial Majesty against the prohibition to trade with us imposed on French citizens by the paper blockade of the United States, although I have reason to believe that an unsuccessful attempt was made on his part to secure the assent of the British Government to a course of action more consonant with the dictates of public law and with the demands of justice towards us.

The partiality of Her Majesty's Government in favour of our enemies has been further evinced in the marked difference of its conduct on the subject of the purchase of supplies by the two belligerents. This difference has been conspicuous since the very commencement of the war. As early as the 1st of May, 1861, the British Minister in Washington was informed by the Secretary of State of the United States that he had sent agents to England, and that others would go to France, to purchase arms; and this fact was communicated to the British Foreign Office, which interposed no objection. Yet in October of the same year Earl Russell entertained the complaint of the United States' Minister in London, that the Confederate States were importing contraband of war from the island of Nassau, directed inquiry into the matter, and obtained a report from the authorities of the island denying the allegations, which report was enclosed to Mr. Adams, and received by him as satisfactory evidence to dissipate "the suspicions naturally thrown upon the authorities of Nassau by that unwarrantable act." So, too, when the Confederate Government purchased in Great Britain, as a neutral country (and with strict observance both of the law of nations and the municipal law of Great Britain), vessels which were subsequently armed and commissioned as vessels of war, after they had been far removed from English waters, the British Government, in violation of its own laws and in deference to the importunate demands of the United States, made an ineffectual attempt to seize one vessel, and did actually seize and detain another which touched at the island of Nassau, on her way to a Confederate port, and subjected her to an unfounded prosecution at the very time when cargoes of munitions of war were being openly shipped from British ports to New York to be used in warfare against us. Even now the public journals bring intelligence that the British Government has ordered the seizure, in a British port, of two vessels, on the suspicion that they have been sold to this Government, and that they may be hereafter armed and equipped in our service; while British subjects are engaged in Ireland by tens of thousands to proceed to the United States for warfare against the Confederacy, in defiance both of the law of nations and of the express terms of the British statutes, and are transported in British ships, without an effort at concealment, to the ports of the United States; there to be armed with rifles imported from Great Britain, and to be employed against our people in a war for conquest. No Royal prerogative is invoked, no executive interference is interposed against this flagrant breach of municipal and international law on the part of our enemies; while strained constructions are placed on existing statutes, new enactments proposed, and questionable expedients devised for precluding the possibility of purchase by this Government of vessels that are useless for belligerent purposes, unless hereafter armed and equipped outside the neutral jurisdiction of Great Britain.

For nearly three years this Government has exercised unquestioned jurisdiction over many millions of willing and united people. It has met and defeated vast armies of invaders, who have in vain sought its subversion. Supported by the confidence and affection of its citizens, the Confederacy has lacked no element which distinguishes an independent nation, according to the principles of public law. Its legislative, executive, and judicial departments, each in its sphere, have performed their appropriate functions with a regularity as undisturbed as in a time of profound peace, and the whole energies of the people have been developed in the organisation of vast armies, while their rights and liberties have rested secure under the protection of the courts of justice. This Confederacy is either independent, or it is a dependency, of the United States, for no other earthly power claims the right to govern it. Without one historic fact on which the pretension can rest, without one line or word of treaty or covenant which can give colour to title, the United States have asserted, and the British Government has chosen to concede that these sovereign States are dependencies of the Government which is administered at Washington. Great Britain has accordingly entertained with that Government the closest and most intimate relations, while refusing, on its demand, ordinary amicable intercourse with us, and has, under arrangements made with the other nations of Europe, not only denied our just claim of admission into the family of nations, but interposed a passive, though effectual, bar to the acknowledgment of our rights by other Powers. So soon as it had become apparent, by the declarations of the British Ministers in the debates of the British Parliament in July last, that Her Majesty's Government was determined to persist indefinitely in a course of policy which, under professions of neutrality, had become subservient to the design of our enemy, I felt it my duty to recall the Commissioners formerly accredited to that Court, and the correspondence on the subject is submitted to you.

It is due to you and to our country that this full statement should be made of the just grounds which exist for dissatisfaction with the conduct of the British Government. I am well aware that we are unfortunately without adequate remedy for the injustice under which we have suffered at the hands of a powerful nation, at a juncture when our entire resources are absorbed in the defence of our lives, liberties, and independence, against an enemy possessed of greatly superior numbers and material resources. Claiming no favour, desiring no aid, conscious of our own ability to defend our own rights against the utmost efforts of an infuriated foe, we had thought it not extravagant to expect that assistance would be withheld from our enemies, and that the conduct of foreign nations would be marked by a genuine impartiality between the belligerents. It was not supposed that a professed neutrality would be so conducted as to justify the Foreign Secretary of the British nation in explaining, in correspondence with our enemies, how "the impartial observance of neutral obligations by Her Majesty's Government has thus been exceedingly advantageous to the cause of the more powerful of the two contending parties." The British Government may deem this war a favourable occasion for establishing, by the temporary sacrifice of their neutral rights, a precedent which shall justify the future exercise of those extreme belligerent pretensions that their naval power render so formidable. The opportunity for obtaining the tacit assent of European Governments to a line of conduct which ignores the obligations of the Declaration of Paris, and treats that instrument rather as a theoretical exposition of principles than a binding agreement, may be considered by the British Ministry as justifying them in seeking a great advantage for their own country at the expense of ours. But we cannot permit, without protest, the assertion that international law or morals regard as "impartial neutrality" conduct avowed to be "exceedingly advantageous" to one of the belligerents.

I have stated that we are without adequate remedy against the injustice under which we suffer. There are but two measures that seem applicable to the present condition of our relations with neutral Powers. One is, to imitate the wrong of which we complain, to retaliate by the declaration of a paper blockade of the coast of the United States, and to capture all neutral vessels trading with their ports that our cruisers can intercept on the high seas. This measure I cannot recommend. It is true that in so doing we should but follow the precedents set by Great Britain and France in the Berlin and Milan decrees, and the British orders in council at the beginning of the present century. But it must be remembered that we ourselves protested against these very measures as signal violations of the law of nations, and declared the attempt to excuse them on the ground of their being retaliatory utterly insufficient. These blockades are now quoted by writers on public law as a standing reproach on the good name of the nations who were betrayed by temporary exasperation into wrong-doing, and ought to be regarded rather as errors to be avoided than as examples to be followed.

The other measure is not open to this objection. The second article of the Declaration of Paris, which provides "that the neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war," was a new concession by belligerents in favour of neutrals, and not simply the enunciation of an acknowledged pre-existing rule, like the fourth article which referred to blockades. To this concession we bound ourselves by the convention with Great Britain and France, which took the shape of the resolutions adopted by your predecessors on the 13th August, 1861. The consideration tendered us for that concession has been withheld. We have, therefore, the undeniable right to refuse longer to remain bound by a compact which the other party refuses to fulfil. But we should not forget that war is but temporary, and that we desire that peace shall be permanent. The future policy of the Confederacy must ever be to uphold neutral rights to their full extent. The principles of the Declaration of Paris commend themselves to our judgment as more just, more humane, and more consonant with modern civilisation than those belligerent pretensions which great naval Powers have heretofore sought to introduce into the maritime code. To forego our undeniable right to the exercise of those pretensions is a policy higher, worthier of us and of our cause, than to revoke our adhesion to principles that we approve. Let our hope for redress rest rather on a returning sense of justice, which cannot fail to awaken a great people to the consciousness that the war in which we are engaged ought rather to be made a reason for forbearance of advantage than an occasion for the unfriendly conduct of which we make just complaint.

MEXICO.

The events of the last year have produced important changes in the condition of our Southern neighbour. The occupation of the capital of Mexico by the French army, and the establishment of a Provisional Government, followed by a radical change in the Constitution of the country, have excited lively interest. Although preferring our own Government and institutions to those of other countries, we can have no disposition to contest the exercise by them of the same right of self-government which we assert for ourselves. If the Mexican people prefer a monarchy to a republic it is our plain duty cheerfully to acquiesce in their decision, and to evince a sincere and friendly interest in their prosperity. If, however, the Mexicans prefer maintaining their former institutions we have no reason to apprehend any obstacle to the free exercise of their choice. The Emperor of the French has solemnly disclaimed any purpose to impose on Mexico a form of government not acceptable to the nation, and the eminent personage to whom the throne has been tendered declines its acceptance, unless the offer be sanctioned by the suffrages of the people. In either event, therefore, we may confidently expect the continuance of those peaceful relations which have been maintained on the frontier, and even a large development of the commerce already existing to the mutual advantage of the two countries.

It has been found necessary since your adjournment to take action on the subject of certain foreign consuls within the Confederacy. The nature of this action, and the reasons on which it was based, are so fully exhibited in the correspondence of the State Department which is transmitted to you, that no additional comment is required.

In connection with this subject of our relations with foreign countries, it is deemed opportune to communicate my views in reference to the treaties made by the Government of the United States at a date anterior to our separation, and which were consequently binding on us as well as foreign Powers when the separation took effect. It was partly with a view to entering into such arrangements as the change in our Government had made necessary that we felt it our duty to send Commissioners abroad, for the purpose of entering into the negotiations proper to fix the relative rights and obligations of the parties to those treaties. As this tender on our part has been declined, as foreign nations have refused us the benefit of the treaties to which we were parties, they certainly have ceased to be binding on us, and, in my opinion, our relations with European nations are, therefore, now controlled exclusively by the general rules of the law of nations. It is proper to add that these remarks are intended to apply solely to treaty obligations toward foreign Governments, and have no reference to rights of individuals.

FINANCES.

The state of the public finances is such as to demand your earliest and most earnest attention. I need hardly say that a prompt and efficacious remedy for the present condition of the currency is necessary to the successful performance of the functions of Government. Fortunately, the resources of our country are so ample, and the spirit of our people so devoted to its cause, that they are ready to make any necessary contribution. Relief is thus entirely within our reach if we have the wisdom to legislate in such manner as to render available the means at our disposal.

At the commencement of the war we were far from anticipating the magnitude and duration of the struggle in which we were engaged. The most sagacious foresight could not have predicted that the passions of the Northern people would lead them blindly to the sacrifice of life, treasure, and liberty in so vain a hope as that of subjugating thirteen independent States, inhabited by many millions of people, whose birthright of freedom is dearer to them than life. A long exemption from direct taxation by the general Government had created an aversion to its raising revenue by any other means than by duties on imports: and it was supposed that these duties would be ample for current peace expenditure, while the means for conducting the war could be raised almost exclusively by the use of the public credit.

The first action of the Provisional Congress was, therefore, confined to passing a tariff law and to raising a sum of $15,000,000 by loan, with a pledge of a small export duty on cotton, to provide for the redemption of the debt.

At its second Session war was declared to exist between the Confederacy and the United States, and provision was made for the issue of $20,000,000 in Treasury notes, and for borrowing $30,000,000 on bonds. The tariff was revised, and preparatory measures taken to enable the Congress to levy internal taxation at its succeeding Session. These laws were passed in May, and the States of Virginia, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Arkansas having joined the Confederacy, the Congress adjourned to meet in the city of Richmond in the following month of July.

Prior to the assembling of your predecessors in Richmond at their third Session, near the end of July, 1861, the President of the United States had developed in his Message the purpose "to make the contest a short and decisive one," and had called on Congress for 400,000 men and $400,000,000. The Congress had exceeded the executive recommendation, and had authorised the levy of half a million of volunteers, besides largely increasing the regular land and naval forces of the United States. The necessity thus first became urgent that a financial scheme should be devised on a basis sufficiently large for the vast proportions of the contest with which we were threatened. Knowing that the struggle, instead of being "short and decisive," would be indefinite in duration, and could only end when the United States should awaken from their delusion of conquest, a permanent system was required, fully adapted to the great exigencies before us.

The plan devised by Congress at that time was based on the theory of issuing Treasury notes convertible at the pleasure of the holder into Eight per Cent. Bonds, the interest of which was to be payable in coin, and it was correctly assumed that any tendency to depreciation that might arise from over issue of the currency would be checked by the constant exercise of the holder's right to fund the notes at a liberal interest, payable in specie. This system depended for success on the continued ability of Government to pay the interest in specie; and means were, therefore, provided for that purpose in the law authorising the issues. An internal tax, termed a war tax, was levied, the proceeds of which, together with the revenue from imports, were deemed sufficient for the object designed. This scheme required for its operation that our commerce with foreign nations should not be suspended. It was not to be anticipated that such suspension would be permitted otherwise than by an effective blockade; and it was absurd to suppose that a blockade "sufficient really to prevent access" to our entire coast could be maintained.

We had the means, therefore (if neutral nations had not combined to aid our enemies by the sanction of an illegal prohibition on their commerce), to secure the receipt into the Treasury of coin sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds, and thus maintain the Treasury note at rates nearly equal to par in specie. So long as the interest continued to be thus paid with the reserve of coin pre-existing in our country, experience sustained the expectations of those who devised the system. Thus, on the 1st of the following December, coin had only reached a premium of about 20 per cent., although it had already become apparent that the commerce of the country was threatened with permanent suspension, by reason of the conduct of neutral nations, and that the necessary result must be the exhaustion of our specie reserve. Wheat, in the beginning of the year 1862, was selling at $1.30c. per bushel—not exceeding, therefore, its average price in time of peace. The other agricultural products of the country were at similar moderate rates—thus indicating that there was no excess of circulation, and that the rate of premium on specie was heightened by the exceptional causes which tended to its exhaustion without the possibility of renewing the supply.

This review of the policy of your predecessors is given in justice to them, and it exhibits the condition of the finances at the date when the permanent Government was organised.

In the meantime, popular aversion to internal taxation by the general Government had influenced the legislation of the several States, and in only three of them, South Carolina, Mississippi, and Texas, were the taxes actually collected from the people. The quotas devolving upon the remaining States had been raised by the issue of bonds and State Treasury notes, and the public debt of the country was thus actually increased, instead of being diminished, by the taxation imposed by Congress.

Neither at the first nor second Session of the present Congress were means provided by taxation for maintaining the Government, the legislation being confined to authorising further sales of bonds and issues of Treasury notes. Although repeated efforts were made to frame a proper system of taxation, you were confronted with an obstacle which did not exist for your predecessors, and which created grave embarrassment in devising any scheme of taxation. About two-thirds of the entire taxable property of the Confederate States consist of lands and slaves. The general power of taxation vested in Congress by the Provisional Constitution (which was to be only temporary in its operations) was not restricted by any other condition than that "all duties, imposts, and excises should be uniform throughout the States of the Confederacy." But the permanent Constitution, sanctioning the principle that taxation and representation ought to rest on the same basis, specially provides that "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all slaves."

It was further ordered that a census should be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress, and that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken."

It is plain that, under these provisions, capitation and direct taxes must be levied in proportion to the census when made. It is also plain that the duty is imposed on Congress to provide for making a census prior to the 22nd of February, 1865. It may further be stated that, according to the received construction of the Constitution of the United States (a construction acquiesced in for upwards of sixty years), taxes on lands and slaves are direct taxes, and the conclusion seems necessarily to be that, in repeating without modification in our Constitution this language of the Constitution of 1787, our convention intended to attach to it the meaning which had been sanctioned by long and uninterrupted acquiescence.

So long as there seemed a probability of being able to carry out these provisions of the Constitution in their entirety, and in conformity with the intentions of its authors, there was an obvious difficulty of framing any system of taxation. A law which should exempt from the burden two-thirds of the property of the country would be as unfair to the owners of the remaining third as it would be inadequate to meet the requirements of the public service.

The urgency of the need was such, however, that, after very great embarrassment and more than three months of assiduous labour, you succeeded in framing the law of the 24th of April, 1863, by which you sought to reach, so far as was practicable, every resource of the country, except the capital invested in real estate and slaves, and by means of an income-tax and a tax in kind on the produce of the soil, as well as by licences on business occupations and professions, to command resources sufficient for the wants of the country. But a very large proportion of these resources could only be made available at the close of the present and the commencement of the ensuing year, while the intervening exigencies permitted no delay. In this state of affairs, superinduced almost unavoidably by the fortunes of the war in which we are engaged, the issues of Treasury notes have been increased until the currency in circulation amounts to more than $600,000,000, or more than threefold the amount required by the business of the country.

I need not enlarge upon the evil effects of this condition of things. They are, unfortunately, but too apparent. In addition to the difficulty presented to the necessary operations of the Government, and the efficient conduct of the war, the most deplorable of all its results has been its corrupting influence on the morals of the people. The possession of large amounts of Treasury notes has naturally led to a desire for investment, and, with a constantly-increasing volume of currency, there has been an equally constant increase of price in all objects of investment. This effect has stimulated purchase by the apparent certainty of profit, and a spirit of speculation has been fostered, which has so debasing an influence and such ruinous consequences that it is our highest duty to remove the cause, and no measures directed to that end can be too prompt or too stringent.

Reverting to the constitutional provisions already cited, the question recurs whether it be possible to execute the duty of apportioning taxation in accordance with the census ordered to be made as a basis. So long as this appeared to be practicable none can deny the propriety of your course in abstaining from the imposition of direct taxes till you could exercise the power in the precise mode pointed out by the terms of the fundamental law. But it is obvious that there are many duties imposed by the Constitution which depend for their fulfilment on the undisturbed possession of the territory within which they are to be performed. The same instrument which orders a census to be made in all the States imposes the duty on the Confederacy "to guarantee to every State a Republican form of government." It enjoins on us "to protect each State from invasion;" and while declaring that its great objects and purposes are "to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity," it confers the means and thereby imposes on us the paramount duty of effecting its intent by "laying and collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, necessary to pay the debts, provide for the common defence, and carry on the Government of the Confederate States."

None would pretend that the Constitution is violated because, by reason of the presence of hostile armies, we are unable to guarantee a Republican form of government to those States or portions of States now temporarily held by the enemy, and as little justice would there be in imputing blame for the failure to make the census, when that failure is attributable to causes not foreseen by the authors of the Constitution, and beyond our control. The general intent of our constitutional charter is unquestionably that the property of the country is to be taxed in order to raise revenue for the common defence, and the special mode provided for levying this tax is impracticable from unforeseen causes. It is, in my judgment, our primary duty to execute the general intent expressed by the terms of the instrument which we have sworn to obey; and we cannot excuse ourselves for the failure to fulfil this obligation on the ground that we are unable to perform it in the precise mode pointed out. Whenever it shall be possible to execute our duty in all its parts we must do so in exact compliance with the whole letter and spirit of the Constitution. Until that period shall arrive we must execute so much of it as our condition renders practicable. Whenever the withdrawal of the enemy shall place it in our power to make a census and apportionment of direct taxes, any other mode of levying them will be contrary to the will of the law-giver and incompatible with our obligation to obey that will; until that period the alternative left is to obey the paramount precept and to execute it according to the only other rule provided, which is to "make the tax uniform throughout the Confederate States."

The considerations just presented are greatly enforced by the reflection that any attempt to apportion taxes among States some of which are wholly or partially in the occupation of hostile forces would subvert the whole intention of the framers of the Constitution and be productive of the most revolting injustice, instead of that just correlation between taxation and representation which it was their purpose to secure. With large portions of some of the States occupied by the enemy, what justice would there be in imposing on the remainder the whole amount of the taxation of the entire State in proportion to its representation? What else would this be in effect than to increase the burden of those who are the heaviest sufferers by the war, and to make our own inability to protect them from the invasion, as we are required to do by the Constitution, the ground for adding to their losses by an attempted adherence to the letter, in violation of the spirit, of that instrument? No such purpose would have been entertained, and no such result contemplated by the framers of the Constitution. It may add weight to these considerations if we reflect that although the Constitution provided that it should go into operation with a representation temporarily distributed among the States, it expressly ordains, after providing for a census within three years, that this temporary distribution of representative power to endure "until such enumeration shall be made." Would any one argue that because the census cannot be made within the fixed period the Government must at the expiration of that period perish for the want of a representative body? In any aspect in which the subject can be viewed I am led to the conclusion already announced, and which is understood to be in accordance with a vote taken in one or both Houses at your last Session. I shall, therefore, until we are able to pursue the precise mode required by the Constitution, deem it my duty to approve any law levying the taxation which you are bound to impose for the defence of the country, or of any other practicable mode which shall distribute the burden uniformly and impartially on the whole property of the people.

In your former legislation you have sought to avoid the increase in the volume of notes in circulation by offering inducements to voluntary funding. The measures adopted for that purpose have been but partially successful, and the evil has now reached such a magnitude as to permit no other remedy than the compulsory reduction of the currency to the amount required by the business of the country. This reduction should be accompanied by a pledge that under no stress of circumstances will that amount be exceeded. No possible mode of using the credit of the Government can be so disastrous as one which disturbs the basis of all exchanges, renders impossible all calculations of future values, augments in constantly increasing proportions the price of all commodities, and so depreciates all fixed wages, salaries, and incomes as to render them inadequate to bare subsistence. If to these be added the still more fatal influence on the morals and character of the people, to which I have already adverted, I am persuaded you will concur in the conclusion that an inflexible adherence to a limitation of the currency at a fixed sum is an indispensable element of any system of finance now to be adopted.

The holders of the currency now outstanding can only be protected in the recovery of their just claims by substituting for their notes some other security. If the currency is not greatly and promptly reduced, the present scale of inflated prices will not only continue to exist, but by the very fact of the large amounts thus made requisite in the conduct of the war, those prices will reach rates still more extravagant, and the whole system will fall under its own weight, thus rendering the redemption of the debt impossible, and destroying its whole value in the hands of the holder. If, on the contrary, a funded debt, with interest secured by adequate taxation, can be substituted for the outstanding currency, its entire amount will be made available to the holder, and the Government will be in a condition enabling it beyond the reach of any probable contingency to prosecute the war to a successful issue. It is, therefore, demanded, as well by the interest of the creditor as of the country at large, that the evidences of the public debt now outstanding in the shape of Treasury notes be converted into bonds bearing adequate interest, with a provision for taxation sufficient to insure punctual payment, and final redemption of the whole debt.

The report of the Secretary of the Treasury presents the outlines of a system which, in conjunction with existing legislation, is intended to secure the several objects of a reduction of the circulation within fixed, reasonable limits; of providing for the future wants of the Government; of furnishing security for the punctual payment of interest, and final extinction of the principal of the public debt, and of placing the whole business of the country on a basis as near a specie standard as is possible during the continuance of the war. I earnestly recommend it to your consideration, and that no delay be permitted to intervene before your action on this vital subject. I trust that it will be suffered to engross your attention until you shall have disposed of it in a manner best adapted to attain the important results which your country anticipates from your legislation.

It may be added that, in considering this subject, the people ought steadily to keep in view, that the Government in contracting debt, is but their agent, that its debt is their debt. As the currency is held exclusively by ourselves, it is obvious that, if each person held Treasury notes in exact proportion to the value of his whole means, each would, in fact, owe himself the amount of the notes held by him, and were it possible to distribute the currency among the people in this exact proportion, a tax levied on the currency alone to an amount sufficient to reduce it to proper limits would afford the best of all remedies. Under such circumstances the notes remaining in the hands of each holder after the payment of his tax would be worth quite as much as the whole sum previously held, for it would purchase at least an equal amount of commodities. This result cannot be perfectly attained by any device of legislation, but it can be approximated by taxation. A tax on all values has for its effect not only to impose a due share of the burden on the noteholder, but to force those who have few or none of the notes to part with a share of their possessions to those who hold the notes in excess, in order to obtain the means of satisfying the demands of the tax-gatherer. This is the only mode by which it is practicable to make all contribute as equally as possible in the burden which all are bound to share, and it is for this reason that taxation adequate to the public exigencies under our present circumstances must be the basis of any funding system, or other remedy for restoring stability to our finances.

THE ARMY.
To the Report of the Secretary of War you are referred for details relative to the condition of the army and the measures of legislation required for maintaining its efficiency, recruiting its numbers, and furnishing the supplies necessary for its support.

Though we have lost many of the best of our soldiers and most patriotic of our citizens (the sad but unavoidable result of the battles and toils of such a campaign as that which will render the year 1863 ever memorable in our annals), the army is believed to be in all respects in better condition than at any previous period of the war. Our gallant defenders, now veterans, familiar with danger, hardened by exposure, and confident in themselves and their officers, endure privations with cheerful fortitude, and welcome battle with alacrity. The officers, by experience in field service, and the action of examining boards in relieving the incompetent, are now greatly more efficient than at the commencement of the war. The assertion is believed to be fully justified, that, regarded as a whole, for character, valour, efficiency, and patriotic devotion, our army has not been equalled by any like number of troops in the history of war.

In view of the large conscription recently ordered by the enemy, and their subsequent call for volunteers, to be followed, if ineffectual, by a still further draught, we are admonished that no effort must be spared to add largely to our effective force as promptly as possible. The sources of supply are to be found by restoring to the army all who are improperly absent, putting an end to substitution, modifying the exemption law, restricting details, and placing in the ranks such of the able-bodied men now employed as wagoners, nurses, cooks, and other employes as are doing service for which the negroes may be found competent.

The Act of the 16th of April, 1862, provides "that persons not liable for duty may be received as substitutes for those who are, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War." The policy of granting this privilege has not been sustained by experience. Not only has the numerical strength of the army been seriously impaired by the frequent desertions for which such substitutes have become notorious, but dissatisfaction has been excited among those who have been unable or unwilling to avail themselves of the opportunity thus afforded of avoiding the military service of their country.

I fully concur in the opinion expressed by the Secretary, that there is no ground for the objection that a new provision, to include those who furnished substitutes under the former call, would be a breach of contract. To accept a substitute was to confer a privilege, not to enter into a contract; and whenever the substitute is rendered liable to conscription it would seem to follow that the principal, whose place he had taken, should respond for him, as the Government had received no consideration for his exemption. Where, however, the new provision of law would fail to embrace a substitute now in the ranks, there appears, if the principal should again be conscripted, to be an equitable ground for compensation to the conscript, who then would have added to the service a soldier not otherwise liable to enrolment.

On the subject of exemptions it is believed that abuses cannot be checked unless the system is placed on a basis entirely different from that now provided by law. The object of your legislation has been, not to confer privileges on classes, but to exonerate from military duty such number of persons skilled in the various trades, professions, and mechanical pursuits as could render more valuable services to their country by labouring in their present occupation than by going into the ranks of the army. The policy is unquestionable, but the result would, it is thought, be better obtained by enrolling all such persons, and allowing details to be made of the number necessary to meet the wants of the country. Considerable numbers are believed to be now exempted from the military service who are not needful to the public in their civil vocation.

Certain duties are now performed throughout the country by details from the army which could be as well executed by persons above the present conscript age. An extension of the limit, so as to embrace persons over forty-five years, and physically fit for service in guarding posts, railroads, and bridges, in apprehending deserters, and, where practicable, assuming the place of younger men detailed for duty with the nitre, ordnance, commissary and quartermasters' bureau of the War Department, would, it is hoped, add largely to the effective force in the field without an undue burden on the population.

If to the above measures be added a law to enlarge the policy of the Act of the 21st April, 1862, so as to enable the department to replace not only enlisted cooks, but wagoners and other employes in the army, by negroes, it is hoped that the ranks of the army will be so strengthened for the ensuing campaign as to put at defiance the utmost efforts of the enemy.

In order to maintain unimpaired the existing organisation of the army until the close of the war, your legislation contemplated a frequent supply of recruits, and it was expected that before the expiration of three years, for which the men were enrolled under the Act of the 16th of April, 1862, the majority of men in each company would consist of those who joined it at different dates subsequent to the original muster of the company into service, and that the discharge of those who had completed their term would at no time be sufficient to leave the company with a less number than is required to enable it to retain organisation. The difficulty of obtaining recruits from certain localities, and the large number of exemptions from military service granted by different laws, have prevented sufficient accessions in many of the companies to preserve their organisation after the discharge of the original members. The advantage of retaining tried and well approved officers, and of mingling recruits with experienced soldiers, is so obvious, and the policy of such a course is so clearly indicated, that it is not deemed necessary to point out the evil consequences which would result from the destruction of the old organisations, or to dwell upon the benefits to be secured from filling up the veteran companies as long before the discharge of the early members as may be possible. In the cases where it may be found impracticable to maintain regiments in sufficient strength to justify the retention of the present organisation, economy and efficiency would be promoted by consolidation and reorganisation. This would involve the necessity of disbanding a part of the officers, and making regulations for securing the most judicious selection of those who are retained, while least wounding the feelings of those who are discharged.

Experience has shown the necessity for further legislation in relation to the horses of the cavalry. Many men lose their horses by casualties of service, which are not included in the provisions made to compensate the owner for the loss, and it may thus not unfrequently happen that the most efficient troopers, without fault of their own—indeed, it may be because of their zeal and activity—are lost to the cavalry service.

It would also seem proper that the Government should have complete control over every horse mustered into the service, with the limitation that the owner should not be deprived of his horse except upon due compensation being made therefor.

Otherwise, mounted men may not keep horses fit for the service; and whether they should serve mounted or on foot would depend, not upon the qualifications of the men, but the fact of their having horses.

Some provision is deemed requisite to correct the evils arising from the long continued absence of commissioned officers. Where it is without sufficient cause it would seem but just that the commission should be thereby vacated.

Where it results from capture by the enemy, which, under their barbarous refusal to exchange prisoners of war, may be regarded as absence for an indefinite time, there is a necessity to support their places in their respective commands. This might be done by temporary appointments, to endure only until the return of the officers regularly commissioned. Where it results from permanent disability incurred in the line of their duty it would be proper to retire them, and fill the vacancies according to established mode. I would also suggest the organisation of an invalid corps, and that the retired officers be transferred to it. Such a corps, it is thought, could be made useful in various employments for which efficient officers and troops are now detached.

An organisation of the general staff of the army would be highly conducive to the efficiency of that most important branch of the service. The plan adopted for the military establishment furnishes a model for the staff of the provisional army, if it be deemed advisable to retain the distinction; but I recommend to your consideration the propriety of abolishing it, and providing for the organisation of the several staff corps, in such number and with such rank as will meet the wants of the service. To secure the requisite ability for the more important positions, it will be necessary to provide for officers of higher rank than is now authorised for these corps. To give to the officers the proper relation and co-intelligence in their respective corps, and to preserve in the chief of each, useful influence and control over his subordinates, there should be no gradation on the basis of the rank of the general with whom they might be serving by appointment. To the personal staff of a general it would seem proper to give a grade corresponding with his rank, and the number might be fixed to correspond with his command. To avoid the consequences of discharge upon a change of duty the variable portion of the personal staff might be taken from the line of the army, and allowed to retain their line commissions.

The disordered condition of the currency, to which I have already alluded, has imposed on the Government a system of supplying the wants of the army, which is so unequal in its operation, vexatious to the producer, injurious to the industrial interest, and productive of such discontent among the people, as only to be justified by the existence of an absolute necessity. The report of the Secretary on this point establishes conclusively that the necessity which has forced the bureaux of supply to provide for the army by impressment has resulted from the impossibility of purchase by contract or in the open market, except at such rapidly increased rates as would have rendered the appropriations inadequate to the wants of the army. Indeed, it is believed that the temptation to hoard supplies for the higher prices which could be anticipated with certainty, has been checked mainly by the fear of the operation of the impressment laws; and that commodities have been offered in the markets principally to escape impressment and obtain higher rates than those fixed by appraisement. The complaints against this vicious system had been well-founded, but the true cause of the evil has been misapprehended. The remedy is to be found, not in a change of the impressment law, but in the restoration of the currency to such a basis as will enable the department to purchase necessary supplies in the open market, and thus render impressment a rare exceptional process.

The same remedy will effect the result universally desired, of an augmentation of the pay of the army. The proposals made at our previous Sessions to increase the pay of the soldier by an additional amount of Treasury notes, would have conferred little benefit on him; but a radical reform of the currency will restore the pay to a value approximating that which it originally had, and materially improve his condition.

The reports from the Ordnance and Mining Bureaux are very gratifying, and the extension of our means of supply of arms and munitions of war from our home resources has been such as to insure our ability soon to become mainly, if not entirely, independent of supplies from foreign countries. The establishments for the casting of guns and projectiles, for the manufacture of small arms and of gunpowder, for the supply of nitre from artificial nitre beds, and mining operations generally, have been so distributed throughout the country as to place our resources beyond the reach of partial disasters.

The recommendations of the Secretary of War on other points are minutely detailed in his report, which is submitted to you, and extending, as they do, to almost every branch of the service, merit careful consideration.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

I regret to inform you that the enemy have returned to the barbarous policy with which they inaugurated the war, and that the exchange of prisoners has been for some time suspended. The correspondence of the Commissioners of Exchange is submitted to you by the Secretary of War, and it has already been published for the information of all now suffering useless imprisonment. The conduct of the authorities of the United States has been consistently perfidious on this subject. An agreement for exchange in the incipency of the war had just been concluded when the fall of Fort Donnellson reversed the previous state of things, and gave them an excess of prisoners. The agreement was immediately repudiated by them, and so remained until the fortune of war again placed us in possession of the larger number. A new cartel was then made, and under it for many months we restored to them many thousands of prisoners in excess of those whom they held for exchange, and encampments of the surplus paroled prisoners delivered up by us were established in the United States, where the men were able to receive the comforts and solace of constant communication with their homes and families. In July last the fortune of war again favoured the enemy, and they were enabled to exchange for duty the men previously delivered to them against those captured and paroled at Vicksburg and Fort Hudson. The prisoners taken at Gettysburg, however, remained in their hands, and should have been returned to our lines on parole, to await exchange. Instead of executing a duty imposed by the plainest dictates of justice and good faith, pretences were instantly sought for holding them in permanent captivity. General orders rapidly succeeded each other from the bureaux at Washington, placing new constructions on an agreement which had given rise to no dispute while we retained the advantage in the number of prisoners. With a disregard of honourable obligations almost unexampled, the enemy did not hesitate, in addition to retaining the prisoners captured by them, to declare null the paroles given by the prisoners captured by us in the same series of engagements, and liberated on condition of not again serving until exchanged. They have since openly insisted on treating the paroles given by their own soldiers as invalid, and those of our soldiers, given under precisely similar circumstances, as binding. A succession of similar unjust pretensions has been set up in a correspondence tediously prolonged, and every device employed to cover the disregard of an obligation which between belligerent nations is only to be enforced by a sense of honour.

No further comment is needed on this subject, but it may be permitted to direct your special attention to the close of the correspondence submitted to you, from which you will perceive that the final proposal made by the enemy, in settlement of all disputes under the cartel, is that we should liberate all prisoners held by us without the offer to release from captivity any of those held by them.

In the meantime a systematic and concerted effort has been made to quiet the complaints in the United States of those relatives and friends of the prisoners in our hands who are unable to understand why the cartel is not executed in their favour, by the groundless assertion that we are the parties who refuse compliance. Attempts are also made to shield themselves from the execration excited by their own odious treatment of our officers and soldiers now captive in their hands, by mis-statements, such as that the prisoners held by us are deprived of food. To this last accusation the conclusive answer has been made, that in accordance with our law and the general orders of the department, the rations of the prisoners are precisely the same, in quantity and quality, as those served out to our own gallant soldiers in the field, and which have been found sufficient to support them in their arduous campaign; while it is not pretended by the enemy that they treat prisoners by the same generous rule. By an indulgence, perhaps unprecedented, we have even allowed the prisoners in our hands to be supplied by their friends at home with comforts not enjoyed by the men who captured them in battle. In contrast to this treatment, the most revolting inhumanity has characterised the conduct of the United States towards prisoners held by them. One prominent fact, which admits no denial nor palliation, must suffice as a test. The officers of our army—natives of Southern and semi-tropical climates, and unprepared for the cold of a Northern winter—have been conveyed for imprisonment, during the rigours of the present season, to the most northern and exposed situation that could be selected by the enemy. There, beyond the reach of comforts, and often even of news from home and family, exposed to the piercing cold of the Northern lakes, they are held by men who cannot be ignorant of, even if they do not design, the probable result. How many of our unfortunate friends and comrades, who have passed unscathed through numerous battles, will perish on Johnson's Island under the cruel trial to which they are subjected none but the Omnipotent can foretell. That they will endure this barbarous treatment with the same stern fortitude that they have ever evinced in their country's service we cannot doubt. But who can be found to believe the assertion that it is our refusal to execute the cartel, and not the malignity of the foe, which has caused the infliction of such intolerable cruelty on our own loved and honoured defenders?

TRANS-MISSISSIPPI DEPARTMENT.

Regular and punctual communication with the trans-Mississippi is so obstructed as to render difficult a compliance with much of the legislation vesting authority in the Executive branch of the Government. To supply vacancies in office; to exercise discretion on certain matters connected with the military organisations; to control the distribution of the funds collected from taxation or remitted from the Treasury; to carry on the operations of the Post-office Department, and other like duties, require under the Constitution and existing laws, the action of the President and heads of departments. The necessities of the military service frequently forbid delay, and some legislation is required providing for the exercise of temporary authority, until regular action can be had at the seat of Government. I would suggest, especially in the Post-office Department, that an assistant be provided in the States beyond the Mississippi, with authority in the head of that Department to vest in his assistant all such powers now exercised by the Postmaster-General as may be requisite for provisional control of the funds of the department of those States, and their application to the payment of mail contractors; for superintendence of the local post-offices, and the contracts for carrying the mails; for the temporary employment of proper persons to fulfil the duties of postmasters and contractors in urgent cases, until appointments can be made, and for other like purposes. Without some legislative provision on the subject, there is serious risk of the destruction of the mail service, by reason of the delays and hardships suffered by contractors under the present system, which requires constant reference to Richmond of their accounts, as well as the returns of the local postmasters, before they can receive payment for services rendered. Like provision is also necessary in the Treasury Department; while, for military affairs, it would seem to be sufficient to authorise the President and Secretary for War to delegate to the commanding general so much of the discretionary powers vested in them by law as the exigencies of the service shall require.

NAVY.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy gives in detail the operations of that department since January last, embracing information of the disposition and employment of the vessels, officers, and men, and the construction of vessels at Richmond, Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, Selma, and on the rivers Roanoke, Neuse, Pedee, Chatahoochee, and Tombigbee; the accumulation of ship timber and supplies, and the manufacture of ordnance, ordnance stores, and equipments. The foundries and workshops have been greatly improved, and their capacity to supply all demands for heavy ordnance for coast and harbour defences is only limited by our deficiency in the requisite skilled labour. The want of such labour and of seamen seriously affects the operations of the department.

The skill, courage, and activity of our cruisers at sea cannot be too highly commended. They have inflicted heavy losses on the enemy, without suffering a single disaster, and have seriously damaged the shipping interests of the United States by compelling their foreign commerce to seek the protection of neutral flags.

Your attention is invited to the suggestions of the report on the subjects of supplying seamen for the service, and of the provisions of the law in relation to the volunteer navy.

POST-OFFICE.

The Postmaster-General reports the receipts of that department for the fiscal year ending the 30th June last to have been $3,337,853 01, and the expenditures for the same period $2,662,804 67. The statement thus exhibits an excess of receipts amounting to $675,048 44, instead of a deficiency of more than a million of dollars, as was the case in the preceding fiscal year. It is gratifying to perceive that the department has thus been made self-sustaining, in accordance with sound principle, and with the express requirements of the Constitution that its expenses should be paid out of its own revenues after the 1st March, 1863.

The report gives a full and satisfactory account of the operations of the Post-office Department for the last year, and explains the measures adopted for giving more certainty and regularity to the service in the States beyond the Mississippi, and on which reliance is placed for obviating the difficulties heretofore encountered in that service.

The statement of the accounts of the department is greatly delayed by reason of the inability of the first auditor to perform all the duties now imposed on him by law. The accounts of the Departments of State, of the Treasury, of the Navy, and of Justice, are all supervised by that officer, and more than suffice to occupy his whole time. The necessity for a third auditor to examine and settle the accounts of a department so extensive as that of the Post Office appears urgent, and his recommendation on that subject meets my concurrence.

CONDUCT OF THE ENEMY.

I cannot close this message without again adverting to the savage ferocity which still marks the conduct of the enemy in the prosecution of the war. After their repulse from the defences before Charleston, they first sought revenge by an abortive attempt to destroy the city with an incendiary composition, thrown by improved artillery from a distance of four miles. Failing in this, they changed their missiles, but fortunately have thus far succeeded only in killing two women in the city. Their commanders—Butler, McNeil, and Turchin, whose horrible barbarities have made their names widely notorious, and everywhere execrable—are still honoured and cherished at Washington. The first-named, after having been withdrawn from the scenes of his cruelties against women and prisoners of war (in reluctant concession to the demands of outraged humanity in Europe), has just been put in a new command at Norfolk, where helpless women and children are again placed at his mercy.

Nor has less unrelenting warfare been waged by these pretended friends of human rights and liberties against the unfortunate negroes. Wherever the enemy have been able to gain access they have forced into the ranks of their army every able-bodied man they could seize; and have either left the aged, the women, and the children to perish by starvation, or gathered them into camps, where they have been wasted by a frightful mortality. Without clothing or shelter, often without food, incapable, without supervision, of taking the most ordinary precautions against disease, these helpless dependents accustomed to have their wants supplied by the foresight of their masters, are being rapidly exterminated, wherever brought in contact with the invaders. By the Northern man, on whose deep-rooted prejudices no kindly restraining influence is exercised, they are treated with aversion and neglect. There is little hazard in predicting that in all localities where the enemy have gained a temporary foothold the negroes, who, under our care increase sixfold in number since their importation into the colonies of Great Britain, will have been reduced by mortality during the war to not more than one-half their previous number.

Information on this subject is derived not only from our own observation and from the reports of the negroes who succeeded in escaping from the enemy, but full confirmation is afforded by statements published in the Northern journals by humane persons engaged in making appeals to the charitable for aid in preventing the ravages of disease, exposure, and starvation among the negro women and children who were crowded into encampments.

The frontier of our country bears witness to the alacrity and efficiency with which the general orders of the enemy have been executed, in the devastation of the farms, the destruction of the agricultural implements, the burning of the houses, and the destruction of everything movable. Its whole aspect is a comment on the ethics of the general order issued by the United States on the 24th of April, 1863, comprising "instructions for the government of armies of the United States in the field," and of which the following is an example:—

"Military necessity admits of all direct destruction of life or limb of armed enemies, and of other persons whose destruction is unavoidable in the armed contests of the war. It allows of the capturing of every armed enemy, and of every enemy of importance to the hostile Government, or of peculiar danger to the captor; it allows of all destruction of property and obstructions of the ways and channels of traffic, travel, or communication, and of all withholding of sustenance or means of life from the enemy; of the appropriation of whatever an enemy's country affords necessary for the subsistence and safety of the army, and of such deception as does not involve the breaking of good faith, either positively pledged regarding agreements entered into during the war, or supposed by the modern law of war to exist. Men who take up arms against one another in public war do not cease on this account to be moral beings, responsible to one another and to God."

The striking contrast to these teachings and practices presented by our army when invading Pennsylvania illustrates the moral character of our people. Though their forbearance may have been unmerited and unappreciated by the enemy, it was imposed by their own self-respect, which forbade their degenerating from Christian warriors into plundering ruffians, assailing the property, lives, and honour of helpless non-combatants. If their conduct, when thus contrasted with the inhuman practices of our foe, fail to command the respect and sympathy of civilised nations in our day, it cannot fail to be recognised by their less deceived posterity.

The hope last year entertained of an early termination of the war has not been realised. Could carnage have satisfied the appetite of our enemy for the destruction of human life, or grief have appeased their wanton desire to inflict human suffering, there has been bloodshed enough on both sides, and two lands have been sufficiently darkened by the weeds of mourning, to induce a disposition for peace.

If unanimity in a people could dispel delusion, it has been displayed too unmistakably not to have silenced the pretence that the Southern States were merely disturbed by a factious insurrection; and it must long since have been admitted that they were but exercising their reserved right to modify their own Government in such manner as would best secure their own happiness. But these considerations have been powerless to allay the unchristian hate of those who, long accustomed to draw large profits from a union with us, cannot control the rage excited by the conviction that they have, by their own folly, destroyed the richest sources of their prosperity. They refuse even to listen to proposals for the only peace possible between us—a peace which, recognising the impassable gulf which divides us, may leave the two peoples separately to recover from the injuries inflicted on both by the causeless war now waged against us. Having begun the war in direct violation of their Constitution, which forbade the attempt to coerce a State, they have been hardened by crime, until they no longer attempt to veil their purpose to destroy the institutions and subvert the sovereignty and independence of these States. We now know that the only reliable hope for peace is in the vigour of our resistance, as the cessation of their hostility is only to be expected from the pressure of their necessities.

The patriotism of the people has proved equal to every sacrifice demanded by their country's good. We have been united as a people never were united under like circumstances before. God has blessed us with success disproportionate to our means, and, under His Divine favour, our labours must at last be crowned with the reward due to men who have given all they possessed to the righteous defence of their inalienable rights, their homes, and their altars.

Richmond, December 7.

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their paper supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—

At Liverpool, to MR. BISTOP, 6, Commercial-buildings, 17, Water-st.

At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq., Manchester Southern Club Office, Market-street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER and MÜLLER, 52, Rue du Château d'Eau, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4, Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1863.

Mr. J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund begs to acknowledge the receipt of the following additional contributions:—

The Embargo on Cotton.

THE importance, not only to the Southern Confederacy, but to the commercial world at large, of the letter which we published in our last week's impression, has not escaped attention. The Honourable C. J. McRae unites, with the functions of representative of the Confederate Treasury, almost absolute discretion in the disbursements in Europe for the War and Navy Departments of the Confederate Government. As a member of the first or provisional Congress, which convened at Montgomery, he acted an influential part in framing the first financial measures of the infant Confederacy. No man, therefore, in Europe can be presumed to be better acquainted with the resources of the Confederate States, and with their necessities at home or abroad. We may also assume that an officer in such high position will not speak to the public hastily or unadvisedly, and that, even as a simple recommendation, his opinion on an important financial question will have great weight at Richmond. When, therefore, Mr. McRae concludes his letter on the Cotton Loan with the statement that the Confederate Government have it now under consideration to prohibit the exportation of cotton, except for their own uses and the payment of their obligations already incurred, and pronounces this measure "salutary and necessary," we must attach to his words a significance only a degree less than to the accomplishment of the foreshadowed fact. That the financial public does so, is proved by the rise of 4 per cent. in the Loan, despite adverse military news, on the publication of the letter.

It is not, however, so much the effect of the proposed embargo on the Loan that we wish to discuss, though in this the Confederate States have of necessity an absorbing moral interest. We are proud to consider the Loan as quite as much an expression of sympathy and good will as a financial speculation. The North certainly so regards it, or it would not expend such gigantic efforts in the crusade against it and its holders. Mr. McRae well explains that the cotton security upon which it is based has heretofore been a secondary feature, and that the Loan was exposed to all the fluctuations of a stock based solely on the credit, good faith, and good fortune of a nation engaged in a life-and-death struggle. The abundant facilities which the Confederate Government has afforded for bringing this reserved strength of the Loan into play by the conversion of the bonds into cotton, the success that during the year has attended blockade-running operations on private account, and above all, the ample provision that has been made for the payment of the interest falling due and the redemption of the one-fortieth of the entire Loan at the first ensuing periodical drawing;—all these restorative influences must have produced a healthy stimulating effect, even without so heroic a remedy as the one recommended.

The cure sought, then, is for an evil of far vaster and more dangerous dimensions than the temporary depression of the national securities abroad. It is to heal a disease which threatens the vitals of the nation itself. Every friend of the Confederate States feels that their finances are in a critical condition. To the vicissitudes of a singularly balanced conflict we have long become accustomed; every one who cares to understand the character of their people and the capabilities of their soil knows that in the darkest hour of their chequered fortunes they were richer in material resources than when the war surprised them without an army, without a treasury, without an arsenal, and without a powder-mill. The military situation, therefore, however often well-founded expectations may be disappointed and the hope of peace deferred, causes no real anxiety, except so far as that situation may be affected and impaired by the derangement of the currency. A nation fighting for life may, it is true, fight long without money, and the Confederate States have not yet reached in this respect the misery of the French Republic or even of the American Colonies. But the circulating medium is to a civilised community what the blood is to a living organism, and diseases of either are, in their effects upon the limbs and body, analogous. And, dropping metaphor, it is obvious that the most implicit confidence in the ultimate redemption of a promise to pay, will not replace the fatal want of a present invariable standard of values. With a currency whose relation to coin is wholly arbitrary and changeable from day to day, there may be famine in the midst of abundance. This is actually the case in the Confederate States. Here, also, is the cause of the strange error into which the Southern correspondent of the Times has fallen. Contrasting the natural resources of the South with those of the North, and then comparing the silent endurance of the one people with the boastful levity of the other, he most illogically arrived at the deduction that the Southerners lacked that abiding faith in their own success, which buoys up their adversaries. Now, apart from the fact that the paper currency of the South is vastly more in excess of the business of the country, than that of the North, which sufficiently accounts for the greater depreciation of the former, there is the further anomalous fact, which we have long since pointed out in these columns, that the precious metals, the infallible standard in every other country, have ceased to be a standard at all in the Confederacy. Withdrawn by the blockade and the consequent cessation of regular foreign commerce, from the operation of the laws of demand and supply, they at the same time acquire an artificial value through the demand stimulated by the requirements of blockade-running speculations.

A very little consideration will show that of the two chief causes of the financial derangement, the over-issue of paper money is not the most formidable. Grant that the depreciation cannot be in exact proportion to the excess of the circulating medium, yet an inflation of the currency to three times its normal dimensions will not account for the fall to less than one-tenth of its nominal value. Assume that the business of the country can float $200,000,000, and that $600,000,000 are issued; if these $600,000,000 did really represent only one-tenth of the nominal amount, or $60,000,000, it follows that they would be inadequate to the requirements of business, and that 2,000 millions of the depreciated issues would be needed to restore the equilibrium. A more powerful cause of depreciation, then, must evidently be at work, and this cause is found in the fiction which still accepts as a standard of computation metals whose value has become almost as speculative as certain bulbs were during the tulip mania in Holland. Wholly discarded this standard can of course not be, but if the Government, as the largest purchaser of all commodities in the country, were to set the example of making all contracts payable in bushels of wheat or in pounds of cotton, or the equivalent, in Treasury notes, of the market value of these articles at the date and locality of payment, a great step would have been taken towards the rehabilitation of the Government promises to pay. Either wheat or cotton might and would fluctuate in price, but these fluctuations would be controlled by circumstances very different from those which affect the price of gold.

Again, during the year now closing, about 130,000 bales of cotton, of about 500 lbs. weight each, have found their way through the blockade to European ports, which, at the ruling prices, sold for upwards of £6,000,000 sterling. With this fund to its credit, had the cotton been exported for its own account, instead of, for the most part, private speculators, the Confederate Government might have dispensed with foreign loans, might have bought its warlike stores at the lowest cash rates, and supplied its citizens with commodities of prime necessity at a moderate advance on cost. Not only would it have earned the fabulous profits pocketed by foreign merchants, but it would have saved itself the issue of that flood of promises to pay with which it purchased importations, and which the importers made haste to dispose of on any terms. And what creditor, at home, could have doubted the solvency of a debtor who was the largest holder of foreign exchange in the country?

Let it not be said that the Government would have failed where private enterprise succeeded. The experiment has been sufficiently tried to demonstrate that the Government, in blockade ventures, has been even more fortunate than individuals, probably for the reason that, thanks to the patriotic enthusiasm of the whole people, it is at present the best served Government in the world. To its success in this respect is due the credit which, amid the most adverse circumstances, it still commands in the markets of Europe. The question, then, would simply have been to extend on a larger scale what has been done with admirable success on a small one. The mercantile marine of every country, not excepting that of the North, is open to it to select the staunchest and the swiftest vessels. It commands a staff of naval officers inferior to those of no country in skill, courage, and dash; and although the service may not be so brilliant and so much to their taste, at the country's bidding they would render it as zealously and devotedly as though they trod the decks of Merrimacs and Albatoms. It will scarcely be contended that vessels avowedly the property of the Confederate Government would run greater risks on the high seas from the enemy's cruisers than those owned by British subjects run under the warm neutrality of the Foreign-office.

But if private enterprise must be called into aid, the cotton bonds now in the hands of European holders afford the desired machinery, provided all private exportation, except in redemption of these bonds, is prohibited. The £3,200,000 which the Government now owes in Europe, represents, at 6d. per lb., 260,000 bales of cotton, which, at the rate of this year's exportation, could be run through the blockade in about two years. Every obligation thus redeemed would make room for a new one, which, as the only means of purchasing cotton, would be eagerly sought at prices remunerative to the Government. We are told that sound political economy forbids the granting of monopolies; but blockade-running is virtually already the monopoly of those firms which were the first and the most enterprising in the attempt. Why not, if a monopoly must exist, give it to those who have trusted the Government? Besides, no one is injured thereby, for those who now hold this virtual monopoly may still retain it by merely changing their purchasing medium.

We have reasons to believe that in advocating this recommendation of Mr. McRae we express the convictions of nearly every important officer of the Confederate States in Europe, and of the great majority of the friends and well-wishers of the Confederate cause. If anything approaching the same unanimity exists in the Congress now assembled at Richmond —and there appears no cause to doubt it—we may expect by any steamer within the next four or five weeks, to hear of the passage of an Act laying an embargo on the exportation of cotton, under conditions similar to those here indicated.

President Davis's Message.

THERE must be little feeling in the man who can read President Davis's Message untouched. Apart from its beauties of style and its power, it has that contagious eloquence, the result of an overmastering consciousness of a just cause and noble purpose, which never fails to move the sympathies of every generous heart and satisfy the requirements of all honourable minds. There was no need, perhaps, of a stronger contrast between the two Presidents of North and South; but if anything could fully illustrate the disproportionate capacities and the opposite characters of the two men, it would be the Messages that have reached us simultaneously from Richmond and from Washington. The President of the Confederate States has, perhaps, a task such as no single human intellect grappled with before. Without the prescriptive authority of monarchy he has more than its responsibilities; without the terrors of demagogism and the fire of fanaticism, he has to conduct the greatest revolution the world ever saw to a successful issue; without the prestige of conquest, he has to convert a community of peaceful citizens into an organised army.* If there is unpopularity to be encountered he must meet it; if there is despondency to dispel, he must cheer it; if there are risks to be run, perils to be met, or mighty resolves to be taken, it is to him the whole Southern Confederacy looks for inspiration and for action. And it is with the sense of this terrible responsibility that he has to meet the representatives of the nation which, to use Mr. Gladstone's words, "he has created," and lay before them the weighty document which is at once the record of his policy, the register of his failures and successes, the history of the past and the index to the future of the Confederacy. His last message is worthy of the occasion and of the cause. It is honest and fearless. It breathes neither a counterfeited cheerfulness, nor an unseemly despondency. It has a manly, self-reliant tone which inspires confidence. It is a protest against the war, and a disclaimer of its guilt, so far as the South is concerned; an appeal and an argument from the South to the whole of civilisation; a masterly indictment against the Power which, false to its principles, is endeavouring to destroy by the sword the rights to which it owes its own origin.

The Message begins with an impartial sketch of the military events of the months that have elapsed since the adjournment of the Congress. The President acknowledges the grave reverses on the Mississippi and in Arkansas, but bears a willing testimony to the spirit in which they were met. He points with pride to the exertions they called forth from the people of the Confederacy; to the successful resistance at Charleston, to the invasion of Pennsylvania, and the hard-fought battle of Gettysburg, to the successful retreat of the army of Virginia with "large trains of captured supplies, and with a constant but unaccepted tender of battle." At that time all promised well, but the surrender of Cumberland Gap under circumstances so suspicious that they are made the subject of special allusion, destroyed this fair prospect, and opened East Tennessee to the Federal armies. The advance and decisive defeat of General Rosecrans on the field of Chickamauga, and the subsequent fight at Chattanooga against the superior forces of General Grant, are next touched upon. Whilst admitting great losses in Tennessee and Arkansas, the President sees in every other direction grounds for congratulation. Before the firm defences of Charleston even the boasted iron-clads recoil. In Louisiana and Texas the Federals have met with disaster after disaster; the most exposed frontier of the enemy has felt in its turn the tread of an invading army. And these facts, despite the temporary gloom which has overshadowed the Confederacy in the loss of East Tennessee, and in the disappointment of the hopes which the earlier successes of the war had raised, justify the calm conclusion of the President, that "whatever obstinacy may be displayed by the enemy in his desperate sacrifices of money, life, and liberty, in the hope of enslaving us, the experience of mankind has too conclusively shown the superior endurance of those who fight for honour, liberty, and independence, to permit any doubt of the result."

The most painful portion of the Message is undoubtedly that which refers to the foreign relations of the Confederacy, and we fancy few Englishmen will read without a blush the just censure which President Davis passes upon the Administration of this country. From the first, he complains, that the two great maritime powers of Western Europe took up an attitude inconsistent with a "practical neutrality;" and within the last six months he shows that their action has become in some cases "positively unfriendly." The President cites several instances in which Lord Russell's language betrayed a hostile animus to the Confederate States; but his chief ground of complaint, and the one which he most thoroughly substantiates is the violation of engagements of which the French and English Governments have been guilty in recognising the blockade of the Southern coast. That blockade was first proclaimed on the 19th and 28th of April, 1861. It embraced the whole coast-line of the Confederacy, extending some 3,459 statute miles. At that very time the United States navy consisted of twenty-four vessels of all classes in commission, of which half were in distant seas. But to illustrate more strongly the monstrous illegality of a blockade established with such a force, the President cites the engagement entered into by the Governments of England, France, and the Confederate States for the maintenance of the provisions of the Declaration of Paris. The British Consul at Charleston took the initiative. The Confederate Government, without hesitation accepted the terms, and imagined that it had obtained a quid pro quo. It abandoned privateering and the belligerent right of capturing neutral ships carrying the enemy's property; but fancied that it had secured in return the non-recognition of paper blockades. Let us see how its concessions were met. On the 21st of May, 1861, Earl Russell announces gratuitously that the blockade could no doubt be rendered effective, notwithstanding the 3,000 miles of coast, considering the small number of harbours. On the 14th of January, 1862, Lord Lyons writes that, in consequence of the Federal navy not being sufficiently numerous to stop up the "small holes," the Federal fleet have closed some of the small inlets by sinking vessels in the channel. On the 6th of May, 1862, Lord Russell states that "the United States Government have now for more than twelve months endeavoured to maintain a blockade of 3,000 miles of coast; that it has been 'kept up irregularly,' and yet that 'Her Majesty's Government never sought to take advantage of the obvious imperfection of that blockade.'" In September, 1862, the noble lord goes so far as to assert that the United States "were very far indeed from being in a condition to ask other nations to assume that every part of the coasts of the so-called Confederate States is effectually blockaded." This is Lord Russell's language to the United States; to the Confederate Government it is exactly the opposite. In February, 1862, Her Majesty's Government, when pressed by President Davis, regarded the blockade as "practically effective." Later still, they twisted the term "effective force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast," to mean presenting an obvious danger to ships approaching the coast. But the climax is to come. Pressed hard about the effectiveness of the blockade, Earl Russell forgets his engagements, repudiates the Declaration of Paris, acknowledges that "the United States navy did not keep up so completely and effectually as was required an effective force," but states roundly that the rulers of England "would have been for ever infamous, if, for the sake of their own interests, they had violated the law of nations and made war in conjunction with the slaveholding States of America against the Federal States." Lord Russell drops the "effective blockade," and, with a rhetorical artifice worthy of him alone, introduces "those slaveholding States." But he is severely handled by the President in the following language, which, if it fail to lower Lord Russell in his own estimation, will certainly not elevate him in the eyes of his countrymen.

"In the second of these reasons," says the President, "our rights are not involved, although it may be permitted to observe that the conduct of Governments has not heretofore, to my knowledge, been guided by the principle that it is infamous to assert their rights whenever the invasion of those rights creates severe suffering among their people, and injuriously affects great interests. But the intimation that relations with these States would be discreditable because they are slaveholding would probably have been omitted if the official personage who has published it to the world had remembered that these States were, when colonies, made slaveholding by the direct exercise of the power of Great Britain, whose dependencies they were, and whose interests in the slave trade were then supposed to require that her colonies should be made slaveholding."

It is only fair to Napoleon III. to state that the President has had no intimation of such views being entertained by the French Government, and that there is reason to believe that at least one attempt has been made by the Emperor to induce the English Government to take a course of action more consistent with their obligations.

Passing briefly in review other breaches of neutrality—the permitted exportation of arms to the Federals and the stoppage of any ship suspected of being built for the Confederates, the discourteous treatment of Southern Commissioners, and the absurdity of an "impartial neutrality" which was owned to be "exceedingly advantageous" to one of the belligerents—the President discusses the steps that ought to be taken in the face of the plain hostility to the Confederacy. Two retaliatory measures are open to him: the one is, to declare a paper blockade of the United States; the other to rescind the article of the Declaration of Paris to the effect that the neutral flag covers enemy's goods. We rejoice to say that neither is adopted, and that the President of the Confederacy, mindful that war is temporary and peace permanent, and that the Southern people must ever be in favour of neutral rights, refuses to sacrifice to a feeling of resentment the principles to which he has once given his assent.

We have no space to follow the various topics of the Message to the end; but we have endeavoured to select such points in the foreign relations of the Confederacy as may be of immediate interest to our readers, leaving to a later issue the treatment of the finances, of the internal administration of the Confederacy, and of the conduct of the invaders. The Message is published in extenso in our columns, and upon all these points deserves the careful study of every reader. But we cannot leave this magnificent State paper, destined hereafter to take a prominent place in the national archives of the South, without quoting its concluding paragraph, characteristic alike of the mind of the writer and of the spirit in which the South has met the vicissitudes of the past, and will meet the trials that are to come.

The patriotism of the people has proved equal to every sacrifice demanded by their country's good. We have been united as a people never were united under like circumstances before. God has blessed us with success disproportionate to our means, and, under His Divine favour, our labours must at last be crowned with the reward due to men who have given all they possessed to the righteous defence of their inalienable rights, their homes, and their altars.

The Tender Mercies of the Yankee.

WHEN a rebellion has been crushed out beyond the possibility of revival; when the insurgent army has been annihilated in the field; when the last town that held out has been stormed by the royal forces; when the few remnants of the insurgent bands are being hunted down like wild beasts by the cavalry and light troops of the conqueror; when men who have broken their oath of allegiance and committed the gravest crime of which human laws take cognizance, await the sentence of their offended sovereign—what is the harshest doom that a Christian monarch and a civilised government would venture to pronounce upon the vanquished? Death to the actual leaders of the rebellion in the council or in the field—perhaps a score or two of the most deeply implicated ringleaders—banishment and confiscation on a couple of hundred more; the rest, the rank and file of the army, are pardoned on condition of asking and loyally accepting the grace of the master. When a great insurrection has evidently failed; when it has become confessedly clear that the objects of the rebellion are unattainable, although the contest may yet be maintained for a few months longer, what kind of terms are offered by a prudent and clement prince? A free pardon to all but some half-dozen persons excepted by name, with the understanding that these will have the opportunity of leaving the country unpursued; the restoration of the rebels to their civil and political rights, on the sole condition of obedience to the laws; the restitution of their property; a complete amnesty or oblivion of political offences.

What sort of compromise is usually offered, when insurrection has assumed the dimensions of civil war; when it is clear that, whatever its result, the struggle will be long and doubtful; and when both parties are desirous to avoid the horror and guilt of unnecessary bloodshed? Concessions, more or less extensive, according to the strength of the two parties, are offered to those who have taken up arms in vindication of a supposed right; it is agreed that no criminal proceedings shall be taken in consequence of anything done during the contest, and that both parties shall stand in all respects, as subjects and fellow-citizens, exactly as they stood before recourse was had to arms. On no other terms would any sane Government dream of terminating a struggle distinctly recognised as a civil war, of which the issue was yet so doubtful that neither party could venture to claim anything like a complete and conclusive success.

The murders and devastation committed by the Duke of Cumberland, surnamed the Butcher, and his father, George II., after the battle of Culloden, are universally regarded as crimes against Christianity and civilisation. The atrocities of Nicholas in Poland, and Haynau in Hungary, have attached a strain of ineffaceable infamy to the escutcheons of Russia and Austria. But it would seem that President Lincoln is bent on outdoing all these, and raising his own name, and those of his advisers, to a place among such scourges of mankind as the heroes of the French Revolution. Charles Sumner claims his place with the craven Robespierre; Fouquier Tinville is to acknowledge a worthy rival in General Butler; and Lincoln and Chase and Seward will henceforward be remembered in conjunction with Couthon and St. Just and Marat. Under the name of an amnesty—a proposal for reconstruction—Mr. Lincoln addresses to the Confederate States a proclamation of unequalled insolence and unprecedented ferocity; and his offer of mercy amounts almost exactly to that which Polyphemus made to his captive. We know not whether to admire most the astonishing impudence of such a proposition to a nation capable of self-defence, or the diabolical malignity which could alone have prompted such menaces, even to a crushed and conquered foe.

The South is not reduced to ask mercy of her enemy; she is not brought so low that any of her citizens dream of giving up the object with which they entered upon this war, and returning to the Union on any terms whatever. They refused to do so before a blow had been struck; they preferred independence outside of the Union even to ascendancy within it, though they well knew that with the aid of the Democratic party, reconsolidated by the alarm of secession, they could have extorted any conditions of reunion they might demand. It is not likely that they would accept now what they refused then. Since that time an impassable gulf has been opened between North and South. They are parted for ever by a dark stream of blood spilt in mortal strife, by injuries never to be wiped out, by insults never to be atoned, by outrages never to be forgotten. The ghosts of men murdered on their own hearthstones, of prisoners assassinated in cold blood, of little children butchered in the sight of their parents, stand between the South and a return to fellowship with those whose hands are red with blood not shed on the field of battle. The foul outrages and insults offered to Southern women would alone suffice to make reunion impossible. How could a Southern gentleman stand face to face with the Nana of New Orleans, and forbear to scourge the caithiff in the very Capitol? How could a Southern father or husband meet the man who ordered the outrages at Athens, or the President who let loose the negro assassins of the Beckham family, except as mortal foes? Let Lincoln offer what compromise he might, no Southern man in whom a spark of manhood yet remained could vote for its acceptance.

But he does not profess to propose compromise; he invites submission, and offers a conditional pardon. He, the chief of a Federal Administration, entrusted by thirty-three sovereign States with limited powers for special purposes; he, an executive officer, responsible to the representatives of those States for the use of the scant authority invested in him; he, Abraham Lincoln, who was yesterday a rail-splitter, and will be a rail-splitter to-morrow—offers his gracious pardon and forgiveness to 8,000,000 of people and to thirteen sovereign States, on such conditions as he in his wisdom and mercy thinks proper to impose. He, whose armies have achieved two victories and sustained seven or eight defeats, offers to extend his favour and protection to a nation which has in the field an army of 300,000 men, and which not long since saw 120,000 of his choicest troops beaten, crushed, routed, all but annihilated, under the walls of its capital. He offers his pardon to the victors of Chickamauga; to the garrison of Charleston; to the soldiers who have three times menaced his capital and twice invaded his country; to the troops that saw his generals fly, in headlong haste, from Manassas Junction; that chased his Grand Army through the woods and swamps of the Chickahominy; that compelled his chief arsenal to surrender at discretion; that have twice returned from Maryland and Pennsylvania with long wagon-trains laden with Federal stores; that held the heights of Fredericksburg, and drove an army twice the number of their own in utter rout before them at Chancellorsville. His bitterest partisans, his most unscrupulous agents, do not pretend that the South is beaten or subdued: he himself does not imagine that her strength is broken. His ministers are making preparation to carry on, in 1864, a war as tremendous as that which has already raged for three years. He knows by terrible experience how changeable are the fortunes of that war; he sees his armies everywhere unable to advance, two of them have only just escaped from annihilation, and yet he deems it suitable to assume the airs of a conqueror and dictate the terms on which he will receive the submission of the enemy and admit them to share the blessings of subjection to his mild and merciful rule.

And such terms! Every one who has held office under the Confederate Government, every one who has resigned military or judicial office in the Federal service when the obligations it imposed became incompatible with his allegiance to his native State, every one who has held rank in the army above that of colonel, or in the navy above that of lieutenant; and, finally, every one who, in obedience to the orders of the Government and the law of nations, has refused to treat fugitive slaves, like the murderers of the Beckham children, on the footing of honourable enemies and prisoners of war, is excepted from the promised amnesty, and left at the mercy of the Chases, Sumners, and Butlers. Every one not included in any of these categories who shall take the oath of allegiance to the Federal Government, shall swear obedience to the Acts of Congress and the proclamations of Mr. Lincoln, until a court packed with creatures of the Republican faction shall pronounce those acts illegal, and shall acquiesce, not tacitly, but formally, in the ukase which pretends to emancipate the slave population of the South, shall receive a free pardon and be restored to the remnant of his property and to the rights of citizenship. Thus speaks Abraham Lincoln to the free, independent, and sovereign States of Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, and their Confederates:—"Give up your independence; abdicate your sovereignty, renounce your liberties, disband your forces, dissolve your Union, and abide the sentence pronounced upon you. Every man of note, eminence, influence, or worth among you; every man who has rendered you service in council or in camp, by land or sea; every man whose deeds have made his name and that of his country honoured throughout the world; every man who has the talent or the authority to be a leader among you, shall be given up to his enemies, to die the death of a traitor. Four-fifths of your property, not destroyed by war, is confiscated by my sovereign will and pleasure. For the rest, every one of your citizens who will forswear his citizenship, and declare himself a willing and loyal subject of this Government at Washington, to which, heretofore, none ever attributed sovereignty or supposed himself to owe allegiance—who will profess himself obedient to every act which I, or my partisans, have enacted for the better suppression and punishment of your rebellion—may return in possession of the wreck of his fortunes and the shadow of his liberties, and live for the future on equal terms with the slaves whom I have made freemen and citizens." This is Mr. Lincoln's scheme for the reconstruction of the Union; these are the terms of reconciliation which he offers to a people maintaining the struggle for independence with unbroken courage, with undaunted endurance, and with even fortune. What less could he have offered to a conquered and suppliant enemy? If Charleston had capitulated; if Bragg's army were annihilated; if Longstreet had surrendered at discretion; if Mobile and Richmond were in the hands of the Federals; if Lee were a fugitive and his army a broken horde of guerrillas, what worse terms would the conquerors dare to offer? They cannot hang 8,000,000 of people; they cannot confiscate a territory larger than Europe. Never but once, since history began, has such an "amnesty" been offered to an unconquered people. When James II. still had a hold on his dominions; when the Cavaliers of England, surprised but not dismayed, were ready to rise on his behalf; when there was yet a hope for his throne and for his son's inheritance, the last and most obstinate of an ill-fated house destroyed his every chance by a proposal to his revolted subjects rather less ferocious than Abraham Lincoln makes to the citizens of the Confederate States. And what was said by one of the "excepted" then is exactly what every sane partisan of the North will say now: "This is not an amnesty; it is a proscription." Need we ask our readers to remember the names of a few of those whom their former colleagues in the Senate and Cabinet are so eager to hang? The list includes nearly every living American who is known and admired in Europe. Jefferson Davis, the one living American whom Englishmen admit to rank with the great statesmen of the Old World; General Lee, the greatest of living strategists; Maury, who has done more for the honour of America in the world of science than any other of his countrymen; Ewell, the trusted friend of Stonewall Jackson; Morgan, the American Garibaldi; Bishop Polk; ex-Vice-President Breckenridge; Johnstone, Bragg, Longstreet, Kirby Smith, Beauregard, Magruder, Semmes of the Alabama, Malfit of the Florida, Stuart, the most brilliant of cavalry officers; every member of the Cabinet, nearly every distinguished man, in short, throughout the length and breadth of the South. Never has such a holocaust of noble victims been sacrificed to the devilish malice of the vilest of mankind.

Happily the proclamation can do the South no harm; and it is not likely to do its authors any good. This horrible outburst of savage and sanguinary ferocity exposes the true character of the Republican faction and of "honest Abraham Lincoln" in unmistakable colours; and we hardly think that we shall hear any more praises (save in the columns of journals which, having no influence to exert and no character to lose, are as careless of probability as of truth,) of the humanity and gentleness of the man who patronised and promoted Butler, and who deliberately organised a scheme for the initiation of servile rebellion and midnight massacre in every defenceless plantation and village in the South. This last and most characteristic production leaves no doubt as to the inner nature of the man; and the revelation is such as has seldom disgraced and appalled humanity.

President Lincoln's Message to Congress.

It is impossible to deny that the Message of President Lincoln to Congress is a work of skill and ingenuity. It is not the effort of a profound statesman, nor is it an emanation from the loyal sentiments of a patriot. In its conception and expression, the craft of an electioneer, the audacity of a despot, and the subtlety of a lawyer, are the moving elements.

To understand this Message, it is necessary to form a clear idea of the position of President Lincoln with regard to the two great political Powers of the North. As in his Cabinet there coexist divergent and even antagonistic principles, so in him, both in reference to the Administration and the country at large, there coexist an image of the Republican and an image of the Democratic party. He is like the god Janus: with the one face he turns to the Abolitionist, with the other to the Conservative faction. Undoubtedly the former party has elevated him to power, and possibly might, single-handed, be strong enough to keep him there; but he has all along shown a desire to conciliate both parties, to lean alternately towards each, and while retaining unimpaired his natural support, to draw to him, or at least to paralyse for all other purposes, the strength of the opposition.

Now a careful appreciation of this situation furnishes the only clue to the policy and meaning of the Message. In its broadest and most apparent features, it seems to be a manifesto to Europe rather than to America. It declares that "the Federal Government is at peace with all the world, that the crisis is past, and the rebellion well nigh suppressed," and it adds the necessary sop for the Abolitionists of England in affirming an adherence to the emancipation policy. If to this there be added a proclamation of amnesty, then to Europe is presented a picture of success, wisdom, and humanity. Yet this picture assumes everything: the death of the rebellion, the reality of the emancipation, (for of its wisdom we need not speak), and the perfection of the amnesty. It is a conversion of mere tropes into facts; it is to assert what we shall prove to be false, on the testimony of President Lincoln and his own ministers.

So far, then, there has been an attempt to throw dust in the eyes of foreign nations. But the importance of the Message consists in its relation to the Federal States. From it the attitude of President Lincoln and his intentions may be learned, and these are not difficult to discover. The first two statements may be considered to be agreeable equally to both parties in the state. Whatever may be the feelings of the North towards England, the period for revenge will be deferred till the termination of the civil war; and it may also reasonably be presumed that, as Republicans and Democrats are supposed to be fighting for some Union or other, both may be delighted to hear that "the crisis which threatened to divide the friends of the Union is past."

Now, however, we come to the artistic portion of the Message: a portion which, taken together with the Proclamation, presents somewhat the appearance of a sandwich—the inside being presented as a delicate morsel to the Republican, and the exterior parts to the Democratic party. Of what avail are all reports of Mr. Lincoln's regret at having issued the proclamation of emancipation? He will not so readily desert in word, if in heart, the men who have made him what he is. He makes a bold bid for the continued support of the Abolitionist, and declares that "he will adhere strictly to his emancipation policy so long as he shall remain the executive." In plain words, he says, "Vote for me at the next Presidential election, and I am ready to satisfy the most extreme doctrines of the Black Republican platform." It would, however, have been most dangerous to have put forth such a programme in his capacity as a candidate for the election of next November, had not some means been adopted to soften the repugnance of the Democrat to the emancipation policy. So he declares that "the rebellion is pressed within its narrowest limits;" in other words, that the war will be ended quickly and that peace is at hand. Does any reasonable man suppose that this announcement is pleasing to the Republican? Certainly it is not so. The Abolitionist is panic-stricken at the mere mention of peace; his theories cannot be realised except by a protracted war. He must exterminate, not defeat, the South, in order to arrive at emancipation; he must destroy every man of note, and confiscate every plantation, to satisfy his insatiable and bloodthirsty vengeance. Moreover, he must destroy liberty, he must complete his great work of revolution. Every vestige of the old United States Constitution, every check on the central authority, every security for individual right, must be swept away for ever. A despotism must be reared up, drawing to it all the rights of States and of individuals, annihilating all local powers, deriving its authority from isolated efforts of universal suffrage, and supporting itself by the sword: a despotism, indeed, in which all men shall be equal and no man shall be free. These aspirations—and with less than these the Republican party will not be content—would be frustrated by that peace which the Democrat may justly desire. But it was necessary that Mr. Lincoln should go a step further in his bid for the Presidency, and conciliate, by more specious means, the good will of the opposition. That is the true meaning of the so-called "amnesty," which promises pardon to the people of the Confederate States, in deference to the Democratic idea of State rights, but reserves the leaders as a holocaust to satiate the Republican vengeance. That, too, is the meaning of the article which remits to the Union any State where a fraction of its voters shall establish a government without the pollution of the oath of Secession. It is a concession to the theory of State Rights, and seems to hold out a promise that seceded States may re-enter the Union on their ancient basis. We will not stop to inquire how far, by this provision, the vote of a seceded State may be fabricated at the next election in case of a split in the Northern voting, and the consequent impossibility of obtaining a majority of States. That is not an improbable contingency, but it is at least an additional evidence that the document which is called a Message by President Lincoln is an electioneering manifesto—an attempt to forestall the action of the people in their choice, a daring bid both to the Republican and the Democrat for another four years of power; one more step on the high road to despotism to which the North is advancing with gigantic strides. The men of the North must, indeed, be blind, if they perceive not in what direction they are being so hurriedly led, and perceiving, then mad, for not arresting their headlong career.

It remains, however, to consider briefly the truth of President Lincoln's assertions, when he declares that the "crisis is past and the rebellion pressed within its narrowest limits." Does Mr. Stanton's report agree with this view? He confesses that Charleston, the arch-rebel, still remains intact, in spite of the utmost efforts of the army and fleet before the noble city, and he seems to see no hope of her reduction. He confesses that the conscription only produced 50,000 soldiers. Certainly it furnished $10,000,000, but dollars are not soldiers; and why, when conscription fails, should volunteering succeed? Why, too, does he recommend the same pay and the same rights for the negro as for the white soldier, if he can obtain a sufficient supply of the latter? There is a confession of anxiety in this proposition more significant than an explicit declaration. Then, too, Mr. Welles speaks of the great success of a blockade which allowed 133 vessels to run into Charleston and Wilmington in seven months, and 130,000 bales of cotton to be exported in eleven months. He even waxes proud of the historical renown of a navy of 588 vessels which is defied by the power of five cruisers. Well, too, may Mr. Chase glory in the success beyond his expectations, while he estimates the Federal debt in June, 1865, at more than $2,200,000,000, and, like a very magician, pretends to know at what point the issue of greenbacks is to be stopped. Indeed, if proof is wanting of the falsity of the words of victory and peace, what can be more convincing than the language of Mr. Lincoln where he declares that "war power is their main reliance, and that their chief care must be directed to the army?" So also is the emancipation policy, on his own evidence, false and heartless, for he dares to boast that 100,000 freed slaves are in the Federal service and that one-half of them bear arms. Where, we ask, are their wives and children? Are they still slaves, or are they starving? What is the value of an emancipation policy which absorbs the males for the selfish purposes of war, and disregards the women and, above all, the children, with whom, if at all, emancipation should commence? Who but a fanatic would believe in a philanthropy which looks upon its objects merely as the instruments or the victims of destruction?

The Proclamation is issued as part of the Message, and deserves a passing word. What is the extent of its mercy? It excepts the heads of the Government and the principal military and naval officers. We cannot stop to make a statistical calculation of how many persons would be included in the exception. The interpretation would be such as usually may be expected when propounded by one of the parties to an engagement. Assuming, however, for a moment the readiness of the Confederate States to accept Mr. Lincoln's proposition, does England appreciate the true result? We cannot believe it possible. The acceptance of the amnesty by the South means simply this: first, the death by execution of the greatest and noblest spirits in the South, the most sagacious of her statesmen, the most able and brave of her soldiers; second, the exile of all immediately below these in grade and position; third, the confiscation of the estates and personal property of every family of wealth, name, distinction, or worth, in the Confederacy, the colonisation of their estates by the Northern soldiery, or the appropriation of them by the Northern generals and leaders; fourth, the entire abolition of all State rights, State governments and courts, the centralisation of all authority, irresponsible power over the person and liberty of every individual, military occupation; in fact, all the conditions and misfortunes of what in Europe are known as conquered provinces.

But it will be said that humanity will stand aghast at such an annihilation of all right, at the murder of great men, and at the total extinction of liberty; that England will then awake to her duty and call on the North to stay its hand. But it will then be too late to repent. All Europe says that the partition of Poland was a crime of the deepest dye; the Western nations have been once and again horrified at the cruelties practised on that unhappy people. Yet England and France are powerless: and why? Because they waited until it was too late, and in the end could only vex themselves with undying remorse at their own supineness. When once the independence of a people is lost, and the iron hand of military rule has rivetted its grasp, other nations deplore and sympathise, but they do not act, because it is then too late.

We have desired to put these considerations before the people of England in order that ignorance may not ever be with them an excuse. But do we fear such results as we have depicted? Assuredly not. Supposing that the affairs of the Confederacy were ten times more embarrassing than they now are, does any man, with a spark of faith in virtue, believe that an army would abandon its leaders to destruction—that a brave and free people would abandon themselves to a hopeless servitude? There is not a soldier in the army of Lee or of Beauregard that would not repudiate in disgust such an imputation; and the citizens still believe that to die is better than to serve.

But it is a mere adoption of Northern phraseology to speak of desperation. What value is to be set on such words as the "pressure of the rebellion within its narrowest limits," when a check to the Confederate arms in East Tennessee is followed by the springing up, as if by magic, of an army in West Tennessee, to defend West Tennessee, West Kentucky, and North Missouri, to the Tallahatchie—when the banks of the Mississippi are patrolled by 10,000 Confederate troops—when Charleston is defiant, and the army of Lee lies in unimpaired strength in Virginia, and makes the sound of its cannon heard in Washington—above and beyond all this, when a people is united as one heart and one soul in the noblest cause, with confidence in itself, its leaders, and its destiny?

It has been often urged in these columns that the extinction of the liberties of the North was a condition precedent to the attempt to subjugate the South. Indeed it is an axiom that the destruction of the rights of one section of a federation involves the destruction of the rights of all. The truth of this view is now manifest. In the Message of Mr. Lincoln we no longer recognise the address of the chief magistrate of a republic to a free and honourable federation, but the edict of a despot to his subjects—a despot at once the creature and the creator of revolution. It ignores the Constitution and the rights of every man under it. It is the work of a man in the temporary possession of power, seeking by the boldest and most disloyal usurpation to grasp at absolute dominion, demanding that those who were once his fellow-citizens and now his subjects should aid him to enslave a free people, who were once also his fellow-citizens; above all, it is the work of an incendiary, who, though foreseeing a future of bloodshed and ruin, recoils not from the prospect while seeking the end of his ambition. In it there is not a word which is conservative or constructive; it re-echoes destruction, extermination, annihilation—it strikes at the foundations of society, and desires to reign over chaos.

These views are not confined to ourselves or to the Southern States: they have found expression in the North, and in the columns of a New York paper. The New York Daily News says that Mr. Lincoln's Message is the "despot's edict, which reveals the radical policy in all its disloyal, disunion, and Republican aspect, and consigns its author to eternal infamy. So far from being self-government, the realisation of the President's scheme for the re-admission of the seceded States would be worse than tyranny—it would be the betrayal of the principles fought for by our fathers by a mean and treacherous trick, which would eternalise discord, suspicion, and hatred between the sections."

The "Anglais Timide" and Denmark.

DAY by day the little cloud in the north of Europe attracts more and more attention, and because of its nearness to us even partially eclipses the great conflict in America. It is not, perhaps, from any sympathy with Holstein, or from any regret at the danger that threatens the integrity of Denmark, that men are anxious about the proceedings of the German Diet and the action of Christian IX. The Emperor Napoleon explained the cause of this uneasiness in his reply to the address of the Senate. His Majesty quoted the little remembered aphorism of Napoleon I., that war between European nations was in effect civil war. When peace is broken anywhere on the Continent no statesman, however sagacious, can tell how long the war will last, or what countries will be dragged into the contest. Will the Federal execution in Holstein lead to hostilities? Those who are best acquainted with the temper of the Danes and the Germans think it will do so. Can the dispute be confined to narrow limits, or will the Great Powers be involved in the quarrel? Will England,—for we desire to look at the question from a purely English point of view,—be able to maintain a neutral position? No doubt the general reply would be in the affirmative, but it is equally certain that the general impression is that the situation is highly critical, and that a single blunder on our part may compel us to unsheathe the sword. Ten years ago, when we were on the very eve of war with Russia, when our fleets had departed for the scene of action, and when our troops had been embarked for foreign service, from press and platform came continued asseverations, that the despatch of our ships and soldiers only meant an armed demonstration. If we had not been so deceived it is possible that war might have been averted, or we might have been better prepared for the encounter. But then, as now, men were loath to believe that a dreaded evil was near, and they preferred to hope against hope. Ten years ago, however, such a hope was more reasonable than it is now. Austria had too much to do at home to enlist in any enterprise; the kingdom of Italy was not in existence; if Prussia would not co-operate with the Western Powers her neutrality was certain; the relations between England and France were cordial; and Russia, without an ally, was confronted by a formidable alliance. How different is the aspect at this moment! If war ensues, Prussia, Austria, and Italy must be belligerents. Our Foreign Secretary has succeeded in damaging the cordial alliance between this country and France, though he is now inadvertently playing into the hands of France. And there is another ground for apprehension. We have been for years getting ready for war. Europe is armed cap-a-pie, and every exchequer is impoverished. It is true, that being ready for hostilities will often discourage them, but then this policy must not be pushed too far. War, though long, must end; but to an armed peace, which is scarcely less exhausting, there is no end except in war. A feeling is wide-spread that it would be better to have a trial of strength, and then reduce the exorbitant military establishments. The Emperor of the French, doubtless, had this in his mind when he proposed a Congress, which, by settling disputed points, would permit Europe to disarm.

But until lately the situation, though threatening, was not desperate. Provided an immediate outbreak could be avoided, the dangers that menaced the peace of Europe seemed remediable. Prussia, Italy, and Austria would not fight willingly. War will cost the Prussians the loss of their constitutional Government; the King of Italy wants time to consolidate his power; and Austria cannot fight without money, or obtain money without fomenting discontent at home. Holstein was the difficulty, but a difficulty that admitted of an easy solution.

We will not trouble our readers with the much-vexed Slesvig-Holstein question; but in order to show how Earl Russell has jeopardised our security and welfare, it will be necessary to glance at the actual state of affairs when Charles IX. ascended the throne.

It has always been the policy of Sweden to keep clear of any connection, either direct or indirect, with the German Diet, and consequently her relations with Denmark, though friendly, were not so intimate as they would have been but for the Danish association with Germany through Holstein. When, therefore, the late King Frederick published an ordinance which severed Holstein from all political connection with Denmark except allegiance to a common sovereign, Sweden was forthwith pledged to assist Denmark in case of need. Never had the latter Government been so strong, and never had the German Diet been so effectually checkmated. There might be a Federal execution in Holstein, but with Sweden at the back of Denmark, Germany would not dare to pursue the game of which the Federal execution was merely the first step and the cover. The death of King Frederick gave the Germans an opportunity for intrigue, and, thanks to Earl Russell, they have been able to upset the offensive and defensive alliance between Sweden and Denmark. The dispute about the title of Christian IX. was primarily of little significance. The succession had been settled by a solemn treaty; and it is utterly false to allege that the Holsteiners had been handed over to a new government without their consent being asked or obtained. The Great Powers were not guilty of such injustice. They made no change in the government of Holstein: they left the Duchy under the protection of the German Diet. All they did was to decide the succession to the throne of Denmark and to the dukedom of Holstein, so as to prevent the untoward complication of a dynastic war. And be it observed, that to effect this arrangement, although the Holsteiners were not called upon to make any change in their law of succession, the Danes had to consent to an important modification. If the new king made any attempt to violate the rights of the Holsteiners, he was amenable for his conduct to the German Diet, which body had the power—a power that it is now exercising—of taking military possession of the country and administering its affairs. Under such circumstances, if there had been no interference between Germany and the Scandinavian Powers, there would have been no prospect of war, in spite of the blustering of Germany and the angry recriminations of Denmark. But Earl Russell presides at the English Foreign-office; and although his lordship has a very sincere horror of war—a horror that makes pusillanimity appear a virtue in his eyes—he is perpetually writing despatches and otherwise so acting as to produce and foster ill-will and hostilities.

It is the traditional policy of this country—a policy not only approved by our statesmen, but in which the people heartily concur—to maintain intact the integrity of the kingdom of Denmark. The Danes are so placed, geographically, that, though few in number, they hold an important strategic position. To have Denmark on our side in the event of an European war is of moment, because, besides her power on land, she occupies ports that would be dangerous in the hands of an enemy and are most convenient in the hands of a friend. Nor had we any reason to expect that the alliance between England and Denmark would fail us. As long as Denmark remained independent she was our natural ally; but if Denmark should be absorbed into a Scandinavian kingdom, then we could no longer calculate on her firm friendship. A new Power would exist, which might seek other alliances than ours, and which would be more likely to look to Paris than to London for support. What, then, has been the conduct of Earl Russell? Has our Foreign Secretary sought to give all lawful aid to Denmark? Has he acted like an English Minister?

How he has played fast and loose with the question is now a matter of history. One year he wrote a despatch strongly in favour of the German Diet, and the following year a despatch as strongly in favour of Denmark; and the extraordinary spectacle was presented of the antagonists respectively offering to be guided, each one by the despatch that favoured his side, both despatches emanating from the same source. But Earl Russell has not been so neutral as it might be inferred from his running with the hare, and holding with the hounds. The marked disrespect with which the Danish Royal family has been treated when in this country has long been the topic of conversation on the Continent, and it has even encouraged the Germans to conclude that we are ready and willing to sacrifice Denmark. When the King of Greece was here, although it was of the utmost importance to him and to the success of his arduous enterprise that he should be supported by all the moral influence of this country, he was not honoured with an interview with Queen Victoria. For this, every loyal subject, well knowing and admiring our sovereign's devotion to her duties, will hold the constitutional Ministers of the Crown solely responsible. Nor is this all. When the Prince and Princess Christian, now the King and Queen of Denmark, were visiting this country, they had but one brief interview with Her Majesty; and on that occasion, it is reported, they were received at the Windsor station by no higher official than the station-master. But it might have been expected that when a crisis arrived, Earl Russell, no matter how strong his German proclivities, would have pursued a policy acceptable to his fellow-countrymen and useful to Denmark. He has done nothing of the sort. By his influence Christian IX. has revoked the patent of March, and is, so it is alleged, prepared to make further concessions.

Earl Russell will find his policy of cringing to the spoiler an utter failure. The appetite of the covetous is never satiated by compliance with unjust demands. The more the German Diet gets the more it will want. Unless our Foreign Secretary is very ill served in Denmark he must have learned from our minister at Copenhagen what is the feeling of the Danes, and that King Christian risks his crown by every concession to Germany. They are resolved not to give up an inch of territory or any of their rights; but if Europe allows Holstein to be wrested from them, then they are ready to join Sweden and to merge their nationality in a Kingdom of Scandinavia. Such a result would be very acceptable to French interests, and the conflict that must precede such a settlement might gratify French ambition, by giving the opportunity for a campaign on the Rhine; but we suppose the programme will not be very acceptable to Englishmen. Yet how is it to be avoided? By a European Congress? Earl Russell, in emphatic and discourteous terms, has rejected the idea. Will the moral suasion of England be effective? Earl Russell has made the very term a by-word and a laughing-stock. We have weakened the position of Denmark, and the hour seems rapidly approaching when we shall be placed in this dilemma: either we must go to war against Prussia to protect Denmark, or we must suffer Denmark to be dismembered and so lose a faithful and valuable ally.

It has been the boast of Earl Russell in reference to the American quarrel that he has been so neutral as to provoke the ill will of both the Confederates and the Federals. He can hardly make this boast now, seeing how zealous his agents have been in Canada in acting as Federal detectives, and that even the Northerners admit that he has been very friendly indeed in being so wide-awake about steam-rans, and so blind about recruiting in Ireland; but so far as Europe is concerned, his lordship can still glory in that kind of neutrality which consists in offending everyone. Earl Russell talked big to Russia and then ate humble-pie, and England was never so low in Russian estimation as at this moment. He encouraged the Poles to hope for assistance, and deserted them in their great need. The German press teems with virulent articles against this country. In Denmark, English friendship is more dreaded than German enmity. In Greece, we have set up a king and are already quarrelling with him, and in that country, where our influence was supreme, we have become decidedly unpopular. In Italy, French influence prevails. With the French, those sincere relations that were the best guarantee of peace in Europe are not so good as formerly. If we extended our survey to the East we should find that there, as elsewhere, Earl Russell has bullied the weak and cringed to the strong, and that everywhere he has made the name of England either hated or despised. Thus are we sowing the seeds of enmity broadcast, and some day, and perhaps before long, we shall reap the fruits of Earl Russell's masterly policy, which consists in leaving England without a friend or an ally, either in the Old World or the New.

A NEW WORK ON THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

PARIS, December 22.

If speech had not been invented to conceal men's thoughts, one might safely predicate that France had no thought of going to war. The debate in the Senate, of the opening passages of which I wrote in my last, has been all in favour of a peaceful policy. In vain M. de Ségur d'Agnesseau pleaded the cause of Poland, even to the extent of war. The only other advocate who raised his voice in favour of that most unfortunate people was fain to acknowledge that, while deploring its fate, he had no remedy to offer. Even with railroads, France is still a long way off from Poland—a truth which was made self-evident to the victims of written and spoken declarations, both here and elsewhere—even by M. Bonjean. The Marquis de la Rochejaqueleine spoke eloquently, and was listened to with significant favour when he denounced the assassinations of the secret committee which a few weeks ago, if no longer, governed Warsaw, and the falsehoods with which the Polish organs have pandered to European imaginativeness. But the coup de grace was given by M. Dupin—now Procureur Général, Louis Philippe's testamentary executor, and for the whole, or greater part, of his reign, President of the Chamber of Deputies. His speech was decisive; he spoke the thoughts of France, which will have no war; and he was really on this occasion, as I have heard said, the Procureur-Général of France. Your readers will have seen in the daily papers the Emperor's answer to the Senate's Address published in this morning's Moniteur—they will have seen that it re-echoes the peaceful language of the Senate, and they will have remarked the quotation from the first Napoleon's sayings—which sometimes differed from his doings.

The proposed Address of the legislative body has not yet seen the light. I am told that in committee one of the Liberal opposition proposed the insertion of a paragraph in favour of the North, which was at once voted down. It is also rumoured that the great Legitimist orator, M. Berryer, has undertaken to bring forward an amendment in the same sense. His doing so can be ascribed to nothing but a desire to embarrass the Government, superadded to the old Legitimist self-glorification, which ascribes the Independence of the American colonies, not to Anglo-Saxon sturdiness, but to the aid of the French court. We may respect an honest delusion, even when it serves to blind its worshippers to the disastrous consequences of which they were themselves the victims; but it is still passing strange to see the great opponent of all revolutions siding with those who are its advocates, both in Europe and America. So much there is in a name, that the really conservative movement in the late United States, because it has been nicknamed a rebellion by men whose theory of government knows no such word, frightens the most brilliant speaker, and not the least sound thinker, in France, from his propriety.

"Le Congrès est mort, vive le Congrès," is the cry of French diplomacy. In my studies of works on the culinary art I have met with a recipe for making omelets without eggs. So a Congress there will be, without England and Austria, unless the ministerial conferences which are to precede it end as such things sometimes do, in demonstrating the utter hopelessness of the principals agreeing. The King of Italy wishes for Rome and Venice, the Pope for Italy and a piéd-à-terre in the rest of the world; Spain is growing clamorous for Gibraltar, and the Sultan insists upon keeping what he has; Prussia has probably hardly made up its mind to the loss of certain Rhine provinces which considerations of sound geography, if not of nationalities, will exact from it, and we have not yet heard what sop Russia is prepared to throw to this Cerberus.

Notwithstanding the new assurance of peace which the Congress gives, although peace be proclaimed with the eloquence of a Dupin—not at the street-corners, indeed, but in the champs clos of the Senate—the Bourse, deafened, perhaps, with its own noise, hears none of these good things—all funds are falling, though least of all the 3 per cents., which are sustained by those who have an interest in the new loan. It is now rumoured that it will be a public one, with certain advantages to the holders of Treasury bonds, which comes very much to what I stated as its probable form. The true reason of the fall in securities is most probably that the pressure for money is quite as severe here as it is in England, although the rate of discount has not advanced beyond 7 per cent., nominally.

Since I last wrote there has appeared in Paris a work* on the condition of the Confederate States. It is in the form of a mémoire to Napoleon III., and is written by Dr. Charles Girard, formerly secretary of the Smithsonian Institute, Washington. Its greatest praise is that it is utterly unpretending, and fulfils its object as no art of rhetoric could have done. Addressed to a sovereign, it contains no superfluous word, and is disfigured by no flight of oratory. It is a plain statement of plain facts, related with a not inelegant simplicity which bears the sterling stamp of truth. As I believe that the author does not contemplate publishing an English edition I shall send you some rather copious extracts, only regretting that the space I can claim from you does not allow of my sending you the entire work.

Dr. Girard reached Charleston on the 8th of July, the day before the Federals made their first attack on Morris Island, the first act in what may be called the second siege of Charleston. He describes with dry humour the desperate attack on Fort Wagner on the 19th, and how a negro regiment took a glorious part in the repulse they suffered, encouraged to deeds of daring "at the post of honour" by Federal bayonets directed to its seat. But he did not tarry in Charleston, proceeding directly to Richmond, and the two or three pages which he allows to this journey of 450 miles give a glimpse of powers of description which make the reader regret that the intention of the work prevented their display.

His first visit was to the President, to whom he had the good fortune to have valuable letters of introduction. Thanks to these, he found not only a warm reception, but obtained permission to visit the various factories which have sprung up in the Confederate States with such truly American rapidity, and also the army of Northern Virginia under General Lee.

The Cabinet of the President is composed of an attorney-general, four secretaries—for foreign affairs, army, navy and finance—and a postmaster-general. Most of your readers know the range of affairs which these officers embrace, and those who do not, can do no better than consult the work itself. I shall speak only of the postmaster-general, whom I take to be a fair sample of the others, and one whose achievements are most easily understood by strangers, for they are expressed in something like pounds, shillings and pence.

"Up to the time of the separation the postal system in the United States cost the treasury $300,000 (£60,000) a-year. The Constitution of the Confederate States provides that the Post-office shall pay its own expenses. Under the administration of the postmaster-general, Mr. Reagan, not only the expenses of this department have been covered, but there was a surplus at the end of the fiscal year 1863."

From the Post-office we may go to the Admiralty, where we shall find business not less efficiently conducted.

"Captain J. M. Brooke, head of the artillery department of the navy, is the inventor of the gun with one or several rings which is now known by his name. He was so obliging as to give me all the information I required on this subject, as well as in regard to the Confederate ironclads, Merrimac, and its celebrated sea-duel with the Federal Monitor."

"When the Merrimac left Norfolk, on the 8th March, 1862, its object was to destroy the wooden vessels which barred the entrance of that harbour. The Confederates had not at the time the least idea of the approach of the Monitor, and did not therefore force the episode which I am about to relate."

"After setting fire to the Congress sinking the Cumberland, damaging the Minnesota, battering the Saint-Laurence and disabling the Erie and some gun-boats, besides silencing the surrounding forts—in all defended by 2,899 men and 220 guns, the Merrimac offered battle to the Monitor, which chance, it is said, had brought to the scene of action. After a fight which every one remembers, the two champions left the scene of combat at the same time and without decisive result."

"Europe was startled by this unaccustomed action between iron-clads. It was the first in a new era of naval warfare. It was said that the advantages had been equal, and that a new engagement was required to decide on the superiority of one or the other of the combatants. This mode of reasoning was based on the idea that the two parties fought with equal arms, whilst in reality it was not so. The Merrimac carried only shells, without a single shot on board. It went out only to attack wooden ships, intending to run them down with its projecting prows or to set them on fire with its shells. It was therefore considered that shot were useless. At the same time it must be allowed that the Confederates had not then the means of making balls, and it is to be presumed that if they had had them the Merrimac would have carried some for the chance of accident."

"The Confederates were not blind to the importance of keeping the secret on this occasion, so that public opinion was not set right by the press, which vied in discussing the results of this first engagement. They waited patiently for the day when a new naval combat should settle all doubts on the subject."

"A month afterwards the Merrimac being ready to renew the struggle, which had been, as if by mutual consent, interrupted on the 9th of March, again offered battle to the Monitor in Hampton Roads. My readers will remember that the Monitor did not take up the gauntlet, and this for reasons which are still unexplained. It is supposed that the Federals, having got wind of the real state of things, thought it more prudent to decline the trial which was offered them."

"The Monitor took refuge under the guns of Fort Monroe, and the Merrimac retired. Both these 'monsters of the sea' have since disappeared: the Merrimac destroyed by the hands of its officers to prevent its falling into the power of the enemy when the Confederates evacuated Norfolk, May 11th, 1862; the Monitor was swamped on a stormy night in the following December, in doubling Cape Hatteras.

"But Brooke's guns and his projectiles have survived these disasters."

The author gives a description of both, interesting to the peace-loving citizen of Great Britain, who reads the columns of the Times devoted to the experiments at Shoeburyness with even more gusto than the reports of the Matrimonial Cause Court; but I must refer him to the original for the satisfaction of his innocent curiosity. But if Dr. Girard has not been misled, he may be satisfied that neither Armstrong nor express-train Whitworth comes up to the Brooke gun, at least at short distances.

The next point which strikes the writer for the press is the freedom, the truly English freedom, which the Confederate Government has under very trying circumstances maintained. It stands even in favourable contrast with the English practice in Ireland in 1848 or '49. Neither the central nor any of the State Governments has an official organ. But yet neither the Government of Richmond nor the State Governments it represents are without their violent opponents.

"The Opposition is generally composed of men who are influenced only by disappointments; who attack the Government of their country only because they have not reached the objects of their personal ambition. This is the secret of the social theories they proclaim."

"This was the case with the Raleigh Standard. It systematically ran down the cause of the South, and it needed all the respect of the Government of Richmond for the freedom of the press and for the sovereign rights of the State of North Carolina to save it from suppression. It required all the firmness which marks the President's character to enable him to resist the popular current, which was strongly in favour of severe treatment."

"I was myself witness of the indignation with which some numbers of the Standard in the beginning of August were received by the people. . . . Judging by certain symptoms I am inclined to believe that the North Carolina regiments, had they been at Raleigh, would have taken it on themselves to vindicate the honour of their State, as the inhabitants of Raleigh were very near doing when they assembled before the office of the paper. Mr. Vance, the Governor, came himself to appease the exasperation of the crowd, and exhorted it to treat the paper and its writers with silent contempt, so as not to furnish history with a single incident which resembled an attack on the liberty of the press."

"The crowd listened to Mr. Vance and obeyed him, and the paper soon left the place, having lost every subscriber."

This long extract seemed too interesting to be omitted, contrasting as it does with the repressive measures by which the press has been muzzled in the North.

I had marked also for extract the chapter containing a visit to Drewry's Bluff, otherwise Fort Darling, and the historical rectification Dr. Girard gives of the Federal account of the battle of the 15th May, 1862. Space forbids this, and I conclude with some passages showing the treatment of Confederate prisoners by the Federals, as well as the disregard of all the usages of war by the Northern armies.

"In one of my conversations with the President (Davis) reprisals were talked of. I had been often present at warm discussions on this subject on the part of men in various ranks of life and of various instruction. The newspapers treated the question in all its aspects. General Lee, in one of his orders of the day, had summed it up in such noble words that they brought conviction to almost the entire nation. 'The question,' said he, 'is not as to what our enemies deserve, but what is worthy of us.' The President, in the interview to which I allude, exclaimed, 'I am forced to do myself violence to prevent being carried away by the just feelings of hatred and vengeance which the conduct of our enemies inspires me with; men without faith or law, with no principles of morality, depraved and abject beyond all that language can express.'"

"Thus at the time of which I speak the exchange of prisoners was made on the most liberal scale on the part of the South, which often gave three for one. But after the events of Vicksburg and Port Hudson the North suddenly and for the first time held a greater number than the South. At first the North stopped the cartel entirely, and afterwards it would only make exchanges of the privates, reserving the officers as hostages for the chance of future reprisals."

It often happened also that when a cartel had been agreed to between the belligerents, instead of forwarding those who were included in it by the most direct road, as was always done in the South, they marched them long round-about routes from penitentiary to penitentiary, through pestilential districts, until disease, fatigue, and privations of all sorts had decimated their numbers. It was thus that 5,000 prisoners were five months in coming from Arkansas to Virginia. I need hardly add, that the prisoners for whom the South received them had long since returned to their homes, and many were again enlisted in the Federal service."

"Another detachment of some hundreds of prisoners, who, after their exchange was agreed to, had been thus marched from prison to prison across the United States, passed lately through Washington, where Mr. Lincoln reviewed them. The men who composed the detachment were only the remnant of a larger number, who had survived the misery and disease under which their fellows had sunk during their long captivity. This tells sufficiently what their present state must have been. One of them saw a negro in the crowd who had once been his servant. 'Master,' said the negro, 'you seem ill and in want of the most necessary things. Here are a $100, and as soon as the war is over, when I can get out of this uniform, I shall come back to the plantation.'"

In Dr. Girard's pages we have several glimpses of the atrocities committed by the Northern troops and the utter disregard their generals show for the acknowledged rights of non-combatants. He finds at Richmond 180 families of refugees from Western Virginia, who had been driven from their homes with only sixty pounds of baggage each and $100 of money. In their raids into North Carolina they fire the villages after taking all they can carry away, even robbing the women of their ornaments; not unfrequently, with cold blooded ferocity, firing through the windows at groups of women and children.

"I, one evening, at General Cooper's, heard the Governor of North Carolina tell how, in their numerous incursions into his State, the enemy carried off by force whole families of negroes; that on several occasions, being surrounded at the moment of embarkation by the local militia, the negroes took the opportunity of escaping to return to their masters, and that then the Yankees turned their fury on the negro children, whom they tore from their mothers' arms and flung into the water. On other occasions they drowned the negroes by wholesale when they resisted the attempt to carry them off."

"The Yankees exercised similar cruelty on the whites. In one detachment of prisoners, of whom a great part was ill of small pox, caught in the miserable huts in which they had been lodged, they amused themselves with fastening them two and two, a sick man to a healthy one, to spread the disease; and then, when the disease reached its height, they would throw them overboard with loud cheers."

We hear only of a small number of the engagements which take place between the two parties, it often happening that several are fought on the same day at great distances.

"Up to the 1st of January, 1863, 250 engagements, more or less important, had taken place, and of these about two-thirds had been favourable to the Confederates."

"The losses were estimated, on the side of the Confederates, at 102,677, as follows:—

Killed .. .. .	20,891
Wounded .. .. .	59,615
Prisoners .. .. .	22,169

On the side of the Federals, in all, 209,116:—

Killed .. .. .	43,874
Wounded .. .. .	97,029
Prisoners .. .. .	68,213

"It is calculated that the number who have fallen victims to disease, or their wounds, were 120,000 on the side of the Confederates and 250,000 on that of the Federals."

In taking leave of Dr. Girard's work, from which I would gladly have made more copious extracts, I may call attention to the map which accompanies it. It shows the division of the States, not exactly as it at present exists; Maryland, for instance, which is retained in the Union by force, figures here as a Southern State; but it is striking as an answer to Mr. Lincoln's geographical dilemma, for here we see a frontier plainly marked out by great natural boundaries or ancient landmarks. The immense extent of the Confederate territory, as thus seen at a glance, is very striking, and offers the best argument in answer to those sanguine friends of the North who look to the speedy subjugation of the Southern States.

THE AMERICAN QUESTION IN ITALY.

(From La Discusione of Turin, December 9.)

A COUNTRY which is fighting for independence is sometimes called upon to delegate to the military power which has taken up its defence the entire management of public affairs. It is pardonable in a country, menaced by a foreign invasion, if it voluntarily renounces its municipal rights, so long as the contest lasts. How much more, then, must we admire a people which, in the hour of extreme national distress, not only combats the external enemy with surpassing valour, but preserves intact all its home liberties, and continues to maintain a dignified, calm, and perfect public order, without needing, even for a moment, to confer unlimited power on its military chiefs!

This is the heroic and admirable attitude which the people of the South have preserved.

Whatever may be said by their enemies, or by those who see only in this people a haughty aristocracy of slave-holding planters, it cannot, even by them, be denied that in the midst of all the horrors of a Vandalic war carried on against it by a powerful and unscrupulous neighbour—in the midst of the multiplied dangers which surround it on every side, and in the midst of bombardments, of penury, of the blockade, and of privations of every sort, with financial difficulties and universal mourning—the judicial power has not ceased its functions for a single day, and the Habeas Corpus, that palladium of a free people, has not been suspended in a single instance.

Admitting that the South is an aristocracy, can it be said that that is a blameworthy or odious aristocracy which bears itself so gallantly on the battle-field, and in the midst of all its difficulties maintains inviolate its internal franchises? What aristocracy has ever done so much before?

Let us now cross the Potomac and see what is passing in the North. No stranger enemy threatens to invade that country; no external violence seeks to suspend the constitutional liberties of those States. Far from it; the property of their citizens is secure, commerce is flourishing, the sanctuaries of home and of religion are unpoluted by a licentious soldiery, and Peace herself might seek her abiding place in the midst of that sublime scenery. But a mad craving for conquest has disordered every mind.

To satisfy the thirst of this national folly no horror is left unperpetrated, there is no humiliation to which all heads do not voluntarily bend. Thus we see the Habeas Corpus suspended, coin banished from circulation, and the country inundated with worthless paper; the press is muzzled, the hustings are silent, and the pulpit itself is bought. The civil tribunals are occupied by dragoons, and the few individuals to whom God has left sense enough to protest against this spontaneous and universal degradation, are taken in the night time, handcuffed, and cast into prison. Every moral sense is abdicated! For what? For the Union!! Yes! perish liberty, let all traditional franchises disappear, let all be demolished and destroyed, but save the Union!

Behold to what the loud outcry of the North has come—behold the aim and end of the war—the preservation of the Union! 'Those who were weak enough to believe that the North would spend its millions and shed its blood to liberate the negro are now, we may hope, convinced—alas! too late for humanity—how unfounded and fallacious was their credulity.

But if there be any who still persist in seeing in the present war a noble intention to redeem a family of mankind, they will do well to read the speech made by Mr. Lincoln's prime minister at Auburn, on the eve of the elections. Not a word was said on that solemn occasion in favour of the negro, but the predominating sentiment from first to last of the speech was the preservation of the Union at any cost. For this end nothing will be left untried; and if by chance the people of the North at the next presidential election took it into their heads to set aside the present Administration and to choose a new President, Mr. Seward takes care to warn them that their master, Lincoln, is now the master of legions, and that the soldiery is now the supreme power in the State. 'Name another President,' says Mr. Seward, 'and you will have civil war in perpetuity, which is simply perpetual anarchy. Undeceive yourselves. Mr. Lincoln cannot cease to be President until the Union is re-established. In virtue of his election in 1860, Abraham Lincoln must be President of the South, for otherwise peace will be lost to the country, and the Union itself will make shipwreck.'

Let us take note of this menace, which is the first step towards a military despotism, and let us watch to see if deeds will follow these words. Assuredly they are words of great weight, for they come from the mouth of a prime minister whose master is the absolute disposer of 300,000 bayonets; but let us hope that even if the North submits to such ignominy the heroic resistance of the South will render the plot nugatory.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, December 23.

THE inhabitants of the important borough of Burnley have followed the example set them by other Lancashire towns, in declaring, by a vast majority, in favour of a separation of the Northern and Southern States. The meeting was officially called by the Mayor, in accordance with a requisition presented to him by 300 of his fellow-townsmen, for the purpose, in the terms of the address, "of considering the propriety of adopting a petition to Her Majesty to take measures in concert with other European sovereigns to put an end to the present disastrous war in America, upon the basis of the Independence of the South."

In the unavoidable absence of his worship, and lest a sufficient civic authority might on that account appear to be wanting to the proceedings, the conduct of the meeting was placed in the hands of the town-clerk (Captain Creeke), who was unanimously voted to the chair. Among the principal speakers were the Rev. E. A. Verity (Rector of Habergham), the Rev. J. T. Shawcross, Mr. Alderman Robinson, and Mr. Councillor Kay. With regard to the first-named reverend gentleman, some opposition was offered by the Northern minority who contended that, as a point of order, it was incompetent for him, not being resident within the town, to address a meeting which was specifically an assembly of townsmen; but upon the town-clerk putting the question to the vote, it was decided that Mr. Verity should be heard.

The reverend gentleman then addressed the meeting at some length, but was frequently interrupted by the same section of his audience that had raised the point of order. The chairman, though repeatedly called upon to exercise his authority by ordering the removal of certain persons, steadily declined to do so, upon the ground that, whatever might be the decision of the meeting upon the great question under consideration, such decision could not go forth as final unless the fullest liberty were allowed to all in the free expression of their opinions. In the course of his address, Mr. Verity exposed the specious fallacy that the American war was in any Northern sense a struggle of liberty against slavery; and even supposing that such was the case, he argued that slavery could not be put an end to by any amount of violence. Slavery could only be suppressed by peaceful means—by the civilising influence of public opinion, and by the spread of the gospel of peace and good will. Referring to the attempts made by the Northern party in Lancashire to qualify the evils of the cotton famine, and thereby to strengthen the hands of the Government in its policy of doing nothing, the reverend gentleman pointed to the increase of pauperism as shown by the returns of the relief committee, and appealed from the statements of the Union and Emancipation Society to the bitter experiences of the operatives themselves. Did they not see distress around them, in their neighbours' dwellings as well as in their own? Was it true, that the people of Lancashire were content to work on Surats? Were not thousands and tens of thousands reduced to depend upon the scanty dole of charity, while they were eagerly waiting to do a fair day's work for a fair day's wage? And, even of those who were still in employ, were not the majority earning less by one-third now than three years ago? He contended that, notwithstanding the so-called patience of the people (by which phrase he understood their degradation and ruin), it was the bounden duty of the Government to consider if something could not be done to mitigate the evils of the crisis in Lancashire. It was true that England declared her neutrality in a proclamation issued at the beginning of the war; but, since that time nearly three years of useless bloodshed had rolled away, and not only was the war no nearer its termination than ever, but it became more and more evident that it was carried on for the purpose of imperial aggrandisement, and for the sake of exterminating—not only slavery—but the white men of the South. He had much pleasure in moving the following resolution:—

"That in the opinion of this meeting, the war in America is an injury to the world, and that the present aspects of the conflict afford no hope of its early termination, unless by means of the moral influence of Europe. We, therefore, earnestly urge upon the Government of this country to enter into communication with the European Powers to concert with them as to the best means of bringing about peace."

Mr. James Greenwood, in supporting the resolution, called attention to the pacific terms in which it was couched. He showed that what the Government was asked to do in the words of the motion had been done before in several instances. There was no need to draw the sword in support of friendly counsels. England had peaceably interfered in the case of Spain and Holland, Holland and Belgium, and Turkey and Greece. In each of those cases separation had taken place, and the several nations were living in peace with each other.

Mr. Alderman Robinson was of opinion that the British Cabinet should at once enter into communications with the Cabinets of Washington and Richmond, with a view to deal as tenderly as possible with the susceptibilities of both belligerents, so that the proposals for peace might be rendered as acceptable as the circumstances of the case would allow. He contended that England was not acting in the full spirit of her proclamation of neutrality; nor did he believe it possible for any nation to be neutral as regards its moral influence. In the present instance the British Government, while professing the most impartial neutrality, was really lending its influence in supporting a war of extermination.

Mr. H. Uttley thought it was the bounden duty of every upright man to do the utmost in his power to stop the war. A great deal had been said in disparagement of the South on account of the domestic institution of slavery. If the Southerners loved slavery, the Northerners hated the slave. He would rather be the slave of a master than the degraded subject of a political faction. The Union and Emancipation Society said a great deal about liberty. He would like to know what kind of liberty they meant. Was it liberty to free slaves and kill them? Was it liberty to prevent others from enjoying it? Yet such was the liberty the North was preaching to the world. The South wished to separate itself from the North, but it seems that, according to this new liberty, the South is to be coerced by the North because the Northerners are the only liberty-loving people in the world. He thought the moral power of England would have great weight with all sections of the American people, and if they failed in urging the British Government to exercise that power, still the world would see that Englishmen had done their duty like men, by the legitimate means of petition and remonstrance.

The following amendment was moved, but rejected:—
“That this meeting believes that the neutral policy hitherto pursued by Her Majesty’s Government is just, wise, prudent, and dignified; and hopes that the present representatives in Parliament will sustain the advisers of the Queen in the course of non-interference which they have hitherto pursued.”

The original motion was then put, and carried by an overwhelming majority.

The Rev. E. A. Verity then read a petition embodying the sentiments of the meeting, and a vote was taken to authorise the chairman to sign it on behalf of the inhabitants of Burnley in public meeting assembled.

The proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to Captain Creeke for the impartial manner in which he had conducted the meeting, and the assembly dispersed after cheering cordially for the “South and Independence.”

Copies of the following petition to both Houses of Parliament are now lying for signature at upwards of 100 of the largest cotton mills in the Manchester district:—

“The humble petition of the undersigned managers, overlookers and others engaged in the cotton manufacture at Messrs. ———’s mills, “Sheweth—That your petitioners depend for their livelihood entirely on the cotton manufacture, and therefore on the importation into this country of a sufficient supply of cotton.

“That until civil war broke out in America, the Southern States have always supplied cotton enough of the quality best adapted to our wants, by the use of which we could earn wages sufficient for the support of ourselves and our families; and as no failure in the supply of such cotton was anticipated, our rate of wages has been based upon its use.

“That since the beginning of the war, one half of our number have been entirely deprived of work, thereby becoming paupers or recipients of charity; while a large majority of the remainder, compelled to use inferior cotton, have earned only about two-thirds of their former wages.

“That when first the war destroyed our means of livelihood we suffered our privations patiently, believing that they could not last; but we see with dismay that every successive mail from America brings tidings of greater cruelty and ferocity on the part of the Northern leaders, and of a sterner resolution on both sides to carry on the war.

“Wherefore your petitioners humbly pray that your lordships [for honourable House] will be pleased to take such steps as may, in your judgment, most speedily lead to the re-establishment of peace.

At the monthly general meeting of the Central Relief Committee, held on Monday last, the honorary secretary (Mr. McClure) reported a further increase of about 1,700 in the number of persons receiving parochial relief. The committee at present hold a balance of about £225,000, while the Mansion-house, Liverpool, and Bridgewater-house committee have still at their disposal about £185,000. A few weeks ago Mr. Commissioner Farnall issued circulars to the relieving officers in the cotton districts, asking for information as to the present position and employment of those labourers and factory operatives who have ceased to receive parochial relief since 6th December, 1862, when pauperism attained its maximum. Some of the returns which have been received are incomplete, but making the best use he can of the data with which he has been supplied, Mr. Farnall frames the following estimate:—That 15,564 persons who were paupers in December 1862, cannot be traced by the relieving officers; that 54,474 have resumed their usual work; that 25,943 are employed in out-door works, and that 7,782 have either removed or emigrated. But these returns do not include those persons who were solely maintained by the various local relief committees. The number of persons now returned as receiving parochial relief is 130,630, as against 59,492 in December 1861; the cost at the several periods being £8,073 15s. 6d. as against £2,910 7s. 11d.

ERRATUM.—In the letter of Hon. C. J. McRae a typographical error substituted 50,000 for 30,000 as the number of bales of American cotton imported into the Liverpool market since 1st of August. It should have read that about 100,000 from 1st of January to 1st of August, and 50,000 since the latter date had been received, making in round numbers 130,000 during the year.

THE LAW, whether intentionally or accidentally, operates in favour of the Federal belligerent. It was expected that judgment would have been pronounced yesterday in the case of the Alexandra. The Court of Exchequer pronounced judgment in many cases, but not in that of the Alexandra. The effect of this is to defer judgment until the first day of next term, that is, until the 11th of January next. We infer from the delay that the judges are divided in opinion; or that the case is not quite so plain as the legal officers of the Crown in England asserted it to be. The judges no doubt feel a difficulty in pronouncing in favour of the Crown; for if they adjudge that the Alexandra should be confiscated, what are they to do in the case of the Victor, alias the Rappahannock, should a question respecting that vessel ever come before them? The Admiralty sold Her Majesty’s sloop-of-war Victor apparently without inquiring into the character of her purchaser. The Victor is now the Confederate war steamer Rappahannock of six guns. If the judges decide that the builders of the Alexandra violated the Foreign Enlistment Act in selling her, will they not, by that decision, decide that Her Majesty’s Admiralty have transgressed the law in a still greater degree?—Dublin Irish Times.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, Dec. 23.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

SINCE the last rise in the Bank rate of discount the Money Market has assumed, and retains a far more steady and satisfactory appearance. In addition to the Bank returns, which continue favourable, there have been considerable arrivals of specie, most of which has been sent into the Bank; whilst, at the same time, the withdrawals for transmission abroad are merely nominal; all of which tend to give strength to the markets. The applications for accommodation, both at the Bank and out of doors, have been greatly restricted, and the brokers are dealing freely at  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., or  $\frac{1}{4}$  below the Bank minimum; and for choice bills the terms are in some instances  $7\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. The joint stock banks are well supplied with capital, which they dispose of at  $7\frac{1}{2}$  to  $7\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. On the Stock Exchange the supply continues abundant, and short loans on Government securities are advanced at 4 per cent. It is indeed said that the Bank directors will immediately reduce the minimum term of discount.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion and specie transactions during the week have been on the whole of a satisfactory character. Specie to a considerable amount is again finding its way into the Bank, whilst the withdrawals have been very limited. The total amount sent in, including £128,000 this afternoon, has been £472,000, whilst there has been taken out only £42,000. The arrivals of gold have also been large, the total reaching £696,242, of which all is from New York, with the exception of £242,332 from Port Phillip. The Peninsular and Oriental steamer on Tuesday took out £122,589, of which £92,115 was in silver and £30,474 gold, the whole being on merchant’s account. The following were the proportions:—India, £29,904; China and the Straits, £64,215; Mauritius, £17,000; Alexandria, £11,300; and Ceylon, £170. The market for silver has again become quiet, but in the early part of the week there was an active demand for Bombay. The bar silver brought by the last West India packet has been sold at 5s. 1½d. per ounce, showing no alteration. Mexican dollars are very inactive, and there is little or no demand for them, the price, however, is called 5s. 1d. per ounce. The only gold ships at present known to be out are the Prince of Wales with £142,000, and the Transatlantic with 15,000 sovereigns.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The improved state of the Money Market, with the better appearance of commercial affairs in general, has materially influenced the English Stock Market. The brokers show more eagerness to do business, prices have in consequence advanced considerably, and there appears at present every prospect of a further improvement, though for the next few days, in consequence of the intervention of the Christmas holidays, less animation must be looked for. Consols closed this evening at  $91\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  ex div. for money, and  $91\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  ex. div. for the account, which as contrasted with last week, is an advance of about  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent. Exchange Bills are also taken, being now up to 9s. to 4s. 6d. The foreign stock market has also shown more animation, and with the exception of Greek, which have declined about  $\frac{1}{4}$  per cent., prices have generally improved, particularly with regard to the more speculative descriptions. Mexican, in consequence of the more satisfactory nature of advices, have risen  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent.; Spanish have likewise advanced from  $\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent.; and Turkish  $\frac{1}{4}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. The closing quotations this evening were, Greek Stock 25½ to 25¾; Mexican, 37 to 37½; Spanish Passives, 33 to 33½; Ditto Certificates, 13 to 13½; Turkish Six Per Cents (1854) 89 to 89½, and ditto ditto (1862) 70½ to 73½.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Throughout the week a moderately fair business has been transacted in American Government and railway securities, but without any material alteration in prices, till to-day, when the business increased very considerably, and in the majority of instances at a rise of from 1 to 2 per cent. in quotations. The chief dealings, however, have been in those securities more particularly connected with the New York districts. The dealings have been as follows:—Virginia State Six per Cents, 32, 31, 30, 30½, 33, 34, 33½, 34½, and 34. Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 80½, 81, and 83. Ditto ditto, Pennsylvania Section, 80, 79½, 82, 81½, 80½, 80, 80½, 80½, and 80½. Erie $100 Shares, all paid, 63, 62½, 64, 62, 63, and 65½. Ditto Seven per Cent., fifth mortgage, 65½, Illinois Central $100 Shares, 890 paid, 26½, 26, 25, 25½, and 24½ discount. Ditto, ditto, all paid, 67½, 69, 68½, 69, and 71. New York Central $100 Shares 80 and 80½. Panama Railway, first mortgage, 100½ and 100. Ditto ditto, second mortgage, 106 and 105½.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A more extensive business has been transacted in British railway shares than for some time past, and prices in almost all instances have advanced; the more satisfactory state of monetary affairs inducing the dealers to operate with much greater freedom; the chief variations, as compared with last week, are a rise of  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire, Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and Midland, of 1 per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow, Great Southern and Western (Ireland), London and Blackwall, and Metropolitan; of  $\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. in Caledonian, Great Eastern, Great Western, Brighton, London and North Western, Chatham and Dover, and of  $\frac{3}{4}$  per cent. in North Eastern (Berwick). The market for foreign Railway Shares has not been quite so brisk; but although prices exhibit an upward tendency, the variation has been unimportant. For shares in British possessions the market continues to show dullness; the dealings have been more restricted than usual; but, nevertheless, prices are fairly sustained.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

This stock has been firmer during the past week. Yesterday it opened at 39 to 41, and closed at 38 to 40.

BANK MEETINGS &c.

The directors of the Chartered Mercantile Bank of India, London and China, have just declared a dividend of 5 per cent., and a bonus of £1 5s. per share, free of income-tax for the current half-year, payable to the shareholders on the London register, on the 1st January, and to the shareholders on the Bombay register, 15 days after receipt of the outward mail of the 18th December. At a special general meeting of the proprietors of the London Bank of Scotland, the resolution passed at the meeting held on the 4th December, in favour of the Company obtaining legal authority to issue their own notes in Scotland, was confirmed. At a meeting of the London Financial Association it was decided to double the capital by the issue of 20,000 new shares of £50 each. One new share to be given for every old one, at a premium to be fixed by the directors, and the proceeds of which are to form the nucleus of a reserve fund. No further call is proposed to be made upon the old shares at present, but £15 is to be called up on the new shares by instalments. There will then be a paid-up capital of £600,000, which will afford increased facilities for conducting business. The general meeting under the new regulations is to be held early in January, when (the chairman remarked) a full and satisfactory statement will be laid before the shareholders.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The prospectus has just been issued of the Consolidated Discount Company (Limited); the object of the undertaking being the purchase of the old-established business of Messrs. Sandeman and Co., of Abchurch Lane. It is stated that there is no promotion money, and that the terms on which the business has been purchased will, it is believed, enable the directors to offer an immediate and secure dividend of at least 10 per cent. The business of the Company will commence as from the 1st of January, at the old premises. The directorate, which is influential, includes three of the members of Messrs. Sandeman’s firm—viz., Mr. Hugh Fraser Sandeman, Mr. Richard M. Sanderson and Mr. Samuel Baker, who will have the chief conduct of the business. The proposed capital is $1,000,000, in 20,000 shares of £50 each; of which 10,000 shares only are to be issued at present.—The prospectus of the National Provincial Aerated Bread Company (Limited) has also been circulated. The formation of this Company is due to what is described as the “extraordinary success” of the London Aerated Bread Company:—an undertaking which has just declared a dividend at the rate of 12½ per cent. per annum from the earnings of a few bakeries only. The present Company propose to introduce Dr. Daughlish’s system of bread manufacture throughout England and Wales, and the patent rights remaining undisposed of have been purchased on terms considered highly advantageous to the Company. It is further stipulated that the chief portion of the price to be paid is made conditional on the success of the undertaking. In the first instance, bakeries are to be established in Manchester, Liverpool and Birmingham; and the Company also propose to sell licences for the manufacture of the bread in those districts where it does not contemplate carrying on operations itself. The proposed capital is £250,000, in 25,000 shares of £10 each, of which only 10,000 are to be issued in the first instance.—The Contract Corporation Company is another heavy undertaking just issued under very satisfactory auspices. The object of the undertaking is the construction of railway and other works, both at home and abroad, a class of business hitherto exclusively conducted by private contractors. The sub-letting of contracts, which is known to be the source of considerable profit, will form an important element of the business. The capital to be raised is £400,000, in £40,000 shares of £100 each. The first issue is to be 20,000 shares only, with a deposit of £1 on application and £2 on allotment.—The National Volunteer Hotel Company at Wimbledon is another undertaking just brought forward, the object being the construction of a convenient hotel for the accommodation of the numerous visitors to Wimbledon connected with the volunteer movement. A favourable site for the building has already been obtained. The capital proposed to be raised is £120,000, in 12,000 shares of £10 each, with power to increase; 10s. per share to be paid on application and £2 on allotment.—The Llanrhidian Bituminous Colliery Company is another scheme for public approbation, the object being the obtaining of a valuable mineral property in the parish of Llanrhidian, Glamorganshire, which it is calculated can be worked profitably, and a dividend of 7½ per cent. is guaranteed for the first year. The capital required is £100,000, in 20,000 shares of £5 each; 10s. to be paid on application and £—on allotment.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

The American produce markets, in common with most others, show continued inactivity, but not in a greater degree than is usual at the close of the year, and in nearly every department a healthy tone prevails. There is some falling off in the clearances for consumption as well as export, but they are still of sufficient magnitude to indicate favourably of the general progress of trade. The cotton market has been dull during the past week, but without sensible depression. Transactions in American provisions have been confined to the finer qualities of all the various descriptions, and have not in any case altered current quotations. The grain trade is about as quiet as it very well can be, and where sales are pressed, rates are again 1s. lower for wheat, but there is no general disposition to force off supplies. Barrel flour has not arrived in any quantity, and is relatively firm. The advanced quotations of petroleum from New York, and the imposition of the new export duty by the Washington Government, have affected our market for this article. Refined has risen 1d. to 2d. per gallon—2s. to 2s. 1d. being the present quotation. All the crude offering at £16 10s. was readily cleared off, and £17 10 is now demanded. The depression in linseed oil is still unrelieved, and our quotations are again lowered 10s. per ton, bringing the price down to £34 10s. Rape oil is also cheaper. Fish oils remain without essential changes. French turpentine gave way 2s. in the early part of the week, but has again recovered to 70s. at the close. The advance in petroleum has caused a firmer market for tallow, but business is not active. Jute is less offered, and some small purchases are reported at an advance of 10s. per ton from the late lowest point. Sugar remains at the decline noticed in our last, but is rather firm. In drugs and dyes, salteries there has been very little movement to affect quotations, which generally have a steady tendency. Arsenic, however, is lower. Scotch pig iron has further advanced to £3 6s. 6d. per ton, and spelter to £19 2s. 6d. Lead is firm at £20 15s. to £21 15s. per ton.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSION.

Advices from Bradford announce the suspension of Mr. Jowett, wool-spinner, with liabilities estimated at between £80,000 to £100,000. The books have been placed in the hands of a local accountant, and competent valuers are engaged in valuing the machinery, stock, &c. The creditors will be called together as speedily as possible.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Dec. 23.

Our cotton market has assumed a very quiet appearance during the last few days, as is generally the case as the close of the year approaches. The dealings have been quite of a retail character, buyers have operated very cautiously, and though there has not been any general pressure to sell, there has been sufficient offering to make prices irregular and lower. American descriptions have given way  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to  $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb. In Egyptian prices have been very irregular, at a decline of  $\frac{3}{4}$ d. to 1d. per lb. There has been but little inquiry for Brazil, and quotations must be reduced from  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to  $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb. The better qualities of Surats have given way about  $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to  $\frac{3}{4}$ d. per lb., whilst the middling and lower descriptions are down fully 1d. per lb. Madras, Bengal, Scinde and China descriptions exhibit about a similar decline. The sales this week have been but moderate, the total being 20,000 bales, of which 8,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year, down to the present time, have been 2,553,820 bales, and to the corresponding period last year they were 2,667,550 bales. There have been imported this year altogether, 1,592,134 bales, and to the same period in 1862, 1,155,626 bales. This year there have been exported 458,101 bales, and to the same time last year, 415,049 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 1,287,300 bales; to the like period in 1862, 1,148,300 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 747,780 bales, and to the corresponding date in 1862, 1,069,000 bales. At the present time the computed stocks are 236,070 bales. At the same last year they were 231,170 bales. The following resolutions were passed at a recent meeting of the Cotton Broker's Association held here. "It was resolved first: That the bill of a bank of limited liability drawn upon the head office, or any of its branches, is not a proper payment for cotton; and, secondly, that on all limited Bank paper presented for the payment of cotton, at least two approved names, in addition to that of the Bank must appear." The latest quotations were Middling Orleans, 27d.; Mobile, 26 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; Upland, 26 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.; estimated fair Egyptian, 27 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 27 $\frac{3}{4}$ d.; fine Dhollerah, 22 $\frac{1}{2}$ d. to 22 $\frac{3}{4}$ d., and Sarats, 11d. to 25 $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

MANCHESTER, December 22.

We have no improvement to report in our yarn and cloth market since this day week, but rather the opposite, and prices are tending downwards from day to day, producing a positive action on the part of spinners and manufacturers in closing their establishments.

The very favourable weekly return published by the Bank of England on Friday last has tended very little to check the idea that we are to see a still more stringent money market shortly. Letters to hand to-day from Bombay, dated 28th November, report that during the previous fortnight money had been fearfully scarce, and the banks had been borrowing at 15 per cent. in the Bazaar, while the public could not get money under 25 to 30 per cent. on security of Government paper, and the consequence was no sales could be made of our staple goods.

Further telegraphic advices from India are now past due, and are anxiously looked for by both buyers and sellers.

Cloth agents are complaining of the accumulation of stocks in their hands, and are agreed that unless some improvement takes place in demand soon, there will have to be a more general resort to short time.

There has been a very general discussion to-day as to the probable surplus stock of cotton in Liverpool on the 1st of January next after stock-taking; estimates here vary from 50,000 to 120,000 bales more than the brokers' circulars would lead one to suppose.

Wm. H. TRAPMAN, Esq.,

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded, or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessities of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no ragged save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathize with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circular; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COURTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

NOTES ON EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

AMERICA.

THE war news is not very full or explicit, but no one can read it and the amnesty at the same sitting with a grave face. Such a grotesque spectacle was never before presented for the amusement of mankind.

We do not wonder that when the news reached Washington and New York that Longstreet had turned upon and beaten the column in command of General Sheridan, it was disbelieved, although "traced to several usually reliable sources." But two days later the rumour was confirmed, and there was no longer any doubt that on the 14th inst. General Longstreet had attacked the Federals under the command of General Shackleford, not General Sheridan, and driven them back half a mile. Next we hear that General Longstreet is still fighting, and Union citizens were so doubtful of the result that they were leaving Knoxville. At the latest advices the Federals were falling back in East Tennessee. Nor is this the only Confederate success reported from that quarter. On the very day that Mr. Lincoln's amnesty proclamation was read in Congress, the Richmond Enquirer published a despatch which announced that General Giltner had routed a Federal corps at Maynardville, Tennessee, and captured a number of prisoners. It appears also that the Federals have abandoned Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge, and all the country between that place and Ringgold. It is not for us to speculate upon the issue of pending events, but it does occur to us that Mr. Lincoln was premature in calling upon his loyal people to return thanks for Longstreet's withdrawal from Knoxville.

From the Army of the Potomac we have intelligence that its winter-quarters are comfortable, and that great numbers of the officers and men of that distinguished body have obtained leave of absence. The only item of interest is an official letter written by General Meade just before his last movement "on to Richmond." He says:—

I am in receipt of many letters, some from persons in high position, telling me I had better have my army destroyed and the country filled up with the dead bodies of the soldiers than remain inactive. While I do not suffer myself to be influenced by such communications, I am, and have been most anxious to effect something, but am determined at every hazard not to attempt anything unless my judgment indicates a probability of accomplishing some object commensurate with the destruction of life necessarily involved. I would rather a thousand times be relieved, charged with tardiness or incompetence, than have my conscience burdened with a wanton slaughter of brave men, or with having jeopardized the great cause by doing what I thought was wrong.

General Meade sacrificed his judgment and conscience for the sake of the political exigencies of his employers, advanced, lost a number of men, and retreated. Though the Army of the Potomac is in winter-quarters the Confederates will not allow it to rest upon its laurels, but continually harass the outposts. The main army of the potentate who has just issued a decree of amnesty is encamped round about his capital for its protection, and is worried by the enemy.

Charleston was heavily bombarded on the 10th inst., but the Federal batteries were soon silenced by the Confederates. From day to day a little Greek fire is thrown into the city, but the damage it does is trifling. A fire occurred in Fort Sumter which caused the explosion of some ammunition and the deaths of ten men. Advices from Charleston announce the arrival of the officers and crew of the Federal gunboat Perry, which was captured at Merville Inlet.

General Butler has informed his Government that a portion of his force, under General Wistar, captured 80 Confederates at Charles City cross-roads, on the James River. He says, "The 139th New York infantry, in fifty-four hours, marched sixty-one miles, mostly in a severe storm, moving day and night, and walking their shoes off, which should be made good by the Government." We suspect the shoe-leather supplied by loyal contractors is not of the best quality.

General Washburn has captured Fort Esperanza, on Matagorda Island, Texas. The Confederates had previously abandoned the place, after spiking the guns and blowing up the magazine. The Federals, it must be admitted, are very successful in their military operations when they meet with no resistance. We have another proof of this in the capture of Elizabeth City, North Carolina, a small and undefended town.

In Kentucky, a Confederate force, under Captain Everett, has made a raid upon Mount Stirling, and captured a large number of horses and $100,000 in greenbacks.

The telegraphic summary, per Etna, contains an item of much interest to all maritime Powers. It says, "The official reports of the commanders of the monitors during Dupont's attack upon Charleston, now published for the first time, show that all the monitors received severe damage, and if the attack had been continued they would have been disabled. One commander says he was disappointed beyond measure at the experiment of monitors overcoming strong forts, and considers it a fair trial." This will explain the inactivity of Admiral Dahlgren, and will make the Federals less sanguine about the capture of Charleston.

The Confederate Senate has, on the recommendation of the President, passed a bill prohibiting the employment of substitutes in the army. This measure will increase the effective force of the Confederacy, but it is still more important as an evidence of the spirit which animates the people.

Mr. Foote, of Tennessee, has made a violent speech in the House of Representatives, in which he blamed President Davis for the loss of Vicksburg and the reverses in East Tennessee. Mr. Foote is a good patriot, though somewhat lacking judgment and discretion; but he is a member of the free legislature of a free people, and no one in the South will question his right to find fault with the conduct of the Executive.

The Message of Governor Letcher to the Virginia Legislature is worthy of the chief officer of the Old Dominion. The Governor thinks that the struggle may last for a long time, and that the Confederates will have to make great sacrifices, but he is confident "that the end will be liberty, independence, and the establishment of free government." He objects to exemptions from military service, and suggests that no man capable of taking the field should occupy a post that could be filled by the aged or the wounded. He has always been opposed to the system of substitutes, but holds that such contracts having been entered into for three years, they cannot be violated. In conclusion, he pays a tribute to the patriotism displayed by Virginia, and says "Thanks to the Ruler of the Universe for His blessings conferred upon us with such liberality, for the successes which have attended our arms, for the unity and harmony of our people, and for the spirit and courage with which He has nerved them for this contest."

The North Carolina Legislature assembled on the 24th November. Governor Vance, in his Message, asks for authority to buy corn, flour, and bacon as a provision for the poor, adding, "Still I see no cause for an alarm, and my last year's experience has encouraged me to believe that all can be fed from our own resources by proper prudence and economy." He announces that the blockade-running has been a complete success, and that the troops are well provided for. On this head he observes:—

With what we have imported and the purchase in our home markets, I think I can safely say that the North Carolina troops will be comfortably clothed to January, 1865—should God in His Providence so long see fit to afflict us with a continuance of the war—except shoes and blankets. Neither the ordnance nor quarter-master's departments placed too much reliance on foreign importation, but every effort has been made to stimulate home production. Both the quality and quantity of arms and munitions manufactured have been improved in the past twelve months.

Governor Vance, referring to the Northern rumours of reconstruction, says, "our people will not crucify afresh their own sons, slain in their behalf, or put their gallant shades to open shame, by stopping short of full and complete national independence."

Resolutions have been introduced in the North Carolina Legislature in which the Confederate army is complimented for its gallantry and heroism, and urged to continue faithful in the discharge of its duty by vigorously prosecuting the war until peace can be re-established upon the basis of separation from the Federal States.

The Report of the Confederate Secretary of the Treasury is commented on in our leader columns. The receipts into the Treasury from all sources from January 1 to September 30, 1863, were, in round numbers, $600,000,000, of which $400,000,000 was raised by issuing treasury notes; $175,000,000 from loans of various kinds; $4,000,000 have been raised by a war tax; sequestration has yielded nearly $2,060,000; customs, $1,000,000; export duty on cotton, $8,000; the patent fund, $10,000. The expenditures have reached within $17,000,000 of the receipts, and $375,000,000 have been spent for the war. The entire debt of the Confederate States is nearly $1,000,000,000, of which $800,000,000 are treasury notes, and $700,000,000 of these notes are in circulation. Mr. Memminger says that the amount needed to carry on the Confederacy to the 30th of June, 1864, is $475,000,000, beside the amount of the undrawn appropriations of the last Congress, which reaches $476,000,000. And if the estimates are extended so as to include the entire year of 1864, the amount will reach $1,427,000,000. Mr. Memminger proposes to raise a loan of $500,000,000, the interest to be paid in specie. The present treasury notes in circulation are to be withdrawn, and a new issue to be made of $200,000,000.

The Reports of Mr. Stanton and of Mr. Welles are documents that deserve more than a cursory perusal; They are a singular commentary on the presidential announcement of the rebellion being nearly crushed. Mr. Stanton states that 50,000 men have been obtained under the conscription; but what addition is this to the army compared to the number of recruits that the Northern Government requires, if it is to make good the deficiency in its ranks caused by the carnage of the field, by diseases, by the hardships of campaigning, desertions, and, above all, by the expiration of the terms of service of those who are now in the field? Conscription was resorted to because volunteering had failed, and now the conscription has proved abortive: it is not likely that the volunteer system will be more successful than formerly. Mr. Stanton feels this, and cannot help giving expression to it in his Report; for though to please his master and his master's friends he asserts a conviction that in another year the war will be over, he admits that the fighting material of the North is becoming rapidly exhausted by pointing to the negro as a recourse in the emergency. He advises the enlistment of negro troops, and recommends that they should have the same pay as white soldiers. If they get the same pay so much the better for the camp followers, who will be sure to fleece them; but the recommendation to enlist negro troops is rather odd. Does not Mr. Stanton know that no efforts have been spared to enlist negro troops, and that wherever it has been possible there has been placed a wall of coloured men, behind which the Yankees have skulked?

Mr. Welles writes much such a Report as an undignified, bragging, and Yankeeised Englishman might have penned after the culminating victory of Trafalgar. He states that 1,039 blockade-runners, of all sorts, have been captured, but he omits to mention the tonnage of most of these prizes; and for the information of the British public, we beg to notify that if a Federal cruiser comes across a deserted fishing-smack it is forthwith set down as a prize. Mr. Welles must be of a singularly sanguine disposition, for he says that, under his auspices, the navy of the United States has achieved great and new historical renown. Where, and on what occasion? Does he refer to the battle in Hampton Roads, when the daring achievements of the Merrimac scared the Federal fleet and revolutionised the system of naval warfare? Was he thinking of Charleston, where the iron-clads were once driven off, and have lately been for months kept at bay? Does he refer to those much-vaunted iron-clads—the Weehawken, for example—that have proved unseaworthy? Does he refer to the services of the gun-boats that have, on more than one occasion proved an asylum to beaten Federal armies? Historical renown! Yes; the only renown acquired by the United States navy in the war is its ingenuity in keeping out of the reach of the five Confederate cruisers that have played such havoc with the Federal mercantile marine.

The Report of the Federal Secretary of the Interior announces the complete failure of the African Colonisation project. This, however, will not be a serious annoyance to the Government, for philanthropic New England has devised a far more inexpensive way of getting rid of the hated race. The males are taken into the army, where they are shot down by the enemy, or die of camp diseases, at a rate that would horrify any other people than the New Englanders, and the negro women and children are left to die from hunger and destitution.

The quantity of tobacco stored in Richmond on account of the French Government, the exportation of which through the blockade has just been conceded by the Federal Government, is from six to seven thousand hogsheads of from 1,200 to 1,800 lbs. troy-weight, and worth, at the prices before the war, about 17,000,000 francs.

The Confederate authorities have refused to receive any more supplies from the North for the Federal prisoners in Richmond. One reason assigned for this is that the Northern press has intimated that the packages were not faithfully delivered; another reason is the insolent conduct of the Federal officers confined in the Libby Prison. They got up a dinner, announced a very grand bill of fare, and offered the inhabitants of the city the fragments of the feast.

The reported mortality amongst the Yankee prisoners in Richmond is contradicted by the Richmond Examiner, which states that since the 1st of January only 671 had died out of 30,000, or less than 3 per cent. The stories of ill-treatment and great mortality arose from the Confederate authorities kindly allowing some prisoners who appeared to be consumptive to return to their homes. Whilst on this subject, we may mention that the Confederate surgeons who have lately come from the North give a melancholy account of the treatment of Southern prisoners.

The Atlanta Register gives an account of Federal atrocities in East Tennessee. It says, "By a special order of Nero Burnside, every rail was to be burned from around the splendid farm of Mr. Lenoir, and he has been rendered penniless. Mrs. Lenoir, an aged lady of seventy-three winters, was murdered because she asked a Yankee to leave enough cabbage-heads to make seed the ensuing season. Mr. and Mrs. Walker, bending under old age, of near fourscore, were driven from their homes and everything destroyed. Not an item left in the way of clothing, ware, or subsistence, because of their Southern principles. These are only a few of the outrages committed by the hated foe. The conduct of the officers in Knoxville was revolting to civilisation; such as walking arm in arm with the negro wenches of Colonel Mettrell and others."

There have been rumours in Washington of Southern propositions for peace, which of course turned out to be unfounded. The Message of Governor Vance will, we think for some time put an end to all canards about North Carolina wishing to return to the Union.

In the Federal Senate, Senator Lane has introduced a bill prohibiting the traffic in gold, silver, or exchange for speculative purposes, under the penalty of a fine of not less than $1,000 nor more than $10,000, and imprisonment for not less than one month nor longer than one year. The bill was referred to the finance committee.

In the House of Representatives Mr. Fernando Wood submitted a resolution requesting the President to appoint two commissioners to negotiate with the authorities at Richmond with the view of terminating the war, and restoring the Union upon the terms of equity, fraternity, and equality, under the Constitution. The resolution was tabled by a vote of ninety-eight against fifty-nine. The Republicans do not desire peace on the basis of the restoration of the Union, and if they did, their wishes would be disappointed. The Democrats waste their strength and time in advocating such an impossible policy. Yet it seems they are sincerely desirous of peace even on the basis of separation, for sixty-four of the party voted against a resolution that the war should be protracted so long as the Confederates are found in arms. But friends who fear to act are no better than enemies.

Thanks to the vigilance of the British officials, the Chesapeake has been recaptured at Nova Scotia. No resistance was offered by the crew, all of whom, excepting three, escaped to the shore. The authorities in Nova Scotia had forbidden the furnishing of coals to the Chesapeake by the people of that Province; they had ordered her detention wherever she appeared, and gave the information to the Federals which led to her capture.

It appears that the English authorities are so fully engaged in protecting the Federals against any movements of the Confederates that they have no time to look after British interests, for if they were not, most assuredly the merchant vessels trading to Matamoras would not be left at the mercy of Yankee cruisers. Even Earl Russell will find it difficult to defend the conduct of his friends in respect to the seizure of the bark Science. According to the written statement of the captain to the owner, the circumstances are these. The Science had been lying at Matamoras for twelve weeks, during which time she had discharged her outward cargo and had taken on board a cargo of cotton and copper for the home voyage. On the 3rd of October a Federal officer from the gun-boat Virginia boarded the Science, examined her papers and then left. At that date the outward cargo was half discharged, and what remained was duly inspected by the Federal officer. A month later, that is to say on the 5th of November, the Captain of the Virginia boarded the Science, examined all her papers, and told the commander "that he should detain the vessel" for the most extraordinary reason ever put forth to justify such an act. It was not pretended that the Science was then engaged in an unlawful voyage; it was not pretended that the Science had at any time been engaged in an unlawful voyage—that is, that she had attempted to evade the blockade. The case was too clear for any such pretext, for the Science had sailed from a neutral port to a neutral port, discharged her cargo, and, with a cargo of cotton, was preparing to return to a British port. Therefore, the Federal captain seized the ship "for having brought contraband of war." We can only say that if this is submitted to, the commercial marine of this country is in considerable jeopardy—that is to say, those vessels that have at any time carried to a neutral port what Mr. Lincoln's Government is pleased to designate contraband of war, such, for example, as quinine, or any other drug. The object of this proceeding is to stop the trade with Matamoras, and this object will be attained if the only remedy for such a flagrant breach of law is an award of damages after many months' detention. The commander of the Science writes, "the absence of an English man-of-war enables the Yankees to annoy the English or other neutral vessels as much as they please, as the trade to Matamoras is an eye-sore to them, and they want to make it so that English and other neutral vessels will not go there to run the risk of annoyance similar to what we had to contend with."

The New York Herald proposes General Grant for next President, observing, "The present Administration is engineering for another term of office; but Mr. Lincoln, his Cabinet, his last Congress, his present Congress, so far, and the clique of fanatical politicians by which Cabinet and Congress have been and are controlled, have signally failed to meet the just and reasonable expectations of the country. In a word, the present Administration has proved a deplorable failure. . . . Let the independent masses of the people, who have had enough of their despicable managing party politicians, and their horrible, bloody, and destructive work, proceed at once to bring out General Grant as their presidential candidate." Among other recommendations of General Grant it is urged that he will not only restore the Union, but also drive the French out of Mexico and "punish" England.

Some of the Federal States have been making calculations as to the proportion of their share of the debt of the Union, and the property they have to meet it. Mr. Dawes, the Abolition member of Congress for Massachusetts, predicted that the public debt would be $3,000,000,000. Mr. Chase says that it will be $2,200,000,000 in 1865; but as we may rely on it that the Federal Secretary is too good a patriot to make the worst of his case, and as balance-sheets are always a little worse than they seem to be, and for other good and substantial reasons, we think the estimate of Mr. Dawes is likely to prove correct. An Iowa newspaper, taking it for a basis, thus figures out the quota of that State and its present financial condition:—

State of Iowa to United States Creditors:—Dr.
To her quota of war debt .. ..	$142,850,000
" share interest on debt .. ..	8,520,000
" annual pensions .. ..	1,000,000
" revenue tax and debt .. ..	2,000,000
" corporation indebtedness .. ..	20,000,000
Total .. ..	$174,370,000

By what the United States census-takers found all her property to be worth in 1860 $205,166,983

Balance in favour of State over United States indebtedness .. .. $30,796,983

Pennsylvania has also been engaged in a like calculation. The Philadelphia Mercury thus states the account:—

Pennsylvania:—Dr.
To her share of the national debt .. ..	$500,000,000
To principal, at 6 per cent, of her share of pension list .. ..	67,000,000
To her own State debt .. ..	38,000,000
	$605,000,000
By her own valuation of her own property ..	$596,000,000
Balance against the State .. ..	$9,000,000

"So that if Pennsylvania," says the Mercury, in conclusion, "were put up at auction to-morrow, and sold for the full sum at which her own Revenue Board has valued her, she could not meet her obligations by $9,000,000. That is, her debt is $9,000,000 more than she is worth." Under these circumstances, we rather think that Pennsylvania and Iowa will decline to pay; and, indeed, if the war goes on, repudiation may not be a matter of choice.

Gold has advanced in New York; at the latest date it was quoted at 52 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

The last day of December rouses us to a consideration of the events that have crowded themselves into the short space of the departing year. Almost without an effort the past of that period rises before us, the present refuses to be denied our attention and the future our anxiety. The year 1863 has not been an eventful and therefore has been a prosperous year for England, for times replete with tranquillity and destitute of stirring incident are those in which the wealth and happiness of the people have progressed without interruption.

In the early spring the cloud which since the death of the Prince Consort had hung over the Court was broken if not entirely dispersed by the auspicious marriage of the Prince of Wales with the Princess Alexandra of Denmark. No one will easily forget the manner in which the English people displayed their unbounded devotion to the Royal Family on that occasion. Such a reception as was accorded by the inhabitants of the metropolis and the Corporation of London to the future King and Queen of England has been denied to the greatest of kings and the most fortunate of warriors. Throughout the boroughs and the rural districts the festivities were worthy of the event. A brilliant London season followed, marred to some extent it is true by the absence of Her Majesty from all scenes of enjoyment—an absence which everyone hopes will not be prolonged into the coming season. Under these auspices the trade of the metropolis and of other towns in the manufacture of all articles of luxury and splendour received a great impulse, and recovered to some extent the paralysing effects of the death of the Prince Consort.

In the political world, the utmost stagnation has prevailed. The session of Parliament was not marked by any struggles for power, and the Ministry, weak and almost disorganised, was yet able to hold its ground through the forbearance of the Conservative party. The tact and discretion of Lord Palmerston prevented any attempt at legislative novelties calculated to raise an issue, while Mr. Gladstone contented himself with a budget void of empirical efforts, and was even cautious enough to remove from it the few objectionable features which seemed to invite opposition. The strength and compactness of the Conservative party, and their loyal abstinence from faction or any greed of office, gained the applause of their supporters and the reluctant approbation of their adversaries; while a tangible proof of the direction of public opinion was given in the great accession to the numbers of that party through the success of Conservative candidates at the various elections held throughout the year. The weakness of the Government has been on the increase during the recess, and the miserable failure of its foreign policy has destroyed what little favour it possessed. It exists, and has existed throughout the year, by the influence and popularity of its chief and the forbearance of its opponents.

The manufacturing and commercial prosperity of the country has, with one striking exception—that of the cotton trade and manufacture—been unprecedentedly good. Till the close of the year the money market had been in a satisfactory condition, and the result was seen in enormous lists of joint-stock companies, of projects of enterprise, and of railway undertakings. The railway bills which will come before the committees of next session recall the days of the railway mania, while the operations of the companies are no longer confined to the country, but are, as far as regards expense and engineering efforts, mainly directed to the improvement of communications in the metropolis and its suburbs. The money market has within the last week shown signs of much greater ease. The high rate of discount seemed to be but a natural result of the exigencies of a superfluity of joint-stock companies, of the speculation in cotton, and the exportation of the precious metals to Egypt in exchange for cotton. In its combination of quantity and quality the harvest was beyond all precedent, but the advantages of abundance have been entirely with the consumer. Within the memory of men living, wheat, its quality being considered, never has been so cheap, and consequently, though other interests have benefited largely, the farmers have not found in the present yield that return which they had fondly hoped would have recompensed them for the disasters of 1860 and 1861. Indeed, if the cotton interest be excepted, we believe that no class of traders have suffered such a lack of profits as the farmers during the last three or four years. At the same time it is to be understood that considerable gains have been put to the credit of the breeders and graziers of stock, and a small section, in point of fact, compared with the vast numbers of corn-growing farmers.

In the cotton districts there has been no great revival of work, and no prospect whatever of activity. The pauperism has decreased during the summer, but as winter has approached, even in the mildest of forms, the favourable character of affairs has turned. The Government works are not yet in operation, but on the other hand, no test has yet been witnessed of the probable effect of a severe winter. It is necessary, however, to remember first, that the masters, while undoubtedly sorely pressed by the cotton famine, had in many cases held large stocks of made goods at the commencement of the American war, that vast quantities of raw material were also in store, and that the prices both of goods and material have been enormously enhanced; second, that in spite of the blockade 130,000 bales of American cotton have arrived in Liverpool during the war; third, that the price of wheat has been unprecedentedly low. All these influences have helped Lancashire in its distress to a considerable extent, but there is no reason whatever to suppose that any real recovery will take place till the Southern States resume their supply of cotton, even the most sanguine persons now admitting that all the efforts of the Cotton Supply Association will never supplement the deficiency. The revenue of the country has proved itself highly elastic, and in no former year have the middle classes spent such large sums of money in travelling and amusements.

The action of the Government in its relations towards the contending parties in America has caused much excitement in the country, and the seizure of the Alexandra and the steam-rans has at once afforded a subject of political agitation, a theme for the writers on international law, and a task for the law courts. The sympathy of the people for the Southern States has taken a more decided character since the declaration of Earl Russell at Blairgowrie. In the principal towns of the north of England large majorities have declared for the Confederacy, and the tone of the English press has been eminently favourably towards the South.

The English army has had scope for its activity to a certain extent in an unfortunate war in New Zealand with the native tribes, and no decisive operations calculated to end the war have as yet distinguished the campaign. The war is, perhaps, the inevitable result of the collision of the white and dark races, but it is not the less regrettable. Some fighting also has occurred on the north-west frontier of the Indian empire. The navy has been engaged in operations against one of the Daimios in Japan, and the destruction of the town of Kagosima has been the lamentable result of an unfortunate quarrel. With these exceptions the country has been at peace with all the world. The Government, however, has been actively engaged in launching a fleet of magnificent iron-clad ships. The cost of these has been enormous, but their success in point of speed and power seems indubitable. Considerable progress also has been made in the vast fortifications around Portsmouth.

On Thursday last Earl Russell was elected Lord Rector of Aberdeen University. The noble lord obtained 231 votes, while his adversary, Mr. E. Grant Duff, M.P., polled 133 votes. The installation will take place in April next.

The Lords of the Admiralty are making the most searching investigation into all the circumstances attending the equipment and departure from the Nore of the Confederate ship Rappahannock, formerly the Victor. The correspondence is of course carried on with secrecy, but certain circumstances have come to light. It seems that the ship was purchased by a London firm, and that several of the Government mechanics, with the cognisance of certain of the officials, were allowed to be employed in the equipment, and that several of the men connected with the engineer department went with the ship from Sheerness to Calais. All these, together with those concerned in the equipment, have been dismissed from the dockyard. A rumour is also current that two of the officials holding responsible office will be called on to resign their appointments. Precautions have been taken to prevent a similar use being made of other ships sold out of the service.

Mr. Lindsay, M.P., has addressed a letter to the Times in reference to the trial in the action against the underwriters of the steamship Harbinger. The leading points in the case were given in these columns last week. Mr. Lindsay refers to the evidence and to the language of the Chief Justice as proving that, inasmuch as Mr. Lindsay's share in the vessel was of the value of more than £6,000 and his insurance only £2,700, he was more interested in the safety of her than any twenty underwriters put together, that the person who bought the hull for £200 did not attempt to take the ship to a neighbouring port for repairs, as the Times argued that it was the duty of the master to have done, and that the best judges of the course to be adopted were the persons on the spot, conversant with the character of the bay and the dangers of navigation on that coast. Mr. Lindsay also observes that the nature of the compromise effected was wrongly stated (an error into which we also inadvertently fell), and that, in fact, the underwriters eventually agreed to pay £4,500 beyond the sum paid into court. Mr. Lindsay also points to the fact that the "leading" underwriters, to the number of 27, settled the claim without dispute, and therefore that the course pursued by the remainder was contrary to custom, and calculated to inspire distrust in men's minds of those persons who adopted such a course. He further shows that on the first trial in February, 1862, the verdict was for him on all points, and that now, after four years' litigation, the verdict has been only modified so far as to declare that communication ought to have been made to the underwriters before abandonment. It really seems to us that Mr. Lindsay has good ground for complaint. Insurers and underwriters must be guided by the principles of good faith and mutual confidence. Such lawsuits as these would quickly annihilate the whole system of insurance. It is not denied that cases occur which demand very strict investigation; but where the firm of shipowners stands high for wealth and respectability, and where, on the face of the transaction, the owners must be losers by the loss, it is hard to conceive good reason for litigation. Certainly, in this case, there were points of law, the solution of which by a series of appeals at an enormous cost would have been profitable to the bar and interesting to the text-writers, but we have yet to learn that this is an object satisfactory to litigants. Men of business, in fact, insure in order that when the loss occurs they may be paid, not harassed by expensive lawsuits.

One of our great literary men has gone from amongst us. The author of "Vanity Fair" died on Thursday last. His death was sudden and unexpected. It was only a few days since that we saw him looking hale, hearty, and happy. Now his name is matter of history. Mr. Thackeray was born in Calcutta in 1811. He was educated at the Charter-house, and loved always to recall his schoolboy reminiscences in his writings. On leaving school he went up to Cambridge, where his taste for painting and etching rather interfered with his dryer studies. He never took his degree; but to cultivate his taste for art went to the Continent, and enjoyed for some years the society of artists at Rome, Paris, and other places. By his keen observation, when abroad, of men and their manners, he laid up for himself a store of treasures, from which he afterwards most felicitously drew. It was not till after his return that he changed his pencil for his pen, making his début with the latter in Fraser with moderate success. He was one of the first promoters and contributors to Punch. On being called to the bar a few years afterwards, he did not forsake literature for law. Still, real success, as a popular writer and novelist, could scarcely be called his till the publication by him, at the age of thirty-five, of "Vanity Fair." By it his fame was at once made, and he took his place in the foremost ranks of our novelists. It would be impossible to compare or even touch upon the respective merits of his principal works. Whether the preference be given in story or style to "Vanity Fair," "Esmond," "The Newcomes," "The Virginians," or "Pendennis," each and all contain matter of deep interest and sound instruction; wholesome moral lessons and useful domestic hints pervade them all; he abhorred the characteristic snobism of the age, and vented his righteous rage against it with playful severity. We each saw ourselves quizzed and portrayed in some character or other; our little peccadilloes and weaknesses truthfully explored. Still we could not be angry; we were in excellent company. With equal success he broke lances with the haughty knight and humble squire, with the exclusiveness of a Mayfair dowager and the offensive presumption of a Pentonville grocer. Everything, however, was written in right good humour, and one of his greatest sorrows was that people ever thought him a cynic. To America, his works ought especially to be dear. Many can recall the stories by visiting the scenes of the "Virginians" and "Esmond." In general society he was quiet and observant, whilst in the more genial company of a few of his old friends, his wit was brilliant. A high tone of morality distinguished him all through life. In fact, to sum up Mr. Thackeray's private character, we can only repeat the words of his old college friends, that "a better fellow or wiser friend than William Thackeray never lived."

Inasmuch as Christmas-day fell this year on a Friday, it was generally agreed that Saturday should be kept as a holiday to an extent exceeding even the glorious associations of "Boxing-day." Throughout the morning the principal shops in London were shut, the Stock Exchange suspended business entirely, and the Bank of England, the Government offices, and the great private houses did as little as possible in the way of work. The principal attraction during the day was the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, which to its ordinary beauties added the splendour of a gigantic Christmas tree, banners, decorations, gorgeous illuminations, shadow pantomimes, dances, gymnastics, ballets, and other festivities. The crowd was drawn from that class which in England knows how to keep holiday in a jovial but orderly style. The number of visitors reached the figure of 43,741. In the evening the theatres were of course crammed in the orthodox style, and the "gods" pelted the "pit" with the proper quantity of "chaff" and orange-peel. The pantomimes were good as ever, the pen of Mr. H. J. Byron having shown undiminished skill at Covent Garden, in a new version of "St. George and the Dragon," at the Adelphi in a fairy tale entitled "Fortunio and his Seven Magic Men," at the Strand in a piece called "Orpheus and Eurydice," and also at St. James's in the "Sensation of the past Season." Mr. E. L. Blanchard contributed a piece called "Harlequin Sinbad the Sailor" to the entertainment at Drury Lane, from time immemorial the real abode of the great Christmas pantomime. The piece turned on the discovery of the Nile, and was immensely successful. The Princess Theatre, perhaps, carried off the palm in the "Christmas pieces," with a play called "Harlequin Little Tom Tucker," which connects in the most elaborate manner in one system of relationship, all the personages who have from all time figured in the nursery rhymes and stories of England. At the Haymarket Mr. Sothorn reappeared in Lord Dundreary, which play, with certain novelties in dialogue and construction, met with all its ancient favour. We ought not to omit, perhaps, the mention of the Polytechnic, where Mr. Pepper not only "draws" with his renowned "Ghost," but gives a valuable lesson on "Burning to Death and Saving from Death," exhibiting a lay figure of a young lady which succumbs to the flames in spite of wet blankets, and a live lady who defies the fire in a muslin dress dipped in a non-combustible composition.

We gave, a fortnight since, an account of the remarkable sale of Lord Stamford's race-horses, and informed our readers that seventeen of the best and most highly-priced animals had found their way back into his lordship's hands. It will be remembered that the horses were put up for sale "without reserve," and that condition, coupled with the names of the purchasers, induced us to suppose that the sales were bond fide, and that Lord Stamford had simply bought back the animals from the purchasers, exactly as any third party in the ordinary course of dealing might have done. It is now stated that Mr. R. C. Naylor has written to Messrs. Tattersall, claiming of them the yearling filly Sloth, for which he had been outbid by Mr. Ten Broeck; that Messrs. Tattersall forwarded the letter to Lord Stamford, and that the filly has been given up to Mr. Naylor. Shortly afterwards Messrs. Tattersall received a demand from Lord St. Vincent's solicitors for the two horses Cambuscan and Archimedes, at the respective prices of 4,900 and 2,900 guineas, the sums bidden by Edwin Parr, who acted for Lord St. Vincent, and was the last bond fide bidder. The demand was accompanied by a notice that, unless the horses in question were delivered up within four days, legal proceedings would be taken. What course Lord Stamford has pursued in answer to this demand we know not, but we are sure that on the above facts no comment is necessary.

However, events have taken a fresh turn, for Captain White, who made the highest bid for Cambuscan, came forward last week and claimed the horse, and tendered to Messrs. Tattersall the price. A meeting of the solicitors for the parties was thereupon held, at which Captain White indignantly repudiated the idea that he was not a bond fide purchaser. Lord St. Vincent then withdrew his claim, and Captain White paid the purchase-money. Both Archimedes and Cambuscan still remain at Mr. Butler's stables. The filly Sloth, which had been claimed by Mr. Naylor, has been relinquished to Lord Stamford.

The Earl of Charlemont died last week. He remembered the first rising of the Irish Volunteers, being at that time himself of the age of five years. He was then, as the heir of the Earl of Charlemont, regarded as the hope of the Irish nation. He knew all the men who have been illustrious in Irish history since 1782, was familiar with Grattan, and told anecdotes of Avonmore, Forbes, and Gardiner. He remembered Burke well. He was elected for the county of Armagh in '97, and was one of the strongest opponents of the Union. Notwithstanding some reluctance, he took his seat in the House of Lords after Union. His last public appearance was at the Dublin exhibition, when he appeared as the senior of the Knights of St. Patrick.

The convict George Victor Townley has been respited until the further commands of Her Majesty.

After a prolonged investigation, a prosecution has been instituted against six of the men who enlisted on board the Federal sloop-of-war Kearsage, at Queens-town, some short time since. The men were brought up on warrant last week before Mr. J. L. Cronin, R.M., at the Queenstown Petty Sessions Court, and a plea in the uniform of the Federal navy. The Crown Solicitor and the Sessional Crown Prosecutor appeared to prosecute on behalf of the Attorney-General. The depositions of Patrick Kennedy and George Patterson were read in the presence of those witnesses. The substance of their evidence has already been given in these columns. It was proved thereby that the prisoners sailed away on board the Kearsage, and gave full particulars of the enlistment. The 4th section of the now famous Foreign Enlistment Act was then read over, and four of the men then stated that they did not pass the doctor at all, or at any rate not till they arrived at Brest. The wages were to be $18 a month, and a dollar and a half for grog. His worship committed the men for trial at the next Cork Assizes, and agreed to take bail in £20 each, with two sureties of £10 each.

THE CONTINENT.

The year which closes this day will be memorable in the history of most nations of the Continent. Poland has again risen in arms against her great oppressor, has again obtained the sympathy and the good wishes of the Western nations, and after having been encouraged by them to protract the contest and make the most appalling sacrifices, has again been abandoned to the tender mercies of the Muscovites. The Slesvig-Holstein question, for ten years a subject for the bad jokes of ignorant writers, has been brought by the death of King Frederick to a crisis, and 1864 leaves to the new year the legacy of a war, of which, as M. Thiers says, the present generation will probably not see the end or the consequences.

General elections have taken place in most continental countries. In France the policy of abstention, so long pursued by the old parties, has been abandoned, and the men who were the glories of the parliamentary régime have sworn fidelity to the Emperor, and thrown in their lot with the new dynasty. In Prussia a new House of Deputies, represents opinions more advanced than those entertained by a House dissolved on account of its opposition to the royal wishes. In Spain the Government obtained an overwhelming majority, thanks to the abstention of the opposition from all part in the elections. In Belgium the Catholic Ultramontane party, after a severe struggle, gained a slight advantage. In Switzerland the elections have left the strength of parties much the same. The Austrian Constitution has received a further development by the election of deputies to the Reichsrath from Transylvania, thus putting that body in possession of its full powers. And the Finnish Diet has met, after a suspension of more than half a century.

A grand effort has been made to establish German Unity. The Emperor of Austria convoked his brother sovereigns to the old imperial city of Frankfurt; but the effort failed, as all efforts to effect the same object will fail, before the jealousy of the two great German Powers.

A noble effort to realise the Utopias of a past age, to settle again upon surer and juster foundations the fundamental pact of Europe, has been made by the Emperor of the French. Thanks to the jealousy of England, the plan failed; and at the moment the possibility of the Congress was destroyed, the death of the King of Denmark provoked a quarrel which only such a Congress could fitly settle. For more than half a century no year has opened upon Europe so gloomily as 1864.

The inference which has been drawn in some quarters from the fact that the Prince de Camille has joined the Legion Etrangère, now under orders for Mexico, is quite unfounded. We are enabled to state authoritatively that the difficulties which hindered the accession of the Archduke Maximilian to the throne of Mexico, have been removed. His Imperial Highness will visit Paris in March, and shortly after set out for his dominions.

The Federal troops are in possession of Holstein and Lauenburg. On Thursday morning, at an early hour, the Danish garrison left Altona, amidst the howlings of the populace, whose courage was brought out by the knowledge that the Germans would be in the town directly, and at eight o'clock a Saxon regiment made its appearance. Slesvig-Holstein colours were immediately suspended from all the windows, and the 1st October was proclaimed Duke of Slesvig-Holstein. The same scene appears to have been repeated in other parts of the Duchy as soon as the Danes retired. The Federal Commissioners have selected Altona as the seat of government, and have addressed proclamations to the people, urging them to order and patience, at the same time that they have winked at the measures taken by the partisans of the Augustenburgs. A large popular assembly was held at Elmsborn, on Sunday, to which delegates from different parts of the Duchy came to proclaim Prince Frederick and receive from Herr Metz, of Darmstadt, one of the spouters of the National Verein, the assurance that the German nation will support Slesvig Holstein with all its power. It seems that the Danish Government not only means to evacuate Holstein, but also those parts of Slesvig which the Holsteiners claim to belong to them, including the important military works at Rendsburg and the tête de pont at Fredericksstadt, situated on the south side of the Eider, and almost absolutely essential to the maintenance of the great line of defence extending across Slesvig, by the Dannevirke, from sea to sea.

These concessions may prevent for the moment any outbreak of war, but they place Denmark in a most unfavourable position as soon as it does begin. They are due to Russian and English influence. It seems that the English Government is anxious to preserve peace at all cost, and, as the only possible chance, will sacrifice Denmark. The English Government has extorted from King Christian a promise to suspend or revoke the new Constitution for Denmark and Slesvig. The Ministry, however, would not have anything to do with a measure which would be so extremely, so dangerously unpopular, and moreover would not produce the slightest advantage. Mr. Hall and his colleagues have therefore resigned, and the King, after several unsuccessful attempts, has commissioned General Oxholm to form a Ministry. There seems to be no probability that he will succeed in doing so, and the feeling which the encouragement given by the Federal Commissioners to the revolutionary proceedings of the partisans of the Pretender has occasioned in Copenhagen will hardly allow the King to persist in his purpose of suspending the Constitution. No measure of that nature would now satisfy Germany and secure the recognition of King Christian's title.

The smaller States, with Bavaria at their head, are pressing on a decision in favour of the title of Prince Frederick. A motion of the Bavarian Minister at the Diet that the Holstein committee should report within a week upon the succession question was carried on Wednesday, the 23rd, by twelve to four votes; Austria and Prussia were in the minority. The committee will certainly report in favour of Prince Frederick, and the Diet will as certainly adopt its report, and give him its assistance to take possession of the lands which it recognises to be his inheritance. The opposition of Austria and Prussia has little weight, because it is not believed to be sincere. If those two Powers had really determined to maintain the Treaty of London, Saxony, Wurtemberg, Bavaria, and the smaller States would not have ventured to reply to their identical notes in the bold language they have employed, and the resolution to bring on the succession question would not have been carried. At first, the two great Powers were really desirous to stay the agitation; they feared that they would be held by Europe to their engagements. The attitude of England has reassured them, and they will seize the favourable opportunity to get money, which they otherwise could not have obtained.

How bent the smaller States are upon pushing matters to an extremity, and how faintly Austria and Prussia resist them, is shown by the fact that Hesse Darmstadt has already proposed that the Diet should immediately occupy Slesvig to ensure the rights of the Confederation, and that Austria and Prussia have suggested as an amendment that Denmark should first be summoned to suspend the new Constitution, and that in case of non-compliance Slesvig should then be occupied. The one proposal is as illegal as the other. Either, if resolved upon, would be a declaration of war against Denmark.

Another sign of the intention of Prussia to go with the stream is the King's answer to the Address of the House of Deputies. His Majesty announces that the decision of the question of the succession in Holstein is reserved, and that the withdrawal of Prussia from the London Treaty would not be feasible without further consideration. Such language shows plainly enough that the King intends to take advantage of the opportunity which the deputies offer him.

The Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha has authorised the Pretender to enlist and equip an army in his territories. We suppose his next step will be to declare the paper money which the Slesvig-Holstein Minister issues legal tender.

The meeting of the German representatives at Frankfurt was not so unanimous as the telegraphic reports—all coming, of course, from good patriots—represented it to be. The proposal to form a central standing committee, to secure the rights of the Duchies and of the Prince Frederick, created a schism, which resulted in the withdrawal of forty South German members, including some of the leaders of the Gross Deutsch party, from the Congress—a fact, upon which one of the other party thus commented, amidst the enthusiastic applause of the majority: "We have to fight the Danes as well in Germany as out of it." And this is the people which pretends to believe in its own unity!

Denmark is not now represented diplomatically at Berlin or Vienna, or indeed anywhere in Germany; and the Austrian and Prussian Ministers, although remaining in Copenhagen, stay there only as private persons. They were accredited only to the late King, and the German Governments have not recognised King Christian—have even refused to receive the ambassador sent to announce his accession to the throne.

Earl Russell has been writing to the Diet, which treats his despatches as so much waste paper. He communicates the Treaty of London, and says that if by over-hasty measures the Confederation should depart from the course thereby marked out most serious complications may ensue. England is, however, ready to take part in a conference. All this is idle talk. There is but one kind of language to which Germany will listen, and if it had been spoken at first all this difficulty would long since have been over.

The bill authorising the loan of 300,000,000 of francs for the reduction of the floating debt has passed the Corps Législatif by 242 to 14 votes. The votes of the minority were not really intended against the bill; they were given in support of an amendment proposed by M. Thiers, limiting the issue of treasury bonds for the year 1864 to the sum of 100,000,000 of francs. His speech in this debate may be taken as M. Thiers' début into the public life of Imperial France. It was a sober speech, with little or no party tendency, and was directed to the support of M. Fould's proposal to reduce the floating debt, and to show the necessity of the adoption of his own amendment if the Chamber wished to prevent the floating debt from speedily resuming its old proportions. He had intended, he said, to give, when he first spoke, some explanations upon the motives which had decided him to reappear in that place and upon the intentions he brought with him, but he reserved that subject until a better opportunity, the debate on the Address. He declared himself a decided partisan of peace, although not of a peace which would be obtained at the cost of the honour and interest of France. He observed, that of all nations France has the greatest influence upon the question of war or peace. The next war, he said, will be no isolated one; it will be a general war, of which the present generation will perhaps see neither the end nor the consequences.

In principle, the Government and the committee of the Chamber to which the bill had been referred did not differ from M. Thiers. The Government had already proposed to limit the issue of bonds for 1865 to 150,000,000. To adopt a limitation in 1864 even to that sum, much more to that proposed by M. Thiers would, the Government commissioners argued, be productive of very great inconvenience, inasmuch as the loan intended to pay off the 300,000,000 of bonds now existing would not be fully realised for perhaps eighteen months. The debate was especially noteworthy for the evidence it gave of a scission in the Opposition: whilst MM. Thiers, Ollivier, and Picard declared themselves decided partisans of peace, MM. Havin and Guérout, the editors of the Sédele and the Opinions Nationales, declared that they would support a war for the liberation of Poland. The feeling of the Chamber was decidedly in favour of peace.

Garibaldi has followed the example of several Sicilian deputies and resigned his seat in the Italian Chamber.

The address in reply to the speech from the throne, has been carried in the Spanish Cortes by 141 to 75 votes.

News from St. Domingo to the 7th, coming from Spanish sources, announces that the insurgents had been everywhere defeated, and that the capture of Azua, which was immediately expected, would terminate the insurrection.

The news from Greece is not satisfactory. The National Guard has been relieved from some of its duties, and has accordingly made a great disturbance, whilst the sittings of the National Assembly continue to be of a turbulent character. It is said that Count Sponeck, the young king's mentor, has been called home, his services being required for Denmark at the present crisis.

The Moldo-Wallachia Chamber has unanimously passed a bill introduced by the Ministry for the sequestration of the property of the monasteries. Bucharest was consequently illuminated. This measure may be for the moment very convenient for the Government and very agreeable to the people; but it will get the Hospodar into hot water with his suzerain and the great Powers.

JAPAN.

A TELEGRAM from Paris says that, according to news received from Alexandria, the parties of the Tycoon and Prince Satsuma had agreed upon the expulsion of foreigners from Japan. Japanese news coming vid Paris must be received with great caution.

THE CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

MANCHESTER, December 30.

It was little more than half a year ago that an unprompted advertisement appeared in the Manchester Guardian, inviting the friends of the Confederate cause to communicate with the advertiser, with a view to forming the nucleus of a Southern Association in this city. The appeal was cordially responded to, a provisional committee, chosen by the promoters, was appointed for three months, offices were opened for the enrolment of members and the transaction of the Society's business, and everything augured well for the success of the purely spontaneous undertaking. Such were the small beginnings of a movement which has since made itself a power throughout the manufacturing districts in the North, and of which the influence is now not confined to Lancashire, or even to this side of the Atlantic.

The Southern Independence Association has, in the Right Hon. Lord Wharncliffe, a zealous and most efficient President; and its list of vice-presidents contains the names of the Duke of Cleveland, the Marquis of Lothian, Right Hon. Lord Teynham, Viscount Gormanston, Lord Robert Cecil, M.P., Lord Adolphus Vane Tempest, M.P., Lord H. F. Thynne, M.P., and many other noblemen and gentlemen of high distinction in the political world. The General Council is composed of gentlemen of local position and influence, whether as merchants or manufacturers, or as members of the liberal professions, or as representatives of the trade and commerce of the town and district. It is specially worthy of note, if only as a protest against the War-Christian doctrines held and promulgated by the Rev. Ward Beecher, that some hundreds of clergymen of various denominations (not excluding even Mr. Beecher's own) do not find it inconsistent with their calling to give their countenance and support to a political movement in the interests of peace.

It may be desirable, for the information of patrons and friends residing at a distance from the scene of the Society's more immediate operations, to offer a brief statement, at the close of the year, of the progress that has been made during the past few months. In the first place, branch societies, provided over by local officers, and managed by local committees, have been established in the following towns:—Ashton, Stalybridge, Heywood, Bury, Blackburn, Preston, Middleton, Stockport, Mossley, Bolton, Burnley, Rawtenstall, Rochdale, Todmorden, Hyde, Ipawich, Macclesfield, Bacup, Huddersfield, Glasgow, Glossop, Ramsbottom, Droylsden, Bradford, Leigh, Bury St. Edmunds, Over Darwen, Stone, Newcastle, Nantwich, Knutsford, Leicester and Northampton. These branch societies (and others are continually in course of formation) comprise, with the Central Association in Manchester, an aggregate of upwards of 20,000 members, of whom, however, the large majority, composed as they are of operatives and men employed in other forms of labour, contribute nothing towards defraying the very considerable expenses of conducting the movement with the efficiency which has hitherto distinguished it. More than 500 lectures have been delivered under the auspices of the Association, and in scarcely a single instance has the audience recorded an adverse vote, while in nine cases out of ten the majorities have been overwhelming. Tracts, pamphlets, and "Papers for the People" are now issuing by thousands and even tens of thousands; the literary contributions being in all cases furnished gratis, and the papers themselves distributed without charge. The titles of a few of these plainly argued and well-written tracts will sufficiently indicate their general character; for instance "An Examination of the Political and Religious Antecedents and Teachings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher," "An Investigation of the Causes of the American War," "Notes on Slavery, especially in relation to the American Question," "An Analysis and Exposition of the United States Tariffs," &c., &c. Although these papers are circulated for the most part in the manufacturing districts, there is scarcely a county in England, Ireland, Scotland or Wales, into which they have not penetrated, in testimony of the activity of the Southern Independence Association in Manchester, and of the zeal with which its officers and members have entered upon their self-imposed labour of goodwill towards the Confederate States. Nor is the Society less active in its various other departments. Petitions and memorials to both Houses of Parliament are now lying for signature in nearly every cotton-mill in the district; and it is gratifying to find that every respectable mill-owner or other capitalist who is largely an employer of labour, is offering all reasonable facilities for carrying out this important measure. In some cases the process of signing is already completed, and the documents are prepared for presentation at the opening of Parliament. In the event of the numerous branch societies adopting the same course in the several towns they represent, the tables of both Houses will present in February next such a spectacle of public feeling in relation to the American war as has not been equalled in intensity since the days of Free Trade. In addition, however, to this mode of testing and concentrating the opinion of the people, the Association has undertaken to parcel out the city and district into wards, and, by means of a personal canvass and register, ascertain, for Earl Russell's information, the extent to which, so far as Lancashire is concerned, his Lordship erred in his division of Federal and Confederate feeling in England. Such is a brief and necessarily imperfect outline of operations, either completed or in course of progress, under the auspices of the Southern Independence Association; and it only remains to be added that, while the action of the Society has not hitherto been crippled through want of funds, the disbursements have been extremely heavy, though by no means out of proportion to the results which have been so satisfactorily achieved.

Proofs are daily accumulating of the extensive scale upon which the Association is conducting its operations, not only in the midland counties, but in the agricultural districts in the south. The latest instance of this was afforded last week at Northampton, where Mr. J. H. Smith, one of the lecturers engaged by the Association, delivered a very able lecture in vindication of the rights of the Southern States. At the conclusion of a well-reasoned address upon that subject, the lecturer proceeded to disabuse the minds of his hearers of the many false prejudices as to the origin, motives, and character of the war. First on the list of the grievances of the South he placed the division of territory; and second in order, though not in importance, the system of revenue and disbursements adopted by the Federal Government. He showed that every year about $40,000,000 went into the pockets of the North from those of the South. It was against the determined resistance of the South that the high tariff of 1824 and 1829 was passed, and the tariff of 1861 seemed to have been expressly formed for the purpose of precipitating an irreconcilable separation. It was the selfish dream of the Republican party to surround the United States as it were with a Chinese wall of tariffs, and to compel England and all other foreign countries to purchase with gold, and not by barter of manufactures, those goods of which the United States had the monopoly. The Southerners would have much preferred that the immense stream of wealth poured by them into the lap of the North should have gone to England; and it was matter for astonishment to find Mr. Cobden, the great apostle of free trade, standing up as the advocate of those States which were the embodiment of high tariffs and commercial restrictions, while he had no sympathy to spare for those States which had always been, and were now, the consistent supporters of free trade, and of open, upright and unrestricted commerce. Whatever surprise might be felt at Mr. Cobden's inconsistency, there was little to be wondered at in the conduct of the North. The South were by far the best customers the North ever possessed. Even of their own actual manufactures, the North did not purchase so largely as the South. It was the South, which, by purchasing annually from $60,000,000 to $80,000,000 worth of Northern goods, sustained the agriculture, the commerce, the manufactures, the fish-ries of the North. Such were some of the solid motives which induced the North to draw the sword in the bloodiest civil war the world has ever seen. But the sword was the worst possible remedy for disunion, and it was equally powerless for externating the evil of slavery. The removal of slavery must be sought by other means, and as a necessary preliminary to the adoption of them, the institution must cease to be protected by the shield of the Union. But to this the North said, "No." Their cry was still, "Union, Union, glorious Union;" but the cry was of no more effect in restoring Union, than the cry of "health, health, glorious health," would avail to restore life to the dead body. Abolition did not mean love for the negro, but hatred for his master; not sympathy for human sorrow, but lust of dominion. "Was nothing," asked the lecturer, "but war, war to resound throughout the world, until a gallant race had been exterminated?" The North could never subjugate the South, and the South had no desire to subjugate the North. Nor was it for the interest and peace of the world that a country extending 3,400 miles from east to west, and 1,700 miles from north to south, should be reconstructed and reconsolidated, even if such an event were possible. The lecturer concluded by calling attention to the overbearing conduct of the Federal Government in past years, and stated his firm conviction that the hostile feeling constantly evinced by that Power towards England would sooner or later lead to a war with this country; and, that being so, he could not understand how anyone calling himself an Englishman could array himself on the side of the North as against the South in its present war of independence. The lecture was well received by an attentive audience, who awarded to the lecturer a cordial vote of thanks at the close.

The symptoms of serious increase in the pauperism of the distressed districts not only continue unabated, but are assuming a more unfavourable appearance from week to week. At the weekly meeting of the Central Executive Committee, on Monday last, Mr. Commissioner Farnall reported an increase by more than 2,000 in the number of persons receiving parochial relief. The returns for Manchester alone showed an excess of 707 above the previous week; Rochdale, 379; Ashton, 372; and Salford, 106; the total number on the books of the twenty-seven unions being 132,676 as against 61,264 for the corresponding week in 1861; the exact increase being 116.6 per cent. It should be added that in ten out of the twenty-seven unions there was a decrease, amounting, however, in the aggregate, to the comparatively trifling number of 240, as compared with the returns for the previous week.

A Hyde operative, named Richard Driver, who, like many another rhyming weaver in Lancashire, is in his humble way a genuine poet-laureate of the manufacturing districts, has been achieving of late something more than a local reputation for his muse, by singing the sorrows of the Cotton Famine. His latest effusion, which is styled a "Series of Dialogues in Verse between President Lincoln and President Davis," is now enjoying a circulation among his brother operatives, to an extent that might move the envy of more pretentious poets. As a specimen of this writer's artless but animated verse, take the following, being a portion of a "Dialogue" upon the recently proposed "amnesty":—

DAVIS.—No, no: for I prefer to die
A martyr's death, ten thousand times,
Rather than seem to justify
Your black and most infernal crimes.
LINCOLN.—If, then, thou dost prefer to die,
Let Vengeance rouse up all my hate,
And every power I have apply
To desolate each Southern State.
Now, Fury, take command of all;
Use powder, cannon, shell, and ball;
Roll Nature back, and make her wild;
Spare not the mother, slay the child:
Butcher them all—revenge is sweet—
Ply well the army and the fleet;
Let Europe, trembling, stand and gaze,
While all the South is in a blaze
For Europe, like an ugly whelp,
Would like to give the South a help.
I am not mad, how'er I seem,
I am not mad, nor in a dream.
For every negro I set free,
I'll slay two white men—may be three;
And he who shall oppose my plan,
Is not like me, an honest man!
DAVIS.—Lincoln! I hate thine ugly name;
And now I tell thee to thy face,
That thine own party yet will shame
At their dishonour and disgrace,
For thus allowing thee to rule
And govern like a Yankee fool:
For is it not a barbarous plan
To butcher every Southern man—
Men that are noble, brave, and good,
And of the Anglo-Saxon blood,
Whose fathers were of English birth,
The topmost race of men on earth?
Ah! thou may'st try to burn the South,
And in the North gage every mouth;
But, spite of that, the world shall see
The sons of English fathers free:
And thou, sir, like a Yankee knave,
May'st swagger, bluster, rant, and rave.

MR. CHASE'S ESTIMATES.

(From the Times of December 28.)

THE new session of the Federal Congress has brought us some welcome information on the mysterious subject of American finance. We have now before us what would be termed in this country the Financial Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and if that exposition is in some respects more obscure, it is in others more diffuse than the annual revelations which our own Parliament receives. Mr. Chase unfortunately has to open his budget and explain his proposals, not at the close, but in the very middle of a financial year. The computations of the Federal Treasury are made from Midsummer to Midsummer, and consequently the Secretary, in presenting a report at Christmas, is compelled to reckon by estimates only for three quarters out of the four. He can close the account up to the Midsummer previous, and can produce the proper figures for the quarter ensuing, but after that all is speculation and conjecture. It is also a disadvantage that his communication is made by a written Report, and not by that oral statement which in our own House of Commons introduces the audience directly to every detail of the public expenditure, and admits of immediate discussion on any obscure or debatable point. On the other hand, there is the advantage, as it were, of a double delivery; for the President receives the Secretary's Report first, and communicates it afterwards to Congress with comments of his own. Besides this, the American Minister is far more ambitious than any British Chancellor of the Exchequer in his forecasts of the future. Mr. Chase, after producing his complete account up to June 30, 1863, proceeds to estimate the receipts and expenditure of the nation not only for the year current, but for that terminating with June 30, 1865. His statements for these several periods we shall now place before the public, reducing them, for perspicuity's sake, not only to the denominations of our own currency, but to our own forms of speech.

The aggregate revenue, then, of the Federal States for the year ending at Midsummer last was, in round numbers, £180,000,000; the aggregate expenditure, £179,000,000. The receipts were constituted as follows:—

Customs .. .. .	£14,000,000
Excise .. .. .	7,500,000
Direct Taxation .. .. .	297,000
Woods and Forests .. .. .	35,500
Miscellaneous .. .. .	600,000

Total regular revenue .. £22,430,500

This sum is only 50 per cent. in excess of the ordinary revenue of the United States before the war, which was about £15,000,000; so that the increase of taxation has been considerable. But we have stated that the expenditure of the Federal Government for the year in question was £179,000,000; so that there was a deficit on the ordinary account of £157,000,000. This was supplied by loans to the amount of £155,000,000, the difference still remaining being covered by the balances in the Treasury. We now subjoin the several heads of the expenditure thus incurred:—

Civil Services .. .. .	£4,650,000
Pension List and Indian Charges .. .. .	843,000
Interest on Public Debt .. .. .	4,946,000
Army .. .. .	120,000,000
Navy .. .. .	12,600,000

Total expenditure .. £143,039,000

But this, it will be seen, is some £35,000,000 short of the aggregate given above. That sum was taken for "the payment of funded and temporary debt," but the President explains in his Message that these payments, "having been made from moneys nominally borrowed during the year, must be regarded as merely nominal payments, and the moneys borrowed to make them as merely nominal receipts;" so that this £35,000,000 may be either added to the disbursements, or deducted from both those and the receipts together. This part of the statement is not very clear, and it probably involves the explanation of a particular item, which is certainly not intelligible as it stands. How does it come to pass that the Public Debt of the Federal States entails an annual charge of less than £5,000,000 sterling? There is considerable incredulity in America about the actual amount of this debt, but we have Mr. Chase's own acknowledgment that it stood on the 30th of last June at $1,098,793,181, or as nearly as possible £220,000,000. Much of this, of course, was contracted during the year, and did not carry interest during the whole of the period, but if we take even half of it as coming to charge, we find it impossible to understand how the interest upon it, at American rates, could have been liquidated for £4,900,000. It is remarkable, too, that in the estimate for the year ending with Midsummer next this item is omitted from the calculation, but it is introduced again in the estimate for 1865, and there figures for just £17,000,000.

To an English eye, the most notable characteristic of these budgets will be the comparatively small amount raised by taxation, and the enormous amount left to be provided by loans. In 1862-3 £22,000,000 was produced by taxes and £155,000,000 by borrowing, being in the proportion of one-eighth from the former source to seven-eighths from the latter. This proportion is modified a little in the Estimates for coming years, but it still remains very striking. In 1863-4 a total estimated expenditure of £150,000,000 will be defrayed by £30,000,000 of ordinary revenue and £120,000,000 of borrowed money. In 1864-5 the outgoings are put at nearly the same amount, but the ordinary revenue is expected to rise to £40,000,000 and the loans to sink to £110,000,000. President Davis, in his Message, gives us some explanation of these arrangements. He remarks, on behalf of the South—and his words, under the circumstances, are of course equally applicable to the North—that when the war first broke out, and war expenditure became inevitable, "a long exemption from direct taxation by the General Government had created an aversion to its raising revenue by any other means than by duties on imports." In this tone of the popular mind we get the key to the whole system of American taxation. It is hardly too much to say that when Mr. Chase has found out what he wants for the service of the year, he raises as much as he can by Customs duties and borrows the rest. All his other sources of revenue together produced last year less than £9,000,000. His Excise, as he confesses, proved a failure, yielding only £7,000,000, instead of the £17,000,000 which he had expected to obtain. As to direct taxation in the Federal States, it literally produces altogether little more than our dog-tax, and actually less than our tax upon carriages. When, therefore, Mr. Lincoln states in his Message that "by no people were the burdens incidental to a great war more cheerfully borne," we are certainly entitled to observe that the burdens in question have not as yet been very perceptibly imposed. The Americans have incurred enormous charges, but, instead of paying them, they have left them still to be paid. At present they are living upon credit; it is when the duty of redeeming this credit comes that the "burdens of the war" will begin to be really felt.

To illustrate the case by a comparison, we will take the budget of this country for the year 1814, a year in which our expenditure made some approximation to the present American standard. No less a sum than £111,000,000 was then required for the service of the State; but of this sum more than two-thirds—instead of one-eighth—were raised by taxes, and one-third only procured by borrowing. In the year 1855, when the Crimean war was at its height, our total expenditure was £84,000,000, but of this, too, we raised £63,000,000, or three-fourths, by the taxation of the year. The Americans, according to Mr. Chase's programme, will provide from their own pockets no more than £90,000,000 during the three entire years from June, 1862, to June, 1865. For the rest of their needs they will resort to borrowing. That they can borrow, or have, at any rate, been able to borrow hitherto, is certainly plain, and Mr. Chase is thus far justified in his sanguine expectations of future supplies. But even supposing that his currency continues in favour, it must be clear that the Americans are consuming at an extravagant rate that public credit which should be a nation's last resource. We cannot tell whether these statements put the whole truth before us by bringing every species of liability to account, but we can tell that even according to these figures and estimates the Federals will have incurred by next Midsummer twelvemonth a debt so great that the entire revenue of the United States before the war would be insufficient to defray its annual charge.

PRESIDENT DAVIS'S MESSAGE.—The inordinate length to which, by a time-honoured tradition, the Messages of American Presidents run, has been even exaggerated by the President of the Confederate States. This excessive prolixity may possibly diminish the effect which so able a state-paper would naturally exercise. But, at all events, it gives to foreigners a complete and exhaustive view of the present position of the Confederacy which they could not otherwise obtain. Like all the other documents issued by President Davis, its good taste and high moral feeling distinguish it broadly from the political compositions which we are accustomed to receive from America. The most thorny and irritating questions are discussed with calmness; and a severe simplicity, rare in transatlantic literature, is sustained even in those solemn appeals which will sometimes tempt a European writer into bombast. It is only when he is led to speak of the wanton and wilful cruelty which is being practised upon his countrymen by the Moura-vieffs of the West that his style loses, for the time, its even balance. A more important merit is the internal evidence of truthfulness which the document contains. Its whole tone is that of a man who knows that, to master difficulties, he must first look there fairly in the face. The narrative which is given of the reverses that have lately befallen the Confederate arms contrasts honourably with the lying braggadocio that used to conceal a Federal defeat. The disasters of the last campaign are nothing extenuated; if anything, they are painted in darker colours than previous accounts seemed to warrant. No enemy could speak more strongly of the disgraceful conduct of the troops to whose faintheartedness the rout at Chattanooga was owing. The President's commentary upon the campaign in Tennessee serves to explain some portions of it that have hitherto seemed inexplicable. The abandonment, for instance, of Chattanooga and Knoxville appeared to be a gratuitous surrender of important strongholds. It is now explained that the tenability of the whole of that line of defences depended upon the possession of Cumberland Gap. This post having been surrendered by an officer who was either treacherous or singularly timid, the relinquishment of the others followed of necessity.—The Saturday Review.

The Confederates unquestionably have been "hard hit." Mr. Davis admits as much, candidly and boldly. They have encountered one or two important defeats, and they have been disappointed in one or two expected victories. They have lost much territory and many men. The blockade of their coast has of late been much more close and severe than formerly, and has inflicted upon them great hardships. The price of the ordinary necessities of life has risen in many parts to a most inconvenient pitch. Their paper currency is fast degenerating into the condition of assignats. To crown the whole, their hopes of assistance from European Powers have gradually dwindled away, and appear now in fact to have been almost wholly abandoned. In all this there is much ground for uneasiness, no doubt, but no ground for despair. Discomfiture and defeat their enemy may inflict upon them by virtue of his superior numbers and more inexhaustible resources,—but anything approaching to subjugation or conquest can come upon them only by the failure of their own resolution or by division in their own ranks.—The Economist.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S MESSAGE.

Fellow Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives, —Another year of health and of sufficiently abundant harvests has passed. For these, and especially for the improved condition of our national affairs, our renewed and profoundest gratitude is due. We remain in peace and friendship with foreign Powers. The efforts of disloyal citizens of the United States to involve us in foreign wars to aid an inexcusable insurrection have been unavailing. Her Britannic Majesty's Government, as was justly expected, have exercised their authority to prevent the departure of new hostile expeditions from British ports. The Emperor of France has by a like proceeding promptly vindicated the neutrality which he proclaimed at the beginning of the contest. Questions of great intricacy and importance have arisen out of the blockade and other belligerent operations between the Government and several of the maritime Powers, but they have been discussed, and as far as was possible accommodated, in a spirit of frankness, justice, and natural good will.

It is especially gratifying that our prize courts, by the impartiality of their adjudications, have commanded the respect and confidence of maritime Powers.

The supplemental treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave trade, made on the 17th day of February last, has been duly ratified and carried into execution. It is believed that, so far as American ports and American citizens are concerned, that in human and odious traffic has been brought to an end.

I shall submit for the consideration of the Senate a Convention for the adjustment of the possessory claims in Washington Territory arising out of the Treaty of the 15th of June, 1846, between the United States and Great Britain, and which have been the source of some disquiet among the citizens of that now rapidly improving part of the country.

A novel and important question, involving the extent of the maritime jurisdiction of Spain in the waters which surround the island of Cuba, has been debated without reaching an agreement, and it is proposed in an amicable spirit to refer it to the arbitration of a friendly Power. A convention for that purpose will be submitted to the Senate.

I have thought it proper, subject to the approval of the Senate, to concur with the interested commercial Powers in an arrangement for the liquidation of the Scheldt dues, upon the principles which have been heretofore adopted in regard to the imposts upon navigation in the waters of Denmark.

The long-pending controversy between this Government and that of Chili touching the seizure, at Setana, in Peru, by Chilean officers, of a large amount in treasure belonging to citizens of the United States, has been brought to a close by the award of his Majesty the King of the Belgians, to whose arbitration the question was referred by the parties. The subject was thoroughly and patiently examined by that justly respected magistrate, and, although the sum awarded to the claimants may not have been as large as they expected, there is no reason to distrust the wisdom of his Majesty's decision. That decision was promptly complied with by Chili when intelligence in regard to it reached that country.

The joint-commission, under the Act of the last Session, for carrying into effect the convention with Peru on the subject of claims, has been organised at Lima, and is engaged in the business.

Difficulties concerning interoceanic transit through Nicaragua are in course of amicable adjustment.

In conformity with principles set forth in my last annual Message, I have received a representative from the United States of Colombia, and have accredited a Minister to that Republic. Incidents occurring in the progress of our civil war have forced upon my attention the uncertain state of international questions touching the rights of foreigners in this country and of United States citizens abroad.

In regard to some Governments these rights are, at least partially, defined by treaties. In no instance, however, is it expressly stipulated that in the event of a civil war a foreigner residing in this country, within the lines of the insurgents, is to be exempted from the rule which classifies him as a belligerent, in whose behalf the Government of his country cannot expect any privileges or immunities distinct from that character. I regret to say, however, that such claims have been put forward, and in some instances in behalf of foreigners who have lived in the United States the greater part of their lives.

There is reason to believe that many persons born in foreign countries, who have declared their intention to become citizens or who have been fully naturalised, have evaded the military duty required of them by denying that fact, and thereby throwing upon the Government the burden of proof. It has been found difficult or impracticable to obtain this proof for want of guides to the proper source of information. These might be supplied by requiring clerks of courts, where declarations of intention may be made or naturalisations effected, to send periodically lists of the names of the persons naturalised or declaring their intentions to become citizens to the Secretary of the Interior, in whose department the names might be arranged and printed for general information. There is also reason to believe that foreigners frequently become citizens of the United States for the sole purpose of evading duties imposed by the laws of their native country, to which, on becoming naturalised here, they at once repair, and, though never returning to the United States, they still claim the interposition of this Government as citizens.

Many alterations and great prejudices have heretofore arisen out of this abuse. It is therefore submitted to your serious consideration. It might be advisable to fix a limit beyond which no citizen of the United States residing abroad may claim the interposition of his government.

The right of suffrage has often been assumed and exercised by aliens under the pretence of naturalisation, which they have disavowed when draughted into the military service.

I submit the expediency of such an amendment of the law as will make the fact of voting an estoppel against any plea of exemption from military service, or other civil obligation, on the ground of alienage.

In common with other Western Powers, our relations with Japan have been brought into serious jeopardy through the perverse opposition of the hereditary aristocracy of the empire to the enlightened and liberal policy of the Tycoon, designed to bring the country into the society of nations. It is hoped, although not with confidence, that these difficulties may be peacefully overcome. I ask your attention to the claim of the Minister residing there for the damages he sustained on the destruction by fire of the residence of the legation at Yeddo.

Satisfactory arrangements have been made with the Emperor of Russia, which, it is believed, will result in effecting a continuous line of telegraph through that empire from the Pacific coast.

I recommend to your favourable consideration the subject of an international telegraph across the Atlantic ocean, and also of a telegraph between the capital and the national forts along the seaboard and the Gulf of Mexico. Such communications, established with any reasonable outlay, would be economical as well as effective aids to the diplomatic, military, and naval service.

The consular system of the United States under the enactments of the last Congress begins to be self-sustaining, and there is reason to hope that it may become entirely so with the increase of trade which will ensue whenever peace be restored.

Our ministers abroad have been faithful in defending American rights. In protecting commercial interests our consuls have necessarily had to encounter increased labours and responsibilities growing out of the war. These they have for the most part met and discharged with zeal and efficiency. This acknowledgment justly includes those consuls who are residing in Morocco, Egypt, Turkey, Japan, China, and other Oriental countries who are charged with complex functions and extraordinary Powers.

The condition of the several organised territories is generally satisfactory, although Indian disturbances in New Mexico have not been entirely suppressed. The mineral resources of Colorado, Nevada, Idaho, New Mexico, and Arizona, are proving far richer than has been heretofore understood. I lay before you a communication on this subject from the Governor of New Mexico. I again submit to your consideration the expediency of establishing a system for the encouragement of immigration, although this source of national wealth and strength is again flowing with greater freedom than for several years before the insurrection occurred.

There is still a great deficiency in every field of industry especially in agriculture and in our mines, as well of iron as the precious metals. While the demand for labour is thus increased here tens of thousands of persons destitute of remunerative occupation are thronging our foreign Consulates and offering to emigrate to the United States if essential but very cheap assistance can be afforded them.

It is easy to see that under the sharp discipline of civil war the nation is beginning a new life. This noble effort demands the aid and ought to receive the support and attention of the Government. Injuries unforeseen by the Government and unintended may in some cases have been inflicted on the subjects or citizens of foreign countries, both at sea and on land, by persons in the service of the United States. As this Government expects redress from other Powers when similar injuries are inflicted by persons in their service upon citizens of the United States, we must be prepared to do justice to foreigners. If the existing judicial tribunals are inadequate to this purpose, a special court may be authorised, with power to hear and decide such claims of the character referred to as may have arisen under treaties and the public law. Conventions for adjusting the claims by joint commission have been proposed to some Governments, but no definite answer to the proposition has yet been received from any.

In the course of the Session I shall probably have occasion to request you to provide indemnification to claimants where decrees of restitution have been rendered and damages awarded by the Admiralty courts; and in other cases, where this Government may be acknowledged to be liable in principle, and where the amount of that liability has been ascertained by an informal arbitral award.

The proper officers of the Treasury have deemed themselves required by the law of the United States upon the subject to demand a tax upon the incomes of foreign consuls in this country. While such a demand may not in strictness be in derogation of public law, or perhaps of any existing treaty between the United States and a foreign country, the expediency of so far modifying the Act as to exempt from tax the income of such consuls as are not citizens of the United States, derived from the emoluments of their office, or from property not situated in the United States, is submitted to your serious consideration. I make this suggestion upon the ground that a comity which ought to be reciprocated exempts our consuls in all other countries from taxation to the extent thus indicated. The United States, I think, ought not to be exceptionally illiberal to international trade and commerce.

The operations of the Treasury during the last year have been successfully conducted. The enactment by Congress of a national banking law has proved a valuable support of the public credit, and the general legislation in relation to loans has fully answered the expectations of its favourers. Some amendments may be required to perfect existing laws, but no change in their principles or general scope is believed to be needed. Since these measures have been in operation all demands on the Treasury, including the pay of the army and navy, have been promptly met and fully satisfied. No considerable body of troops, it is believed, were ever more amply provided and more liberally and punctually paid, and it may be added, that by no people were the burdens incidental to a great war more cheerfully borne.

The receipts during the year from all sources, including loans and the balance in the Treasury at its commencement, were $901,125,674 86c., and the aggregate disbursements $895,796,630 65c., leaving a balance on the 1st of July, 1863, of $5,329,044 21c. Of the receipts, there were received from customs, $69,069,642 40c.; from internal revenue, $37,640,787 95c.; from direct tax, $1,485,103 61c.; from lands, $167,617 17c.; from miscellaneous sources, $3,046,615 35c.; and from loans, $776,682,361 57c., making the aggregate, $901,125,674 86c. Of the disbursements, there were for the civil service, $23,253,922 8c.; for pensions and Indians, $4,216,526 59c.; for interest on public debt, $24,729,846 51c.; for the War Department, $599,298,600 83c.; for the Navy Department, $63,211,105 27c.; for payment of funded and temporary debt, $181,086,635 7c.; making the aggregate $895,796,630 65c.; and leaving the balance of $5,329,044 21c. But the payments of the funded and temporary debts, having been made from moneys nominally borrowed during the year, must be regarded as merely nominal payments, and the money borrowed to make them as merely nominal receipts, and their amount, $181,086,635 07c., should therefore be deducted both from receipts and disbursements. This being done there remains as actual receipts $720,039,039 79c., and the actual disbursements $714,709,995 58c., leaving the balance as already stated.

The actual receipts and disbursements for the first quarter, and the estimated receipts and disbursements for the ensuing three-quarters of the current fiscal year 1864, will be shown in detail by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which I invite your attention.

It is sufficient to say here that it is not believed that actual results will exhibit a state of the finances less favourable to the country than the estimates of that officer heretofore submitted, while it is confidently expected that at the close of the year both disbursements and debt will be found very considerably less than has been anticipated.

The report of the Secretary of War is a document of great interest. It consists of:—

1. The military operations of the year detailed in the report of the General-in-Chief.
2. The organisation of coloured persons into the war service.
3. The exchange of prisoners, fully set forth in the letter of General Hitchcock.
4. The operations under the Act of enrolling and calling out the national forces, detailed in the report of the Provost-Marshal-General.
5. The organisation of the Invalid Corps; and,
6. The operations of the several departments of the Quartermaster-General, Commissary-General, Paymaster-General, Chief of Engineers, Chief of Ordnance and Surgeon-General. It has appeared impossible to make a valuable summary of this report, except such as would be too extended for this place, and hence I content myself by asking your careful attention to the report itself. The duties devolving on the naval branch of the service during the year and throughout the whole of this unhappy contest have been discharged with fidelity and eminent success. The extensive blockade has been constantly increasing in efficiency.

If the navy has expanded, yet on so long a line it has so far found it impossible to entirely suppress illicit trade. From returns received at the Navy Department it appears that more than 1,000 vessels have been captured since the blockade was instituted, and that the value of prizes already sent in for adjudication amounts to over $13,000,000.

The naval force of the United States consists at this time of 588 vessels, completed and in course of completion, and of these 75 are iron-clad, or armoured steamers. The events of the war give an increased interest and importance to the navy, which will probably extend beyond the war itself. The armoured vessels in our navy completed and in service, or which are under contract and approaching completion, are believed to exceed in number those of any other Power; but while these may be relied upon for harbour defence and coast service, others of greater strength and capacity will be necessary for cruising purposes and to maintain our rightful position on the ocean. The change that has taken place in naval vessels and naval warfare since the introduction of steam as a motive power for ships of war demands either a corresponding change in some of our existing navy-yards, or the establishment of new ones for the construction and necessary repair of modern naval vessels. No inconsiderable embarrassment, delay, and public injury have been experienced from the want of such governmental establishments. The necessity of such a navy-yard, so furnished, at some suitable place upon the Atlantic seaboard, has on repeated occasions been brought to the attention of Congress by the Navy Department, and is again presented in the report of the Secretary which accompanies this communication. I think it my duty to invite your special attention to this subject, and also to that of establishing a yard and depot for naval purposes upon one of the Western rivers. A naval force has been created on these interior waters, and under many disadvantages, within a little more than two years, exceeding in number the whole naval force of the country at the commencement of the present Administration. Satisfactory and important as have been the performances of the heroic men of the navy at this interesting period, they are scarcely more wonderful than the successes of our mechanics and artisans in the production of war vessels, which have created a new form of naval power.

Our country has advantages superior to any other nation in resources of iron and timber, with inexhaustible quantities of fuel in the immediate vicinity of both, and all available, and in close proximity to navigable waters. Without the advantage of public works, the resources of the nation have been developed and its power displayed in the construction of a navy of such magnitude, which has, at the very period of its creation, rendered signal service to the Union.

The increase of the number of seamen in the public service from 7,500 men in the spring of 1861 to about 34,000 at the present time has been accomplished without special legislation or extraordinary bounties to promote that increase. It has been found, however, that the operation of the draughts, with the high bounties paid for any recruits, is beginning to affect injuriously the naval service, and will, if not corrected, be likely to impair its efficiency by detaching seamen from their proper vocation and inducing them to enter the army. I therefore respectfully suggest that Congress might aid both the army and naval service by a definite provision on this subject, which would at the same time be equitable to the communities more especially interested. I commend to your consideration the suggestions of the Secretary of the Navy in regard to the policy of fostering and training seamen, and also the education of officers and engineers for the naval service. The Naval Academy is rendering signal service in preparing midshipmen for the highly responsible duties which in after life they will be required to perform. In order that the country should not be deprived of the proper quota of educated officers, for which legal provision has been made at the naval school, the vacancies caused by the neglect or omission to make nominations from the States in insurrection have been filled by the Secretary of the Navy. The school is now more full and complete than at any former period, and in every respect entitled to the favourable consideration of Congress.

During the past fiscal year the financial condition of the Post-office Department has been one of increasing prosperity, and I am gratified in being able to state that the actual postal revenue has nearly equalled the entire expenditures, the latter amounting to $11,314,206 84c., and the former to $11,163,789 59c., leaving a deficiency of but $150,414 25c. In 1860, the year immediately preceding the rebellion, the deficiency amounted $5,656,705 49c., the postal receipts being $2,643,722 19c. less than those of 1863. The decrease since 1860 in the annual amount of transportation has been about 25 per cent.; but the annual expenditure on account of the same has been reduced 35 per cent. It is manifest therefore that the Post-office Department may become self-sustaining in a few years, even with the restoration of the whole service. The international conference of postal delegates from the principal countries of Europe and America, which was called at the suggestion of the Postmaster-General, met at Paris on the 11th of May last and concluded its deliberations on the 8th of June. The principles established by the conference as best adapted to facilitate post-intercourse between nations, and as the basis of future postal conventions, inaugurate a general system of uniform international charges at reduced rates of postage, and cannot fail to produce beneficial results.

I refer you to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, which is herewith laid before you, for useful and varied information in relation to public lands, Indian affairs, patents, pensions, and other matters of public concern pertaining to his department. The quantity of land disposed of during the last and the first quarter of the present fiscal year was 3,841,549 acres, of which 161,911 acres were sold for cash; 1,456,514 acres were taken up under the Homestead law, and the residue disposed of under laws granting lands for military bounties, for railroad and other purposes. It also appears that the sale of the public lands is largely on the increase.

It has long been a cherished opinion of some of our wisest statesmen that the people of the United States had a higher and more enduring interest in the early settlement and substantial cultivation of the public lands than in the amount of direct revenue to be derived from the sale of them. This opinion has had a controlling influence in shaping legislation upon the subject of our national domain. I may cite as evidence of this the liberal measures adopted in reference to actual settlers, the grant to the States of the overflowed lands within their limits, in order to their being reclaimed and rendered fit for cultivation, and the grants to railway companies of alternate sections of land upon the contemplated lines of their roads, which, when completed, will largely multiply the facilities for reaching our distant possessions. This policy has received its most signal and beneficent illustration in the recent enactment granting homesteads to actual settlers. Since the 1st day of January last before mentioned, the quantity of 1,456,514 acres of land have been taken up under its provisions. This fact and the amount of sales furnish gratifying evidence of increasing settlement upon the public lands, notwithstanding the great struggle in which the energies of the nation have been engaged, and which has required so large a withdrawal of our citizens from their accustomed pursuits. I cordially concur in the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, suggesting a modification of the Act in favour of those engaged in the military and naval service of the United States. I doubt not that Congress will cheerfully adopt such measures as will, without essentially changing the general features of the system, secure, to the greatest practical extent, its benefits to those who have left their homes in defence of the country in this arduous crisis.

I invite your attention to the views of the Secretary as to the propriety of raising by appropriate legislation a revenue from the mineral lands of the United States.

The measures provided at our last Session for the removal of certain Indian tribes have been carried into effect. Sundry treaties have been negotiated, which will in due time be submitted for the constitutional action of the Senate. They contain stipulations for extinguishing the possessory rights of the Indians to large and valuable tracts of land. It is hoped that the effect of these treaties will result in the establishment of permanent friendly relations with such of these tribes as have been brought into frequent and bloody collisions with our outlying settlements and emigrants. Sound policy and our imperative duty to these wards of the Government demand our anxious and constant attention to their material well-being, to their progress in the arts of civilisation, and, above all, to that moral training which, under the blessing of Divine Providence, will confer upon them the elevating and sanctifying influences, the hopes and consolations, of the Christian faith. I suggested in my last annual Message the propriety of remodelling our Indian system. Subsequent events have satisfied me of its necessity. The details set forth in the report of the Secretary evince the urgent need for immediate legislative action.

I commend the benevolent institutions established or patronised by the good in this District to your generous and sterling care.

The attention of Congress during the last Session was engaged to some extent with a proposition for enlarging the water communication between the Mississippi river and the North-eastern seaboard, which proposition, however, failed for the time. Since then, upon a call of the greatest respectability, a convention has been held at Chicago upon the same subject, a summary of whose views is contained in a memorial addressed to the President and Congress, and which I now have the honour to lay before you. That this interest is one which ere long will force its own way I do not entertain a doubt, while it is submitted entirely to your wisdom as to what can be done now. Augmented interest is given to this subject by the actual amount of work upon the Pacific Railroad, under auspices so favourable to rapid progress and completion. The enlarged navigation becomes a palpable need to the great road.

I transmit the second annual report of the Commissioners of the Department of Agriculture, asking your attention to the developments in that vital interest of the nation.

When Congress assembled a year ago the war had already lasted nearly twenty months, and there had been many conflicts on both land and sea with varying results; the rebellion had been pressed back into reduced limits, yet the tone of public feeling and opinion at home and abroad was not satisfactory. With other signs, the popular elections, then just past, indicated uneasiness among ourselves, while, amid much that was cold and menacing, the kindest words coming from Europe were uttered in accents of pity that we were too blind to surrender a hopeless cause. Our commerce was suffering greatly by a few armed vessels built upon and furnished from foreign shores, and we were threatened with such additions from the same quarters as would sweep our trade from the sea and raise our blockade. We have failed to elicit from European governments anything hopeful upon this subject.

The preliminary Emancipation Proclamation, issued in September, was running its assigned period to the beginning of the new year. A month later the final proclamation came, including the announcement that coloured men of suitable condition would be received in the war service. The policy of emancipation and of employing black soldiers gave to the future a new aspect, about which hope, and fear, and doubt contended in uncertain conflict. According to our political system, as a matter of civil administration, the Government had no lawful power to effect emancipation in any State, and for a long time it had been hoped that the rebellion could be suppressed without resorting to it as a military measure. It was all the while deemed possible that the necessity for it might come, and that if it should the crisis of the contest would then be presented. It came, and, as was anticipated, was followed by dark and doubtful days.

Eleven months having now passed, we are permitted to take another review. The rebel borders are pressed still further back, and by the complete opening of the Mississippi the country dominated by the rebellion is divided into distinct parts, with no practical communication between them. Tennessee and Arkansas have been substantially cleared of insurgent control, and influential citizens in each, owners of slaves and advocates of slavery at the beginning of the rebellion, now declare openly for emancipation in their respective States. Of those States not included in the Emancipation Proclamation, Maryland and Missouri, neither of which, three years ago, would tolerate any restraint upon the extension of slavery into new territories, only dispute now as to the best mode of removing it within their own limits.

Of those who were slaves at the beginning of the rebellion, full 100,000 are now in the United States' military service, about one-half of which number actually bear arms in the ranks, thus giving the double advantage of taking so much labour from the insurgent cause, and supplying the places which otherwise must be supplied with so many white men. So far as tested, it is difficult to say they are not as good soldiers as any. No servile insurrection or tendency to violence or cruelty has marked the measures of emancipation and arming the blacks. These measures have been much discussed in foreign countries, and contemporary with such discussion the tone of public sentiment there is much improved. At home the same measures have been fully discussed, supported, criticised, and denounced; and the annual elections following are highly encouraging to those whose official duty it is to bear the country through this great trial. Thus we have the new reckoning. The crisis which threatened to divide the friends of the Union is past. Looking now to the present and future, and with a reference to a resumption of the national authority in the States wherein that authority has been suspended, I have thought fit to issue a proclamation, a copy of which is herewith transmitted. On examination of this proclamation it will appear (as is believed) that nothing is attempted beyond what is amply justified by the Constitution. True, the form of an oath is given, but no man is coerced to take it. The man is only promised a pardon in case he voluntarily takes the oath. The Constitution authorises the Executive to grant or withhold the pardon at his own absolute discretion, and this includes the power to grant on terms, as is fully established by judicial and other authorities. It is also proffered, that if in any of the States named a State Government shall be recognised and guaranteed by the United States, and if under it the State shall, on the constitutional conditions, be protected against invasion and domestic violence, the constitutional obligation of the United States to guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and to protect the State in the cases stated, is explicit and full. But why tender the benefits of this provision only to a State Government set up in this particular way? This section of the Constitution contemplates a case wherein the element within a State favourable to republican government in the Union may be too feeble for an opposite and hostile element, external or even within the State, and such are precisely the cases with which we are now dealing.

An attempt to guarantee and protect a revived State Government, constructed in whole or in preponderating part from the very element against whose hostility and violence it is to be protected, is simply absurd. There must be a test by which to separate the opposing elements, so as to build only from the sound; and that test is a sufficiently liberal one which accepts as sound whoever will make a sworn recantation of his former movements.

But if it be proper to require, as a test of admission to the political body, an oath of allegiance to the United States and to the Union under it, why not also to the laws and proclamations in regard to slavery?

Those laws and proclamations were enacted and put forth for the purpose of aiding in the suppression of the rebellion. To give them their fullest effect, there had to be a pledge for their maintenance. In my judgment they have aided, and will further aid, the cause for which they were intended.

To now abandon them would be not only to relinquish a lever of power, but would also be a cruel and astounding breach of faith.

I may add, at this point, that while I remain in my present position, I shall not attempt to retract or modify the Emancipation Proclamation, nor shall I return to slavery any person who is free by the terms of that proclamation, or by any of the Acts of Congress.

For these and other reasons it is thought best that support of those measures shall be included in the oath, and it is believed that the Executive may lawfully claim it in return for pardon and restoration of forfeited rights, which he has a clear constitutional power to withhold altogether, or grant upon the terms he shall deem wisest for the public interest. It should be observed, also, that this part of the oath is subject to the modifying and abrogating power of legislation and supreme judicial decision.

The proposed acquiescence of the national Executive in any reasonable temporary State arrangement for the freed people is made with the view of possibly modifying the confusion and destitution which must at best attend all classes by a total revolution of labour throughout whole States. It is hoped that the deeply afflicted people in these States may be somewhat more ready to give up the cause of their affliction, if to this extent this vital matter be left to themselves. While no power of the national Executive to prevent an abuse is abridged by the proposition, the suggestion in the proclamation as to maintaining the political framework of the States on what is called reconstruction, is made in the hope that it may do good without danger of harm. It will save labour and avoid great confusion. But why any proclamation now upon the subject? This subject is beset with the conflicting views that the step might be delayed too long or be taken too soon. In some States the elements for resumption seem ready for action, but remain inactive apparently for want of a rallying point—a plan of action. Why shall A adopt the plan of B, rather than B that of A? And if A and B should agree, how can they know but that the General Government here will reject their plan? By the proclamation, a plan is presented which may be accepted by them as a rallying point, and which they are assured in advance will not be rejected here. This may bring them to act sooner than they otherwise would. The objection to a premature presentation of a plan by the national Executive consists in the danger of committing itself on points which could be more safely left to further developments. Care has been taken to so shape the document as to avoid embarrassment from this source, saying that on certain terms certain classes will be pardoned, with rights restored. It is not said that other classes or other terms will never be included, saying that reconstruction will be accepted if presented in a specific way. It is not said it will never be accepted in any other way. The movements by State action for emancipation in several of the States not included in the Emancipation Proclamation are matters of profound gratulation. And while I do not repeat in detail what I have heretofore so earnestly urged upon this subject, my general views and feelings remain unchanged; and I trust this Congress will omit no fair opportunity of aiding these important steps to the great consummation. In the midst of other cares, however important, we must not lose sight of the fact that the war power is still our main reliance. To that power alone can we look for a time to give confidence to the people in the contested regions that the insurgent power will not again overrun them; until that confidence shall be established, little can be done anywhere for what is called reconstruction. Hence our chiefest care must still be directed to the army and navy, which have thus far borne their harder part so nobly and well. And it may be esteemed fortunate that, in giving the greatest efficiency to these indispensable arms, we do honourably recognise the gallant men, from commander to sentinel, who compose them, and to whom more than to others the world must stand indebted for the home of freedom disenthralled, regenerated, enlarged, and perpetuated.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

THE FEDERAL "AMNESTY" PROCLAMATION.

The following Proclamation is appended to the Message:—

PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS, in and by the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that the President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offences against the United States, except in cases of impeachment; and whereas a rebellion now exists, whereby the loyal State Governments of several States have for a long time been subverted, and many persons have committed and are now guilty of treason against the United States.

And whereas, with reference to said rebellion and treason laws have been enacted by Congress declaring forfeitures and confiscations of property and liberation of slaves, all upon terms and conditions therein stated, and also declaring that the President was thereby authorised at any time thereafter by proclamation to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion, in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions, and at such times and on such conditions, as he may deem expedient for the public welfare.

Whereas the congressional declaration for limited and conditional pardon accords with the well-established judicial exposition of the pardoning power; and whereas, with reference to the said rebellion, the President of the United States has issued several proclamations with provisions in regard to the liberation of slaves; and whereas it is now desired by some persons heretofore engaged in the said rebellion to resume their allegiance to the United States and to reinaugurate loyal State Governments within and for their respective States; therefore I, Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States, do proclaim, declare, and make known to all persons who have, directly or by implication, participated in the existing rebellion, except as hereinafter excepted, that a full pardon is hereby granted to them, and each of them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and in property cases where the rights of third parties shall have intervened, and upon the condition that every such person shall take and subscribe an oath, and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate, and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:—

"I, —, do solemnly swear in presence of Almighty God that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States and the Union of the States thereunder, and that I will in like manner abide by and faithfully support all Acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves, so long and so far as not repealed, modified or held void by Congress or by decision of the Supreme Court; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion having reference to slaves, so long and so far as not modified or declared void by decision of the Supreme Court. So help me God."

The persons excepted from the benefits of the foregoing provisions are all who are or shall have been civil or diplomatic officers or agents of the so-called Confederate Government; all who have left judicial stations under the United States to aid the rebellion; all who are or shall have been military or naval officers of the said so-called Confederate Government above the rank of colonel in the army or lieutenant in the navy; all who left seats in the United States Congress to aid the rebellion; all who resigned commissions in the army or navy of the United States and afterwards aided the rebellion; and all who have engaged in any way in treating coloured persons, or white persons in charge of such, otherwise than lawfully as prisoners of war, and which persons may have been found in the United States service as soldiers, seamen, or in any other capacity; and I do further proclaim, declare, and make known that whenever in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one-tenth in number of the votes cast in such States at the Presidential Election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid, and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter according to the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called Act of Secession, and excluding all others, shall re-establish a State Government which shall be republican, and in nowise contravening such oath, such shall be recognised as the true Government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefit of the constitutional provision which declares that:—

"The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion on application of the legislature, or of the executive, when the legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence."

And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known that any provision which may be adopted by such State Government in relation to the freed people of such State which shall recognise and declare their permanent freedom, provide for their education, and which yet may be consistent, as a temporary arrangement, with their present condition as a labouring, landless, and houseless class, will not be objected to by the national Executive.

And it is engaged as not improper, that, in constructing a loyal State Government in any State, the name of the State, the boundary, the subdivisions, the constitution, and the general code of laws as before the rebellion be maintained, subject only to the modifications made necessary by the conditions hereinbefore stated, and such others, if any, not contravening said conditions, and which may be deemed expedient by those framing the new State Government. To avoid misunderstanding, it may be proper to say that this proclamation, so far as it relates to State Governments, has no reference to States wherein loyal State Governments have all the while been maintained; and for the same reason it may be proper to further say that, whether members sent to Congress from any State shall be admitted to seats constitutionally, rests exclusively with the respective Houses, and not to any extent with the Executive; and still further, that this proclamation is intended to present to the people of the States wherein the national authority has been suspended and loyal State Governments have been subverted, a mode in and by which the national authority and loyal State Governments may be re-established within said States or in any of them, and, while the mode presented is the best the Executive can suggest with its present impressions, it must not be understood that no other possible mode would be acceptable.

Given under my hand, at the City of Washington, the 8th day of December, A.D. 1863, and of the Independence of the United States of America the 88th.

By the President,

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD, Secretary of State.

THE HUMAN HAIR.—M. Pruner Bey has recently contributed to the Paris Anthropological Society a most important and valuable memoir on the human hair. Hitherto our information on this interesting subject has been most vague and unsatisfactory. The microscope has at last yielded most important results, and will greatly tend to the elucidation of the problem of the diversity of human races. We shall present our readers with the more important results of M. Pruner Bey's labours. Thus we find that so well defined are ethnic diversities in mankind that a single hair will now be sufficient to decide to what race the individual belonged. What seems more wonderful still is that half-blooded races can be detected by the structure of the hair! The following are the conclusions to which M. P. Bey has arrived:—1. Microscopic examination accounts for the different aspects the hair of the human race presents to the naked eye. The flatter the hair, the more it curls, and the rounder the hair the more stiff and smooth it becomes. 2. One extreme end of the scale is represented by the Papuans, the Bosjesmans, and the Negroes; the other by the Polynesians, the Malays, the Siamese, the Japanese, the Turanians, and Americans, not excepting the Esquimaux. The Aryans occupy the intermediate space. 3. The Basques differ from the Aryan stock as much by their hair as by their language. 4. Cross-breeds are recognisable by the fusion and juxtaposition of the characters inherent in the hair of their parents. 5. It is much less, the anatomical disposition of the constituent elements than the form of the hair which produces the characteristic differences. Anatomically there would only be the transparent centre deprived of medullary substance in some branches of the Aryan race which would deserve to be considered. But the fine points of the hair belonging to allophylic races, as well as their down, present the same peculiarity. 6. A single hair, presenting the average form characteristic of the race, might serve to define it. But, without pretending to this degree of certainty, it is indubitable that the hair of the individual bears the stamp of his origin. 7. Though there are appreciable differences in the form of hairs in the same individual, the extreme forms are only met upon the same head when there is a commixture of blood. 8. The small scale assigned to the diameters of the hair explains the relative resemblances between single hairs belonging to individuals of different stocks; but in spite of this apparent inconvenience, the general or predominant form of the sections does not in the same race transgress certain limits, and it is upon that we must base our diagnosis. 9. The hair examined by our method appears to us to possess an incontestable value for the study of characters inherent in the races of man. 10. Some will find in it forms of transition, for instance, from the Polynesian to the Melanesian, from the Malay and Lithuanian to the Turanian, &c., from this to the Basque and the American, &c., whilst others may energetically point out the different and constant forms even in this apparently insignificant appendage of the skin. 11. It is with the form of the hair as with the form of the cranium, however unequal may be the importance of these two characters.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed; that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives, or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognized at this office.

Subscription, 25s. per annum—post paid, 30s., payable in advance. All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-Office Orders made payable to, J. B. HOPKINS, 13, Bouverie-street, Fleet-street, London E.C.

The INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the paper made:—

The Campaigns of 1863.

THE history of half-a-dozen European wars seems rolled into one when we review the military events of the year in America. Greater numbers have closed in mortal conflict even in modern times than strove together at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg; greater distances have been traversed by conquering armies; greater physical difficulties have been overcome by great commanders, from the days of Hannibal's crossing the Alps, to that of the march of a French army to Moscow. But we may ransack history in vain for a parallel to the gigantic war between North and South, complete in all respects; and the task of Napoleon I. defending the soil of France against the Allies in 1814 is dwarfed by the magnitude of the work Jefferson Davis has to accomplish—the defence of the Confederacy against half a million of armed men, aided by fleets which menace every town along the coast, and which traverse without resistance the great rivers of the Confederacy, so many safe highways for the invader. When we add that the fighting grows more desperate as the months roll by; that the area of the warfare is increasing; that the skill and military aptitude of both North and South are being rapidly developed; and that in the energy, self-reliance, and unexhausted resources, the Confederacy has exhibited, there is abundant evidence that on her part the war may be protracted for years, we have said enough to prove that there is in this war an unprecedented material for history, a field of interesting research for military students, and a volume of experience for the commanders of great armies, such as no wars since those of the Revolution have supplied us with.

Four great campaigns have been carried on during 1863. There have been intervals of rest, but the object for which they were commenced has never been lost sight of, and, with the renewed readiness of the armies to fight, has been persistently pursued. The States of Virginia, Tennessee, Mississippi, and Louisiana have been the great battle-fields, and in each the attack has been fierce, and the resistance stubborn; in each, invaders and invaded boast of their successes. In Virginia, as was natural, the struggle has been severest and most unrelenting. The year dawned upon the slopes of Fredericksburg, as yet hardly cleared of the Federal dead who fell in Burnside's mad attempt to storm the heights. Through January and February the Northern army remained in cantonments at Falmouth, recruiting, drilling, and preparing for a new movement in the spring. By the end of the month of March the roads were tolerably fit; Hooker declared his 130,000 men irresistible, and crossed the Rappahannock, to return a week later with the loss of a third of his army, beaten and disgraced, out-manceuvred and out-fought at every point. The victory was dearly purchased by the loss of Stonewall Jackson, but for whose death it would have been, in all probability, much more complete. But Chancellorsville effectually disposed of the cry of "On to Richmond" for the year. Hooker, taking up a strong position north of the Rappahannock, busied himself once more with filling up the gaps which desertion and demoralisation had produced in his army. Lee, having repaired his losses, and anxious to strike a blow that would have its effect throughout the whole theatre of the conflict, determined on carrying the war into the enemy's territory. Leaving Hooker in a perfect bewilderment as to his plans, he moved northwards by his left, and before the Federal general knew where he was, had fallen upon Milroy's division at Winchester, and pushed his advance across the Potomac. Losing no time, he marched rapidly through Maryland into Pennsylvania, and made the whole North tremble for its great cities. The Federal General Meade, however, followed with equal rapidity; and Lee, finding his line of retreat threatened, was compelled to face about and give battle. The two armies met somewhat accidentally at Gettysburg; and an engagement took place the same day, which terminated altogether in favour of the Confederates, but unfortunately left the Federals in a remarkably strong position on a "horse-shoe" range of hills two miles from Gettysburg. Numbers and position were against the Confederates, but Lee trusted to his gallant soldiers, and the attack was ordered. The struggle lasted two days. In spite of the dashing gallantry of the Southern soldiers, the odds were too great; at the close of the second day's fight they had gained but little ground, and Lee reluctantly gave the order to retire. The Federals were too roughly handled for a vigorous pursuit. On two occasions Lee offered battle, and the enemy declined. Finally he made good his retreat across the Potomac with the bulk of his spoil, all his prisoners, and the loss of two guns. We confess, however, the sacrifices incurred were not redeemed by the advantages gained. The attack at Gettysburg was a mistake. Lee underrated his opponents and paid the penalty. So far as we can learn, there was no reason why the Confederate general should not have selected his own ground, and awaited attack in perfect confidence, and it was probably only the "untoward" victory of the first day's engagement which induced him to become the assailant. The moral effect of the invasion of Northern territory was, of course, marred by the spectacle of Lee's army retiring from a drawn battle, by the renewed courage inspired in the breasts of the Federals, and the heavy loss of life on the part of the South, unattended by any adequate result. A few months of inaction followed, and Federals and Confederates found themselves fronting each other almost in their old quarters north and south of the Rappahannock. At one time Meade seemed intent upon a forward march, but the attitude of his opponent quickly checked his advance, and resulted in his retreat, almost a flight, upon Centreville and Fairfax Court-house. Again Meade pushed forward, but it was only to find the Confederates too strongly posted on Mine End valley, and again he retired, with Lee's cavalry harassing his rear and plundering his trains. Both armies have by this time gone into winter-quarters. The balance of the success rests with the Confederates. Two decided victories, Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville; a drawn battle, in which they inflicted far greater loss on the enemy than they sustained; a raid into Pennsylvania and Maryland; the safety of the Southern capital for another twelve months—these are the laurels of General Lee and the Army of Virginia. The North has lost in its Virginia campaign 100,000 men by battle, desertion, and exhaustion, and it is actually not so near Richmond as it was fourteen months ago.

In Tennessee the contest has been hardly less severe. But here the Federals can boast of a decided progress. Early in the year the two armies, under Generals Bragg and Rosecrans, met at Murfreesborough. The battle lasted two days, and the Federals owed their escape from the most decisive disaster of the war to the presence, energy, and indomitable resolution of their commander. The trophies of the fight rested with the Confederates, but Rosecrans accomplished his purpose; he broke up the Confederate force that threatened Nashville, and occupied Murfreesborough, which he soon converted into a fortified camp. Early in the month of July Rosecrans again moved forward, driving the Confederates easily before him from Shelbyville and Tullahoma, and even from Chattanooga, where a determined resistance was expected. There his triumphs ceased. Engaged by Bragg on the Atlanta-road at Chickamauga Creek, some seventeen miles south of Chattanooga, his army sustained a disastrous defeat which ought to have cost the Federals the whole of Tennessee. At the same time General Burnside, who had marched from Kentucky, captured the force holding Cumberland Gap without firing a shot, but reaching Knoxville, was completely isolated, and both Federal armies were apparently lost. A month's inaction on the part of the Confederates restored their old numerical superiority to the Federals. Generals Grant, Sherman, and Hooker, brought up forces to Chattanooga, and Grant, finding himself at the head of 90,000 men, decided upon attacking the Confederates posted on the heights of Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain. The Confederates fought bravely for some time, but at length gave way under the superior numbers of the enemy, thus yielding to the Federals the first real victory they have achieved during the war. The blow that relieved Chattanooga saved General Burnside, and Longstreet, foiled in an attempt to take the town by assault, retired, pursued by the enemy's cavalry. By the latest accounts he appears to have turned round and inflicted a severe blow upon his pursuers. But he will hardly recover Knoxville. In Tennessee, then, the Federals have gained clear advantages. The possession of East Tennessee gives them a valuable base of operations against Richmond from the south, or against North Carolina. At Chattanooga they are in an equally commanding position for an attack upon Georgia or South Carolina. But they are still exposed to the inconvenience of a very long line of communication, running through an enemy's country. No doubt the Confederates will make every effort to break up their communications, and in the event of their success the position of the Federals in Tennessee will be most precarious.

In Mississippi and Louisiana the Federals have triumphs to boast of; but they are by no means of the importance occasionally ascribed to them. The capture of Vicksburg and Port Hudson has been useful to the North, not so much from the strong positions they have gained, as from the fact that the armies employed in reducing them became available for operations elsewhere. From first to last the capture of these two strongholds can hardly have cost the Federals less than 70,000 men; but it has not opened the Mississippi River to the commerce of the Western States; nor has it secured the States of Mississippi and Louisiana to the Union. On the contrary, both States are now, with the exception of three or four important points, almost denuded of Northern troops; whilst in the latter the Confederates have been strong enough, on more than one occasion, to inflict a severe defeat on the invader. The fighting in Arkansas can scarcely be called a campaign, for there has been nothing worthy of the name of a battle. And in Texas, General Banks's operations have been as yet confined to the sea-board. There has been no success to counter-balance the disgraceful defeat at Galveston, and the repulse at Sabine Pass. But the greatest failure of the year has been the attack upon Charleston, which holds out to-day as strongly as she did six months ago, and whose batteries send as fierce defiance to the Federal iron-clads now, as they did when the Keokuk was sunk, and the whole squadron drew off in the space of a brief half hour. Fort Sumter is in ruins; Fort Wagner is taken. But the flag still flies from the ruins of Sumter, and half a dozen batteries have risen to take the place of Wagner; 1863 leaves Charleston as safe, as undaunted, as when in Christmas 1860 she witnessed the retreat of the Federal garrison from Moultrie to Sumter.

We have touched upon the leading events of the war, so far as space will permit; and we find no reason for despondency or distrust in the ultimate success of the Confederate arms. It is plain that the further the Federals press into Confederate territory, the greater will be the resistance they will meet; the greater the physical difficulties they will have to overcome; the more need they will have of large reinforcements to their armies. Where are these to be obtained? The last draft drove New York into a riot, and required the presence of 40,000 soldiers to enforce it. In the spring the term of the three years' service men, the veterans of the army, will expire. How many of them will remain in the army? How will those who leave be replaced? At present the North is compelled to call away troops from Mississippi and Louisiana to hold Tennessee. And yet Confederate forces are recruiting in Tennessee and Kentucky. Unless the North can be prepared with 300,000 fresh men in the spring, so far from extending its conquests it will hardly hold its own. The lesson of the past years' struggle, with all its vicissitudes, its triumphs, its reverses, and its disappointments, is yet a hopeful one to the South. It proves that the difficulties of the invader grow with the progress he makes, whilst his resources are failing; and it points to the day—not so remote as Mr. Seward, in canvassing for Mr. Lincoln's next Presidency, would imagine—when the North, from sheer exhaustion, must so far restrict the operations of her armies, as virtually to abandon the dream of subjugation.

Injustice not Generosity.

AMONG the contrasts which abound in the respective State papers of the two American Confederations, there is always a striking difference of tone in regard to their relations with foreign Powers. Hitherto, the North has been querulous, suspicious, and insolent, finding at every turn some new occasion of complaint, and discerning in the most ordinary and inevitable applications of the clearest principles of public law a wrong calling for remonstrance, if not justifying war. The Confederate Government, on the other hand, was at first well satisfied with the consideration it received at the hands of Europe; and afterwards, when it was treated in some cases with scanty justice and still more scanty courtesy, it forbore to utter any exaggerated or undignified complaint, and confined itself to the simple expression of diplomatic regret at the failure of what it deemed its reasonable expectations. Now for the first time President Lincoln speaks on this subject in a tone of satisfaction; he admits, or we should rather say he boasts, that the relations of his country with the European Powers are such as he wishes them to be; he returns grateful thanks for the policy pursued by the Emperor of the French, and condescends to acknowledge, though perhaps less fully and frankly than they deserve, the sacrifices of personal honour and patriotic duty which Lord Russell has made out of pure devotion to the Federal cause. The Confederate statement is in complete contrast to this. President Davis regrets the necessity which obliges him to announce to Congress that the foreign relations of the Confederacy are by no means in a satisfactory position; and that the European Powers have pursued a course which, if not absolutely inconsistent with the legal status of neutrality, is certainly one of passive co-operation with the aggressor in the war. He speaks with calmness and dignity; but his tone is bitter, and the spirit of his Message is that of strong though suppressed indignation. It is impossible for any one to read it without feeling that it utters the convictions of a man who conceives that he has been grievously wronged, but who refrains from giving vent to his sense of injury in consideration of the paramount duties imposed upon him, as the chief of a nation only too ready to take fire at the first hint that it has suffered insult or injustice at the hands of others. Nor is it possible for any honest-minded man to read with attention the President's statement, and the evidence which it embodies, without feeling that he does well to be angry; and that if an English Minister had to present a similar statement to Parliament in regard to the conduct of Russia or France, the outburst of wrath which would ensue would make the avoidance of a quarrel an exceedingly difficult matter. It is beyond question that the policy pursued by Europe—that is, practically, the policy of France and England—has been from the first more favourable to the North than to the South. It is beyond question, moreover, that at every point at which a determination has had to be taken—on every occasion on which it has been necessary to choose between two lines of neutral action—the course least friendly to the Confederacy has been adopted; and we regret to say, it is equally beyond question that this system has been initiated, enforced, and insisted on in each and every instance by England, speaking by the voice of her authorised representative. It is with bitter shame and regret that those journals which are not restrained from speaking the truth on this subject, either by attachment to the Ministry or by devotion to Mr. Lincoln, have admitted the truth of this impeachment. Exception may be taken to the evidence of those newspapers which are notoriously hostile to the present Administration, and may be supposed, therefore, to take a jaundiced view of Lord Russell's policy. But no exception lies to the evidence of the ablest and bitterest of Liberal organs, which last week but one wrote an article defending Lord Russell as Foreign Minister, on the ground that he was preferable to either of his two possible successors, and which last week describes his policy in these pregnant words:—"From the known character of Lord Russell it may be safely assumed that ample justice, and something more, has always been done to the claims of the stronger side; and there is, on the same ground, every probability that he has leaned against the weaker combatants as heavily as the most strained construction of law would permit." It is Lord Russell, and England as represented by Lord Russell, that has been the author of the unfair and partial policy that has provoked a protest even from the calm and much-enduring statesman who directs the affairs of the Confederacy. We need hardly waste words in showing that, in pursuing this policy, both England and France have been guilty of extreme folly and shortsightedness. The Emperor is not so weak as to suppose that the new Empire of Mexico can stand, except by his support or by that of the Confederate States, against the hostility of the North; he is not blind to that hostility because for the moment his enemies observe a politic silence; nor does he forget that, if he is to be saved from a most expensive and dangerous burden, it must be by a Confederacy strong enough to establish a real balance of power on the American Continent. He does not need that we should remind him that the triumph of the North involves perils which even his courage cannot pretend to despise. Nor does any English statesman suppose that it is possible to conciliate the Yankees; to make them ashamed of their braggart, aggressive, unprovoked animosity, or of their greedy hankerings after Canada. It is admitted on all hands (except by Messrs. Bright, Taylor, and their associates) that the reconstruction of the Union means war with England. It is admitted by all men capable of reasoning that it is for our interests that the Confederate States should be strong enough to keep the North in check and preserve order and international equality in America without assistance from Europe. It is felt that we have every possible reason for desiring the speedy termination of this miserable conflict, which is destroying the producing powers that have fed our manufactories, and the consuming powers that have taken so large a portion of our manufactures. There is no doubt in any mind capable of influencing the national councils that the interests of England are identical with those of the South: that the interests of Europe require the establishment of a balance of power on the American continent. And yet Europe refuses to lend a hand to achieve that end, and England leans as heavily as possible against the South. How is it that such things can be?

Partly because England—the nation—is not fully aware how heavily her influence has been felt in the scale against the belligerent with whom she fully sympathises. As a contemporary says: "The general opinion has been that no case of injustice to the Confederates has arisen yet that is sufficiently well-marked to justify the interference of Parliament with the conduct of the Government." Partly, we affirm and will maintain, from a feeling of generosity of which England, perhaps, is alone capable. The friends of the North made a strong appeal to English generosity and English chivalry. "Do not take the occasion to avenge your old wrongs on the weakness of your enemy. Don't stump Jonathan to a fight when his hands are full. Bear with him now, when you cannot be supposed to fear him, and don't take up the side that has such strong inducements to offer you. Don't lean to the side on which your interest so obviously lies. Rather endure wrongs and pocket insults than, in order to enforce a right or resent an affront, lay yourselves open to the charge of seeking a plausible excuse for grasping at great but dishonourable advantages." And England listened to this appeal to national Quixotry, and acted as she did thirty years ago, when she ruined her most valuable possessions and added thirty millions to her debt in order to clear herself from "the stain of slavery." She thought only of the sacrifices she was asked to make, of the rights she was called on to forego, of the insults she was bidden to disregard. Her Minister knew better; and if England had understood the issue as well as he did, she would never have listened to his insidious counsels. She was willing to be generous to her enemy; she had no intention to be unjust to her friends. And we call attention to Mr. Davis's message for the express purpose of showing that the real issue has not been fairly presented to the country; that, under pretence of forbearing to press our rights against the North, she has really been guilty of gross and flagrant injustice towards the South; that, while intending simply to be lenient and forbearing towards a foe unable to resist her, she has been unwittingly made the accomplice of a Minister whose policy it has been to back the strong against the weak, the invader against the patriot, the aggressor and would-be conqueror against those who fight only for honourable peace and national independence.

One of the first acts of Earl Russell was to exclude from the ports of Great Britain and her colonies all prizes made by either party. This was nominally a neutral act; really, it has in no single case imposed inconvenience on the North, while, as it was intended, and as the North at once admitted that it would, it has operated to limit and cripple exceedingly the maritime warfare carried on by the South.

One of his first measures, in his communication with the Northern Government, was to call attention to the intermediate and dubious kind of recognition vouchsafed to the South, and to claim credit from Mr. Seward on that score. Then, when the Southern Commissioners came over, and Mr. Adams had the unparalleled impudence to complain of their reception as private individuals by the Foreign Minister, how did Earl Russell act? Did he inform Mr. Adams that it was not for a foreign Envoy to dictate to Her Majesty's Secretary of State whom he should and whom he should not receive? Did he remind him that, except as regards the formal matter of diplomatic recognition, the Confederate States stood in the same relation to England as the United States? Did he, in a word, answer with the dignity befitting the Minister of a great Power—nay, with the spirit of an English gentleman? He actually took the tone of apology, and informed the envoy who menaced him with foreign hostility if he dared to see whom he pleased, that "he did not expect to see the Confederate agents again." And so well did he observe this understanding, that his open insolence to Mr. Mason has been the theme of comment and rebuke from all independent journals, and finally obliged the Confederate Government to withdraw from the attempt to open diplomatic communication with a country whose Minister would neither observe the decencies of official intercourse nor the courtesies due from one gentleman to another.

We pass over the significant fact that Lord Russell actually condescended to inquire, on the complaint of Mr. Adams, whether the citizens of Nassau had or had not been guilty of a new crime against laws human and divine: the crime of trading with a belligerent Power without the permission of its enemy. We pass over the violent measures which he has taken, by perversion of law and vexatious abuse of all the delays, appeals, and annoyances which it permits, to prevent the purchase of ships in England for the service of the Confederacy, while British ships every week convey hundreds of Irish recruits to the Federal armies, and thousands of Birmingham rifles to the Federal arsenals. We come to a more flagrant, open, and daring violation of honour, neutrality and pledged good faith—the acknowledgment by England of an invalid blockade.

As to the fact, habemus confitentem reum. In his correspondence with the Federal Government, Lord Russell expressly notes the invalidity of the blockade, and claims credit for the friendliness to the North displayed in recognising it in the face of that invalidity. And this utterly confounds all his hesitating and prevaricating pleas in its favour, as one which we should ourselves have recognised, before his audience at Blairgowrie. He might have a better case on the ground of generosity, if English interests alone were involved. But generosity to the strong at the expense of the weak generally goes by an uglier name; and generosity which consists in the violation of an express treaty with one belligerent in order to oblige another is commonly described as treachery, falsehood, and dishonour. As Mr. Davis remarks, Lord Russell invited the Confederate States to accept a convention consisting of three articles, two of them concerning neutrals alone, the third involving the interests also of the belligerent less powerful at sea. The South has kept her share of this engagement faithfully. She has respected our flag when it covered Northern goods; she has respected our goods under the Federal flag. She calls upon us to observe the third article of the compact; that a blockade, to be binding, must be enforced by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast. Lord Russell hesitates, quibbles, prevaricates, and finally meets the difficulty by a direct falsehood. He, who in 1856 took these words in their literal and natural sense, and justly denounced them as a mischievous and disastrous concession on our part, now declares that they mean nothing at all, except to declare the old law of nations, that a blockading force must be able to create some real and evident danger to ships approaching the blockaded coast! Did this man speak the truth before Parliament then, or does he speak it before Europe and America now? For one or other of his statements must have been wilfully and consciously untrue.

Here we pause. When once the real state of the case becomes apparent to the public; when once it is understood that the cry for generosity to the North is a cry for injustice to the South; when once it is comprehended that the execration uttered on the idea of an alliance with slavery against freedom is really a plea for the violation of a distinct and unmistakable treaty entered into with a view to the exigencies, and after the commencement of this very war, we feel sure that no further appeals to their prejudices, no further sophistry and declamation, will avail to silence the demand of Englishmen that justice shall be done and faith be kept. Meantime, let us pray the Confederate States to bear in mind that Lord Russell is not England; and that it is only by deceiving and bewildering the English nation that he obtains leave to insult and wrong their kindred of the South.

The Budgets: Federal and Confederate.

A FORTNIGHT ago we dwelt upon the marked contrast presented by the state of affairs in the North and in the South. Both sections of the late Union were three years ago free from debt, and in the enjoyment of a commercial and industrial prosperity that was at once the admiration and envy of nations taxed for the debts contracted by past generations. We do not agree with those who suppose that the United States had a monopoly of social and political freedom; but it is undeniable that they were as free as any people could desire to be. And they had an unprecedented advantage. Every other nation had purchased liberty by sacrifices of blood and treasure, whilst the United States had liberty without debt. The Union was dissolved, and the new Confederation and the old Federation were involved in war. It might have been supposed that at the end of three years both belligerents would have exhibited a decadence from their wonted prosperity; but so far as the surface is concerned, the North seems to have grown richer on account of her profuse expenditure, whilst the South manifests unmistakable signs of the exhaustion caused by the outlay necessitated to carry on the gigantic struggle. Two strong men are stricken with the same disease; but the one in sickness wears the appearance of exuberant health, whilst the other plainly evinces suffering. As we pointed out, these appearances are utterly delusive, and the seeming prosperity of the North conceals from the superficial observer inevitable ruin and collapse. The reports of Mr. Chase and Mr. Memminger exactly illustrate this position; and if they are carefully studied cannot fail to gratify the friends of the South, and to fill the partisans of the North with dismal forebodings. But there is no chance of such lengthy documents being studied by the general public, and we, therefore, propose to notice a few leading features and facts.

The candour with which Mr. Memminger tells his fellow-citizens of their monetary difficulties is admirable. If Mr. Chase had been called upon to prepare a statement of the financial condition of the South, he could not, unless he had falsified figures, have produced a more unvarnished balance-sheet. The Confederate Secretary abstains from indicating facts which cannot be ignored, and which make the prospect considerably brighter. Considering the relative populations, it would appear from the figures of the two budgets that the South owes more than the North, but a moment's reflection shows that such is not the case. In July, 1863, the public debt of the United States was $1,098,793,181, and the public debt of the Confederate States was $701,447,510; that is, about $50 per head of the population of the United States, and about $85 per head of the white population of the Confederate States. Of course, in excluding the negroes, we are making the calculation tell unfairly against the South, since the negroes, though not payers, are the producers of the wealth that pays taxation. Including them, in the South the indebtedness per head in July, 1863, was about $70, and in the North about $50. But more than two-thirds, that is $701,447,510 of the Confederate debt was unfunded and had been contracted for purchases made with the currency five times greater than the country can bear even in time of war. Moreover, a considerable portion of the funded debt had been created in liquidation of Government liabilities contracted on such unfavourable terms. If the Confederate ports had been open to commerce, as we contend they would have been had England and France been faithful to their treaty engagements and had refused to recognise a paper blockade, then the currency of the South would not have been unduly inflated, and the Confederate Government would have made its purchases at usual war prices. Whilst the Northern debt in July, 1863 would have been $50 per head of the population, the Southern debt would have been less than $20 per head. We are not putting forth a paradox. We are not contending that an inflated currency, and the consequent depreciation of Government issues, is a good thing. Our object is to show that it is absurd to judge of the financial position of the South, of her de facto expenditure, and the actual strain upon her resources, by merely looking at Mr. Memminger's figures. No doubt the South, from banking with the North, had not at the time of secession a large stock of bullion on hand; and in further proof of this we may cite the fact that the separation did not cause a commercial crash in New York, which would have happened if Northern houses had been under heavy advance to their Southern clients. But the stock of bullion in the South was large enough for internal commerce, and that stock has not been diminished. It has disappeared from circulation, but it remains in the country. When peace is proclaimed it will again come into use, whilst the North will be drained of her bullion which she is now using to purchase supplies in Europe. Whatever may be the nominal debt of the Confederate States, the real debt is no more than it would be if the currency were in a normal condition. When peace is declared the North will have nothing to offer in exchange for European gold; but the South will have a stock of cotton worth at least £20,000,000 sterling, or in Confederate currency, $200,000,000. But it may be said that that will be so much worse for the Government, which will have to redeem its obligations at par. And so it would if the unfunded debt was not wiped off or reduced to such an amount as proposed by Mr. Memminger. Foreseeing this, as well as desiring to remedy present evils, the debt will go doubt be forthwith funded. However high the interest demanded, the Confederate Government must pay it in justice to the community, for then public credit will be benefited by the return of prosperity in the gradual reduction of the interest, and therefore the amount of the public debt. The South is suffering from a financial difficulty that peace will remove; for the North there is no such relief. We do not mean that the South is any better for her present trouble, and we regret that Southern statesmen, well knowing the antagonism of the North, did not in years past provide and station a navy which, in the event of separation and war, would have kept her ports open to the commerce of the world. What we mean is, that the position of the South is not so bad as it seems, is vastly better than that of the North, and will improve rapidly after the cessation of hostilities. We submit that Mr. Memminger, whilst with praise-worthy candour presenting a truthful balance-sheet, might with propriety have shown the silver lining to the cloud. However, he does not address himself to foreigners, and no harm can come from a brave and determined people having an exaggerated notion of the difficulties to be overcome.

Mr. Chase's budget is of a very different character, so far as style is concerned, but its figures are even less encouraging. The Federal Secretary begins by announcing that his sanguine expectations have been exceeded, and ends by solemnly thanking God for the success that has attended his administration. That Mr. Chase has displayed great ability is unquestionable. His object has been to meet present requirements, and industriously, and with what his countrymen call smartness—a word which means unscrupulous cunning—he has pressed into his service the national resources. He has inundated the country with greenbacks, which he parades as the new national currency—very much in the manner the late Mr. Muntz used to eulogise the paper currency that he wanted John Bull to adopt instead of the old-fashioned gold and silver coinage. In order to distribute his greenbacks, he has not only paid Government debts with them, but he has substituted for the issues of the private banks the products of his own presses. In every considerable town he has set up a Branch National Bank, the business of these establishments being to float Government paper. Nor has Mr. Chase been unmindful of the necessity of getting his greenbacks funded as fast as possible. To effect this he has employed agents who have gone about the country selling bonds, very much in the way that in the olden times was adopted by the touters employed by lottery-keepers. His industry and tact have been duly rewarded, and he boasts that every man in the United States has more or less interest in the stability of the Government. This is true, as far as it goes, and is equally applicable to the Confederate States; but the point is, whether the Government obligations are redeemable. A national debt is a safeguard against revolution so long as the national credit is unimpaired, but it fosters revolution when there is national insolvency. Mr. Chase is clearly of a different opinion. Like "kite-flying" merchants, he looks upon heavy indebtedness as the best foundation for credit. He says, "It is a distinguishing characteristic of our financial history in this rebellion that the public credit, which was at the lowest ebb in the months which preceded its breaking out, has steadily improved in the midst of the terrible trials it has brought upon the country." Such a statement was never before made by a financial minister. When we were engaged in war, and spending more than we could raise from taxation, it was common enough for the leaders of the war party to assure their friends that it was all right and safe, because our commercial supremacy gave us the carrying trade of the world, and enabled us to pay the interest; but no one ever ventured to assert that our credit was improved by our growing indebtedness. It occurs to us that if Mr. Chase would essay to obtain a loan in gold, either at home or abroad, he would find money rather tighter and dearer in 1864 than it was in 1860. But then Mr. Chase does not care about gold, and might tell us that the higher the interest demanded by the lender, the greater the credit of the borrower. Some of his maxims are about as reasonable.

We have observed that Mr. Chase's figures are not quite so encouraging as his comments; and it will be easy to establish that position. According to the budget, the debt of the United States in July, 1864, will be $1,686,956,641.44, and in July, 1865, $2,231,935,190.37. Mr. Chase thus gives the future debt to a cent; but such precision is rather suspicious, and reminds us of accommodation bills, which are always drawn for some odd pence, in order to make them look genuine. Mr. Chase's calculations fall very short of those made by his political friends, who estimate the public debt at $3,000,000,000 in 1864, and we venture to think the larger estimate is more likely to be correct. It must likewise be borne in mind that the States are also contracting debts. But on the present occasion we will accept Mr. Chase's figures, and without going to 1865 assume that in 1864 the public debt of the United States will be about £340,000,000 sterling. The interest on this debt is nearly 6 per cent. Mr. Chase says it was on the 1st October only 3.95 per cent.; but he gives us a statement that shows that we must not rely on his calculations of interest. As we have seen, Mr. Chase estimates the debt in July 1864 at $1,686,956,641; but a third of this was to be contracted between July 1863 and July 1864, and consequently interest on this large amount will not have to be paid in the first year, ending July 1864. If, then, we make an average, we may assume that interest will have to be paid in that year on $1,500,000,000. Now, the interest on this at 4 per cent.—Mr. Chase takes it at 3.95—is $60,000,000. But Mr. Chase estimates the interest to be paid in the fiscal year, ending 30th of June, 1864, at $85,387,677—or nearly 6 per cent. We hope our readers have followed these figures, for they are a fair test of Mr. Chase's reliability, and justify our assumption that the rate of interest is not 3.95 per cent., but 6 per cent.

Accepting Mr. Chase's estimates, the interest on the public debt in 1864 will be £21,000,000, or equal to 21s. per head of the population; whilst the interest on the public debt of England is about 17s. 6d. per head of the population. If the war lasts till July, 1865, the interest will be equal to 27s. per head of the population.

Meanwhile, let us see what proportion of the lavish expenditure is met by taxation. We are told over and over again that the country never was so prosperous, and it is true that from the inflation of the currency and the excessive Government expenditure, the opportunity for payment of taxes was all that could be desired in the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1863. The expenditure during that period was $714,709,995. The total income during that period derived from taxation and sale of lands was $111,399,764; that is, not a sixth part of the expenditure. Of this $37,640,787 was from internal revenue, and only $1,485,103 from direct taxes. No wonder the people have borne such burdens without murmuring; but it is odd that Mr. Chase should congratulate himself on the result, seeing that the income from internal revenue and direct taxation was not half so much as he expected. The sovereign people refuse to pay now they are being enriched with Mr. Chase's issues; and under such circumstances we think the prospect of future payment is not very promising.

We elsewhere publish some calculations as to the solvency of the States of Iowa and Pennsylvania. Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, affirms that the public debt will foot up to $3,000,000,000, and in that case all the property of Iowa, except $80,000,000, will be pledged; and Pennsylvania would not be able to meet her engagements by $9,000,000. Even at Mr. Chase's estimate for July, 1865, the national resources will be pretty well exhausted; so that, even if the Union could be brought to the hammer, the assets, over and above the payment of creditors, would be very small. Altogether, we vastly prefer the position of the Confederate States. The South will have a heavy burden of debt, but likewise the means to meet it. The North will have a much heavier debt, and less assured means of paying the interest thereon. The South is at the worst, and will improve with peace; the North is at the best, and must certainly suffer a financial collapse.

THE CAUSES OF THE AMERICAN WAR.

BY A. T. BLEDSOE, LL.D., PROFESSOR OF MATHEMATICS, UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA.

No. 3.

A FEDERAL organ in this city exults in the "triumphant and crushing logic of Mr. Cobden." "Nothing," says that journal, "more damaging to the South—nothing more unanswerable by its friends—has ever been said. The authority of the first of free-traders has now extinguished the pretence that the South is fighting against a protectionist tariff. Mr. Cobden was in America in 1859, the year preceding the election of Mr. Lincoln, and he was disappointed to find there was so little interest felt on the free trade question—that there was no party formed, no public agitation, no discussion whatever upon the subject of free trade. To this statement he adds the records of an experience common to all who have studied the documentary evidence of the causes of secession." In these bold assertions the journal in question reflects all the confidence of Mr. Cobden himself, who seems most perfectly and profoundly convinced of the truth of his positions. "We were told," says he, "in the House of Commons, by one who was once the great champion of democracy and of the rights and privileges of the unsophisticated millions, that this civil war was originated because the South wished to establish free-trade principles, and that the North would not allow it." Then, having adduced the facts to demolish this position, Mr. Cobden adds: "Is it not astonishing, in the face of facts like these, that any one should have the temerity, with any regard to decency or any sense of self-respect, to get up in the House of Commons and say secession has been upon a question of free trade and protection?" "It is a war," says he, "to establish a slave empire. This is its sole aim and object. The question of free trade and protection has nothing whatever to do with it. Slavery, slavery—slavery," he cries—"that is all. It is this object and purpose with which the war was begun, that in my opinion renders success to the Secessionists impossible."

Now we hope, we trust, nay, in a judgment of charity, we believe, that the organ in question is profoundly ignorant of the documentary evidence to which it so confidently appeals. Mr. Cobden relies on one document only—the report of the famous Committee of Thirty-three. But it takes more than one swallow to make a summer, more than one document to make the history of a great empire, or of a great revolution. Mr. Cobden's inference may, if any one pleases, flow from his premises; but his premises are too narrow—far too narrow—to support a just conclusion. It is due to Mr. Cobden's dialectical skill to say that his argument is admirably constructed. His premises are well chosen, and his inference is well drawn. Nothing could present a more plausible and taking view of his side of the American question—that is to say, provided it be exhibited to those only who have little or no acquaintance with the history of American affairs. Nothing is better calculated to deceive and mislead such persons. Hence, if the assertion or opinion of Mr. Cobden be true, that there is no "Protestant country in the world where the masses of the people are so illiterate as in England," then must his most skillfully-put argument have produced a tremendous effect when addressed to those masses. No wonder, then, that it called forth from the thousands who heard him reiterated "cheers" and cries of "hear, hear," nor that it should produce a similar impression among the tens of thousands who have read his speech at Rochester. In this view of the subject, we fully concur with the sentiment that "Nothing more damaging to the South has ever been said."

But is it true that "nothing more unanswerable by the friends of the South" has ever been uttered? If so, then indeed must the cause of the South be impregnable, and the very strength of her enemies will be found to be sheer weakness in her hands.

We do not deny that the institution of slavery, or rather the violent and angry agitation of the slavery question, was one of the causes of the dissolution of the Union. But how far this was a real cause, and how far it was only the hypocritical pretext to cover ulterior designs, is not the question now before us. This question relates to the assertion of Mr. Cobden, that the desire of free trade, and a hatred of the system of protection tariffs, was not one of the causes of secession. "The political field was wholly occupied by one question," says he, "and that question was slavery." Let us, then, look beyond that little field, and see if we cannot find another cause of secession.

"The tariff is," says Mr. Everett, in an address delivered in New York on the 4th of July, 1861, "with one exception, the alleged monster wrong, for which South Carolina drove the Union to the verge of civil war, and which, next to Abolitionism, the South has been taught to regard as the most grievous of the oppressions which she suffers at the hands of North." &c. Every reader of American history knows it was John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, who taught the South to regard the protective tariff as "the monster wrong" under which she was so grievously and so cruelly oppressed. Nor did South Carolina ever find relief, except at short intervals, from a sense of that wrong, or cease to groan under a conviction of its oppression, until she had finally seceded from the Union. This system of protection tariffs, then, as one great source of that deep, abiding, and embittered hostility between the two sections, may surely be regarded as one of the causes of the secession of the South.

Henry Clay, although he was not the author, became the leading advocate, of the protection policy, which was called by him and his party the "American System." It was, indeed, the "American system" as opposed to the interests of the Old World; but it was the Yankee system as opposed to the interests of the South. This became so apparent in 1832, and was so keenly felt by the South, that the Union was in imminent peril. It was then that Mr. Clay startled the Senate with the words, "Save the country, save the Union, save the American system," and concluded a most eloquent appeal to the friends of that system with the exclamation, "How is the system to be sustained against the united South, and the increased impending dangers of civil war?"

This danger was averted and the Union saved by one of Mr. Clay's compromises; according to which the protective policy was to be gradually abandoned, and the tariff reduced to the revenue standard. The compromise was accepted by Mr. Calhoun, but not approved by Mr. Webster. "The honourable member admits," says Mr. Webster, "that though there will be no positive surrender of the power there will be a stipulation not to exercise it—a treaty of peace and amity, as he says, which no American statesman can hereafter stand up and violate." But American statesmen did afterward stand up and violate that treaty of amity and peace, and we are sorry to add that Mr. Clay was foremost among the number. "The Tariff Act of 1842," says Governor Hammond, "was equally stringent with that of 1828. This Act, which was passed in open violation of the compromise of 1833—a violation which should for ever put an end to all faith in legislative compromises and Congress."

"A resort to State action to resist this oppressive Act was again proposed by some in South Carolina," continues Governor Hammond, who was Mr. Calhoun's successor in the Senate of the United States, "but Mr. Calhoun resisted it because he believed the next congressional elections would bring into power a party strong enough to repeal it." But this hope proved fallacious. Hence "in 1844," he says, "a more strenuous effort was made to excite State interposition. But Mr. Calhoun resisted still. There was one hope left." That hope also proved delusive. Mr. Calhoun submitted still; because, as he believed, "the Union could not survive" the interposition of the State—so deep and so enduring was his love of the Union. "But," concludes Governor Hammond, "his love of the struggles of more than a quarter of a century," from 1832 to 1850, "the protective system, though somewhat weakened in opinion and narrowed in practice, still flourishes, in violation of every principle of free and equal government—a gross infraction of the Constitution and a deadly injury to the South."

Now, in all this have we not conclusive evidence of the existence of a party at the South opposed to the protective system? Has Mr. Cobden never heard nor read of this party? nor of its life-long struggle with that "monster wrong," that "deadly injury to the South,"—the protective system? Has he never heard nor read of the impatience of the South, and especially of South Carolina, under the galling injustice of that system, nor of how it loosened the bonds of the Union? It is a remarkable, a significant fact, that South Carolina, in which the protective system had always been the most keenly felt and the most vehemently resented, was the first State to secede from the Union; while Kentucky, the State of the great protectionist, Henry Clay, and herself the recipient of some of its advantages, never seceded at all. Does this look as if protection had nothing to do with the phenomenon of secession?

But we are not left to inference. No one who has ever lived in America, or is at all familiar with its political history, can be ignorant of the fact that the "monster wrong" of the Tariff is one of the alleged causes of disunion. The debates in Congress, and all the periodical literature of the day connected with American politics, are replete with evidences to this effect. One of the most popular pamphlets on the Northern Side of the question, written by Professor Hodge, of Princeton, and scattered all over both sections of the Union just before Mr. Lincoln's inauguration, bears direct testimony to the glowing expectations of the South of the great results to flow from "the advantages of cotton and free trade." In a reply to Professor Hodge, written and published at the South in 1861, we find these words: "In the present Southern movement, the voice of the people is unmistakable. They think, as Mr. Hodge tells us, that secession will make the South a great people; that it will add vastly to their trade, population, and advancement, in all material and moral good. They rely with confidence on the advantages of cotton and free trade." Here again is evidence from both sections of the Union that the South regarded the protection system as an incubus on her greatness and prosperity, from which secession and free trade would deliver her.

In another work, entitled "Southern Wealth and Northern Profits," written by a Northern man and published in 1860, the year of Mr. Lincoln's election, it is estimated that by means of the Tariff alone the South was made to pay the enormous tribute of $40,000,000 annually to the North. The estimate by Southern writers reached $50,000,000. The author of "Southern Wealth and Northern Profits," a New-Yorker, and the well-known editor of the Democratic Review, says, "the profits of other business may be approximated as follows:

Bounties to fisheries per annum .. .. .	$ 1,500,000
Customs, per annum, disbursed at the North .. .	40,000,000
Profits of manufactures .. .. .	30,000,000
" of importers .. .. .	16,000,000
" of shipping, imports and exports .. .	40,000,000
" on travellers .. .. .	60,000,000
" of teachers at the South, sent North .. .	5,000,000
" of agents, brokers, commissions, &c. .. .	10,000,000
" of capital drawn from the South .. .	30,000,000
Total from these sources .. .. .	$231,500,000

* The Carolina Tribute to Calhoun. Page 307.

"This is an approximation," adds the author, "of the annual load which Southern industry is required to carry, and the means of paying it depends upon black labour. . . . No matter how great may be the production of wealth at the South, it pours off into Northern coffers as rapidly as it is created, and, singularly enough, the recipients of that wealth are continually upbraiding the South with its production."

Mr. Story and other Northern writers admit that the Tariff question was one of the alleged causes of disunion. But he insists that this was merely a pretext. What! the tribute of $50,000,000 a year a mere pretext! What! $231,000,000 a year, paid out of Southern wealth in the shape of Northern profits, a mere pretext! Better—far better—might it have been said that the tax of a few pence upon tea was a mere pretext. If, then, the authors of the Revolution of 1776 could resist that tax, exclaiming, "Millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute," surely their descendants may be allowed to refuse to pay millions upon millions for tribute—especially for tribute to those from whom they received nothing but scorn and contempt in return.

The truth is, that during the year 1860 many persons, both at the North and at the South, began to calculate the value of the Union. The well-grounded fear that an unscrupulous and rapacious faction, confined to one section, would soon usurp all the powers of the Government, roused them to this calculation. The effect in both sections of the Union was prodigious. The South, for the first time, was made to see, in all its naked magnitude, the stupendous burden under which she had so long groaned. Thousands and tens of thousands of her sons, including the more intelligent portion of them, began to realise the profound insight and prophetic wisdom of Calhoun. "The dazzling splendours of the 'American system,'" which had been conceived in a spirit of hostility to the Old World, faded from their view, and the frightful features of the Yankee system occupied the field of vision. Of course, that odious and oppressive system could no longer be tolerated; especially after it was seen that the Northern faction could have everything its own way, and institute a still more grievous drain upon Southern wealth.

The effect at the North was equally great. Professor Hodge, in the paper already referred to, declared that the South owed all her prosperity to her union with the North, and that her dream of prosperity and wealth out of the Union would prove a fatal delusion. "The North," said he, "can do without the South, and hold on in her grand career of prosperity, wealth and glory; while the South must inevitably sink into insignificance and contempt." But his eyes were soon opened. In the course of three months, he again appeared in print, with the burden of his song entirely changed. For it seems that, in the meantime, he had discovered that the North really had some need of the South, and that if she seceded it would be quite necessary to whip her back into the Union.

In like manner the New York Tribune, the leading advocate of the Black Republican faction, as late as December 1860, says, "Whenever a portion of this Union, large enough to form an independent self-subsisting nation, shall see fit to say to the residue, 'We want to get away from you,' we shall say—and we trust self-respect, if not regard for the principle of self-government, will constrain the residue of the American people to say—Go!" But how sudden the transformation! How quick the Somerset! Having discovered the great secret disclosed by "Southern Wealth and Northern Profits," or by some other similar production, it turned right around, and said, the South shall not go—must not go; it will be ruin to the North. "The almighty dollar" prevailed, and "self-respect" with "the principle of self-government," was given to the winds.

Mr. Banks, the Black-Republican Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress, and the author of the low slang expression, "Let the Union slide," was as suddenly converted as Mr. Greeley, the editor of the New York Tribune. And having been thoroughly converted, he became a general in Mr. Lincoln's grand army of coercion to keep the Union from sliding. In short, all the leaders of the Anti-slavery party who had so long and so openly fought under the banner of secession, on which was inscribed the motto, "No Union with Slaveholders," and who had so often rent the very heavens with the shout, "Down with the pro-slavery compact of the Constitution," down with that "covenant with death and agreement with hell;"—yea, all these very consistent and pious politicians wheeled right around and fell into the ranks with Greeley and Banks for the preservation of the "pro-slavery compact" and a forced "union with slaveholders!" The very men who had been the loudest in the cry for a dissolution of the Union, became, all on a sudden, the fiercest and most sanguinary advocates for its preservation. Comment is unnecessary—comment is beggared and confounded.

The cause of all these changes is no secret. The word by which they were wrought or completed went forth from Washington. When Mr. Lincoln was asked, "Why not let the South go?" he simply replied, "Let the South go? Where, then, shall we get our revenue?" This word is upon record, and it speaks volumes. I do not mean to assail slavery, said he; my oath of office and the Constitution forbid; as he proclaimed to the whole world in his inaugural address. But I mean "to collect the revenue," and hold the "property of the Union." That is my purpose and design, and that is all. Let the South go, indeed! Where, then, should we "get our revenue?" What, then, would become of that glorious "American System," which has so long cheated the silly bird of the South into laying the golden egg for the North? No! The South cannot go! The South shall not go!

Where, then, "shall we get our revenue?" This opens the secret of the war. It is the old story repeated of the rage of Pharaoh, who, seeing his revenues so sadly reduced, if not ruined, by the exodus of a despised and oppressed people, pursued them with the fury of his vengeance. That the people of the North really worshipped the Union must be admitted. But, on the other hand, it cannot be denied that that worship waxed and waned with the advantages derived by them from the Union. In New England especially, this worship, like all others, except the worship of "the almighty dollar," was exceedingly prone to decay. The Union was, indeed, but the golden calf of their idolatry; and no less than five times in the course of her history did her mercenary sons threaten to dethrone the unpropitious god. The legislature of Massachusetts, as every reader of American history knows, passed a resolution declaring the State out of the Union, simply because, from the acquisition of the territory of Louisiana, she apprehended that the balance of political power might turn in favour of the South. But how deep, how intense, how earnest, how all-absorbing became her worship of the Union when this balance was entirely overthrown in favour of the North!—when the General Government, in all its departments and with all its powers, fell into the hands of the North, so that she could plunder the South without stint, without limit, and without the least check or restraint! Then, indeed, she could worship the Union, as Moloch was worshipped of old, by the sacrifice of millions of human victims on its bloody altar, and present to her sister States of the South, not the three fair words of "Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity," but the grim Jacobinical alternative of "Fraternity or Death!"

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

RICHMOND, November 30.

We have suffered a serious disaster in Tennessee. Lookout Mountain, Mission Ridge, the lines of Chickamauga, are in the hands of the enemy. General Bragg has fallen back to Kinggold, in Northern Georgia, with what loss it is impossible for us to form any reasonable conjecture. As usual, the telegrams of the Associated Press are more enigmatical than any responses of the Delphic oracle in the most inebriated condition of the Pythoness. We are told, for example, that the loss of the retreating Confederate army was 1,000 in killed and wounded, while that of the pursuing Federal army was 20,000 in killed and wounded—a disproportion of casualties which, if it were true, would convert defeat into brilliant victory, and make it only necessary for General Bragg to go on retreating and mowing down his pursuers, with the certainty that before he reached the Gulf of Mexico the Federal army would be completely annihilated. As far as we can understand the events of the past week by comparing the accounts of the Yankee press with the fragmentary, fitful, confused statements of the operators at Atlanta, it would seem that after a heavy cannonade, kept up during Sunday the 22nd inst., and heavy skirmishing the following day, the Yankees charged our works on Lookout Mountain at daylight on Tuesday the 24th in immense strength, at the same time engaging our right wing on Mission Ridge; that a desperate and sanguinary fight ensued, which was kept up throughout the day, the Yankees having been repulsed again and again by the corps of D. H. Hill, under the personal command of General Breckinridge; that at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, by sheer force of numbers, they carried our left centre, whereupon our men, seeing themselves entirely cut off, fell into great confusion, and were made prisoners to the extent of two or three brigades; that during the night the remnant joined the right wing on Mission Ridge, where they were attacked on Wednesday with great vigour; that the right wing gallantly held its ground under the command of Hardee and strewn the heights with the dead bodies of the assailants; that after night-fall, the enemy having enfiladed our position on Mission Ridge, it became necessary to abandon it, which was done, leaving a considerable number of guns in the enemy's hands, besides prisoners, variously stated at from one to five thousand. There is some doubt with regard to the present position of Bragg's army. His headquarters are at Ringgold. Whether he holds the Chickamauga lines or not is not known. The telegraph holds to the affirmative, but the general belief is the other way.

The news of this disaster has certainly produced a considerable depression here, but it was not unlooked for. The knowledge of the fact that Bragg's army was utterly without confidence in their leader and that Longstreet had moved off with his fine corps d'armée to operate elsewhere, had prepared the public mind for the reception of disagreeable intelligence from Lookout Mountain, and it was this knowledge on the part of the enemy which doubtless precipitated the attack. They profited by Longstreet's absence as Hooker had hoped to profit at Chancellorsville, when that heroic leader was investing Suffolk—the difference was that Hooker dashed himself against Stonewall Jackson, and Grant had no such obstacle in his way.

The retreat of Bragg, under circumstances of so much discouragement, makes the success or failure of Longstreet at Knoxville a matter of the very first importance. If he can force Burnside to capitulate, the victory of Grant at Lookout Mountain will be rendered of comparatively little consequence, and the Yankees may be compelled after all to withdraw from Tennessee, which has been the principal object of our Western campaign. We are informed that Knoxville is invested on all sides; that Burnside and his whole force are shut up within the town; that Longstreet is shelling it; that all the Federal troops in Eastern Tennessee, other than Burnside's force, have left the country by way of Cumberland Gap, and we may therefore reasonably hope that two or three days' time will suffice for the reduction of the place and the capture of the garrison. There is, indeed, a rumour that Knoxville has surrendered, but it is not credited. The situation is one in which time is everything. If Burnside's supplies are as scant as has been represented, he may have been compelled to yield before this writing; otherwise, should Grant prefer reinforcing him to an advance in the direction of Rome and Atlanta, and Longstreet not be strong enough to carry Knoxville by direct assault, he may be reduced to the necessity of abandoning the siege, and making a safe retreat into Virginia or North Carolina.

There has been heavy fighting on the line of the Rapidan, and a general engagement is expected at any moment. On Thursday, the 26th instant, a despatch from General Lee informed the Secretary of War that Meade was moving with his whole army towards the lower fords at Ely's and Germanna Mills, obviously with the design of crossing, and that he was pressing forward with all haste to confront him. That night the corps of the Federal General French crossed at Germanna Mills, and the next day advanced towards Spotsylvania Court-house, for the purpose, as was thought, of making a flank movement upon the division of General Edward Johnson, belonging to Ewell's corps, the old command of Stonewall Jackson. Johnson's division was at that time on the march for the ford at Germanna Mills. The two forces came in collision in a field distant one mile and a-half from the river, near the plank-road leading from Orange Court-house to Fredericksburg (so well remembered from the importance it bore in the memorable battles of Chancellorsville and the Wilderness), at half-past two of the afternoon, and a desperate conflict ensued, which was maintained with great obstinacy on both sides, until night closed over the bloody scene. The enemy was repulsed at all points, and just before dark was glad to get behind his intrenchments, from some of which our troops dislodged him. Our loss in this engagement was about 500 in killed and wounded; the loss of the enemy was certainly much greater, and we captured a considerable number of prisoners. These latter, with our wounded, have been brought to the city. While French and Johnson were thus engaged, our general, Rosser, made a bold and successful dash upon the enemy's ordnance train, which was moving in the rear of French's corps, and took 100 ordnance wagons, forty ambulances, 400 mules, and the entire guard and body of teamsters accompanying them, much of which plunder was destroyed on the spot, though the mules and ambulances were safely brought off, and the prisoners are in security on Belle Isle.

Intelligence of these operations having reached the city late Friday night, the belief was generally entertained that a battle would be joined on Saturday between the armies of Meade and Lee in full force; but the morning of Saturday, the 28th November, throughout Eastern Virginia, was probably just such a morning as hung that day over Ludgate-hill and Fleet-street. The densest fog that has been seen for many years enveloped all objects. In the city, the other side of the street was but dimly visible. Carriages, as they rattled by, vanished into a thick gloom at the distance of fifty paces. In the open field it was impossible to discern anything at close pistol-shot. Of course all military manœuvres were impracticable in such a mist, and a cannonade was just as likely to prove destructive to friend as foe. The fog gave way on Sunday morning to a heavy rain, which further suspended the inevitable shock of arms; but, as all believe, this cannot be delayed beyond three or four days at the farthest. Momentous issues depend upon the result of this encounter. The army of Meade is superior to that of Lee by two to one; they are moreover flushed by the recent successes of the Yankees in the West, and they advance under the miserable delusion that the reduction of Richmond would terminate the war, and thus cover them with imperishable laurels; but despite these material and factitious advantages of the enemy, we have the liveliest confidence that the army of Lee is invincible, and will maintain its prestige on another victorious field.

The bombardment of Sumter goes on with small results, in a most theatrical style, with blaze of calcium lights and roar of great guns at regular intervals. Charleston is honoured with a shell now and then, but has not been set on fire. The most painful incident of the last week has been the killing of Captain Frank H. Harleston, while going his rounds over the ruins of Sumter: a most gallant, devoted, and accomplished soldier and gentleman, whose loss is deeply lamented. Four more heavy pieces of ordnance have been unmasked by the Yankees at Battery Gregg, and several mortars of extraordinary size have been added to the offensive materiel of Morris Island; but there is no great reason to apprehend that, with all their weight of metal and expenditure of ammunition, they will accomplish anything beyond what has already been achieved.

The solitary waters of James River, which have been disturbed by nothing more than a few Yankee gun-boats from time to time, and the regular weekly steamer bearing the flag of truce to City Point, these three years, have recently been enlivened by the visit of a French frigate. The captain, leaving the vessel at City Point, has come up to Richmond, on business, it is said, connected with the removal of the tobacco belonging to the Emperor of France which now lies in the Richmond warehouses. By consent of both Governments, Federal and Confederate, the tobacco is to be removed and six or eight French merchantmen are to come for it. Of course there are rumours that Mr. Slidell has obtained, in return for this concession on the part of the Confederate States, assurances of the most friendly character, &c., &c., from His Imperial Majesty, which is all nonsense, &c., &c. The high naval dignitary who is now in the city on this business, is the guest of the French Consul, but he will probably fly from Confederate cuisine at the very earliest possible moment.

The interruption in the execution of the cartel for the exchange of prisoners still detains in our hands 16,000 or 17,000 Yankee soldiers, rank and file, and the mournful ululation of the Northern press and pulpits deepens in volume over the horrible barbarities they charge us with inflicting upon them. They do not hope to deceive Europe with these mendacious reports; nobody abroad, out of the small circle that shouted over the harlequinades of Ward Beecher, will believe them; their purpose is to stimulate enlistment and keep up the war spirit at home by inaugurating a new crusade for the liberation of the captives. There seems little hope just now that the exchange of prisoners will be resumed. Lincoln insists that we shall recognise the negro as the equal of the white man, and this we will never do. Lincoln is just a little behind the Abolition party proper of the North, which now proclaims that the negro is the superior of the white man. An Iowa judge has lately decided that a negro may sue out a writ of habeas corpus but that a white man may not; and the Rev. Dr. S. H. Tyng, of New York City, in a recent sermon, lays down this novel proposition:

"The African race is the embodiment of the highest type of humanity; and as the emotions are superior to the intellect, so is the African the superior of the Caucasian."

A late number of Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper is embellished with a cut representing the negroes on a Mississippi plantation flogging the overseer, and all the indications are that the followers of Beecher and Charles Sumner will soon be blatant pro-slavery men. They will favour the perpetuity of the institution, reversing only the relations of the blacks and whites as master and slave. I commend this solution of the slavery question in America to the notice of the philanthropists of Exeter Hall.

The two branches of the Confederate Congress will convene in the Capitol in this city this day s'ennight. Senators and representatives are already arriving by every train, and it seems probable that a quorum will be had in each House on the first day of the Session.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, December 15.

MILITARY operations are universally thought to be over for weeks, perhaps months, except for irregular movements by guerillas, and such enterprises as that of General Banks, in gradually occupying the coast places in Texas. Meade has taken his army into winter-quarters in Virginia. There is less talk now about removing him for the failure of his last advance upon Lee. Grant is resting at Chattanooga, securing the possession of East Tennessee, and has evidently no thought of advancing upon Atlanta until his preparations are all ready, which it is given out will not be until the opening of the spring; it may be earlier, but not very soon. During the winter both parties will hurry forward to Western Georgia, East Tennessee, and South-Western Virginia, as a great central battle-field, all their disposable forces for a tremendous struggle, to be decisive of military predominance in the heart of the Confederacy.

In the lulling of arms all ears are open to hear what is going on at Washington. Congress is in session, indeed, but business has not yet been commenced. The committees having been only appointed on Monday. But the tone of the two houses is plainly discoverable in the speeches of the leading members and the measures of which notice is given. It is fully in accord with that of the President's Message, which is that of exuberant triumph—and the unrelenting purpose to enjoy and use victory without moderation and without remorse. They seem to be thoroughly convinced that the power of resistance in the South is utterly broken, and that the whole territory may be seized whenever orders are given for the troops to go forward and take possession.

Many people in the North—who share in this delusive opinion that the war could be ended at once if the immense military advantages of the North were vigorously pressed, and accompanied by measures of amnesty, compromise, and liberal concession, to win the submission of the Southern people to their inevitable subjugation, by tendering them the hope of merciful treatment—are fully persuaded that the Administration and its friends in Congress do not desire the war to be closed until their own measures are ripe for carrying into effect the political designs with which they have identified the war, and they reap for themselves the party and personal profit. For those ends, military operations are designedly delayed and edicts are issued by the President, and schemes brought forward in Congress and urged by the organs of party opinion—the effect of which is inevitably, and the design is charged to be, to exasperate the Southern mind beyond the possibility of reconciliation, inflaming it by studied outrage and goading it to desperation. Peace is only offered on such terms of shameful degradation and utter ruin, that any extremity of resistance, however hopeless of success, would be preferable to submission. A protracted warfare is thus ensured by the course of the Administration, purposely indecisive, in order to make its plans for the extinction of the Southern States a continual military necessity, which is allowed to swallow up all questions of constitutional powers, and in order also to ripen into political uses the appetite of the Northern people, which is growing fast into a national passion for seizing and dividing among themselves the whole property and all the lands of the South.

This is the estimate which the Northern men in opposition put before the country of the designs of the Administration. Affecting a high public virtue, they talk of them indignantly as utterly without authority in the constitutional powers of either President or Congress—outrages which every man in the North ought to resist as the caprices of a lawless tyranny, subversive of his own liberties, and no Southern man could yield to without utter ruin as well as infinite baseness. But this opposition exhausts its virtue in angry words, and weakens itself with the effort. It loses ground because it loses character in its shameless inconsistency of arraigning the Administration for great crimes, and at the same time hotly contesting with it for superiority of zeal, in furnishing the excuses under which they are justified and the means by which they are executed.

The conduct of the leaders and journals of the Democratic party leaves no ground for surprise that it has no weight in Congress and no coherence or influence in the country. They present nothing around which an honest, humane, constitutional party could rally, if there were the elements of such. The just men among their followers are confused by their teachings or disheartened by their treacheries. Many of their followers, unable to see any difference in principle, or to foresee any difference in results between their policy and that they attack, yield to the temptations offered them to join with that party which has the dispensation of the spoils and rewards opened to their view by the breaking up of the Government of the Southern States, and the parceling out, among the Northern victors, of all the possessions of 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 of Southern people. By these managements on one side, and mismanagements on the other, during the past two years, the party of the Administration has been made to be all powerful, in the country and in this Congress. Whatever edicts the President may issue, or the policy his party may dictate, will be ratified by the legislative power and carried into effect by the executive and the army, which is absolutely under his control, and which he has moulded into a mighty political machine.

No legislative action is required of this Congress in order to give either money or men to the President. Last winter, in the midst of the Democratic reactions, which were afterwards lost, there was an apprehension at Washington that the House of Representatives might in this Congress be against the Administration; and they made haste to put all important bills beyond the reach of their successors by granting unlimited power to raise money, and passing conscription bills and revenue bills, which the Congress could not touch, except in the way of amendment, and with the consent of the other two branches in which their continued ascendancy was secured. The precaution against repeal of these measures has proved to have been unnecessary; but it leaves little for this Congress to do, except to help in making the bills more effective. The conscription law is to be improved, so as to be more productive; but the power to call out the whole physical force of the country and compel service, needed no enlargement. It is ample and absolute. There is still an unexpended authority to borrow about $900,000,000, so that the Secretary need not ask for any new provisions, except the improvement of the system of taxation already in force, so as to facilitate the payment of interest on the money he has the right to borrow.

The Administration has, therefore, full command of all the resources of the country, the undoubted support of Congress, and the acquiescence, in fact, of its adversaries, in the prosecution of the war, and in the enforcement, by military means, in the first place, and by the auxiliary legislation it may ask for, of its own policy.

The President's Message and the Proclamation which he sent out with it are the charts of that policy. They are his plans, carefully prepared, in consultation with the chiefs of his party, for restoring the authority of the United States, in the States which are expected to be won, by force or submission, within the grasp of the forces of the Union. The President's propositions are these:—

The States in rebellion have forfeited their constitutions, and have no longer a right to possess or to frame any form of government, except such as may be conceded to them by the conquerors.

But by this concession, the inhabitants may now form new constitutions, and create new States, on conditions which the President undertakes to lay down as the law for them.

The population must be loyal citizens of the United States, as defined and created by tests which the President, by virtue of his office, undertakes to impose. It is assumed, in effect, that by secession and war every inhabitant of a seceded State is prima facie disloyal, and needs to be reinstated.

Every person falling within this description is liable to suspicion and arrest, and to confiscation of all his property as a traitor. To all such, with a large list of enumerated exceptions, the President offers the privilege of citizenship within the States: pardon and amnesty to every individual who will come forward and subscribe in person an oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States and a further sworn pledge to support the proclamations and other presidential measures against slavery, and all the acts of Congress for the prosecution of the war, until they are repeated or made void by the Supreme Court of the United States—which he has been engaged in remodelling, so as to be in consonance with him. In other words, no Southern man is to have any share in the government of his State until he shall have declared on oath his acquiescence in the whole abolition and disfranchising policy of President Lincoln.

But all Southern men are not to have even this option. There is a very large class of the best among them, who will not be permitted, if it were possible they could desire, to make themselves thus infamous. The President secures the grovelling character of the constituency he invites, by excepting out of those he is willing to receive on submission, all officers of the Confederate army above the rank of colonel; all officers of the navy above lieutenant, and all persons whatever who have held any civil, political, or diplomatic appointment under the Confederate Government, and a further class of those who have had any direct participation in the treatment of negro soldiers of the United States otherwise than as equal to the whites. In brief terms, every man whom the Southern people have trusted and employed in their struggle for freedom—for his peculiar capacity, eminent trustworthiness, or special ability and desire to serve them, is to be proscribed, hunted, and punished, and they are expected to renounce and denounce him. There was no idea that such men would seek the ignominy of being sworn vassals of the destroyers of their country. The marked exclusion of the possibility shows that only the ignoble, the venal, and the cowardly, were wanted, for such service as the manufacture of new States on the President's model.

The constituency thus carefully selected out of these materials, may, by the President's permission, erect themselves into a State, with such territory as they may define as limiting their jurisdiction. The President only thinks it "not improper" to engage that he would prefer as much respect to the old boundaries, old laws, and ancient habits, as they might find it convenient to observe. As to the numbers required to constitute a sufficient depository for the new State authority, the President is contented to exact that they shall not be less than one-tenth of the number of votes cast at the presidential election of 1860. That one-tenth, if loyal and sufficiently oath-bound to the President's policy, will be maintained by the army of the United States as the true Government of the State.

But this pledge is not without its further conditions. The framers of the new constitution are required to take a preliminary oath that it shall contain nothing at variance with the President's proclamations and the laws of Congress, and that it shall contain an express provision for the prohibition of African slavery within the proposed State.

These are the terms of amnesty and reconciliation on which the President's party affects to expect a return of large masses of the Southern people into the restored Union, the disbanding and dispersion of the Southern armies, and the early submission of the whole country to the authority of the United States and the tender mercies of the Northern Government. They are so wantonly humiliating and deliberately insulting that they give strong confirmation to the political accusations of the enemies of the Administration, that they were purposely made intolerably offensive in the full expectation that they would be scornfully repelled, that peace might be made impossible, and the tremendous war powers remain in their hands, to enable them to make sure of retaining the control of the Government, and to bring in to their help and their profit the sordid passions that are waiting greedily for the extermination of the Southern people and the division of the Union.

It is in grotesque consistency with this mockery of concession for peace, which means war for bloody persecution and universal spoliation, that Mr. Lincoln finds his authority to direct and sanction these weighty changes in a harmless clause of that section of the Constitution which gives to the President the power of granting pardons in all cases except impeachments. On the conceded power to release convicts from the legal penalties of crime he bases the right to extinguish the civil life of great communities, and establish over them new governments, dictated by his own will and administered by his own creatures, under the armed protection of the United States. He reasons that the power to grant pardons includes by necessary construction the power to impose conditions. By easy transition, the power to impose conditions exists without limit. Being competent to release the penalties of the law upon convicted rebels, he may pardon in advance of conviction, on the admission of offence contained in the acceptance of the pardon. By another transition, the employment of pardoned rebels may be dealt with as a part of the war policy, which has no constitutional limits. Whatever pardoned rebels may be required to do for the breaking up of the power of rebels, is a lawful use of the pardoning power for the overthrow of rebellion, and the President's authority is complete to do that, by compact with pardoned rebels for which no statesman ever found the power, direct or implied, in the whole Constitution and all the departments of the Government—the power by executive act to extinguish States that were independent and sovereign before they were betrayed by their faith in a written constitution into a confederation, which grew strong to oppress and now seeks to destroy them. To this hideous system of construction there is not an audible word of dissent among the partisans of the Administration, and the words of protest by the minority are feeble and unheeded. Everything is held to be lawful, or justified as a necessity stronger than law, which ministers to the passions of ambition, cupidity and revenge, that are working together with such demonic energy for the subjugation, humiliation, and plunder of the South.

These lusts, and the insolent assurance of speedy success, exhibit themselves in all the doings and sayings of the new Congress, in the elections for speaker, and the wretched discomfiture of the poor attempts to make it the representative of moderate counsels; in the organisation of the committees; in every incidental debate, even on the most trivial topic, and by the flood of notices already poured in for motions, bills, constitutional amendments, and multitudinous projects for new varieties of vindictive administration, of which the prevailing idea is of the South is at mercy, and the unconcealed and undisguised purpose, to deprive the inhabitants of their civil rights, to overthrow their system of labour, to rob them of their property, and scourge them out of their homes into penniless exile.

I describe to you thus plainly the temper, determination, and passions of the North, that you may understand and admire the great qualities which come forth at the South in the time of their needs, to enable them to bear up as they do against this ferocious enmity, backed by such unlimited resources and wielded with such intensity of desperate will. That there is among them a solemn sense of great peril is avowed in the recent Message of President Davis with a heroic firmness and august dignity which entitle him and his cause to the profound respect of mankind. There is no effort to conceal the anxieties of the situation, the painful disappointment of high expectations, the unfortunate results of great enterprises, the magnitude of the sacrifices and sufferings already incurred, or of the still greater that are yet to be encountered, before the people can hope to be rid of the cruel invasion and possess their liberties and property in peace. The whole condition of public affairs is laid bare, as a father confides his difficulties to his children, and asks their help for the salvation of their common home. The loss of battles, embarrassments of finance, the exposure of important points on an extended frontier which it is impossible to defend everywhere, the coldness and caprices of foreign governments, which, in the name of neutrality, are powerful friends of the North; the greatness of the dangers which thicken around the cause of Southern Independence, and the increased demand for more struggle and more endurance, are all told simply, without the slightest indication of a thought that the manly avowal of the necessities of the State will weaken the courage and faith of the people, or fail to bring out responsive pledges for new efforts and unflinching determination. There is in that Message, and will be found in the manner with which it is received by those to whom it is addressed, the assurance, which the world may accept as unalterably true, although the arrogant North derides it, that the Government and people of the Confederacy are united in the resolute purpose to consent to no end of the war, short of absolute and final Independence.

PARIS TOPICS.

(From our Own Correspondent.)

PARIS, December 29.

THE feeling of disquietude which has for some weeks taken hold of the public might have been expected to yield to the peaceful character of the Emperor's answers to the Senate, and to the speech by which M. Thiers inaugurated his return to public life—a speech which was one of his happiest efforts, as reflecting the universal yearning for quiet which only seems to strengthen by the excitements to war which the radical press now openly indulges in. But yet there is an undefined uneasiness, the cause of which has found a formula of expression—"the dread of the unknown," but whose existence is more distinctly felt than its grounds are defined. It might be thought that when France and England are agreed that there shall be peace, there can be no fear of war; but there is a vague idea that while both peoples are heartily agreed on this subject, the higher Powers who consult for them, and are the best judges of their good, may have otherwise decreed. It may only be that people have made up their minds to be uneasy until after the 1st of January, and that then, the Christmas bills and other sorrows of the past year being settled, they will begin a happy new year with renewed spirits. The news from Holstein is here considered more menacing than, judging from what I read in the London papers, it seems to be thought in England. It is very distinctly felt here that France has a direct interest in the question, and that the doctrine of nationalities which threatens the King of Denmark with the loss of the Duchies because he is a Dane, may also be applied to merge his crown in that of a Scandinavian kingdom because he is a German. In fact, of the "unknown" one element seems to be making itself visible, and men who have for months made up their minds that they were sitting on a powder-barrel, are as much flustered by the lucifer-match which is near at hand as by the torch which has so long been blazing further off.

The French papers published only extracts of the Messages of the Presidents, either document being too long for their columns. They have been very sparing of comment, but the gist of their appreciations may be found in the remark of the Globe, that "Mr. Lincoln's Message is simply absurd, and that that of Mr. Davis bears no impress of despair." One or other half of this judgment is presented in stronger colours, according to the leanings of the writers; but this is the thought that all express. "The only conclusion to be drawn from these documents is the determination on both sides to continue the effusion of blood." It is certain that the interest felt here in the events of a war which no turn of fortune seems to bring nearer that end for which only wars are made now-a-days, peace, has long been flagging, and is now very nearly extinguished, in the general public. I have already mentioned that the reverse is the case in Italy, and that it is in the more advanced journals of the Liberal party of that country that the American struggle is beginning to be appreciated both in its causes and its necessary results. The Commercio, which is the organ of the Society of Political Economy, has of late treated these questions frequently, and I have remarked in it several long extracts from your columns on the economic bearings of the war.

My last letter extended to such a length that I was unable to refer to a very valuable paper, published in the Mémorial Diplomatique of the 20th, on the branches of international law committed by the Prize Courts of New York. The subject is of the highest importance, and is here treated in a thoroughly statesman-like manner. It is well worthy of engaging more attention in England than has hitherto been the case. English publicists are unwilling to touch upon this theme, on the ground that our country, being the greatest maritime Power, and depending, in no small measure, on this for her position in the world, it is our interest to see the rights of belligerents extended, and even to suffer in our present abnormal position of neutrals, for the sake of the increased power which we shall thus acquire as belligerents. Such writers forget that the wrongs we thus put up with can never be drawn into precedents in our favour. We shall have all the world against us if we attempt to enforce the present American practice in our own case, and the very first protests that will be made against the exercise of such rights as we fancy we are acquiring will come from the United States. We are suffering a wrong which is doubly disgraceful: for we know that it is a wrong, and submit to it either from fear or from the hope that we may hereafter derive some profit from it. By the Treaty of Paris, the only people against whom we could enforce those rights would be the United States, which was not included in it; and we well enough know their faithlessness, the spirit of bullying in which they accept the concessions we are making, and that when they are themselves at peace and we at war they will forego no profit for the sake of past complaisance.

All the sea-faring nations in the world are interested in what is now going on in the prize-courts of the United States of America. The solicitude of the French Government should be awakened by them. Although the English flag is alone at this time the victim of the inadmissible pretensions of the Northerners, the decisions we are about to examine, and the grounds on which they are given, are nothing less than a serious attack on the rights of neutrals—the rights which, for several centuries, it has been the particular honour of France to watch over and defend.

The rights and the duties of neutrals and belligerents in time of war are founded on certain essential principles derived from natural right and consecrated by precedents. On the part of neutrals these rights and duties consist in abstaining completely from all interference in acts of hostility; on the part of the belligerents, in the obligation not to suffer the direct consequences of the state of war to weigh injuriously on neutrals. If the neutral violates his duties, he becomes by the very fact of this violation the ally of one of the belligerents, and the enemy of the other, and therefore becomes liable to be treated as an enemy. If it be the belligerent who violates his duties, inasmuch as by this violation he deprives the neutral of the benefits of his neutrality and causes him to suffer the inconveniences of war, he exposes himself to seeing the latter take openly the part of his enemy.

The code which fixes the duties of neutrals and belligerents not being strictly a written law, but a code, which, though derived from the natural law, reposes for the most part on treaties, decisions of courts, and, in a word, on precedents, it becomes essentially important to neutral nations that no unjust precedent which may be invoked at a future time should be introduced into the law of nations."

The writer then examines Judge Betts's decisions in the cases of the Stephen Hart and the Springbok, and concludes that there is in each of them "not one, but several violations of the public law; viz., 1. Arbitrary assimilation of objects of merchandise with contraband of war. 2. Arbitrary seizure of a neutre cargo because it contains some articles of contraband. 3. Seizure and confiscation of neutral merchandise sailing in a neutral bottom between the neutral ports, under the pretext that the merchandise is ultimately destined for one of the belligerents."

There is an appeal from these monstrous eccentricities of American jurisprudence to the Supreme Court of the United States. "Let us hope that they will be reversed. If this expectation be deceived, if the higher magistrature accept these heresies of Judge Betts and confirm his unjust sentences, it will be the duty of all the maritime Powers to protest against this attack on the law of nations."

I mentioned the publication about three weeks ago of a pamphlet by M. Aucaigne on the Russo-American alliance. It is still time to give a short sketch of its contents, which, as it treats of a long existing fact, have not lost their interest. M. Aucaigne answers those writers of the French Liberal, or rather of the Radical press of all countries, who, unable to reconcile their professed admiration for the conduct of the North in the American war and their sympathy for Poland with the cordiality which liberty-bestowing United States parade for tyrant Russia, have taken refuge in the pretext that the hard measure meted out to the North by England and France had forced the unwilling Yankees into the embrace of the Russian bear; that, in short, it was only their utter loneliness in the world which made the friendless Northerners rush into the arms of the "Butcher of Poland." "But you are wrong, my friends," says M. Aucaigne. "Birds of a feather flock together," and I am about to show you that the American vulture belongs to the very same category with the Russian eagle, and delights in precisely the same garbage. They are, in fact, not new allies, but very old friends. Their cries send forth identical broods, on your own showing. Their Butlers, Turchins, McNeils, and other names of infamy, are the very counterparts of the pictures which you daily sketch of the Mouravieffs, Bergs, and Annenkoffs.

In a single day McNeil has hung more prisoners than Mouravieff has sentenced in a month. Villages are burned on the Mississippi on not more provocation than on the Vistula. If the Russian Government condemns the soldiers of the Polish rebellion to a frightful death during the winter months, by forbidding the importation of furs, winter clothing, and shoes, Mr. Lincoln goes much further than this; he makes medicines and the surgical instruments, destined to the hospitals, contraband of war. He condemns his own wounded, whom his generals have a habit of leaving in the hands of the enemy, as well as the Confederate patriots, not to the anæsthetic death of frost, but to the burning agonies of slow death from untended wounds. If pillage on the largest scale be the right of Cossack officers, it is not less the privilege of Federals; but no Cossack would be so shameless as to parade his Polish spoil. He may take money for his booty, or content himself with its destruction; but the Yankee officer, though himself as ignorant of the value of works of art, takes pride in carrying them off to adorn his house, or, perhaps, to present them to some sniffling war-preacher, shrewd in such matters than himself. "We care little," says that shining light, Beecher, "about the Confederates. We want only their land. They may go where they will." No doubt it is a very paying business to exterminate the inhabitants of a country, provided always that one has people ready to occupy it at a handsome rent. Russia has such tenants ready at will, but this little difficulty is a terrible embarrassment to poor Mr. Lincoln. The Czar's position is, in this respect, considerably the better. His serfs do not question the humane motives which prompted his proclamation of emancipation; but Mr. Lincoln makes a merit of having taken this step only as a war measure, and the negroes, undeveloped though their brains may be, have still convolutions enough in them to appreciate the benevolence which told their colour-fellows that there is no room for them in his dominions. If Russian despatches are insolent, Yankee ones can fairly vie with them. Why, oh! my friends, have you two weights and two measures? Is noon at New York sunset at St. Petersburg, morally as well as geographically?"

The parallel is drawn out in a most amusing manner; but it is not all play, even the rough play I offered you specimens of. There is something very serious in the conclusions of this light-toned composition.

Admirers of the Model Republic, hear what a long sojourner in its chief cities says:

"These two countries, Russia and the United States, have been long succeeded in deceiving the opinion of Europe. They have done so because we are about as far from one as from the other. But visitors to either have rarely been taken in, and those who have tarried a time in them, never."

"Was not Russia in the 18th century the Land of Freedom, the Home of Progress, the Ark of the Philosophical Covenant? Who was great, and noble, and virtuous, and liberal of jewelled snuff-boxes like Catherine? All the philosophers of those days, even Voltaire, all, excepting only morose Jean Jacques, sung to this tune.

"Why?"

"Because the Russians, like the Yankees, each after his fashion, are adepts in the harmonious art of singing—their own praise; twin Orpheus, philosophical force nature gambol to their strains, and lively type rush into laudatory forms at their bidding. In plainer language, they know how to make much of chance visitors, and they take care to show them only the right side of the medal.

"Let us look at history, and explain, if we can, how we have been blind to the facts it was meant to teach us in the constant intimacy which may be traced between Russia and the United States.

The sympathy between Russ and Yankee has never been at fault. In 1812 there was war between the United States and England. Russia offered to mediate, but England in those days had ministers, asses perhaps, whom Orpheus strains could not charm. They at first refused the offer, but, pressed hard in the great Napoleonic struggle, they at length agreed, and Russia testified her zeal for the interests of her transatlantic friend by extorting from Great Britain—intent above all things on securing the liberties of Europe—the price of the slaves whom the English had made prisoners both in the North and the South. At that time the North had slaves of its own—an expensive bargain in a cold climate—of which they were determined to be rid by selling them into the South. They had calculated their value, and were more clamorous than the planters themselves for the restitution of their lost slaves or their price. England was, perhaps, more loath to seem thus to sanction the institution by paying a price than to sacrifice the money, so at least said her statesmen; but she was forced to yield to the urgent representations of Russia, which was drawing large subsidies on her own account at the same time.

"Again, we find Russia the very good friend of the United States, when they extorted from Louis Philippe, by threat of war, a payment of 23,000,000 francs. Russia, on this occasion, by weighing on the would-be founder of a left-handed dynasty, obtained the payment which the threat that accompanied the claim should have rendered impossible in France, and in return for the darling dollars she had helped to extort, American sympathy was undisguisedly with Russia in the Crimean war, and gave her all the aid she could—with profit to herself.

"If we bring all these facts together, add to them Mr. Seward's 'sentiment,' telegraphed to the Russian banquet at New York in honour of Prince Gortschakoff; the hot haste with which the prince refused the French proposal of mediation; and, again, the moral tendencies and the past history of the two countries, we shall come to understand that the Russo-American alliance, officious and private at the New York fête, will become official and formal at no distant day."

From the summary I give, it may be seen that the pamphlet is well worth reading.

The telegrams continue to bring hourly more alarming reports of the dangerous state of things in Germany. For fifteen years great Deutschland has brooded over the wrongs inflicted upon it in the matter of the Duchies, and now at the most dangerous moment in modern history it rises from its beer-cans and rushes frantic towards the Elber. The Bourse, however, of this evening, so long stagnant at 66.50, or thereabouts, has only fallen 5 centimes, notwithstanding the telegram from the Europe, of Frankfurt,—"There can be no longer any illusion; war is inevitable, imminent!" We take comfort here in the still lingering echoes of M. Thiers' speech; we persuade ourselves that it has been taken to heart in high places, and we fancy we can see a bright cloud in the stormy horizon, no less than a counterpart of the celebrated New Year's speech of 1859. Not this time the thunderclap, but the gentle dew of heaven which blesteth, &c. There are persistent rumours renewed, even at this last minute, of the reduction by 100,000 men of the force now under arms. This would be answered by a rise of 3 or 4 per cent. in the funds, and by a general broadening of the financial features which have for so long looked so drearily long. But we must not be too eager to accept such good auguries. Besides the hand-breadth of storm looking black in the North, there is a fleecy little cloud in the South-eastern corner of the Mediterranean, going up from the famous rigoles of the Suez canal—all the water that can be poured into it with the aid of 20,000 Egyptian fellahs may be wanted to effuse the dry phrases in which it pleased Her Majesty's Ministers to express her answer to the Emperor's invitation. The Sultan's answer is published in to-day's Moniteur, but shorn of its fairest part, the page of titles—which would have given at least some amusement to Figaro and the Charivari.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

WEDNESDAY EVENING, DEC. 30.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

In all monetary and commercial circles, business during the week has been greatly circumscribed, but nothing of an adverse nature having occurred to create alarm, a generally good feeling has prevailed. The money market has become much easier, and in consequence the directors of the Bank of England felt themselves justified at their weekly meeting on Thursday last in reducing the minimum rate of discount from 8 to 7 per cent., a course which at this season must prove of the greatest advantage to the commercial community. Money continues tolerably abundant in all quarters, but within the last day or two the applications for discount, to meet the engagements maturing at the end of the year, have considerably increased both at the Bank and in the open market. The brokers, however, have not advanced their terms. The lowest rate for first-class paper is 6½ per cent., but exceptional transactions are recorded at a fraction lower. The joint-stock banks are working their resources at full rates. On the Stock Exchange money was in rather large demand this morning, and the terms for advances on Government Securities were 6 to 6½ per cent., but subsequently there was more ease, and money was lent at 5½ to 6 per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The transactions in bullion and specie have been on a contracted scale, but on the whole the results must be regarded as favourable. Although the amount sent into the Bank is comparatively small, £151,000, on the other hand, it is satisfactory to know that there have been no withdrawals for transmission abroad. The arrivals of specie have been £40,000, but of this large amount £260,000 is from the West Indies, and the remainder from New York. The Bombay steamer, which left on the 27th, took out £36,650, of which £317,350 was in silver for Bombay, and the remainder, gold, for Bombay and Alexandria. There has been an active demand for bar silver, but owing to the small supply in hand, the price has improved to 5s. 1½d. per ounce. The Mexican dollars brought by the last West India mail, have just been sold at 5s. 1d. per ounce, being the same as before. The Prince of Wales and the Transatlantic, from Australia, are still out at sea, one with £142,000 in gold, and the other with 15,000 sovereigns.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The Christmas holidays have to a certain extent put a stop to business during the greater part of the week, and anything like activity cannot be looked for till after the commencement of the new year. Still, for the two or three days that business may be said to have been in progress, a fair amount of dealings have been recorded in the English Stock Market. There has, however, been very little variation in prices, but quotations have nevertheless been well supported. Consols closed this evening the same as on this day week, viz.—91½ to 92 ex. div. for money, and 91½ to 92 ex. div. for the account. Exchequer bills are also without change, being still at 9s. to 4s. dis. A more active business has been transacted in foreign stocks, particularly in those of a more speculative description. At one period Greek declined 1½ per cent. on sundry adverse rumours; but there has since been some recovery. Mexican remains steady; Spanish Passives have improved ½, and the Certificates ¾ per cent. There has been but little alteration in Turkish. The closing quotations this evening were—Greek, 24½ to 25; Mexican, 37½ to 37½; Spanish Passives, 33½ to 33½; and the Certificates 13½ to 14½; Turkish (1854) 89½ to 90½; Ditto (1862) 70½ to 70½.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Considering the unsettled state of business during the week the dealings in American Government and Railway Securities have been pretty numerous, but prices have not been well supported, and the market closed this evening with weakness, and with very little inclination on the part of the dealers to operate. The dealings have comprised, Virginia State Six per Cents. at 33; Atlantic and Great Western, New York Section, 81½; ditto ditto, Pennsylvania Section, 80½, 79½, 80½, and 79½; Erie $100, all paid, 65½, 66, 67, and 66½; Illinois Central Seven per Cents. 74½ and 74; ditto ditto $100, $90 paid, 24½, 23½, 24½, and 24 discount; Marietta and Cincinnati Railway Bonds, 73 and 72; and New York Central Seven per Cent. Convertible Bonds, 80½.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Although the transactions in the British railway share market have been less numerous than usual, still a fair business has been done, at, in almost all instances, improved quotations. To-day, however, there has been less animation, and, in some instances, prices have fractionally receded. As compared with last week, the following changes have taken place:—In Caledonian a rise of 1½ per cent.; Great Northern have advanced 1½ per cent.; Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and North British, each 1 per cent.; Midland, North Eastern (York), and North London ¾ per cent.; Great Eastern, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Brighton, Chatham, and Dover, London and North-Western, Metropolitan, North-Eastern (Berwick), and do. do. (Leeds), each ½ per cent. The only decline has been in North Staffordshire, which are down 1 per cent. There is scarcely any alteration to notice in foreign railway shares; business has been generally restricted and prices steady. There has also been but little doing in the shares of those undertakings connected with the British possessions, but quotations are uniformly supported.

THE CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market continues inactive; the quotations are unchanged, 37 to 39.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

The Mauritius Land, Credit, and Agency Company, (Limited), has just been brought out, the capital required being £250,000, in 12,500 shares of £20 each, of which 1,500 shares are reserved for Mauritius. It is not intended, however, to call up more than £4 per share. This company has been organised and introduced by the International Financial Society, and is another of those useful undertakings which are seeking to utilise capital in our various colonies. It is stated that the legal rate of interest on mortgages in Mauritius being 9 per cent., the company will be able to preserve such a margin as will enable them to realise a considerable profit on the small amount of paid up capital required to conduct the business. The Credit Foncier system of a sinking fund is to be adopted, and the Company's investments, besides being limited to first mortgages, are to be strictly limited in amount. The prospectus has also been issued of the Western Fire Insurance Company, with a proposed capital of £1,000,000 in 100,000 shares of £10 each, of which the first issue is to consist of 25,000 shares. A deposit of 10s. is to be paid on application, and 10s. more on allotment, beyond which the prospectus states no further call is anticipated. The Company has been established to work in conjunction with the Western Life Insurance Company, established in 1842. Thus associated, it will commence its operations with many substantial advantages over similar new undertakings; the valuable and widely diffused connections already established, whose influence and support have been secured; a large number of agencies completely organised and in full working order, with fully appointed chief offices in London and Manchester, and branch offices at Birmingham, Liverpool, Plymouth, Shrewsbury, Bradford, and other important places. From these advantages the formation of this company will be attended with but small expense, and a large amount of business will be immediately obtained. The prospectus of the English and Foreign Library Company has, likewise, been issued, the object being to purchase the stock and good-will of Hookham's Library, in Old Bond-street, which, founded in 1764, is the oldest establishment of the kind in the metropolis. The capital is to be £100,000 in 10,000 shares of £10 each, with a deposit of £1 on application and payment of £1 10s. on allotment.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At the annual meeting of the Oriental Inland Steam Navigation Company held to-day, the report of the directors was adopted. It appears that great losses have followed the company's operations on the Ganges, but the twelve months' operations on the Indus had been attended with satisfactory results. It is intended to transfer a portion of the company's fleet to the Indus, from which favourable results are anticipated.—At the half-yearly meeting of the Canal Company, also held to-day, a dividend of £1 per share was declared.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In most departments, business, since our last, has been checked by the usual holidays, and the markets for American produce have not formed an exception to the general rule. But a firm and healthy tone is perceptible, notwithstanding the prevailing quiet, and a steady legitimate demand for all the leading descriptions of produce is expected on the resumption of business in the new year. As an exception to the general inactivity at the moment, cotton has sold freely and has advanced ¼d. to ½d. lb. The grain markets are firm, with small supplies of both home and foreign produce. In American provisions the dealings have been confined to some trifling sales of New York singed bacon sides at 38s. to 40s. Large arrivals of American beef have caused buyers to look for earlier rates, and transactions consequently remain in abeyance. Holders of fine qualities are however firm. Petroleum maintains the recent advance, 2s. to 2s. 1d. per gallon being the present quotation. Lined oil has not further given way, but the market is still dull. Rape oil is a shade firmer. In fish oils there is too little doing to establish quotations. Turpentine has advanced to 72s. per cwt. for French; for American quotations are nominally unaltered. Tallow is again dearer owing to the threatening aspect of political affairs in the North of Europe. For fute the demand is dull, but the tendency rather firm than otherwise. In sugar nothing worth naming has taken place. Drugs and drysaltary articles have participated in the general dullness, but in the few transactions that have occurred steady rates have been paid. The metal trade has been very active all the week. For Scotch pig-iron extensive contracts have been made, and prices have further advanced 3s. per ton, bringing the present quotation up to £3 9s. 6d. cash. In spelter, also, a considerable business has taken place, the closing prices being £20 to £20 5s. on the spot, or 20s. per ton advance of the rates of this day week.

COTTON AND DRY GOODS MARKET.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, Dec. 30.

The intervention of the Christmas holidays has, to a certain extent, interfered with the progress of business, but nevertheless a fair number of dealings have taken place; prices have advanced, and still exhibit an upward tendency. The sales this week have amounted to 31,000 bales, of which 15,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year have been 2,575,420 bales, and to the same period last year 2,702,070 bales. There have been imported this year 1,627,648 bales, and to the like period in 1862, 1,557,733 bales. There have been exported this year 467,135 bales, to the same period last year 416,986 bales. Taken for consumption this year 1,299,600 bales; to the like period last year 1,161,400 bales. Taken on speculation this year 750,710 bales, same in 1862, 1,087,390 bales. Computed stocks at the present time 250,270 bales, same period last year 216,320 bales. For American descriptions, slightly higher prices have in some instances been obtained. In Sea Islands there has been but little doing at smaller rates. Egyptians have been in fair demand, at a slight advance in quotations. In Brazil the dealings have only been moderate, but previous rates have prevailed. Surats have been well supported, but the supply is somewhat limited. The latest quotations this afternoon were: American 26d. to 29d. Egyptian 26½d. to 34d. Pernambuco 22½d. to 23d. Bahia and Macao 25½d. to 27½d. Maranhao 27½d. to 28½d. Japan 21½d. and Surats 15½d. to 25½d.

MANCHESTER, December 29.

We have very little to say of our last week's business, a only a few trifling transactions have been entered into, and many millowners have taken advantage of the holiday time to close their works for a few days.

Telegrams from India to hand on Monday, although of an unfavourable character, were not quite so bad as had been reported in the earlier part of the day; this, combined with more favourable advices from China, and a disposition shown by the Liverpool market to advance again, produced a rather better feeling on the part of holders, who held out firmly for the prices of the week previous.

To-day (Tuesday) a better tone has been manifested by spinners and manufacturers generally, who have advanced their pretensions. Home trade yarns may be said to be about ¼d. per lb. dearer than last week. Although some few dealers would not sell under an advance of ¼d. per lb.

In cloth very little has been done and quotations are only nominal.

General Polk assumed command at Enterprise, Mississippi, on 20th November. In an order of the day he says:—"In conformity with orders from the President of the Confederate States, I assume command of the prisoners captured and paroled at Port Hudson and Vicksburg. The place of rendezvous for both garrisons is fixed at Enterprise. Of these prisoners some have been organised, exchanged and returned to the field. The rest should be prepared to follow their comrades at the earliest moment. The emergencies of the service, as well as the brilliant pages they have already contributed to the history of the war, demand this. To accomplish it, they must be in hand, well disciplined, and ready to resume their arms so soon as exchanged."

We are informed, upon undoubted authority, that the Messrs. Laird have received several bona fide offers for their celebrated iron-clad rams from friendly Powers who are at peace with themselves and all the rest of the world. Messrs. Laird have positively declared that the vessels are not for sale; and it would thus seem that they have no desire to shirk the responsibility of proving that they took the order for the construction of the ships in the first instance from parties whose connection with either one or the other of the American belligerents it will be difficult, if not impossible, to show. The last offer for the purchase of the "rams" was refused only in the early part of this week.—The Army and Navy Gazette.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

Two Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLLY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.
